START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

June 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-045

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops Tanglewood	 1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops Tanglewood	 1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops Tanglewood	 1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO Pops	 1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO Pops Tanglewood	 1944-1945
75	BSO Pops Tanglewood	 1945-1946
76	BSO Pops Tanglewood	 1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO Pops	 1951-1952
83	BSO Pops	 1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO Pops	 1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO Pops	 1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO Pops	 1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO Pops	 1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO Pops	 1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO Pops	 1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO Pops	 1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO Pops	 1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO Pops	 1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO Pops	 1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO Pops	 1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO Pops	 1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO Pops	 1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO Pops	 1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO Pops	 1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO Pops	 1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO Pops	 1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO Pops	 1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 45

Volumes 80-81

BSO
1949-1951
to Tanglewood
1950-1951

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 80

BSO

1949 - 1951

NATIONAL FLAT BACK SCRAP BOOKS

Made in U.S.A.

FULL DUCK COVER, MANILA PAPER

Without Index, Ruling, Paging or Title

NUMBER	THICKNESS	SIZE
1032	72 Leaves	12⅝ × 10¼
1033	72 Leaves	15 × 10
1034	100 Leaves	15 × 10
1036	90 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
1038	150 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
1039	90 Leaves	18 × 13
→ 1041	150 Leaves	18 × 13
1042	150 Leaves	25 × 20

To duplicate this book Order Number indicated by arrow

BLANK PAGE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Turns a Page

NOW THAT Charles Münch is taking charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Serge Koussevitzky, answers are foreshadowed to questions of artistic policy. Mr. Münch comes to America a Frenchman, and no doubt he will, in all essentials, remain one. For Dr. Koussevitzky came a Russian, and he remained Russian, though acquiring, in the progress of his career, citizenship in the adopted country.

That the Boston Symphony will be converted, however, into something French is a remote likelihood. Certainly it has not been rebuilt into anything Russian by Dr. Koussevitzky. It will never, we may be sure, become a replica of the Orchestre National of France, which gave a concert in Boston last autumn with Mr. Münch conducting. Brilliant and interesting as that ensemble proved to be, it was not what Bostonians would want their organization changed into, or that they would find their aspirations appropriately expressed by.

* * *

No; the Boston Symphony, despite all conductorial influence, will remain the orchestra it has been from its foundation. A conductor's individuality explains much, yet not everything, nor even the main thing. We can tell, indeed, by the figure a conductor cuts when he walks on the platform how he will do the job. To take an example from the past, Karl Muck, who held the Boston Symphony baton for a couple of seasons in the early nineteen hundreds, and for other seasons just before and along into World War I, habitually stepped in sight upon the stage with the bearing of someone commanding the situation, which for him was the orchestral ambiance chiefly; for he exercised little emotional control over the audient spaces at his back.

Then consider Max Fiedler, who spelled Muck for four seasons between Muck's terms. When Fiedler paced the path from the side door of the Symphony Hall platform to his desk out front, his air was that of leader and gerant who not so much dictated the actions of the performers as aroused, moderated, and swayed the feelings of the listeners.

* * *

Without drawing complete conclusions from these two, and still allowing them to illustrate opposite types, we may look at Dr. Koussevitzky and say that he, during his long period of service, has combined them both, by regulating the doings of his instrumentalists and by guiding and diverting this way and that the mood and temper of his public. It may be, too, that this double gift, talent, and capacity of his was what enabled him to keep his place for 25 years.

Yet while Dr. Koussevitzky has remained, elemental characteristics of the town itself have remained, too. An attitude of Bostonians toward the art of tone, and perhaps toward all art—something acquired in the eighteenth-century Tory living at the North End, and added to in the nineteenth-century making of the city on the borders of Boston Common and the extending of it over lagoon and marsh and to regions across bridges and ferries, has also stayed constant.

* * *

Now if 25 years is long for a music director's tenure, it is but a brief stretch in social history; and in respect to the art of tone, the thing to be thought of is the Bostonian ear. For any place of long residential habit develops special concern for sound, with the result that each city has an ear of its own. To exemplify, there is the Parisian ear, which notoriously refuses to enjoy Tchaikovsky. Then don't forget the ear of Londoners, which Americans, until a few decades ago, so trusted and relied upon that they received pianists into their concert halls on the mere good report of London. Singers, down to World War II, had only to appear at Covent Garden to be accepted for opera in New York.

Wide World

Conducting Technique of Serge Koussevitzky

* * *

No need to speak of Vienna and Leipzig. Orchestral conductors have regularly entered into activity in the United States under acclaim from Vienna or after training at Leipzig, go back as far as you like. Fair to admit, moreover, regarding conductors, they possess, every one of them, inalienable powers and inheritances that audiences respond to. There was Arthur Nikisch of Boston Symphony legend, who could introduce the rising scale passage of the early measures of Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture No. 3 with a tonitruous force that set him apart from any batonist of his day and perhaps of any other. His small hand and short arm enabled him to make a down-beat that brought every instrument to simultaneous accent on the attack. The same for his dealing with the horns in the first movement of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. Then Koussevitzky, incumbent 60 years after Nikisch—did anyone, or will anyone, ever surpass him for delicate handling of the doublebasses in the Finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony?

Geoffrey Landesman

Charles Münch, New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

* * *

In Dr. Koussevitzky's time, when Boston, through technical chance and change, assumed a peripheral instead of a central character, the Bostonian ear was fain to attune itself to a large, broad, expansive sonority. The community having resolved itself into a chain and necklace of residential quarters or municipalities, many subscribers to the Symphony concerts found themselves negotiating distances of which formerly they knew nothing. They might almost as well have been dwellers in settlements along the Volga River, like the people to whom Dr. Koussevitzky in his early conducting days transported players and gave orchestral programs. At the beginning of his career he was inspired, inevitably, with that bigness, that grandeur, that sublimity, which Russians so delightedly affect.

* * *

He brought this thing along with him to Boston, and he found it suited well the public of the broad topographical sweep. But we shall find it logically disappearing with him from the orchestral scene, and we shall have what Thoreau zealots might call a new tune on our telegraph harp. The Bostonian ear will desire again music from the inner heart of the orchestra; in fine, music from the players rather than dominantly from the conductor. In the coming time, accordingly, the noisy brass of the Boston Symphony may be expected to recede; the wood winds may be expected to rise to significance again, and the violins may be expected to reassert a warmth and pulse which they possess and have long represented.

* * *

The orchestra in such event will become neither French nor like French under Mr. Münch. It will simply become the ideal Boston Symphony; while the new conductor, for his part, will manifest, we may hope, the precision of Nikisch, the melody of Muck, the good humor of Fiedler, and the passion of Koussevitzky.

WINTHROP P. TRYON

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES
SEP 3 - 1949

THE SOUNDING BOARD

Koussevitzky's Art Wins Acclaim at Bowl

BY ALBERT GOLDBERG

One of Hollywood Bowl's more historic events occurred last night with the first appearance there of Serge Koussevitzky, who has just retired as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after a quarter of a century of service that marked an epoch in the American musical scene. The audience, though not as large as it should have been, still considerably outnumbered the average season attendance for symphony concerts, and the orchestra rose to greet the distinguished maestro as he made his customary lordly approach to the podium.

Though he is now accepting guest conducting engagements, during his long term with the Boston Symphony Koussevitzky seldom conducted other orchestras and it was particularly interesting to observe his art separated from the famous orchestra which he developed into one of the most polished instruments of its kind the world has ever known.

Passion for Clarity

Even in the comparatively short period of rehearsal he had to impose his ideas upon a strange orchestra, the outstanding characteristics of his conducting were strongly in evidence. He has above all a passion for clarity; every score that comes under his attention is revealed in microscopic detail. Each strand of tone stands forth in its own right. No voice in the orchestra obscures any other voice that should be heard, and there is never a doubt, for instance, what the second clarinet or the second bassoon are up to; all the secondary parts are given as devoted attention as the major ones, and there is never any skimping.

Slow Tempos

It is this unremitting attention to detail that gives to Koussevitzky's conducting its characteristic intensity, an intensity that is constantly reflected in his quivering beat and his surgent gestures. It also in part accounts for his preference for comparatively slow and distinct tempos; there is excitement through his conducting on occasion but there is never rush or hurry. In that respect he is more an example of an earlier race of musicians than he is of the present feverish age of speed and fury.

Both Beethoven's "Egmont Oveture" and the Seventh Symphony were unrolled in a specious, leisurely manner. No idiomatic inflection was lost or overlooked, and though faithfulness to the letter of the score was paramount, the total impression was of a highly personalized interpretation. The orchestra had obviously been painstakingly rehearsed to the most minute nuance, and the satisfaction the conductor had expressed with musicians and their previous training were reflected in performances that seemed to express the leader's intentions completely.

Powerful Reading

Our own preference for Koussevitzky has always been in more romantic and emotional music, and this aspect of his art was strikingly displayed in the Second Symphony of Sibelius. No one has done more to acquaint the American public with the music of this still neglected master than Koussevitzky, and his reading, filled with sonorous string and brass passages, and the most sensitive delineation of the melodic lines, was both powerful and definitive.

His success with the public, needless to say, was tremendous, and throughout the evening the orchestra added its unrestrained plaudits to those of the audience.

DIAPASON
CHICAGO, ILL.
SEP 1 - 1949

BIGGS TO OPEN BACH FETE OF 1950 OVER RADIO NETWORK

In celebration of the coming Bach anniversary in 1950, E. Power Biggs announces the performance of the entire organ literature of Johann Sebastian Bach, to be presented on the national scale and coverage afforded by radio. Programming in sequence of the extensive repertoire will begin on the Biggs program Sunday, Sept. 25, over the Columbia Broadcasting System and will continue throughout 1950. Sept. 25 also marks the beginning of the eighth year of these CBS network broadcasts.

Crowds of several thousand each week attended the three Bach recitals played by Mr. Biggs in the music shed at the Berkshire Music Center during the 1949 Berkshire festival.

Mr. Biggs has received the honor of being elected a fellow of the Royal Academy of Music.

Mr. Biggs is to be soloist at the opening concert of the Evansville Philharmonic Orchestra, Evansville, Ind. George Dasch will conduct the Sowerby Concerto in C major for organ and orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 8 - 1949

MUNCH'S BOSTON BOW TO BE 1900 PROGRAM

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Sept. 7—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today they had received a cable from their new conductor, Charles Munch, informing them that he would leave France by plane on Sept. 15 to begin his duties. Mr. Munch succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired in June after twenty-five years in the post.

An orchestra spokesman said Mr. Munch, a native of Alsace, had been spending much of a two-month vacation improving his mastery of the English language.

In recognition of the fiftieth anniversary year of the orchestra, Mr. Munch's first program, Oct. 7, will be the same one conducted by Wilhelm Gericke when the organization moved into the new Symphony Hall from the old Music Hall in 1900.

The program includes Weber's overture to "Euryanthe"; Handel's organ concerto No. 4; ballet music and entr'acte from "Rosamunde" by Schubert, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
SEP 8 - 1949

BSO's New Leader To Fly From Paris For First Concert

BOSTON — Receiving a cable from Charles Munch, officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that their new conductor will fly from Paris Sept. 15 to assume his duties immediately in order to rehearse the orchestra for the opening 69th season Oct. 7 in Symphony Hall.

In recognition of the 50th anniversary year of Symphony Hall, he has chosen for his first appearance the exact program Wilhelm Gericke presented at the opening concert in the then new hall on Oct. 19 and 20, 1900.

Succeeding Dr. Serge Koussevitzky who retired this summer after 25 years as conductor, Mr. Munch will include Handel's fourth organ concerto, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," ballet music and Entr'Acte from "Rosamunde" by Schubert, and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

Mr. Munch, a native of Alsace, has been touring France this summer where he fulfilled conducting engagements. It has been reported by members of the Boston Symphony that he has been spending much of his two-month's vacation improving his mastery of the English language.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 11 1949

MUNCH TO ASS

Boston, Sept. 10.- Munch will fly ho Thursday to assume as conductor of th phony Orchestra, it tonight. The famed tor will succeed sevitzky who retir 25 seasons as head

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
SEP 11 1949

First Concerts by Munch Marks Hall's Anniversary

Since next month marks the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of Boston's Symphony Hall, Charles Munch will devote the program of his first concerts as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular conductor, on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Oct. 7 and 8, to the works played in the orchestra's first subscription concerts in that hall under Wilhelm Gericke on Oct. 19 and 20, 1900. These are Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Handel's fourth organ concerto, the ballet music and entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the soloist. Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," given in the opening dedicatory concert in Symphony Hall on Oct. 15, 1900, will be given under Mr. Munch for the orchestra's spring pension fund concert. Leonard Bernstein and Richard Burgin will conduct the orchestra for two weeks each. Although it had been rumored that Serge Koussevitzky would make some mid-season guest appearances with the Boston Symphony, this is not mentioned in the orchestra's latest announcement.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
SEP 10 1949

Will Conduct Symphony In Boston Season

Charles Munch will arrive Friday by plane from France to assume his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The season begins in Symphony Hall on Oct. 7.

At the opening concert the new conductor will commemorate the 50th anniversary of Symphony Hall itself by repeating the exact program conducted by Wilhelm Gericke at the first concert in the hall, Oct. 19, 1900.

* * *

THE PROGRAM consists of Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto, with E. Power Biggs as soloist on the new organ installed this summer; the ballet music and entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosa-Munde"; and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Charles Munch, the 10th conductor of the orchestra, is the third Frenchman to hold the post, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux having held it 1918-1924. Among soloists scheduled for his first season as conductor are Francois Poulenc, who will appear as pianist in a new work of his own; Nicole Henriot, young French pianist; Robert Casadesus, pianist, and Raya Garbousova, cellist, neither of whom has appeared with the orchestra for several seasons; Byron Janis, pianist, the duo-pianists, Whittemore and Lowe and Ossy Renardy, Isaac Stern, Ginette Reveu and Zino Francescatti, violinists.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will share the 1950 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood with Mr. Munch, has announced he will not appear as gest oenductor with orchestra this winter.

Leonard Bernstein, who has conducted at Tanglewood and Boston, will appear as guest conductor for two weeks, as will Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra.

* * *

BEETHOVEN'S "Missa Solemnis" will be presented at the orchestra's Spring Pension Fund concert, and Bach's "Passion According to St. John" during Holy Week, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society joining the orchestra for both these performances. Mr. Munch will introduce Honegger's "Joan de Arc at the Stake" at a special midwinter concert with a newly organized chorus assisting. While the classical repertory will furnish the major part of his programs, little known and rarely heard works, past and present, will also be included.

The orchestra will appear twice in Hartford. Mr. Munch, a native of Strasbourg, Alsace, where he was born in 1891, was the founder of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and Paris Symphony Orchestra. He first came to this country in 1946.

Still vigorously interested in romoting the musical welfare o ll segments of the country oussevitzky was impressed by he Southland's high percentage o oth musical and per capit vealth. "How many people do yo ave here now—three million Four million? Just think, 25 cent year from every person woul give you a million dollars a yea o invest in music. Who wouldn' oe willing to give 25 cents a yea for such a cause?"

But always, he feels, the battl must go forward—for higher mus ical standards, for more vigorou community participation, for a alert and discriminating publi that will accept nothing less tha the finest.

"How do you get these things? he echoed our question. "You figh for them, my dear. You fight, an you never give up. A person wh is in the right is never alone."

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS
SEP 9 1949

★ Mildred Norton

(Drama-Music Editor)

Nearly 75 years of serving the cause of music have made Serge Koussevitzky uniquely qualified to discuss both the headaches and the rewards of such a life.

Talking with him, you quickly discover that the rewards, for him, so outweigh the headaches in importance that the buoyant enthusiasm, the swift imagination of youth still vitalize every subject that engages him.

Now on his first visit west after 25 years of holding the Boston Symphony in foremost position among the nation's orchestras, Koussevitzky says he was particularly impressed by the fine caliber of players he found in the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra during the past week he worked with them at Hollywood Bowl.

"You know," he declared, "I was literally amazed. The first bassoon, the first clarinet, the first oboe and the first horn, for instance, are wonderful players. The strings are good, too. In fact, the entire group is one of the finest I have come across.

"These men are quickly responsive, too. They love music; you can feel this when you conduct them. But it is difficult for them to play under so many different guest conductors at the Bowl. One or two, yes; but for the Bowl season as a whole there should be one steady conductor."

Encouraging young talent

Although this year Koussevitzky retired from the gruelling routine of conducting more than 100 winter concerts in addition to planning the repertoire and teaching young conductors during his "vacation" months, his summers are still devoted to his beloved Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center which he founded in 1940.

This was the realization of his lifelong dream to create a place where students, teachers and professional musicians could gather to study and exchange ideas. With Koussevitzky's vibrant personality as the nucleus, the Berkshires have become an international mecca for musicians, as well as for music lovers who attend the annual festivals 10,000 strong daily throughout every August.

For a man so imbued with a desire to share his musical wealth, merely cutting a dramatic figure on the podium is not enough. To Koussevitzky, music is truly a way of life, and a conductor has not fulfilled his mission until he has activated every one of a community's potentials for music.

This intense desire to foster a love of music in everyone is reflected not only in his impassioned podium readings but in the equal fervor which has made his entire life a crusade against indifferent musical standards and public apathy.

As a young man in Czarist Russia, he loaded his newly-minted orchestra of 75 players into a barge and introduced the music of Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Beethoven in free concerts to every village and hamlet along the Volga shores.

In Paris, as a leader of the avant-garde, he made himself the champion of new talent, premiering works, later to become famous, which even the canny French then viewed askance. When, in 1924, he assumed leadership of the Boston Symphony, it was to create from an orchestra fallen into disrepair a brilliant ensemble that is long acknowledged the country's finest.

American composers

In America, Koussevitzky continued his championing of the young, the new, the neglected. 'Sometimes the compositions I performed were bad," he confesses 'I knew it. But how is a young composer to improve unless he can hear how his music sounds?"

With the emergence of Tanglewood, came also new recognition for the young American conductor. Leonard Bernstein, who will guest conduct the Los Angeles Philharmonic this fall, is one of the brilliant youngsters to come out of Tanglewood; Thor Johnson is another.

[4]

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES
SEP 3 - 1949

THE SOUNDING BOARD

Koussevitzky's Art Wins Acclaim at Bowl

BY ALBERT GOLDBERG

One of Hollywood Bowl's more historic events occurred last night with the first appearance there of Serge Koussevitzky, who has just retired as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after a quarter of a century of service that marked an epoch in the American musical scene. The audience, though not as large as it should have been, still considerably outnumbered the average season attendance for symphony concerts, and the orchestra rose to greet the distinguished maestro as he made his customary lordly approach to the podium.

Though he is now accepting guest conducting engagements, during his long term with the Boston Symphony Koussevitzky seldom conducted other orchestras and it was particularly interesting to observe his art separated from the famous orchestra which he developed into one of the most polished instruments of its kind the world has ever known.

Passion for Clarity

Even in the comparatively short period of rehearsal he had to impose his ideas upon a strange orchestra, the outstanding characteristics of his conducting were strongly in evidence. He has above all a passion for clarity; every score that comes under his attention is revealed in microscopic detail. Each strand of tone stands forth in its own right. No voice in the orchestra obscures any other voice that should be heard, and there is never a doubt, for instance, what the second clarinet or the second bassoon are up to; all the secondary parts are given as devoted attention as the major ones, and there is never any skimping.

Slow Tempos

It is this unremitting attention to detail that gives to Koussevitzky's conducting its characteristic intensity, an intensity that is constantly reflected in his quivering beat and his surgent gestures. It also in part accounts for his preference for comparatively slow and distinct tempos; there is excitement through his conducting on occasion, but there is never rush or hurry. In that respect he is more an example of an earlier race of musicians than he is of the present feverish age of speed and fury.

Both Beethoven's "Egmont Overture" and the Seventh Symphony were unrolled in a spacious, leisurely manner. No idiomatic inflection was lost or overlooked, and though faithfulness to the letter of the score was paramount, the total impression was of a highly personalized interpretation. The orchestra had obviously been painstakingly rehearsed to the most minute nuance, and the satisfaction the conductor had expressed with musicians and their previous training were reflected in performances that seemed to express the leader's intentions completely.

Powerful Reading

Our own preference for Koussevitzky has always been for more romantic and emotional music, and this aspect of his art was strikingly displayed in the Second Symphony of Sibelius. No one has done more to acquaint the American public with the music of this still neglected master than Koussevitzky, and his reading, filled with sonorous string and brass passages, and the sensitive delineation of the ... ic lines, was both powerful ... definitive.

His success with the public, needless to say, was tremendous, and throughout the evening the orchestra added its unrestrained plaudits to those of the audience.

DIAPASON
CHICAGO, ILL.
SEP 1 - 1949

BIGGS TO OPEN BACH FETE OF 1950 OVER RADIO NETWORK

In celebration of the coming Bach anniversary in 1950, E. Power Biggs announces the performance of the entire organ literature of Johann Sebastian Bach, to be presented on the national scale and coverage afforded by radio. Programming in sequence of the extensive repertoire will begin on the Biggs program Sunday, Sept. 25, over the Columbia Broadcasting System and will continue throughout 1950. Sept. 25 also marks the beginning of the eighth year of these CBS network broadcasts.

Crowds of several thousand each week attended the three Bach recitals played by Mr. Biggs in the music shed at the Berkshire Music Center during the 1949 Berkshire festival.

Mr. Biggs has received the honor of being elected a fellow of the Royal Academy of Music.

Mr. Biggs is to be soloist at the opening concert of the Evansville Philharmonic Orchestra, Evansville, Ind. George Dasch will conduct the Sower by Concerto in C major for organ and orchestra.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
SEP 10 1949

Will Conduct Symphony In Boston Season

Charles Munch will arrive Friday by plane from France to assume his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The season begins in Symphony Hall on Oct. 7.

At the opening concert the new conductor will commemorate the 50th anniversary of Symphony Hall itself by repeating the exact program conducted by Wilhelm Gericke at the first concert in the hall, Oct. 19, 1900.

* * *

THE PROGRAM consists of Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto, with E. Power Biggs as soloist on the new organ installed this summer; the ballet music and entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde"; and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Charles Munch, the 10th conductor of the orchestra, is the third Frenchman to hold the post, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux having held it 1918-1924. Among soloists scheduled for his first season as conductor are Francois Poulenc, who will appear as pianist in a new work of his own; Nicole Henriot, young French pianist; Robert Casadesus, pianist, and Raya Garbousova, cellist, neither of whom has appeared with the orchestra for several seasons; Byron Janis, pianist, the duo-pianists, Whittemore and Lowe and Ossy Renardy, Isaac Stern, Ginette Reveu and Zino Francescatti, violinists.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will share the 1950 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood with Mr. Munch, has announced he will not appear as guest conductor with orchestra this winter.

Leonard Bernstein, who has conducted at Tanglewood and Boston, will appear as guest conductor for two weeks, as will Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra.

* * *

BEETHOVEN'S "Missa Solemnis" will be presented at the orchestra's Spring Pension Fund concert, and Bach's "Passion According to St. John" during Holy Week, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society joining the orchestra for both these performances. Mr. Munch will introduce Honegger's "Joan de Arc at the Stake" at a special midwinter concert with a newly organized chorus assisting. While the classical repertory will furnish the major part of his programs, little known and rarely heard works, past and present, will also be included.

The orchestra will appear twice in Hartford. Mr. Munch, a native of Strasbourg, Alsace, where he was born in 1891, was the founder of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and Paris Symphony Orchestra. He first came to this country in 1946.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS
SEP [illegible] 1949

★ Mildred Norton

(Drama-Music Editor)

Nearly 75 years of serving the cause of music have made Serge Koussevitzky uniquely qualified to discuss both the headaches and the rewards of such a life.

Talking with him, you quickly discover that the rewards, for him, so outweigh the headaches in importance that the buoyant enthusiasm, the swift imagination of youth still vitalize every subject that engages him.

Now on his first visit west after 25 years of holding the Boston Symphony in foremost position among the nation's orchestras, Koussevitzky says he was particularly impressed by the fine caliber of players he found in the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra during the past week he worked with them at Hollywood Bowl.

"You know," he declared, "I was literally amazed. The first bassoon, the first clarinet, the first oboe and the first horn, for instance, are wonderful players. The strings are good, too. In fact, the entire group is one of the finest I have come across.

"These men are quickly responsive, too. They love music; you can feel this when you conduct them. But it is difficult for them to play under so many different guest conductors at the Bowl. One or two, yes; but for the Bowl season as a whole there should be one steady conductor."

Encouraging young talent

Although this year Koussevitzky retired from the gruelling routine of conducting more than 100 winter concerts in addition to planning the repertoire and teaching young conductors during his "vacation" months, his summers are still devoted to his beloved Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center which he founded in 1940.

This was the realization of his lifelong dream to create a place where students, teachers and professional musicians could gather to study and exchange ideas. With Koussevitzky's vibrant personality as the nucleus, the Berkshires have become an international mecca for musicians, as well as for music lovers who attend the annual festivals 10,000 strong daily throughout every August.

For a man so imbued with a desire to share his musical wealth, merely cutting a dramatic figure on the podium is not enough. To Koussevitzky, music is truly a way of life, and a conductor has not fulfilled his mission until he has activated every one of a community's potentials for music.

This intense desire to foster a love of music in everyone is reflected not only in his impassioned podium readings but in the equal fervor which has made his entire life a crusade against indifferent musical standards and public apathy.

As a young man in Czarist Russia, he loaded his newly-minted orchestra of 75 players into a barge and introduced the music of Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Beethoven in free concerts to every village and hamlet along the Volga shores.

In Paris, as a leader of the avant-garde, he made himself the champion of new talent, premiering works, later to become famous, which even the canny French then viewed askance. When, in 1924, he assumed leadership of the Boston Symphony, it was to create from an orchestra fallen into disrepute a brilliant ensemble that is long acknowledged the country's finest.

American composers

In America, Koussevitzky continued his championing of the young, the new, the neglected. "Sometimes the compositions performed were bad," he confesses. "I knew it. But how is a young composer to improve unless he can hear how his music sounds?"

With the emergence of Tanglewood, came also new recognition for the young American conductor, Leonard Bernstein, who was to next conduct the Los Angeles Philharmonic this fall, is one of the brilliant youngsters to come out of Tanglewood. Thor Johnson, another

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 8 - 1949

MUNCH'S BOSTON BOW TO BE 1900 PROGRAM

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Sept. 7—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today they had received a cable from their new conductor, Charles Munch, informing them that he would leave France by plane on Sept. 15 to begin his duties. Mr. Munch succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired in June after twenty-five years in the post.

An orchestra spokesman said Mr. Munch, a native of Alsace, had been spending much of a two-month vacation improving his mastery of the English language.

In recognition of the fiftieth anniversary year of the orchestra, Mr. Munch's first program, Oct. 7, will be the same one conducted by Wilhelm Gericke when the organization moved into the new Symphony Hall from the old Music Hall in 1900.

The program includes Weber's overture to "Euryanthe"; Handel's organ concerto No. 4; ballet music and entr'acte from "Rosamunde" by Schubert, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
SEP 8 - [illegible]

BSO's New Leader To Fly From Paris For First Concert

BOSTON — Receiving a cable from Charles Munch, officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that their new conductor will fly from Paris Sept. 15 to assume his duties immediately in order to rehearse the orchestra for the opening 69th season Oct. 7 in Symphony Hall.

In recognition of the 50th anniversary year of Symphony Hall, he has chosen for his first appearance the exact program Wilhelm Gericke presented at the opening concert in the then new hall on Oct. 19 and 20, 1900.

Succeeding Dr. Serge Koussevitzky who retired this summer after 25 years as conductor, Mr. Munch will include Handel's fourth organ concerto, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," ballet music and Entr'Acte from "Rosamunde" by Schubert, and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

Mr. Munch, a native of Alsace, has been touring France this summer where he fulfilled conducting engagements. It has been reported by members of the Boston Symphony that he has been spending much of his two-month's vacation improving his mastery of the English language.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
SEP 11 1949

First Concerts by Munch Marks Hall's Anniversary

Since next month marks the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of Boston's Symphony Hall, Charles Munch will devote the program of his first concerts as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular conductor, on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Oct. 7 and 8, to the works played in the orchestra's first subscription concerts in that hall under Wilhelm Gericke on Oct. 19 and 20, 1900. These are Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Handel's fourth organ concerto, the ballet music and entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the soloist. Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," given in the opening dedicatory concert in Symphony Hall on Oct. 15, 1900, will be given under Mr. Munch for the orchestra's spring pension fund concert. Leonard Bernstein and Richard Burgin will conduct the orchestra for two weeks each. Although it had been rumored that Serge Koussevitzky would make some mid-season guest appearances with the Boston Symphony, this is not mentioned in the orchestra's latest announcement.

[illegible]
11 1949

MUNCH TO A[illegible]
Boston, Sept. 10.—Munch will fly ho[illegible] Thursday to assume [illegible] as conductor of th[illegible] phony Orchestra, it [illegible] tonight. The famed [illegible] tor will succeed [illegible] sevitzky who reti[illegible] 25 seasons as head [illegible]

[illegible] ...Still [illegible] ...ly interested [illegible] ...musical welfare [illegible] ...the country, [illegible] ...Koussevitzky, [illegible] ...the Southland's high [illegible] ...both musical and per capita wealth. "How many people do you have here now—three million? Four million? Just think, 25 cents a year from every person would give you a million dollars a year to invest in music. Who wouldn't be willing to give 25 cents a year for such a cause?"

But always, he feels, the battle must go forward—for higher musical standards, for more vigorous community participation, for an alert and discriminating public that will accept nothing less than the finest.

"How do you get these things?" he echoed our question. "You fight for them, my dear. You fight, and you never give up. A person who is in the right is never alone."

[4]

MUSIC

The Coming Symphony Season

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

On Oct. 7 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 69th season, under the baton of Charles Munch, who has the awesome responsibility of succeeding Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who completed his own 25th season with the orchestra last May. Mr. Munch, no stranger to Boston because of his guest appearances, will be the symphony's 10th conductor and the third of French blood, the other two being Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Munch will fly from Paris next Thursday and will assemble the orchestra for rehearsals the first of next month. The trustees have evidently decided to give the new director ample opportunity to display his mettle. There will be no guest conductor other than Leonard Bernstein, who takes over for two weeks. However, Richard Burgin retains his position as associate conductor and he, too, will be heard from. Shortly after his arrival Mr. Munch will meet members of the press and divulge his plans for the season in some detail. He has already made it known that he will introduce new works and revive neglected classics.

Anniversary Concert

Symphony Hall itself was opened 50 years ago and Mr. Munch's first program will be a replica of that presented by Wilhelm Gericke at the first pair of regular concerts in the new auditorium, that itself made acoustical history as the first concert hall especially designed along scientific lines. This historic list, to be re-heard on Oct. 7 and 8, consisted of Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," the Fourth Organ Concerto of Handel, the Entr'acte and Ballet Music from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

In honor of the hall's 50th birthday, the organ has been rebuilt by the Aeolian-Skinner Co. and E. Power Biggs, the orchestra's regular organist, will have the honor of dedicating it at these concerts. It is interesting to note that Beethoven's Fifth was the last number that the orchestra played under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky while still its regular leader, at the last concert of the Berkshire Festival on Aug. 14.

Symphony Hall was actually opened by a special concert that offered Beethoven's Overture, "The Consecration of the House," and his Missa Solemnis. Mr. Munch will present the great Mass in the spring. During Holy Week he will perform the rarely heard "St. John" Passion of Bach; using on both of these occasions the combined choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe. At a special Pension Fund concert in mid-season he will offer Honegger's elaborate "Joan of Arc at the Stake," which received its first American performance from him in New York last season. It is, by all accounts, a work of considerable effectiveness.

A Bach Year

As already noted in this place, 1950 will be a Bach year, the bicentennial of the composer's death. It had previously been announced that Mr. Munch would perform in the course of the coming season all six of the "Brandenburg" Concertos. There was a rumor circulating at Tanglewood last summer that he would also do all nine of the Beethoven Symphonies, but this has happily been denied. My informant was a member of the trombone section and possibly the wish was father to the thought. Beethoven employs trombones in only three of his nine symphonies, and in each case in but a single movement!

A notable figure among the soloists will be the French composer, Francis Poulenc who will be heard as pianist in a new work of his own for piano and orchestra. This will be M. Poulenc's first appearance in Symphony Hall but not in Boston. Last season at Jordan Hall he accompanied the French baritone, Pierre Bernac, in a recital that proved to be one of the outstanding events of the year. Other pianists to be heard will be Byron Janis, a youngster of great promise; that distinguished artist, Robert Casadesus, and the two-piano team of Whittemore and Lowe. It is good news that the sensational French violinist, Ginette Neveu, will return to us. Other fiddlers will be Isaac Stern and Gino Francescatti. There will be one cellist, that personable Russian, Raya Garbousova.

Regular Concerts

The orchestra will give its usual 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, with the supplementary concerts on Tuesday evenings and Sunday afternoons. This shorter series will offer two soloists of its own, the extraordinary French pianist, Nicole Henriot, and a violinist whom we do not know, Ossy Renardy.

The orchestra will give its customary concerts in Cambridge, in New York and other cities on the Eastern seaboard and make its traditional Western trip. In other words, save that Koussevitzky is out and Munch is in, it will be a case of business as usual. And this department herewith wishes the latter all the good luck in the w[illegible]

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
SEP 11 1949

CHARLES MUENCH, who has fulfilled conducting engagements in France during the summer, will fly from Paris on Sept. 15 to assume his new duties as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will assemble the orchestra by the end of this month to open its 69th season on Oct. 7 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Muench's first season as the Orchestra's regular conductor coincides with the 50th anniversary year of Symphony Hall, the auditorium which was built for this Orchestra in 1900. To celebrate this anniversary, he has chosen for his first program the exact program which Wilhelm Gericke presented at the opening subscription concerts of the Orchestra in the then new hall on Oct. 19 and 20, 1900. At that time the organ which had been built with Symphony Hall was heard in a performance of Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto. This summer, a new organ has been built and installed and will have its first hearing by the inclusion of this same concerto on the first program. The soloist will be E. Power Biggs. Wilhelm Gericke's program of 50 years ago, to be repeated, is as follows: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, Ballet music and Entr'Acte from "Rosamunde" by Schubert, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

BOSTON HERALD SUNDAY SEPT. 11

A Pre-Season Speculation--- The Arrival of Charles Munch

By RUDOLPH ELIE

While the arrival from Paris this week of Charles Munch to assume the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra doesn't quite bring to an end the musical doldrums between the finale of the Berkshire Festival and the opening of the new season in Symphony Hall (for there are still about four weeks to go), it brings up the question of the year con fuoco: What's he going to do?

MUNCH, MOONCH, MERNCH?

This week the trustees of the orchestra parted, ever so little, the curtains veiling this matter. They are awaiting, they said, Mr. Munch's personal announcement of his own plans when he does arrive and settles down in his new Milton house, but in the meantime there were some fairly general plans.

First of all Mr. Munch (and the name may be pronounced Munch, Moonch, Mernch or the properly inflected sound represented by Muench with no hard feelings), has chosen to begin his season by noting the 50th anniversary of Symphony Hall. Thus his first program will be exactly that which Wilhelm Gericke presented at the opening concert in Symphony Hall on October 19 and 20, 1900. This program offers Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, Schubert's Ballet music and Entr' Acte from "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Coincidentally enough, just as there was a new organ in Symphony Hall in 1900, there is a new one there this fall, an Aeolian Skinner designed by G. Donald Harrison and one already pronounced to be, by those who have tried it, a truly magnificent instrument. It will be played in the Handel Concerto by E. Power Biggs, who began the whole movement for a new organ for Symphony Hall by contributing $1000 to the cause. (The management added $20,000, but is still looking about for contributions to cover the cost, which is more than double the money raised).

Beyond the program for the first concert, the trustees do not go very far, but three works of considerable interest are already planned. These are Bach's "Passion According to St. John," rarely heard in this city, to be given during Holy Week; Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake" (which Mr. Munch introduced in New York), and, for the Pension Fund concert, Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," more frequently heard but always a great experience. The Bach and Beethoven will have the combined choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe; and Honegger will be done by a mysterious "new" chorus.

FINE SOLOISTS

Koussevitzky having announced that he will not appear as guest conductor this season, contrary to his original plans, the only guest conductor will be Leonard Bernstein, who will conduct twice in each of the series. Mr. Bernstein thus fills the vacancy left by Koussevitzky. (It might be mentioned in passing that Koussevitzky bowled the West Coast audiences over last week in his guest appearances there, and presently begins his tour of Brazil, Palestine and Europe to conduct the leading orchestras of the world before returning to his Arizona winter home.) Richard Burgin, associate conductor, will also lead the orchestra during two weeks in the course of the season.

If guest conductors are fewer than in recent years, soloists are more numerous. The list includes Byron Janis, pianist; Francis Poulence giving the first performance a new piano concerto; and Whittemore and Lowe, duo-pianists; all appearing in Boston for the first time. Other soloists are the pianists Robert Casadesus and Nicole Henriot; the violinists Ginette Neveu, Isaac Stern, Ossy Renardy and Zino Francescatti; and the cellist Raya Garbousova . . . a very formidable array.

It is of course not yet known what these artists will play. Nothing, probably, too far from the beaten track. Nor can it be predicted what Mr. Munch will bring out in the way of new music, though it has been announced that he will maintain the Koussevitzky tradition in this respect.

Putting two and two together, however, it seems likely that Mr. Munch will range the orchestral literature widely in building his program. I suspect he will revive many quite forgotten works of the classical and romantic literature, with no undue emphasis on French music. The word is he has been lately performing Brahms for the French and Brahms is not, as a rule, French fare (they loved it). He has also recently done Strauss' "Domestica" and a number of other un-Gallic works; it would be gratutious to say he is boning up on them, but there seems no doubt he has Boston in mind. As this is Strauss' 85th—and last—year, we shall certainly hear some Strauss. After the turn of the year it is the 200th anniversary of the death of Bach; we shall doubtless hear all the Brandenburg Concertos and possibly all the orchestral suites! I hope so. There are surprisingly many other anniversaries to be noted, among them the 100th anniversary of Chopin's death. The year, I feel sure in saying, will be filled with musical interest of the highest degree.

INSPIRED LEADER

If I were called upon for suggestions, I should put in a word for the little-done concertos and symphonies of Mozart and Haydn. I should like to have Mr. Munch, himself a great violinist, conduct two or three of these unknown concertos while playing the solo part. I hope he will give us more soloists and groups of soloists from the ranks of the first desk men of the orchestra. We should hear, for example, Beethoven's Triple Concerto performed by Richard Burgin, Samuel Mayes and Lukas Foss. We should hear Strauss's new Horn Concerto done by James Stagliano (and we probably will). The possibilities in this respect are endless, and we simply have not had enough opportunity to realize how very fine our own orchestral musicians are. It is no aspersion on Koussevitzky that his programs, in the late years, became more and more limited. But the programs of his first 15 years were startlingly imaginative, and perhaps it is no coincidence that Munch comes to the orchestra in the same circumstances and at much the same age that Koussevitsky did. I, for one, have the hunch that Munch will prove a program builder of taste, discrimination and imagination. That he will prove an inspired leader I have no doubt whatever.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
SEP 15 1949

BULLETINS

BOSTON (U.P.)—Charles Munch flew from Paris, France, today to assume his new position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Munch, who has been conducting in France during the summer, will assemble the orchestra by the end of the month to open its 69th season Oct. 7 at Symphony Hall. He succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retired.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES
SEP 13 1949

French Composer Dies

PARIS, Sept. 12 (AP)—Henri Rabaud, 75, French composer who once was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
SEP 13 1949

French Composer Dies

Paris — (AP) — Henri Rabaud, 75, French composer who once was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last night.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
SEP 14 1949

French Composer Dies

PARIS, Sept. 13—(AP)—Henri Rabaud, French composer, who once was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died Monday after a long illness. He was 75 years old.

Rabaud accepted leadership of the Boston [illegible] in October, 1918, and served until the following April.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
SEP 15 1949

Letters

Koussevitsky Triumph

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Although we are living far from Pittsfield and the Berkshire Music Festival now, we had the pleasure of seeing and hearing Dr. Koussevitsky on September 3d at the Hollywood Bowl. I thought perhaps your readers, particularly Dr. Koussevitzky's admirers, might like to hear about his concert out here.

The Bowl itself is a stupendous place, both as to size and beauty of setting. The stage is large, and the orchestra is seated before a large shell, painted blue. Combine all this with floodlights, and 21,000 people, and you really have something. Not to mention the California moon!

The music was wonderful, of course. Arthur Rubenstein was soloist in the Rachmaninoff concerto No. 2, and he received tremendous applause. The concluding orchestral work was Tschaikovsky's fourth symphony, and scarcely had the last note died away when the entire audience rose to its feet and cheered. If there had been a roof over the Bowl, they would surely have raised it! Again and again Dr. Koussevitzky was called back; he was presented with a large wreath, at which he smiled happily and bowed again to the applauding audience. He tore off pieces of the wreath and tossed them to his orchestra, brought them to their feet, and the applause became deafening again. The audience just absolutely refused to go home!

We [illegible] very proud and happy that his reception in California was so warm and heartfelt. I know he must have been happy too. These Friday and Saturday night concerts marked Dr. Koussevitzky's first appearance in California; but we certainly hope they will not be the last.

Mrs. MARTIN J. PEARSON.
1115 Barton Avenue,
San Bernadino, Cal.

RALEIGH, N. C.
NEWS-OBSERVER
SEP 12 1949

Odds and Ends: Officials of the Boston Symphony have announced the receipt of a cable from their new conductor, Charles Munch, informing them that he would leave France by plane on September 15 to assume his new duties. Munch succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitsky who retired in June after 25 years in the post.

In recognition of the 50th anniversary year of the orchestra, Munch's first program, on October 7, will be the same conducted by Welhelm Gericke when the organization moved into the new Symphony Hall from the old Music Hall in 1900.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
SEP 15 1949

Boston Conductor En Route To U. S.

Boston, Sept. 15. (UP)—Charles Munch will fly from Paris, France, today to assume his new position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Munch, who has been conducting in France during the Summer, will assemble the orchestra by the end of the month to open its 69th season Oct. 7 at Symphony Hall. He succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retired.

[5]

Munch Opens 69th Boston Symphony Season Oct. 7

By JOHN WM. RILEY

With cooling weather and turning leaves we can feel Autumn in the air. And with the announcement of the Boston Symphony's plans for 1949-50, we know another music season is in the making.

Last season was one of special interest, it being Serge Koussevitzky's 25th and last as music director of the Boston Symphony. And this one coming promises to be of equal interest, with Charles Munch as our new conductor, and the observation of Symphony Hall's 50th anniversary in view.

Mr. Munch will fly from Paris Sept. 15 to take up residence in his Milton home and later this month to assemble the orchestra in preparation for the opening concert, Friday afternoon, Oct. 7. On that occasion he will play the same program with which Wilhelm Gericke opened the first subscription season on Oct. 19 and 20, 1900: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, Ballet music and Entr'Acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the organ soloist.

During this Summer a new organ has been built at a cost of nearly $50,000 by the Aeolian-Skinner Company of Boston and installed in Symphony Hall. A contribution of $1,000 by Mr. Biggs for the renovation of the old organ (which had been installed in 1900) resulted in a special fund for the building of an entirely new organ. Thus, Gericke's program repeated on this 50th anniversary, offers Mr. Biggs the opportunity for dedicating the new organ.

No special plans for the celebration of Symphony Hall's 50th anniversary have been announced. However, there is a book in the works which will trace the history of the hall. It is being written by H. Earle Johnson, a professor at Clark University, Worcester, and author of "Musical Interludes in Boston."

CHARLES MUNCH, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, who will open the 69th season of the orchestra, and the 50th anniversary year of Symphony Hall, Friday, Oct. 7.

Soloists and Conductors

The Boston Symphony will give its usual four series of concerts here. The only guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein who will be in Boston two weeks, appearing in each of the series, and Richard Burgin, associate conductor, who will have two weeks in the course of the season.

The soloists for the 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will include the following who are to make their first appearance with the orchestra: Byron Janis, pianist; Francis Poulenc, French composer and pianist, will play a new work of his own; and the duo-pianists Whittemore and Lowe, who appeared at Pops several years ago. Robert Casadesus will also be one of the piano soloists. The violinists will include Ginette Neveu, Isaac Stern and Zino Francescatti. Cellist Raya Garbousova will also appear. Violinist Ossy Renardy and pianist Nicole Henriot will each appear in the series of six Sunday afternoon and nine Tuesday evening concerts.

Six concerts will be given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Tuesday evenings, and series of five each in New York city on Wednesday evenings and Saturday afternoons, in Brooklyn on Friday evenings, and in Providence on Tuesday evenings. The orchestra will make a tour of midwestern cities in October, appearing in Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, East Lansing and Toledo. Two concerts will be given in Newark, New Haven, Hartford and Washington, and single concerts in New Brunswick, Philadelphia, New London and White Plains.

Choral Works

Mr. Munch also announces for the orchestra's Spring Pension Fund Concert Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" with which Wilhelm Gericke dedicated Symphony Hall in a special concert, Oct. 15, 1900. Bach's "Passion According to St. John" will be performed on Friday and Saturday of Holy Week, with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth, taking part. Mr. Munch will introduce to Boston Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake" at a special mid-Winter concert at which a newly organized chorus will assist.

The Boston Symphony's radio arrangements will be much the same as last year, with television perhaps in the offing. There will be 30 radio rehearsals broadcast over N. B. C. on Mondays, and five regular concert broadcasts are planned for next Summer's Berkshire Symphonic Festival. During the Festival, Serge Koussevitzky and Mr. Munch will share leadership of the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky continues as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

This past week Koussevitzky has been conducting the Los Angeles Philharmonic in Hollywood Bowl concerts to great acclaim. Later in the season he goes on to South America, to Palestine and to Europe.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
SUNDAY NEWS
SEP 11 1949

Munch Will Assume Boston Symphony Post Thursday

BOSTON, Sept. 10 — Charles Munch, who has fulfilled conducting engagements in France during the summer, will fly from Paris on September 15 to assume his new duties as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will [illegible] by the end of this month to open its 69th season on October 7 in Symphony hall, Boston.

Mr. Munch's first season as the orchestra's regular conductor coincides with the 50th anniversary year of Symphony hall, the auditorium which was built for this orchestra in 1900. To celebrate this anniversary, he has chosen for his first program the exact program which Wilhelm Gericke presented at the opening subscription concerts of the orchestra in the then new hall on Oct. 19 and 20, 1900.

At that time the organ which had been built with Symphony hall was heard in a performance of Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto. This summer, a new organ has been built and installed and Mr. Munch will give the organ its first hearing by the inclusion of this same concerto on the first program. The soloist will be E. Power Biggs, Wilhelm Gericke's program of 50 years ago, which will be repeated, is as follows: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe;" Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4; ballet music and Entr'Acte from "Rosamunde" by Schubert, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Charles Munch also announces for the orchestra's spring Pension Fund concert Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" with which Wilhelm Gericke inaugurated Symphony hall in a special concert on Oct. 15, 1900. Bach's "Passion According to St. John" will be performed on Friday and Saturday of Holy Week. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth, will join the orchestra in these performances. Mr. Munch will introduce to Boston another choral work, Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," at a special midwinter concert in which a newly organized chorus will assist.

This orchestra will give its usual four series in Boston. Two weeks of the concerts will be led by Leonard Bernstein, who will thus appear as guest conductor in each of the series. Richard Burgin, as associate conductor, will lead the orchestra during two weeks in the course of the season.

The soloists for the 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will include the following who are to make their first appearance with this orchestra: Byron Janis, the pianist; Francis Poulenc, who is to appear as pianist in a new work of his own; and the duo-pianists, Whittemore and Lowe. Robert Casadesus will return to the concerts. The violinists will be Ginette Neveu, Isaac Stern, and Zino Francescatti, and the 'cellist, Raya Garbousova. Ossy Renardy, the violinist, and Nicole Henriot, the pianist, will each appear in the series of six Sunday afternoon and nine Tuesday evening concerts.

Six concerts will be given in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on Tuesday evenings, and series of five each in New York City on Wednesday evenings and Saturday afternoons, in Brooklyn on Friday evenings, and in Providence on Tuesday evenings. The orchestra will make a tour of Midwestern cities in October, appearing in Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, East Lansing, and Toledo. Two concerts will be given in Newark, New Haven, Hartford, and Washington, and single concerts in New Brunswick, Philadelphia, New London, and White Plains.

As the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he will present new works for the first time in this country. While the classical repertory will furnish the principal substance of his programs, music of the past, little known and long unheard here, will be revived. These works he will shortly announce.

MILLERTON, N.Y
NEWS
9/15/49

Munch New Conductor Of Boston Symphony

69th Season Will Open On October 7

Charles Munch, who has fulfilled conducting engagements in France during the summer is flying from Paris to assume his new duties as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will assemble the orchestra by the end of this month to open its 69th season on October 7 in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Mr. Munch's first season as the Orchestra's regular conductor coincides with the 50th anniversary year of Symphony Hall, the auditorium which was built for this Orchestra in 1900. To celebrate this anniversary, he has chosen for his first program the exact program which Wilhelm Gericke presented at the opening subscription concerts of the Orchestra in the then new hall on October 19 and 20, 1900. At that time the organ which had been built with Symphony Hall was heard in a performance of Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto. This summer, a new organ has been built and installed by the Aeolian-Skinner Company. Mr. Munch will give the organ its first hearing by the inclusion of this same concerto on the first program. The soloist will be E. Power Biggs. Wilhelm Gericke's program of 50 years ago, which will be repeated, is as follows: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4; Ballet music and Entr'Acte from "Rosamunde" by Schubert; and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Charles Munch also announces for the Orchestra's spring Pension Fund concert Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" with which Wilhelm Gericke inaugurated Symphony Hall in a special concert on October 15, 1900. Bach's "Passion According to St. John" will be performed on Friday and Saturday of Holy Week. The Harvard and Radcliff choruses, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth, will join the Orchestra in these performances. Mr. Munch will introduce to Boston another choral work; Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," at a special midwinter concert in which a newly organized chorus will assist.

This Orchestra will give its usual four series in Boston. Two weeks of the concerts will be led by Leonard Bernstein, who will thus appear as guest conductor in each of the series. Richard Burgin, as Associate Conductor, will lead the Orchestra during two weeks in the course of the season.

The soloists for the 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will include the following who are to make their first appearance with this Orchestra: Byron Janis, the pianist; Francis Poulenc, who is to appear as pianist in a new work of his own; and the duo-pianists, Whittmore and Lowe. Robert Casadesus will return to the concerts. The violinists will be Ginette Neveu, Isaac Stern, and Zino Francescatti, and the 'cellist, Raya Garbousova, Ossy Renardy, the violinist, and Nicole Henriot, the pianist, will each appear in the series of six Sunday afternoon and nine Tuesday evening concerts. Six concerts will be given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Tuesday evenings, and series of five each

(Turn to Page One)

Since the Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1881, it has had nine conductors. Charles Munch, as the 10th, is the third native of France (Henri Rabaud conducted in 1918-1919, and Pierre Monteux in 1919-1924). Serge Koussevitzky, whose term of 25 years followed these, will share with Charles Munch the Berkshire Festival in 1950 at Tanglewood next summer and will continue as the director of the Berkshire Music Center there. Charles Munch, first coming to the United States in December, 1946, when he made his initial American appearance conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest, is a native of Strasbourg, Alsace, where he was born in 1891. Mr. Munch has made his remarkable reputation as conductor for the most part in France where he has led the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureaux Orchestra, and the Straram Orchestra. He was the founder of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra and in 1938 became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. Last autumn he took the Orchestre Nationale de la Radiodiffusion Francaise on a good-will tour of America.

As the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he will present new works for the first time in this country. While the classical repertory will furnish the principal substance of his programs, music of the past, little known and long unheard here, will be revived. These works he will shortly announce.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
SEP 15 1949

THE NEW RECORDS

By IRVING KOLODIN

Recordings of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony are so many, and a few of them are so good, that a new offering of one is usually in the nature of a ceremonial for company, or conductor, or both. That is apparently the case with RCA Victor's new issue, in which Serge Koussevitzky directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra in what is the twelfth version currently available of this masterwork, and probably the fiftieth there has been of it.

IRVING KOLODIN

Roussevitzky's ceremonial is so well known that it scarcely needs further mention, save to note that it took him twenty-five seasons with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to achieve a public issue of his view of this work on records with his own orchestra. (An earlier one originated in England. Victor's part in the presentation impressed me, when I heard it, as significant of some fresh approach to the problem of recording a symphony orchestra—a hunch that has no confirmation save the knowledge that it followed a longish lapse of recording.

There is an impressive bigness in the sound that can be heard (especially in the 45 rpm), a good deal of accurate contrast between instruments of the same choir—cellos and violas, for example, or clarinets and oboes—plus very lusty brass, double basses and tympani. What I would prefer to hear, however, is the same contrast, with more vibrance in the tone, less overlapping of sound in the climaxes, where something perilously approaching echo is heard. Some of the solo effects—in the latter part of the third movement, for example—are uncommonly good, but the full orchestra has a harsh, astringent timbre not truly in the Bostonian character.

As performance, it is close to the best of those in the second flight: that is, a floor or two below the high level of Toscanini's insuperably dramatic one, or the broadly forceful performance of Furtwaengler. Also, its temper throughout is of almost deliberate orthodoxy, in marked contrast to the vacillations of his "Eroica." Of this sort, it is remarkably achieved, though his musical "Hamlet" needs more of personal illumination and individual viewpoint to make it truly interesting. (RCA Victor album 1313.)

Schuricht's 'Coriolan.'

While with Beethoven, it might be well to mention a new version of the "Coriolan," which is everything that Koussevitzky's C minor is in force and clarity, plus a good deal more in the resonance and richness that it lacks. Though the catalogues contain versions of this challenging work done by Toscanini, Walter Furtwaengler Mengelberg and Mitropoulous, it is none of these who has provided us with the best version in a contemporary reproduction: rather the relatively obscure Carl Schuricht, with the London Symphony Orchestra.

I am unacquainted with the previous performance by Schuricht with the Berlin State Opera Orchestra (Polydor), but it is evident that he has a keen understanding of this score and a special affection for it. The tempestuous passages are not badgered and harried, in the Toscanini manner, or submerged in effects, as in Furtwaengler's most recent. Rather, the work is delivered from first to last with firm rhythm, a sure sense of the contrasts between stress and solace which make this score the overwhelming thing it is. Nothing astonishing about the recording—for London, that is; it is a typical Kingsway Hall product, full and live in sound, rich in color and detail. (London T-5119.)

The Lighter Side.

An enterprise that has not received the notice here due it is Columbia's establishment of the "Harmony" label, on which, in addition to pop. matter of current origin, will be reissued fine items of the past. In the latter category, in its first issue, are Crosby's inimitable "Paradise" of the early '30's, coupled with the equally good if lesser known "She Reminds Me of You" (1007) and the sprightly "Limehouse Blues" and "If I Had You" of the Goodman Sextet, c. 1940 (1011). Bargains both, even were the price not so modest.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD
SEP 16 1949

Boston Conductor En Route To U. S.

Boston, Sept. 15. (UP)—Charles Munch will fly from Paris, France today to assume his new position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Munch, who has been conducting in France during the Summer, will assemble the orchestra by the end of the month to open its 69th season Oct. 7 at Symphony Hall. He succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retired.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD
SEP 15 1949

Toscanini Faces N. Y. Invasion By Koussevitzky

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

The energetic ghost of Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony and director of Tanglewood, amazing center of summer music where 9,000 listeners are regarded as a small audience, and 14,000 paid admissions for a single concert are a common-place, continues to plague his colleagues.

The realm of Toscanini is about to be invaded by the irrepressible Koussevitzky. He has been invited to conduct a special pre-assembly concert for the United Nations in honor of the opening of the general United Nations' assembly. The concert will be played next Saturday, Sept. 17. The orchestra will be the N.B.C. Symphony, Toscanini's group. The program has been arranged by Norman Corwin, chief of special projects for the U.N. radio.

Copland a Pioneer

The first performance of Aaron Copland's "Salutation" to the United Nations will be conducted by Koussevitzky. The work is scored for symphony orchestra and narrator, a type of expression in which Copland is a highly successful pioneer. One recalls his "Lincoln Portrait" in which the orchestra commented on famous Lincoln quotations. This work had its premiere at the Watergate some seasons past.

In the new "Salutation," Copland has drawn the narrator's text from the preamble to the U.N. charter.

Koussevitzky will conduct again in Washington, according to announcement from the Snow Concert bureau, on Dec. 6. His orchestra for this concert will be the Boston Symphony, which also will be heard under its new conductor, Charles Munch, Jan. 12.

"Ghost" a Distress

The Koussevitzy "ghost" may also distress those of the 36 directors of the National Symphony who were given no opportunity to pass on the great conductor's offer to take over the National Symphony, first reported in the Times-Herald. According to the Musical Courier, negotiations were conducted entirely "en camera" though they continued for 10 weeks. Koussevitzky's proposals included the building of a concert-hall-opera-house, which Washington badly needs, and the founding of a major music school in the Nation's Capital.

Koussevitzky assured the directors he met that he could secure the money for these badly needed cultural monuments. He also offered to retain the orchestra's newly appointed conductor, Howard Mitchell, "if he is competent." Tours, broadcasts and recordings were included in his grand plan.

Loyal to Mitchell, the directors concerned explained that Koussevitzky is "clear out of our class."

EPTEMBER 16, 1949  ATLANTIC

Symphonic Pipe Lines

Lynsk W. Fisher, Staff Photographer; Ewing Galloway

The finer points of the new Symphony Hall organ are being explained (left to right) by G. Donald Harrison, president of the Aeolian Skinner Organ Company of Dorchester, Mass., to E. Power Biggs, organist of the Boston Symphony. The organ, now being installed, must be ready for the opening concert Oct. 7. Reputed to cost $50,000, the far corners of Symphony will echo with its strains as the organist sits down at the console.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS
SEP 17 1949

Batoned for Boston

Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, arrived at International Airport aboard an Air France plane at 11:30 A. M. yesterday en route to Boston to assume his post. He succeeds Serge Koussevitsky, who retired at the close of the season.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
SEP 16 1949

Munch Flies In

Charles Munch, French conductor recently appointed permanent director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Serge Koussevitzky, arrived here today by plane from Paris. He is scheduled to open the orchestra's 69th season on Oct. 7.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 17 1949

MUNCH ARRIVES BY PLANE

New Boston Conductor Here to Prepare for Coming Season

Charles Munch, recently appointed director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived yesterday at the New York International Airport, Idlewild, Queens, on an Air France plane, to prepare for the opening of the sixty-ninth season of the musical organization on Oct. 7.

The 57-year-old conductor has been the leader of the Paris Symphony and was the founder and conductor of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra. He has been guest conductor also of the Boston Symphony for the last three seasons.

Noting an increased public interest in music in this country, M. Munch said that he had found the Boston audiences "very understanding." He plans to leave today for Boston, where he will be joined by Mrs. Munch, who is due next week on the Ile de France.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
SEP 17 1949

Munch Arrives to Take Over Boston Symphony

New York, Sept. 16 (AP)—Charles Munch, the 57-year-old French musician, arrived today by plane from Paris to take over direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Munch succeeds Serge Koussevitzky.

Munch plans to leave by auto for Boston tomorrow. He said he will be joined next week by Mrs. Munch and that they would live at 1883 Brush Hill Rd., Milton.

He will be 10th conductor of the Boston orchestra since it was founded in 1861. The orchestra will open its season Oct. 7.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
SEP 17 1949

New Boston Symphony Director Reaches N. Y.

NEW YORK, Saturday (AP) — Charles Munch, the 57-year-old French musician, arrived yesterday by plane from Paris to take over direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Munch succeeds Serge Koussevitzky.

Munch plans to leave by auto for Boston today. He said he will be joined next week by Mrs. Munch and that they would live in Milton.

He will be the 10th conductor of the Boston orchestra since it was founded in 1861. The orchestra will open its season Oct. 7.

OTTAWA, CANADA
CITIZEN
SEP 17 1949

Munch Arrives At New York

NEW YORK — Charles Munch, the 57-year-old French musician, arrived yesterday by plane from Paris to take over direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Munch succeeds Serge Koussevitzky.

The Death of a Hero---
A Great Man Passes on

By RUDOLPH ELIE

He wasn't quite six feet tall but he seemed a giant of a man. His head was massive, square-cut, and from below his blond eyebrows his icy blue eyes, wide-spread, reflected an unbending will. He always wore a mustache, perhaps to conceal his slightly bulbous, upturned nose, and nearly always wore black clothes of the most formal Prussian cut.

TERRIFIC BLUNDER

From the beginning—that would be in 1864—he seemed destined for music. His father played the first violin in the court opera in Munich; his mother was the daughter of a wealthy brewer and a lifelong patron of music and the arts. Even before he began his schooling at the age of six he had composed a piano piece he called "The Tailor's Polka," and a song for Christmas time. Everybody said they were charming, but his mother and father knew they were really more than charming; they knew they were the product of musical genius, which almost always manifests itself in the earliest years. By the time he was 10 he had written a Festival March and a Serenade for Wind Instruments, and had had the unbearable thrill of seeing them published.

That was enough; he was to be a composer. After that, as he progressed through the gymnasium and the university, one composition after another rushed from his pen. There were a couple of string quartets, a group of piano pieces, a cello sonata, a couple of concertos and a symphony, all before he was 20. In the meantime he had dropped out of the university and had become the assistant conductor, under the great Hans von Bulow, of the ducal orchestra at Meiningen. There, in the orchestra, was a curious musician named Ritter, a man many years his senior. It was this man who was to lead the young composer into a musical blind alley in which, though he was to achieve enduring fame and perhaps musical immortality, he was ultimately bypassed by the main stream. For it was Ritter who turned his thoughts to the medium of the Liszt tone poem couched in an extension of the language of Wagner.

For years, after this idea had become fixed in his mind, he was the rage of Europe. His first big tone poem he called "Aus Italien," and in it committed a terrific blunder. He thought "Funiculi, Funicula" was an Italian folk song and quoted it verbatim, only to discover, when the true composer descended upon his neck, that it was written by Luigi Denza for the opening in 1880 of a funicular railway. But scenes and controversy and turbulence were always to be his wherever he went or whatever he did.

FILLED WITH NAUSEA

By the turn of the century he was one of the most famous men in Europe. His tone poems "Don Juan," "Macbeth," "Death and Transfiguration," "Till Eulenspiegel," "Don Quixote" and "A Hero's Life" (in which he described his views on critics), were astonishing musical audiences all over the world. He once said he could express a silver spoon in music (and did express a silver rose), without a single word. But he used words almost as skilfully as he used notes; there wasn't an associate or a friend he didn't enrage with his sharp tongue. Those he didn't enrage, his wife did. "I will only say," wrote Mahler, who got along with him when his wife wasn't on the scene, "that (she) filled me with positive nausea."

Yet, if his wife was difficult, her ambition drove him on to greater efforts. "My God, for a million!" she once said to Mahler, then reconsidered. "No," she added, "that's not enough, five million. Then he can stop composing." One day, when he was wandering absentmindedly around the house, she barked, "Get busy and compose!" He did.

Most of his composing was done in the spring and summer. "Cherries do not blossom in the winter," he used to say. But he composed everywhere, while walking, driving, eating or drinking. One of his most famous melodies, the waltz in "Der Rosenkavalier," occurred to him during a card game. Yet it wasn't as easy as that. "Musical ideas, like young wine," he said, "should be put in storage and taken up again only after they have been allowed to ferment and ripen." After the passage of a year or so, he'd take up the idea again to find that unconsciously something within him had been at work on it. Once the musical ideas were perfected in his mind and worked out as piano arrangements, the scoring was merely labor and, until very late in his life, he worked 12 hours a day at it.

WILL OUTLIVE TIMES

After 1900 his thoughts turned almost entirely to opera, though his "Sinfonia Domestica" (which acutely delineated his tempestuous life with his wife) and the Alpine Symphony came afterwards. The first opera was perhaps his most sensational one. It was "Salome," after the play by Oscar Wilde, and it scandalized Europe. Mahler, however, said it was a masterpiece, though he claimed his friend was a "vulcan who lives and labors over a heap of slag." Other operas followed; "Elektra," "Der Rosenkavalier" and "Ariadne auf Naxos." And then something hapepned; perhaps the emergence of the music of another and younger composer named Stravinsky. For suddenly it became fashionable to say that the master was burned out. Romanticism, Wagnerianism and all that was dead, and so was he. Then first world war came along, and when it was all over, nobody seemed to remember him as being still alive. It was 1920, but Richard Strauss was still alive.

Last week, at the age of 85, Richard Strauss died. The years since 1914 had not found him idle. Eight operas followed "Ariadne," as well as orchestral pieces and con-

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
SEP 17 1949

BOOK CHAT

BY MARGARET PARSONS

H. Earle Johnson of the music department at Clark University, has written a history of one of Boston's best-known cultural and social landmarks, Symphony Hall. The title will be, simply enough, "Symphony Hall—Boston" and the book will be published in the early Spring.

M. A. DeWolfe Hose, who was himself the author of a history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra some years ago, has written an introduction for Mr. Johnson's book. The Trustees of the Orchestra have opened all records to him but his book is not to be considered "official" history in the sense that restrictions have been put upon his use of the material.

H. EARLE JOHNSON

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS
SEP 1[illegible]

★ Mildred Norton

(Drama-Music Editor)

The fame of Tanglewood, which has formed the setting for midsummer studies by artists from all over the world, has spread far beyond the Berkshires in the 10 years since Serge Koussevitsky founded the Berkshire Music School near Lenox, Mass.

Now numbering local chapters throughout the country made up of Tanglewood alumnae, it added its latest chapter last Monday evening, when a group of 25 Los Angeles musicians gathered to pay tribute to Dr. Koussevitsky and inaugurate a Los Angeles chapter.

Koussevitsky, who recently concluded the Hollywood Bowl season with a capacity attendance of 20,000 people, delivered a stirring talk to the members on the objectives and ideals of the Alumnae group and on the importance of good music in the world today.

Gregor Piatagorsky, world famous cellist, who is also a faculty member of the Berkshire Music Center, briefly commented on the high ideals inspired in all musicians by Dr. Koussevitsky and stressed the importance of the Los Angeles Chapter as the branch furthest removed geographically from the parent chapter in Mass.

Wednesday, Koussevitsky flew to his ranch in Phoenix, Ariz., where he will spend the winter.

Castelnuovo-Tedesco concert

Another opportunity for music lovers to meet with the creative minds which are writing the music of our age will be provided tomorrow night, when the third "Meet the Composer" concert is presented at the Assistance League Playhouse in Hollywood.

Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco, one of the most respected musical creators of his generation, will be the composer featured, both in a program devoted to his music and in the discussion period which follows. Tedesco, who has written extensively on music in addition to composing for opera, the concert hall and the films, will answer questions concerning music's role in society, the relationship between the composer and his public and the problems facing the contemporary musician.

Great of the program highlights will be the performance of his Sonata for Clarinet and Piano, which will be played by Franklyn Stokes with the composer at the keyboard. Other artists appearing include contralto Eula Beal, who will present a group of Tedesco songs which she also plans to introduce at her Town Hall appearance in November, and the American Art Quartet.

UCLA concert series

Public season tickets are now on sale for UCLA's annual concert series, which this year includes six events: Vladimir Horowitz, Oct. 3, in solo concert; soprano Delia Reinhardt in recital, accompanied by Bruno Walter, Nov. 29; violinist Louis Kaufman, Jan. 10; the Los Angeles Chamber Symphony under Harold Byrns, Jan. 31; Metropolitan tenor Giuseppe De Stefano, Feb. 28; three young artist audition winners, March 21.

Philharmonic tickets on sale

Campaign for sale of season tickets to the 31st season of concerts by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, Alfred Wallenstein conductor, is now under way and will continue through Oct. 15. The 1949-50 season opens Oct. 27-28.

National opera group forming

Douglas Field has been appointed west coast regional director of the National Association of Opera, a non-profit organization with Philadelphia headquarters formed to promote opera festivals throughout the country utilizing new talent.

John Anello, national president, was in Los Angeles last week to discuss the possibility of presenting a festival here next year as part of the Centennial celebrations. It would follow the pattern of two already presented in Anello's native Milwaukee, in which short operas and operatic excerpts were performed by artists auditioned throughout the United States, Canada and Mexico.

Change in broadcast time

The contemporary chamber music series, "Music of Today," will be on the air over KFWB from 10 to 10:30 p. m. in future. Tomorrow's program is second in the current series honoring Arnold Schoenberg.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
SEP 18 1949

Music

MUNCH TO AID HUB SYMPHONY

By RAYMOND MORIN

Being in its 69th year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra finds it a simple matter to celebrate anniversaries. So it is that Charles Munch's first season as its regular conductor coincides with the 50th anniversary year of Symphony Hall, built for this orchestra in 1900.

To celebrate this event with his first concert on Oct. 7, Mr. Munch has selected the same program which Wilhelm Gericke presented at the opening subscription concerts in the then new hall on Oct. 19 and 20, 1900.

New Organ Built

At that time the organ, which had been built with Symphony Hall, was heard in a performance of Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto. This Summer, a new organ has been built and installed by the Aeolian-Skinner Co. Mr. Munch will thus give the new organ its first hearing by the inclusion of this same concerto on the first program. The soloist will be E. Power Biggs.

Gericke's program of 50 years ago, which will be repeated, is as follows: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4; Ballet Music and Entr'Acte from "Rosamunde" by Schubert; and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The fact that this is a 50th anniversary is relatively unimportant. However, it is of the greatest importance to what may be the world's finest orchestra that Charles Munch is going to try to fill Serge Koussevitzky's 25-year-old shoes.

Direct Opposite

Temperamentally he is the direct opposite of his predecessor. He is well-supplied with exuberance, but his employment of this energy is superimposed by self-effacement, engaging modesty, and a determination to serve music with humility.

For more than two decades, the Boston Symphony has been partly eclipsed by the vivid personality that commanded it. But it is only just to point out that because of this powerful domination it has become great. Its style, atmosphere, and general impression have stemmed directly from this source. Also there has been a degree of affectation and a resultant concentration of limelight that has caused the Boston Symphony to be known as its conductor's orchestra.

It is highly probable that the spotlight at Symphony Hall will alter its course. For a while there will be an inevitable comparison between the podium styles of Munch and his predecessor, but when his personal observation is finished, the patrons at Symphony Hall will find that "the music is the thing."

Style Responsible

If the Boston Symphony has risen to its present heights, it is because of the "style, atmosphere, and general impressions" that we have mentioned. Therefore it would be nonsensical to have wished for a Koussevitzky with a less dictatorial attitude.

In the chapter on Charles Munch in his book, "Dictators of the Baton," David Ewen (an enlightened and fair-minded authority) says: "I doubt if Munch will ever succeed in making us forget Koussevitzky's treasurable contributions to our symphonic life. And yet just as strongly do I feel that his presence at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring it a greater health and balance."

There is no doubt in my mind that the guardians of the Boston Symphony took these factors into consideration when they chose Munch to succeed Koussevitzky. To have selected a virtuoso conductor would have been fatal because it would have led to new versions of the same podium techniques, and again the spotlight would have remained on the baton.

Master Conductor

Munch is a master conductor, but he is also a musician of impeccable taste and refinement. In selecting him, the Boston Symphony's future has been invested more soundly in its ability to play great music Since the basic qualities of performance lie within the music itself, and since the orchestra's resources are immense, we can see no reason why the Boston Symphony under Munch should not enter a new era of prosperity.

Super Memory

A few years ago, when we interviewed Vladimir Horowitz, he said that to play the poetic first movement of Beethoven's "Moonlight Sonata" one should also be able to play the brilliant Etudes by Liszt.

This brings to mind what a small revelation of an artist's skill is given in a single performance. I doubt if the artist himself fully envisions the scope of his own resources. For example, when Joseph Battista plays Liszt's "Piano Concerto in E-flat" at the Festival's Monday night concert, the audience will be hearing one of thirty-odd concertos in his repertory.

Probably 15 Hours

We can but approximate the time it would take to play all of them but a rough guess would be 15 hours of continuous performance. Naturally, these are not all in perfected condition, but the fact remains that at some time or other in his career, Mr. Battista has played 30 piano concertos, and any one of them could be prepared for concert performance in a comparatively brief time.

These concertos are the smaller part of his repertory. Like most concert artists, his solo engagements far exceed those with orchestra. Therefore, over the years has has accumulated a gigantic repertory, which it would be difficult for him to even list by title.

We had an illustration of this at Cape Cottage, Me., where he was summering with his wife, Angeline, and preparing for his Fall and Winter tour.

Spanish Music

One evening, the subject of Spanish music came into the conversation, and among the works mentioned was Albeniz' "Triana." It so happens that "Triana" is one of the most difficult scores in the Spanish literature, technically and interpretively.

Said Mr. Battista: "I used to play that piece years ago." Whereupon he went to the piano and played it cover to cover. It was accurate playing and not too far removed from his own concert standard.

Mrs. Battista remarked, "I've never heard you play that before, Joseph. When did you play it last?"

"Oh, it must have been before we were married," he replied.

That was seven years ago.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
SEP 15 1949

New Boston Symphony Conductor Coming to U. S.

BOSTON, Sept. 15 (UP)—Charles Munch will fly from Paris, France, today to assume his new position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Munch, who has been conducting in France this Summer, will assemble the orchestra by the end of the month to open its 69th season Oct. 7, at Symphony Hall. He succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retired.

MUSIC

Critic's Report on Death of Strauss

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

While Richard Strauss was alive, the musical past was still, in a way, the musical present. Now that he has gone, the past has become that in very truth. Strauss, of course, became a classic long ago. Few composers have had the satisfaction that must have been his in seeing his music so firmly established. Last season, according to Musical America's annual survey, the 27 major American symphony orchestras gave him 122 performances of 14 works, which put him in sixth place among all composers, living or dead. His nearest contemporary rival, Prokofieff, received about half as many—62 performances of 11 compositions — while Stravinsky trailed with 53 and Sibelius with 48.

The Future

How long Strauss will retain his popularity is sheer guess work. For all his harmonic daring, the unprecedented complexity of his scores, his boldly imaginative and prodigiously masterful handling of the orchestra, he was not, strictly speaking, a revolutionary. It was his destiny to conclude an epoch, not to begin one. Yet that Palestrina, and after him Bach, did the same thing has not militated against their survival.

A realist in life as well as in his art, Strauss knew when he had become a back number, though he continued almost to the day of his death to pour out music in his own way. Yet not in the manner that he had once pursued. The storm and stress, the flaming romanticism of the great tone poems and of those notable music dramas, "Salome" and "Elektra," gave way to a new and different, a "classical" Strauss; though not in the same sense that Strauss between the ages of 12 and 22 was a classicist, in the tradition of Mendelssohn and Brahms. With "Der Rosenkavalier" (1911) the tide turned. In such sharp contrast to its sensational predecessors that it was a sensation in its own way, this last-to-date of the really great operas proved to be a flood of vocal and orchestral song, set off with the lilting waltz rhythms that have helped to confuse him in the minds of many with his namesake, Johann of Vienna.

Of the subsequent Strauss of these nearly four decades of busy creativity, the American public has but the merest inkling. The Metropolitan, and with no great success, mounted "The Egyptian Helen," a work hampered by a tortuous libretto. Indeed, the only one of the post-"Rosenkavalier" works to find general favor is "Ariadne on Naxos." The first of a long line of modern chamber operas, it is unsuited to large auditoriums and still caviar, I suspect, to many opera-goers. Nevertheless, the New York City Center has found it a best-seller and will open its current fall season with it on Sept. 29, besides adding "Rosenkavalier" to its repertory. Possibly Strauss' demise will prompt the Metropolitan or the Center to try its hand at one of the nine other operas that followed the latter, not one of which has been heard in this country.

Began at Six

Like Mozart, Strauss began composing at six and was soon producing compositions of eminent respectability and complete technical mastery. This was the first of his five periods. The second, following his conversion to the ideals of Liszt and Wagner, began with the Symphonic Fantasy, "From Italy," and included all the tone poems, save the "Alpine Symphony" (1915), and the first four operas. You might even call "Rosenkavalier" a work of transition and place the remaining stage-pieces in a fourth category. That still leaves the fifth phase of his art: the instrumental works of his last years. Since Strauss himself did not consider most of them important, we do not have to. They include the Second Horn Concerto, played at Tanglewood last summer and quite likely to turn up at Symphony Hall this season, and what would seem to be the most valuable of them, the "Metamorphosen" for 23 solo strings, which Dr. Koussevitzky disclosed to us.

If the instrumental works of his extreme youth are no longer of vital interest, the same is not true of the songs. Two of his very finest, "Zueignung" and "Allerseelen," were written at 18. They are pure Strauss, as was "Don Juan," which he composed, still more incredibly, at 24. Within the next 15 years came six more tone poems, the operas "Guntram" and "Feuersnot," and a host of songs. Such productivity is all the more remarkable when we consider that Strauss was a practicing conductor and, incidentally, one of the best in the business.

So long a period of significant activity is without parallel in the history of music, and only Verdi, among the top composers, exceeded Strauss' span of 85 years. The secret in Strauss' case is to be found in his calm temperament, his orderly and methodical mind, his intense practicality. We can also admire his modesty. He explained his command of the orchestra by the fact that he had so often conducted the operas of Wagner, of whom he once said, "no one can climb that mountain. I don't try to, I go around it." And on another occasion: "Wagner is a composer in the front rank of the first class. I am a composer in the front rank of the second class." . . . A great genius who had his head in the clouds yet kept his feet on the ground.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
SEP 18 1949

LOCAL MUSICIAN GOING TO BOSTO

The Springfield Symphony Orchestra serves many purposes in the community and not the least important is the opportunity for talented young musicians to get practical training. This is a point which conductor Alexander Leslie has stressed during his five years with the orchestra. Under his interested and painstaking direction, a number of young musicians have gained practical experience in orchestral playing which has served them well when the opportunity arrived for expansion of their activities.

As case in point is that of Theodore Brewster, who has served the orchestra as first bassoonist for three years. He has been accepted as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will assume his duties there this season. He substituted at Tanglewood this summer for the ailing bassoonist of the Boston orchestra. He is a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music. One needs no crystal ball to predict that Mr. Brewster's interest in the Springfield orchestra will continue, and from time to time he may be heard with the orchestra, just as some of his new colleagues will be heard.

Among others who have graduated from the Springfield orchestra to other orchestras are Donald Radding, violinist, now a member of the National Symphony, and Wilfred Robillard, flutist, now with the Baltimore orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 21 1949

Miss Alisa Damrosch Littell
David Berns

ALISA D. LITTELL ENGAGED TO WED

Member of Damrosch Family Will Be Bride of Eleazer de Carvalho, Conductor

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Littell of 158 East Seventy-first Street and Tyringham, Mass., have announced the engagement of their daughter, Alisa Damrosch, to Eleazer de Carvalho, son of Senhora Dona Dalila Mendonça de Carvalho of Rio de Janeiro and the late Capitao Manuel Afonso de Carvalho.

Miss Littell was graduated from the Chapin School in New York, studied also at Smith College, and is attending the David Mannes Music School here. She is a granddaughter of Walter Damrosch, of New York, famous conductor, and the late Mrs. Damrosch, and of Mrs. Philip Littell of New York and Cornish, N. H., and the late Mr. Littell.

On her maternal side also she is a great-granddaughter of the late James G. Blaine, who was Secretary of State in the administrations of Presidents Garfield, Arthur and Benjamin Harrison, and of the late Dr. Leopold Damrosch, founder of the New York Oratorio and Symphony Societies. Miss Littell's father is Senior Editor of The Reader's Digest.

Mr. de Carvalho received a Doctor's degree in music from the University of Brazil. He is conductor of the Orquestra Sinfonica Brasileira in Rio de Janeiro, and is a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 21 1949

SYMPHONY HEAD ARRIVES IN HUB

Munch, Succeeding Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, to Prepare His Opening Program

Boston, Sept. 20.—(AP)—Charles Munch, who began his musical career by playing a church organ, arrived today to prepare his opening program as the first new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a quarter of a century.

He was appointed 15 months ago to succeed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired this spring.

Munch, lately conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, drove here from New York and went directly to his new home in suburban Milton. The house was once the residence of the late Episcopal Bishop William Lawrence.

The Alsatian-born, 57-year-old Munch told his first Boston press conference that, like Koussevitzky, he would not stay within narrow musical limits.

He said his repertoire will include the works of such American composers as Walter Piston, Lukas Foss, Roy Harris, William Schuman and Bernard Wagenaar.

Munch brought with him a fine Guarneri violin, but said he did not intend to play it in public.

The new conductor said that for his first appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony he would repeat the program presented when Symphony Hall opened 50 years ago.

He said he added two pieces to that program in memory of two composers who died recently—Richard Strauss' Domestic Symphony and Henri Rabaud's Nocturnal Procession.

Munch was taught the organ as a youngster. When he was 12 years old he played at St. William's Church in his native Strasbourg.

Later, he concentrated on the violin and in 1919 was made professor at the Strasbourgh Conservatory and conductor of its orchestra.

In 1926 he went to Leipzig as concert master in the Gewandhaus orchestra. Six years later he went to Paris, where he conducted concerts of the Paris Symphony, Lamaoureux and Staram orchestras.

He founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra several years ago and has since been its conductor. He also continues as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
SEP 21 1949

MUNCH, NEW BOSTON CONDUCTOR, ARRIVES

To Repeat Program of 50 Years Ago at First Appearance

BOSTON, Sept. 20 -AP- Charles Munch, who began his musical career by playing a church organ, arrived today to prepare his opening program as the first new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a quarter of a century.

He was appointed 15 months ago to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired this Spring.

Munch, lately conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra drove here from New York and went directly to his new home in suburban Milton. The house was once the residence of the late Episcopal Bishop William Lawrence.

The Alsatian-born, 57-year-old Munch told his first Boston press conference that, like Koussevitzky, he would not stay within narrow musical limits.

He said his repertoire will include the works of such American composers as Walter Piston, Lukas Foss, Roy Harris, William Schuman and Bernard Wagenaar.

Munch brought with him a fine Guarneri violin but said he did not intend to play it in public.

The new conductor said that for his first appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony he would repeat the program presented when Symphony Hall opened 50 years ago.

He said he added two pieces to that program in memory of two composers who died recently—Richard Strauss' Domestic Symphony and Henri Rabaud's Nocturnal Procession.

Munch was taught the organ as a youngster. When he was 12 years old he played at St. William's church in his native Strasbourg.

Later, he concentrated on the violin and in 1919 was made professor at the Strasbourg Conservatory and conductor of its orchestra.

In 1926 he went to Leipzig as concert master in the Gewandhaus orchestra. Six years later he went to Paris where he conducted concerts of the Paris Symphony, Lamaoureux and Staram orchestras.

He founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra several years ago and has since been its conductor. He also continues as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
SEP 21 1949

WOMEN ADORE CHARLES MUNCH

New Hub Conductor May Get Soap Opera Trade

Boston, Sept. 21 (UP)—Athletic-looking Charles Munch may cut in on the soap opera audience when he starts his winter concert series as new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was indicated today.

In his first meeting with critics as regular conductor late yesterday, the 58-year-old French musician showed the results of a survey made by the French magazine Elle. It asked its feminine readers with which man they would most like to dine.

Fourteen thousand answers came in. Winston Churchill was first and Munch, who recently completed summer engagements in France, was second.

However, Munch told the critics that his primary ambition on his new job was to maintain the orchestra at the high level it reached under retiring conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

He outlined plans for introducing new works and reviving lesser known compositions of famous composers, giving symphony listeners a wider variety than is ordinarily available.

Munch reported that he had bought a Milton home that once belonged to the late Massachusetts Episcopal Bishop William Appleton Lawrence.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
SEP 21 1949

Munch Prepares For Boston Concert

Boston, Sept. 21.—(AP)—Charles Munch, 57-year-old former leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, today made preparations for his opening program as the first new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a quarter of a century.

Munch, who began his musical career by playing a church organ, was appointed 15 months ago to succeed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired this spring.

He earrived here from New York yesterday and went directly to his new home in suburban Milton.

The Alsatian-born Munch told a press conference that for his first appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony he would repeat the program presented when Symphony Hall opened 50 years ago.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
SEP 21 1949

Munch Arrives In Boston.

Boston, Sept. 20. — (AP.) — Charles Munch, who began his musical career by playing a church organ, arrived today to prepare his opening program as the first new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a quarter of a century. He was appointed 15 months ago to succeed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired this spring. Munch, lately conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, drove here from New York and went directly to his new home in suburban Milton. The house was once the residence of the late Episcopal Bishop William Lawrence.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
SEP 21 1949

Munch To Repeat Boston Symphony Hall's First Bill

Boston, Sept. 21. (AP)—Charles Munch, 57-year-old former leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, today made preparations for his opening program as the first new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a quarter of a century.

Munch, who began his musical career by playing a church organ, was appointed 15 months ago to succeed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired this Spring.

He arrived here from New York Tuesday and went directly to his new home in suburban Milton.

The Alsatian-born Munch told a press conference that his repertoire will include the works of such American composers as Walter Piston, Lucas Foss, Roy Harris, William Schuman and Bernard Wagenaar.

He said that for his first appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony he would repeat the program presented when Symphony Hall opened 50 years ago.

He said he added two pieces to that program in memory of two composers who died recently—Richard Strauss' Domestic Symphony and Henri Rabaud's Nocturnal Procession.

MUNCH TELLS OF PLANS FOR YEAR

New Symphony Conductor Meets Press on Arrival in Boston--- Only One Personnel Change

NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR IN BOSTON
Charles Munch (left), new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he was welcomed here by George E. Judd, the orchestra manager.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The scene was the conductor's room at Symphony Hall. But now it was Charles Munch, not Serge Koussevitzky, who received the assembled members of the daily and weekly press. Gone from the walls were the numerous portraits of Koussevitzky that so long adorned them. And one felt that no matter how long Mr. Munch remained in Boston, they would not be correspondingly decorated. The Symphony's new conductor, now in his middle 50s, is photogenic, but in manner he is self-effacing. Koussevitzky has not been succeeded by another "grand seigneur."

Mr. Munch was clad in a brown double-breasted suit with shirt and tie that matched it becomingly. Obviously he is interested in his personal appearance, but he does not look as though he had stepped from the pages of Esquire. In fact, it's all going to be different; and changes are always welcome.

Mr. Munch's purpose in meeting the assembled journalists was to disclose his plans for the season. Yet, in a sense, they had to be extracted from him. You get the idea that he would not be voluble even in his native French, and his English, much improved since he was here last, is still halting. He was anxious to display it as far as he could, but he frequently turned to Antony Bonvalot, who acted as interpreter when such service was necessary.

If not such a dashing figure as Koussevitzky, Mr. Munch is still something of a lady-killer. To the women of Paris he has long been known as "le beau Charles." In the course of proceedings yesterday afternoon he drew from his pocket a page extracted from a woman's magazine published in Paris in which the subscribers had answered the question: With what man would you most wish to have dinner? The top number of votes, 4027, went to Winston Churchill. In second place was Mr. Munch with 1282, and the actor Jean Marais was two votes behind him.

Special Concerts

This will be a year of memorializing and special concerts. One of the latter will be devoted to Albert Schweitzer, specifically to the raising of funds for his hospital at Lambarene in French Equatorial Africa. Because of Dr. Schweitzer's fame as organist, the program will contain works for that instrument alone and with orchestra, the soloist being E. Power Biggs, who will also play a Concerto of Handel at the opening concerts of Oct. 7 and 8. As already stated in these columns, the initial program will be a replica of Wilhelm Gericke's list for the first pair of concerts when Symphony Hall was opened 50 years ago.

Weber, Schubert and Beethoven are the other composers represented; but before these numbers are heard Mr. Munch will pay his respects to a predecessor of his at Symphony Hall, Henri Rabaud. That distinguished French musician, whose term of one year, 1918-19, came between those of Muck and Monteux, is best known as composer by his affecting tone poem, after Lenau's "Faust," "La Procession Nocturne," and on it Mr. Munch's choice quite naturally fell. Rabaud died in Paris on Sept. 12 at the age of 76. Four days before, Richard Strauss passed away at Garmisch-Partenkirchen in his 86th year. At the second pair of concerts Mr. Munch will play the latter's "Symphonia Domestica," with which he has recently had great success in Paris. And, for the first time in Boston, it will be performed with the four saxaphones that Strauss included in the score, with the injunction that they should be omitted only when absolutely necessary.

The music of Bach will be much in evidence, since that greatest of composers, as many will have it, died in 1750. Among other things Mr. Munch will offer the "St. John" Passion, in Holy Week, and a transcription of "The Art of Fugue," made by a cousin of his, Ernest Munch. The 75th birthday of Arnold Schoenberg, which fell on the 13th of this month, will be marked by a performance of the one work of his that has found widespread favor, the "Transfigured Night" for strings.

Other Features

Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, which opened Symphony Hall, will be heard at a special concert in the spring, and yet another will be devoted to Honegger's choral piece, "Joan of Arc at the Stake." Mr. Munch will not neglect the American composer, and he will introduce to Boston Dutch-born Bernard Wagenaar by way of a new symphony. A French composer who will once more come into his own here is Vincent d'Indy. We will hear his great Second Symphony and his charming "Symphony on a French Mountain Song" with Robert Casadesus as the pianist. Mr. Munch's eyes brightened at the suggestion of Haydn, but he made it quite plain that two composers whom he would not favor would be Sibelius and Bruckner. "They are not liked in France."

The last half hour of the Monday rehearsal will continue to go on the air, but Mr. Munch is not particularly intrigued with the prospect: "I do not like to be observed when I am cleaning house." Dr. Koussevitzky enjoyed these sessions immensely.

Mr. Munch arrived in New York by plane on Friday and motored to Boston in his new auto. His wife arrives Friday on the Ile de France. They will live at 1383 Brush Hill rd, Milton, in a house formerly occupied by Bishop William Lawrence. A chauffeur and chambermaid came with Mr. Munch from France. Their cook is French, but she was acquired in Boston. Mr. Munch is duly sensible of what it means to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony and he opened this little meeting by saying that he would devote all his energies to the task of keeping the orchestra at the high level at which it now stands. There will be only one change in the orchestra's personnel, a new recruit to the bassoon section, Theodore Brewster, former student at the Conservatory. Nor will Dr. Koussevitzky's unconventional method of seating the orchestra be changed.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT & LEADER
SEP 18 1949

CHARLES MUNCH

. . . who will take over the Boston Symphony orchestra for the fall and winter season, flew from Paris to Boston this past week to assume his new duties. He will assemble the orchestra by the end of the month and will open its 69th season on Oct. 7, in Symphony hall, Boston. As the season coincides with the 50th anniversary year of Symphony hall, Mr. Munch has chosen for his first program the exact program which Wilhelm Gericke presented at the opening concerts of the orchestra in the new hall on Oct. 19 and 20, 1900. At that time the organ which had been built with Symphony hall was heard in a performance of Handel's Fourth Organ concerto.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL
SEP 18 1949

Chicago Dec. 5.

Munch Is Set At Boston

BOSTON, Sept. 17. — Charles Munch, who has filled conducting assignments in France during the Summer, flew in from Paris this past week to assume his new duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The successor to Serge Koussevitzky, who resigned last Spring after 25 years at the Boston's helm, will open the famed group's 69th season on Oct. 7 in Symphony Hall.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
SEP 18 1949

Munch to Conduct Boston Symphony

BOSTON. (UP)—Charles Munch will fly from Paris, France, today to assume his new position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Munch, who has been conducting in France during the summer, will assemble the orchestra by the end of the month to open its 69th season Oct. 7 at Symphony Hall. He succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retired.

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST
SEP 18 1949

Charles Munch Takes Over Baton From Koussevitzky

BOSTON, Sept 17.—Charles Munch, who has fulfilled conducting engagements in France during the summer, will arrive from Paris this week to assume his new duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will assemble the orchestra by the end of this month to open its sixty-ninth season Oct 7 in Symphony Hall.

Munch's first season as the orchestra's regular conductor coincides with the fiftieth anniversary year of Symphony Hall, the auditorium which was built for this orchestra in 1900. To celebrate the anniversary, he has chosen for his first program the exact program which Wilhelm Gericke presented at the opening subscription concerts of the orchestra in the new hall on Oct 19 and 20, 1900.

At that time the organ which had been built with Symphony Hall was heard in a performance of Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto. This summer, a new organ has been built and installed by the Aeolian-Skinner Company. Mr Munch will thus give the organ its first hearing by the inclusion of this same concerto on the first program. The soloist will be E. Power Biggs. Gericke's program of 50 years ago, which will be repeated, is as follows: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Handel's Organ Concerto No 4; Ballet music and Entr'Acts from "Rosamunde," by Schubert, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The orchestra will give its usual four series in Boston. Two weeks of the concerts will be led by Leonard Bernstein, who will thus appear as guest conductor in each of the series.

Since the Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1881, it has had nine conductors. Charles Munch, as the tenth, is the third native of France (Henri Rabaud conducted in 1918-1919, and Pierre Monteux in 1919-1924). Serge Koussevitzky, whose term of 25 years followed these, will share with Munch the Berkshire Festival of 1950 at Tanglewood next summer.

[10]

By Don Messenger
Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Organ Installation Marks Symphony Hall 'Birthday'

Symphony Hall's 50th anniversary is being marked by the installation of a new organ as well as the new conductor, Charles Munch, from Paris.

For several months after the removal of the old instrument left a gaping void behind the row of gilded pipes, an astonishing array of loudspeakers connected to an electric organ has filled the hall with sonorous music when needed for graduation ceremonies and what not. But now these have yielded to the brand new Aeolian Skinner wind instrument especially designed by Donald Harrison.

Popular subject for meditation in Symphony Hall is whether or not the display pipes which have stood through these changes are "real" or "fake." The answer is that except for a few, added for symmetry, they were real enough in the old organ and are now connected with the new instrument.

Munch Brings Along Violin, But Won't Play in Public

Only piece of luggage carried by Charles Munch, new Boston Symphony conductor, as he stepped off the plane from Paris, was a cherished Guarneri violin. Asked whether he meant to play it in Boston, he replied, however, "Only for you, perhaps, not in public."

After starting his musical career as an organist in a Protestant church in Strasbourg at the age of 12, he did concentrate on the violin for a while and in 1926 was concert master for the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig. Since 1932 he has been conducting various orchestras in Paris.

Talking about instruments, he was asked his opinion on jazz trumpet techniques. He said that he had once heard Louis Armstrong give a wonderful performance of Paganini's "Perpetual Motion" for violin, showing extraordinary skill. Would he try to get Mr. Armstrong to join up with the Boston Symphony, someone inquired. He smiled and answered, "I think not."

'English Lavender' Called 'Bittersweet'

It may be, says one downtown shopper, that devaluation of the pound has affected supplies of British herbs, but whatever the reason, she insists that it was bittersweet which filled a table set up in an alley and plainly labeled "English Lavender."

Incidentally, accustomed to bittersweet in the West, she was a little disturbed to find that when she remarked on this discovery she found that several Bostonians associated bittersweet only with chocolates. — and Noel Coward's operetta, in which the English Evelyn Laye appeared in New York and the American Peggy Wood starred in London—to get back to that hands-across-the-sea touch once more.

Black Calves Named With Accent on the 'Per'

Out at Friendly Crossways Farm in Harvard, Mass., members of the second New England High School Institute of International Relations held there this summer conferred names on a pair of black calves which have stuck to them permanently.

One was first called Emperor Jones, after the character in Eugene O'Neill's play of that name, but this soon shrank to "Per Jones" under high schoolers' love of abbreviations. Because of this, when the second calf was acquired, it became "Per Haps."

Old Music Hall Organ Reerected Near Methuen

Before moving into Symphony Hall at the turn of the century, the Boston Symphony Orchestra had played for 20 years in the old Music Hall, on the site of the present Orpheum Theater. The organ there was installed in 1850 and, like the one just replaced in Symphony Hall, served for half a century before being taken out. It was reerected in a hall built especially for it in the castle-crowned Searles estate near Methuen.

NEW LEADER
NEW YORK, N.Y
9/17/49

KATHRYN GRAYSON AND JOSE ITURBI IN NEW MGM TECHNICOLOR FILM

"That Midnight Kiss," new MGM Technicolor musical romance, which comes into the Capitol Theatre on Thursday, Sept. 22, stars Kathryn Grayson, Jose Iturbi, Ethel Barrymore and Mario Lanza. In support are Keenan Wynn, J. Carrol Naish, Jules Munshin, the comic waiter of "Easter Parade," Thomas Gomez, Marjorie Reynolds and Amparo Iturbi.

Lanza, making his motion picture debut in "That Midnight Kiss," relives the true-life episode in which the famous conductor, Koussevitzky, accidentally heard him sing while he was working as a piano-mover and made him an over-night singing sensation.

The accompanying in-person show will headline Gene Krupa and his orchestra, featuring Roy Eldridge, Bill Black, Dolores Hawkins and Frankie Ross. Other start acts will include Jack E. Leonard, comic; Kitty Kallen, songstress, and Tommy Wonder, dancing star of "Annie Get Your ..."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 21 1949

MUNCH ARRIVES IN BOSTON

New Conductor of Symphony Announces Special Concerts

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Sept. 20—Charles Munch, arriving today in Boston to begin his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said he was planning a series of special concerts commemorating noted composers during his first season as successor to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Among his programs, Mr. Munch said, he would include all the Brandenburg concertos and orchestral suites of Bach, as well as the "St. John Passion" in observance of the 200th anniversary of that composer's death. Other works will commemorate Richard Strauss and Henri Rabaud, both of whom died earlier this month.

Another special concert will be a benefit for Dr. Albert Schweitzer's African mission. During a recent visit to Boston, before Mr. Munch's arrival, Dr. Schweitzer inspected the new symphony organ, then under construction, and inscribed his name on the instrument.

Explaining his plans at a press conference, Mr. Munch said there would be only one change in orchestral personnel and no changes either in the seating plan or pitch of the orchestra.

'Le Beau Charles' Munch Arrives to Plan New Symphony Season

By CYRUS DURGIN

"I wish with all my heart and soul to maintain the high standards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra set by Serge Koussevitzky." So spoke Charles Munch, the new conductor, at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

This was his first interview since he assumed the post, and a large circle of the newspaper and magazine press sat around him in the freshly redecorated conductor's room at the corner of Massachusetts av. and St. Stephen st.

CHARLES MUNCH, new conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Though Mr. Munch spent a busy Summer conducting in Paris and elsewhere he looked fit and rested and handsome as ever. He had found some time to play golf. What was his score? Say 75?

"No, much more!" smiled the Alsatian musician with that blend of humor, charm and easy amiability which have helped to gain him the affectionate nickname of "Le beau Charles."

These qualities bid fair to make a drastic change of atmosphere at Symphony Hall. It was in the air yesterday as the writers and various members of the Hall staff sat and talked informally with him. His English has improved, for he has been studying hard the past two months. Though now and again he used the services of an interpreter, he answered questions quickly and with obvious friendliness and frankness. If you wish to describe him in a phrase, call him an aristocratic musician with the democratic manners which all Americans like.

Favorite of Parisiennes

It was with humor rather than pride that he pulled from his coat pocket two sheets from the Parisian magazine "Elle" (She), a woman's publication. He laughed as he explained that "Elle" has asked 10,000 Parisiennes the question: "With whom would you like most to have dinner?" Winston Churchill came first, with 4000 votes, and Charles Munch second, with 1282. Then followed an assortment of about eight more or less famous males. Gary Cooper was low in the count, having received 387 votes, with Joseph Stalin on the short end of 378.

Mr. Munch flew from France last Thursday. In New York he picked up a car (an Oldsmobile, black sedan, if you must have all the details) and drove himself to his new home at 1383 Brush Hill road, Milton, a house once occupied by the late Bishop William A. Lawrence. Mr. Munch is an old hand with motor vehicles. He has been driving himself for 30 years. (Veteran Motor Car Club please note!)

But from now on he will have not too much time to see New England scenery at first hand—though he plans a few outings—for the little mahogany chest in his room at Symphony Hall was stuffed with five drawers full of new musical manuscripts for him to examine. These all had arrived before he did!

Mrs. Munch, who dislikes air travel, and is now aboard the Ile de France, will arrive on Friday with chauffeur, maid and the immense amount of luggage involved in moving from Paris to Boston. All Mr. Munch carried from the plane was a handbag and his precious Guarnerius violin ("a wonderful instrument!" which once belonged to the late Belgian virtuoso, Eugene Ysaye.

The silver-haired conductor, whose big eyes and high forehead gives him a resemblance to the great French composer, Hector Berlioz, started his professional career as a violinist. But the very first instrument he learned was the organ. He was then a boy of 12 in Strasbourg, and he played in a Protestant church.

"I remember one day when I forgot the repeat in a chorale," he said. "The pastor was furious. My uncle, you know, was the teacher of Albert Schweitzer, the great Bach scholar and doctor, who was in the United States last Summer."

Schweitzer married into the Munch family.

"Next November I shall conduct a special concert to benefit Dr. Schweitzer's hospital in Africa. One of the pieces we shall play is the Poulenc Concerto for Organ, Strings and Tympani. We may do a recently discovered Organ Concerto by Haydn. Mr. Biggs (E. Power Biggs, the Boston Symphony organist) has the score on microfilm, and I shall read it over soon."

Plans no Radical Changes

While Dr. Munch has in mind a considerable number of compositions which either have not been heard at all at the Boston Symphony concerts, or have not been done in many years, no radical changes otherwise may be expected. He will not alter the seating plan developed by Serge Koussevitzky. He will keep the orchestral pitch of 444 vibrations a second used by Koussevitzky, and to which the new organ now being built has been designed.

What does Mr. Munch propose by way of novelties, old and new? Well, there are suites by Rameau and Couperin as orchestrated by Saint-Saens. ("His orchestration of them is the best.") At a special concert he will introduce Honegger's unusual "Jeanne d'Arc au Bucher," with a special chorus assembled by Arthur Fiedler. Francis Poulenc will be soloist in the premiere of his own new Piano Concerto.

There is a symphony by William Walton, the only one the Englishman has written, which, though a decade old, is unknown here. Vincent D'Indy's B-flat Symphony will be revived, and so will his Symphony on a French Mountain Air, with Robert Casadesus playing the piano part. Mr. C. will also do a Mozart concerto. The prelude to the late Hans Pfitzner's opera, "Palestrina," unknown over here, is another candidate.

As a very rare novelty, Mr. Munch has scheduled Bach's monumental study in counterpoint, "The Art of Fugue" as transcribed for orchestra by Munch's cousin, named after his father, Ernest Munch. (These Munches certainly get around; there is a nephew now in Washington, who is financial counsel to the French government.)

Chore for Bernstein

That new 90-minutes long Symphony "Turangillila" (which means a kind of love song) by the French Olivier Messiaen, Mr. Munch will entrust to guest conductor Leonard Bernstein, when and if the music is ready.

Early in the season Mr. Munch will honor the memory of two lately deceased composers. At the first concerts, before he embarks upon a repetition of the first program given by the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall in 1900, he will conduct Henri Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne." Richard Strauss' memory will be honored with the Domestic Symphony. Munch conducted this work last Summer in Paris, where, as he says, both Strauss and Brahms have been popular for 25 years, a complete reversal of the attitude which once prevailed. Two weeks before the German composer died he sent Munch his picture, inscribed "From your very grateful Richard Strauss."

The soloists? Violinist Ginette Neveu will perform either the Sibelius Concerto or the Chausson Poeme, and Ravel's Tzigane. The Brahms Concerto will have the attention of violinist Ossy Renardy, and one or the other of Brahms' piano concertos likely will be done by Nicole Henriot. The 75th birthday of the prophet of the 12-tone-system, Arnold Schoenberg, will be marked with the pre-12-tone-system "Transfigured Night."

Only one new face will be seen in the orchestra, bassoonist Theodore Brewster.

Charles Munch will also carry on the policy of introducing new American music. He already has in hand a new Suite by Harvard's Walter Pistion, and a Symphony by Bernard Wagenaar. He has been in correspondence with Samuel Barber, William Schuman and Aaron Copland.

Incidentally, when that inevitable question finally got asked, Mr. Munch reveals he likes American jazz.

"That Louis Armstrong! I heard him play the Paganini Perpetual Motion on the trumpet and you could hear every note. Fantastique!"

From all of which you may be assured that the coming season will be lively.

Record Sept 21

New Symphony Leader Likes 'Hot Jazz' Music

Charles Munch is probably the happiest man in Boston. He has attained to the conductorship of the greatest musical instrument in the world, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Serge Koussevitzky, who held the job 25 years.

CHARLES MUNCH
"Happy to Be in Boston"

But that's not all. An Alsatian by birth, a Frenchman by nature, Mr. Munch has a new American automobile—an Olds if you must know the brand—which he drove over the road from New York yesterday in order to get his first real look at the New England scenery.

By so doing, the Symphony's new conductor postponed his first meeting with the Boston press 24 hours, and those already acquainted with the appearance of the Boston press will agree that Mons. Munch took the better view first.

Although Munch couldn't trust his English and newsmen couldn't trust their French, they got along swell, for the man's most noticeable characteristic is humor. His well molded face is dotted and crinkled with it—even when he read his prepared statement, in which he said the things one would say in the circumstances . . . "Happy to be in Boston . . . going to maintain the orchestra in the high Koussevitzkian standard."

Mr. and Mrs. Munch will live in Milton in the former residence of Bishop Lawrence. They have no children. He will soon do Bizet's only symphony, which he thinks has been neglected. He's also going to do a lot of Richard Strauss, having recently knocked 'em silly with those works in Paris.

Munch received the latest picture of Strauss from the late composer just two weeks before his death.

Munch likes "le jazz hot."

"Going to play any of it here?" "To which he replied with a grin, "Not in this hall."

He was organist at St. Williams in Strasbourge when only twelve.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER

SEP 21 1949

Munch Meets The Critics

Gives Plans for Hub's Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Sept. 21 (UP)—Athletic-looking Charles Munch may cut in on the soap opera audience when he starts his winter concert series as new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, it was indicated today.

In his first meeting with critics as regular conductor late yesterday, the 58-year-old French musician showed the results of a survey made by the French magazine Elle. It asked its feminine readers with which man they would most like to dine.

Fourteen thousand answers came in. Winston Churchill was first and Munch, who recently completed summer engagements in France, was second.

However, Munch told the critics that his primary ambition on his new job was to maintain the orchestra at the high level it reached under retiring Conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

He outlined plans for introducing new works and reviving lesser known compositions of famous composers, giving symphony listeners a wider variety than is ordinarily available.

Munch reported that he had bought a Milton home that once belonged to the late Massachusetts Episcopal Bishop William Appleton Lawrence.

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
REPUBLIC

SEP 18 1949

Book Scheduled On Symphony Hall

NEW YORK, Sept. 17—On Little, Brown's list for early spring is a history of one of Boston's best known cultural and social landmarks, Symphony Hall.

Written by H. Earle Johnson of the music department of Clark University, Worcester, the book will have an introduction by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, who was himself the author of a history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra some years ago.

Monitor Sept 21

New Symphony Conductor Eager to See Fall Foliage

Charles Munch, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived yesterday by car from New York after flying from Paris, was delighted today with the prospects for the musical season and with the wide view of autumnal New England from his new Milton home.

It is the first time, he said, that he has ever been in this part of the world as fall colors were due, and he is eagerly anticipating the sight of their development as viewed from the old home of Bishop William Lawrence of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Incidentally, it was in the Protestant St. William's Church in his native Strasburg in Alsace, that Mr. Munch began his musical career as an organist.

Of his musical plans, the new conductor said that for his first program he will repeat the concert with which Symphony Hall opened a half century ago. To it, he is added two numbers in memory of composers who passed on recently—Richard Strauss' Domestic Symphony and Henri Rabaud's Nocturnal Procession.

In later concerts, he said, he intends to carry on Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's tradition of including both the new and the old, with works of such American composers as Walter Piston, Lucas Foss, Roy Harris, William Schuman and Bernard Wagenaar.

At a press interview Mr. Munch displayed a considerable sense of humor and something of an inclination toward self-effacement when it came to the importance of his new post.

Mrs. Munch will arrive on Friday on the Ile de France at New York.

New Conductor of Symphony Arrives, Announces Plans for Special Concerts

Charles Munch, 54-year-old Alsatian who succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in Boston yesterday from Paris (via New York in his brand new American car) and stated that he hoped the orchestra would remain as famous under him as it had under his 75-year-old predecessor.

In a press conference in the refurnished Green Room of Symphony Hall, the conductor, who was recently the second choice of the readers of a Paris magazine as "the man I would like most to have dinner with"—Winston Churchill was the first—announced but one change in orchestra personnel, no change in the seating plan of the orchestra, no change in its pitch, and a wide variety of old and new works for his programs.

Among the special concerts he has planned is a benefit for Albert Schweitzer's African mission, all the Brandenburg Concertos and Orchestral Suites of Bach as well as the "St. John Passion" in observance of the 200th anniversary of Bach's death, and works commemorating Richard Strauss and Henri Rabaud, both of whom died earlier in the month.

Having already taken residence on Brush Hill road, Milton in the former home of Bishop Lawrence, Munch expects Mrs. Munch on the Ile de France next week. Unfazed by Boston traffic, which he described as only a little worse than that of Paris, the graying conductor expressed astonishment at the autumn foliage, which he had never seen before.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 17 1949

Munch Arrives in U. S.

French Conductor Going to Boston to Succeed Koussevitzky

Charles Munch arrived at 11:30 a. m. yesterday at Idlewild Airport, Queens, aboard an Air France plane en route to Boston, where he will succeed Serge Koussevitzky as permanent director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Munch, fifty-seven, has led the Paris Symphony and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, and founded and conducted the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra. He is scheduled to open the sixty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony on Oct. 7, and will be the tenth conductor of that organization.

All Seats Subscribed For Symphony Season

Every seat for the Boston Symphony Orchestra season has been subscribed, with the last available seat in Symphony Hall taken yesterday, it was announced last night. The season opens Oct. 7, and will include four series in Boston, two in New York, and a series in Sanders Theater, Cambridge. This will be the first season under the new conductor, Charles Munch.

dead of exposure and exhaustion

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER
SEP 22 1949

HEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY—Charles Munch at Boston's Symphony hall yesterday where he assumed his new duties as conductor of the famed Boston Symphony orchestra. Munch succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitzky who retired this spring. The new conductor was head of the Paris Conservatory orchestra. — AP Photo.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE & POST
SEP 22 1949

Also in BOSTON HERALD

MUNCH INSPECTS NEW ORGAN—Boston, Sept. 22—Charles Munch (left) new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has details of a new organ in Boston's Symphony Hall pointed out to him by William McKenzie. Munch started his musical career by playing a church organ in his native Strasbourg. The new organ, which will be completed next month, replaces the organ installed when Symphony Hall was opened in 1900.—(AP Photo)

TIFFIN, OHIO
ADVERTISER-TRIBUNE
SEP 24 1949

Munch Will Repeat 1900 Program For Debut As Boston's Conductor

NEW YORK, Sept. 24—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to Serge Koussevitzky, on Oct. 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on Oct. 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's tenth conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in mid-winter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

will repeat several times during the winter, along with Mendelsohn's "The Stranger," which gave its first American performance on Sept. 1.

...the producer.

Munch, Violinist

When a new conductor comes to town, it is natural for the public to want to know something of his background—his birthplace, citizenship, training, or the roles he has played in the musical world, other than as a conductor.

And so when Charles Munch arrived in Boston this week to take over the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, we learned among other interesting items of his personal history that he was a church organist at the age of 12. Later he became a violinist and professor of the violin at the Paris Conservatoire.

This information stirred Symphony Hall to consult the records of his predecessors, and this is what turned up:

Sir George Henschel, 1881 to 1884, was a baritone, organist, pianist, composer, author, and graphic artist. William Gericke then took over the conductorship for the next five years, and again from 1898 to 1906. He was a pianist, organist, violinist, cellist, amateur flutist, and composer.

Arthur Nikisch, who served from 1889 to 1893, was a violinist. He was followed by Emil Paur, violinist and pianist, from 1893 to 1898. Dr. Karl Muck, who held two tenures in Boston (1906-1908 and 1912-1918), was a pianist.

Max Fiedler, who headed the Boston Symphony from 1908 to 1912, was a pianist, organist, and composer.

Henri Rabaud apparently was not a professional instrumentalist, though he composed. He held the podium for one season, 1918-19. Pierre Monteux, now conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, directed the Boston Symphony from 1919 to 1924. He is a violinist and violist.

For the past 25 years Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was held the baton, of course, and his ability as a contrabassist, composer, and arranger is generally known. He played his last concert as official conductor of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood on Aug. 14. Since then he has conducted at Hollywood Bowl and is now en route to Brazil for guest appearances. This tour will take him through Europe and into Israel.

Mr. Munch will open the new season of the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon, Oct. 7.

Munch, Popular With Frenchwomen, Ready To Start Hub Symphony Season

BOSTON (U.P.) — Athletic-looking Charles Munch may cut in on the soap opera audience when he starts his winter concert series as new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, it was indicated today.

In his first meeting with critics as regular conductor late yesterday, the 58-year-old French musician showed the results of a survey made by the French magazine Elle. It asked its feminine readers with which man they would most like to dine.

Fourteen thousand answers came in. Winston Churchill was first and Munch, who recently completed summer engagements in France, was second.

However, Munch told the critics that his primary ambition on his new job was to maintain the orchestra at the high level it reached under retiring conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

He outlined plans for introducing new works and reviving lesser known compositions of famous composers, giving symphony listeners a wider variety than is ordinarily available.

Munch reported that he had bought a Milton home that once belonged to the late Massachusetts Episcopal Bishop William Appleton Lawrence.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 24 1949

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

BRUNO WALTER has recorded for Columbia a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which tells us more about Bruno Walter than about Beethoven's symphony. It tells us, that is, of the worsening of the tendencies so accurately described by the observation attributed to Toscanini a number of years ago—"When Walter comes to something beautiful he melts"—and by the observation of another German conductor to me: "Walter always had a rhetorical nature." These tendencies have developed into a softness and slackness that is intolerable—except to Germans for whom his performances today are a means of sentimentally recalling the golden age in Berlin—in the music of Haydn, Mozart, or Beethoven. Any symphony of Beethoven, but especially the Ninth, and above all its grim first movement. I can conceive of that movement being taken at as slow a pace as Walter's; in fact I retain an impression of a performance by Muck in 1929 in which the movement went just so deliberately. But in this deliberateness there was a steadiness, a controlled power, which built up the cumulative force this movement must have; whereas Walter cannot complete even the first statement of the tremendous opening theme without an expansively rhetorical retardation, and cannot let the climax of the entire opening section subside without slackening in tempo as well. Nor is this sort of thing less damaging when it occurs in the variations and the alternating section of the slow movement, and in the finale.

The orchestra in the performance is the New York Philharmonic, the chorus is the Westminster Choir, the soloists are Irma Gonzalez, soprano, Elena Nikolaidi, contralto, Raoul Jobin, tenor, and Mack Harrell, baritone; and it isn't always certain what is defective playing or singing and what is defective recording in the 78 r.p.m. set I have heard (MM-900, 8 12″). I think I can say that the tone and inflection of the solo horn in the trio of the scherzo movement are poor, and the proclamations of the brass in the coda of the slow movement (end of side 10) are raucous; and on the other hand that the over-all recorded sound, while clear and spacious, is too sharp in the upper range, that right at the start the horns sound closer than the violins, that the introductory measures of the scherzo, the first time, are too weak (they are right when the scherzo is repeated), and that with the volume set at the proper level for the orchestra, in the finale, the solo voices and chorus are ear-piercingly loud and unpleasant. But I can't be sure how much of the screaming of the chorus, the acidulous and explosive (in the first quartet of the soloists) singing of Gonzalez, the tight and explosive singing of Jobin is the too-close microphone and how much is the chorus, Gonzalez, and Jobin. And there is the same uncertainty about the noisy confusion in the opening orchestral outburst of the finale, the explosive drumbeats in the second variation of the slow movement, the confused noise without force (possibly leveled off by the recording) at the beginning of side 3. And in my copy two sides of the slow movement waver in pitch.

From RCA Victor comes a new recording of Beethoven's Fifth made by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony: the first movement a little deliberate, but straightforward, with two Koussevitzky imprints—the interminably drawn-out oboe cadenza, and the retarded quiet passage just before the end; the second movement too slow for Andante con moto; the scherzo too slow for Allegro, and ending with another Koussevitzky imprint—the slow tempo for the transition to the finale and for the opening of the finale—all this slowing up for emphasis resulting in wearying ponderousness. The sound from the 78 r.p.m. records (DM-1313, 4 12″) is too sharp, and afflicted with terrific reverberation.

In the Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony performance of Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" there is the same excessive slowness in the passages referring to Senta. But this time the sound from the 78 r.p.m. record (12-0958) lacks the brilliance of the violins, which cannot even be heard in the big tuttis.

What Haydn's Symphony No. 73 ("La Chasse") is like when it is played effectively I have yet to learn. From Sevitzky's performance with the Indianapolis Symphony—heavy, crude in rhythm and phrasing—I get the impression of a dull work, except for the finale. But that performance is excellently reproduced by the 78 r.p.m. records (DM-1312, 3 12″).

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
SEP 22 1949

Heads Symphony

Associated Press photo

Charles Munch has assumed his new duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitzky who retired this spring. The new conductor was head of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 22 1949

HEADS SYMPHONY: Charles Munch at Boston's Symphony Hall yesterday where he assumed his new duties as conductor of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra. Munch succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitzky who retired this spring. The new conductor was head of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. —Associated Press Photo—

[12]

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
REPUBLIC
SEP 25 1949

Munch To Make Debut With Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, Sept. 24—(UP)—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony October 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on October 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's Euryanthe, Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's Rosamunde, and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra' 10th conductor, will be a performance of Bach's Passion According to St. John, with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in mid-winter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's Joan of Arc at the Stake, making use of a newly organized chorus.

NEW YORK'S unique operatic organization, The Lemonade Opera, opens its first fall season Wednesday with a performance of Hansel and Gretel, and Kurt Weill's Down in the Valley. As usual the accompaniment will be two pianos and the conductor will be seated on the tiny stage. Lemonade will be served at intermission, of course.

The opera gave premieres of Weill's opera and Haydn's The Man in the Moon during its summer season. The Haydn work it will repeat several times during the winter, along with Mendelssohn's The Stranger, which gave its first American performance September 1.

RICHARD STRAUSS died September 8, the day Rise Stevens, American mezzo-seprano, and the personnel of the Salzburg Festival were presenting his Der Rosenkavalier in the Opera House in Paris.

At the end of the first act, the audience was informed from the stage that the composer was dead. When Octavian entered during the second act for the presentation of the rose, the orchestra stopped playing and the audience stood for a moment of silent tribute.

WALTER DUCLOUX, [illegible] American conductor, offers two rarely heard works in his second concert with the NBC Symphony tonight. They're Schubert's Symphony No. 6 in C and Lamotte de Grignon's Andalusia.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN
SEP 25 1949

Munch To Repeat 1900 Program At Debut With Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, Sept. 24—(UP)—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to Serge Koussevitzky, on Oct. 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on Oct. 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's tenth conductor, will be a performance of Boach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy week. Sometime in midwinter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

New York's unique operatic organization, "The Lemonade Opera," opens its first fall season next Wednesday (Sept. 28) with a performance of "Hansel and Gretel," and Kurt Weill's "Down in the Valley." As usual the accompaniment will be two pianos and the conductor will be seated on the tiny stage. Lemonade will be served at intermission, of course.

The opera gave premieres of Weill's opera and Haydn's "The Man in the Moon" during its summer season. The Haydn's work it will repeat several times during the winter, along with Mendelssohn's "The Stranger," which gave its first American performance on Sept. 1.

Richard Strauss died Sept. 8 on the day Rise Stevens, American mezzo-soprano, and the personnel of the Salzburg Festival were presenting his "Der Rosenkavalier" in the Opera House in Paris.

At the end of the first act, the audience was informed from the stage that the composer was dead. When Octavian entered during the second act for the presentation of the rose, the orchestra stopped playing and the audience stood for a moment of silent tribute.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
SEP 25 1949

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS FOR SEASON

Munch to Direct New American Music

Boston, Sept. 24—Charles Munch, who has arrived in Boston to take up his duties as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had divulged his plans and intentions for the orchestra's season which is to open Oct. 7. Charles Munch, who succeeds Serge Koussevitzky as this orchestra's tenth conductor and the third native of France, has returned from an active season in his own country. He and Mrs. Munch have taken up their residence in Milton in he house formerly occupied by the ate Bishop William Lawrence.

New Organ Installed

The new conductor will open the season by playing "La Procession Nocturne" of Henri Rabaud, his colleague who conducted this orchestra in 1918-1919 and who died in France Sept. 8. He will present the "Symphonia Domestica" by Richard Strauss on his second program in memory of the famous composer who also died in this month. The first program will be a repetition of the program with which Wilhelm Gericke opened in Symphony Hall 50 years ago. The half century anniversary of the auditorium will be celebrated then by the dedication of a new organ which is installed and which will be first heard when Handel's third concerto is played by E. Power Biggs.

Undertaking a tour outside of New England in its third week, the Boston Orchestra will give concerts in Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, East Lansing and Toledo.

The 200th anniversary in 1950 of the death of Johann Sebastian Bach will be remembered by the performance of the St. John Passion, the Art of Fugue, and Brandenburg Concertos. The French conductor's interest in the music of America is evident in his announcement of a new violin concerto by William Schuman, "Second Suite" by Walter Piston, a new cantata by Lukas Foss, and a symphony by Bernard Wagenaar to be performed in the course of the season.

A concert in November for organ with orchestra will be given for the benefit of Albert Schweitzer's Mission in North Africa. Dr. Schweitzer is a relative of Mr. Munch by marriage.

Again France in New England: The Arrival of Charles Munch

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Charles Munch is a man well above average height, perhaps six feet tall, with grey hair close trimmed and parted on the side but with an unruly forelock, and straight, regular features at once sensitive and aristocratic yet touched with humor and worldliness. There is about him a sense of vigor but of control; every movement is strong but somehow reposed. Though his hands and fingers are long but not thin or wiry, and though his expression is at once esthetic and reflective of a perceptive sprit, he does not seem a musician.

SPEAKS ENGLISH

It is not until he talks and, following a summer tutoring he talks in English unless rattled by an overly rapid or complicated question in that language, that his calling as a musician is evident. Even then he conveys the impression that he could have gained eminence in any field and that he has, in fact, an extraordinary grasp of the world's affairs in and outside the fields of artistic endeavor. That he was recently the second choice, to his own vast amusement of the of the readers of a French periodical, as the man they would most like to have dinner with (after Winston Churchill), is entirely compprehensible. There are few men, of such personal attractiveness, whose personalities reflect so complete a mingling of wit, warmth and refinement.

At his first press conference, in the newly redecorated Green Room of Symphony Hall, he was at first most reserved. It was clear he was afraid his summer's English lessons had deserted him entirely and, though a man of considerable savoir faire, it was also possible the array of newspapermen before him seemed more formidable than in fact it was. He began with a gracious little speech, one that he had thought out for the occasion, in which he said he was well aware of his responsibility as the successor to Dr. Koussevitzky; that he approached his task with energy and love; that he hoped he could maintain the level of Dr. Koussevitzky's accomplishments, and that he hoped the Boston Symphony orchestra would remain as famous as it always had been.

After that, as he answered the questions of the press, clasping and unclasping his hands thoughtfully but replying without hesitation, his charm and personality began to work. He said he planned to introduce some new American works on his program; a new symphony by Bernard Wagenaar, a new suite by Walter Piston and perhaps works by Barber, Copland, Schuman and Harris. Among the many revivals of the classic and romantic repertoire, he said he would do Bach's "The Art of Fugue" in the transcription by Ernest Munch, as well as all the Brandenburg Concertos, the orchestral suites and the St. John Passion in observance of the 200th anniversary of Bach's death; a symphony by William Walton, and various compositions of Rameau, Couperin, Mozart, D'Indy, Schoenberg and others; a very wide-ranging choice.

He said he would preface his first concert—which repeats the program given on the occasion of the first Symphony Hall concert 50 years ago this fall—with Henri Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" in memory of the composer-conductor who served one season as conductor of the Boston Symphony. Later in the season he said he would do Richard Strauss' Domestic Symphony in memoriam of his close friend from whom, only three weeks before his death, he had received an autographed photo.

Besides the previously announced works contemplated Mr. Munch, who turned out to be Albert Schweitzer's brother-in-law, stated that he plans a special benefit concert in November for Schweitzer's African mission. "You must help me," he said to the assembled newspapermen, "please give me your ideas and suggestions for our programs." Judging by the pile of mail on his desk, as well as his music cabinet stuffed with manuscripts, Mr. Munch had already received many suggestions. My own suggestion, that he conduct while performing some of the violin concertos of Haydn or Mozart, amused him very much, but he declined. He said he'd brought along his beautiful Ysaye Guarnerius, but had no idea of performing in public. I still think it's a good idea.

The musical formalities over, Mr. Munch explained that he had arrived in Boston this week via New York in a new American car to prepare for his duties as the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was his first driving experience in America but he found the trip most enjoyable; the traffic feased him not at all. Having been driving in France for more than 30 years, he said he was well prepared for the worst Boston could offer him. Although Mrs. Munch does not arrive for another week or so, Mr. Munch had taken immediate residence in his new home on Brush Hill road in Milton, the former house of Bishop Lawrence. He pronounced it ideal in every way, and was sure Mrs. Munch would be enchanted with it as he was.

There seemed no doubt, as the interviewers reluctantly withdrew, that Charles Munch had swept his audience off its feet. Nobody ever made a difficult task seem easier. Now he faces a task far more difficult: that of following in the footsteps of a great predecessor. That he will sweep his larger musical audiences off their feet as completely as he did his first interviewers is, I am certain, a foregone conclusion. For if any man can do it, that man is Charles Munch.

RICHMOND SERIES

From the subscription office of the Richmond Celebrity Series comes word that all Sunday afternoon concerts beginning with Artur Rubinstein's program on Oct. 30 will take place at the usual hour of 3:30. Subscribers will receive their tickets for the entire series by the end of this month.

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
SEP 25 1949

Munch Chooses Historic Program For Debut as Boston Conductor

New York — UP — Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony in succession to Serge Koussevitzky, on Oct. 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on Oct. 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's 10th conductor will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Some time in midwinter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
SEP 25 1949

Boston Symphony Back With 'Dress Rehearsal

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air on NBC for its second season of "Dress Rehearsal" programs Monday, Oct. 3. Charles Munch is the new regular conductor of the famous orchestra. Munch was appointed to direct the Boston Symphony after the resignation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who inaugurated this broadcast series last year.

Munch takes over the orchestra coincident with the 50th anniversary of Symphony Hall in Boston, where the programs originate. His first concert will be a repeat of the first concert given in the hall. Music of Weber, Handel, Schubert and Beethoven is scheduled.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
SEP 22 1949

Boston's Symphony Conductor To Honor Rabaud at Opening

Charles Munch, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the season Oct. 7 and 8 at Boston Symphony Hall with "La Procession Nocturne" by the late eHnri Rabaud, who conducted the orchestra in 1918-1919. Mr. Rabaud died Sept. 8 in France.

Conductor Munch will present the Symphonia Domestica by Richard Strauss in memory of the composer Oct. 14 and 15. Other works announced the first season are premieres of a violin concerto by William Schuman, a Second Suite by Walter Piston, a cantata by Lukas Foss, a symphony by Bernard Wagenaar, a symphony by William Walton, a piano concerto by Francois Poulenc, a symphony by Jacques Rivier, and works by D'Indy, Roussel, Berlioz and Rameau.

A special concert for organ and orchestra in November will benefit Dr. Albert Schwitzer's North African mission.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 30 1949

SYMPHONY SELLOUT

Boston, Sept. 29.—(UP)—The change in conductors didn't affect the popularity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra reported today that all seats for its concerts had been sold for the entire season. Charles Munch, who is replacing Serge Koussevitzky, will give four series of concerts in Boston and also will appear in Providence, Cambridge, Carnegie Hall, New York, and the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
SEP 26 1949

Heads Symphony

Charles Munch is shown at Boston's Symphony Hall where he [illegible] duties as conductor of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra. Munch succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitzky who retired this Spring. The new conductor was head of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.—(AP).

[13]

WEST WARWICK, R. I.
PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES
SEP 26 1949

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plans Are Announced by Munch

Charles Munch, who has arrived in Boston to take up his duties as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has divulged to newspaper interviewers his plans and intentions for the orchestra's season which is to open Oct. 7. Charles Munch, who succeeds Serge Koussevitzky as this orchestra's tenth conductor and the third native of France, has returned from an active season in his own country where he has been conducting the festival in his native Strasbourg and the concerts of the Conservatoire and Government Radio Orchestra in Paris. He is well known in this country from the tour of the latter orchestra last autumn and from many guest appearances in our principal cities.

The new conductor will open the season by playing "La Procession Nocturne" of Henri Rabaud, his colleague who conducted this orchestra in 1918-1919 and who died in France on Sept. 8. He will present the Symphonia Domestica by Richard Strauss on his second program in memory of the famous composer who also died in this month. The first program will be a repetition of the program with which Wilhelm Gericke opened in Symphony Hall exactly 50 years ago. The half century anniversary of the auditorium will be celebrated then by the dedication of a new organ which is installed and which will be first heard when Handel's Third Concerto is played by E. Power Biggs.

Outside of New England

Undertaking a tour outside of New England in its third week, the Boston Orchestra will give concerts in Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, East Lansing, and Toledo.

The 200th anniversary in 1950 of the death of Johann Sebastian Bach will be remembered by the performance of the St. John Passion, the Art of Fugue, and Brandenburg Concertos. The French conductor's interest in the music of America is evident in his announcement of a new violin concerto by William Schuman, a Second Suite by Walter Piston, a new cantata by Lukas Foss, and a symphony by Bernard Wagenaar to be performed in the course of the season. From the conductor's own country there will be Honegger's "Jeanne D'Arc at the Stake," symphony by Jacques Rivier, new piano concerto by Francis Poulenc and a suite from his ballet, "Les Animaux Modernes." Music by D'Indy, Roussel, Berlioz and Rameau will also figure on the symphony by William Walton. A special concert in November for organ with orchestra will be given for the benefit of Albert Schweitzer's Mission in North Africa. Dr. Schweitzer, who is a famous organist as well as a humanitarian, inspected and autographed this orchestra's new organ when he visited America last summer. He is a relative of Charles Munch by marriage.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
SEP 27 1949

Directs Boston Symphony

—Wide World Photo

Charles Munch is new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Advocate Sept 30

17

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

CONCERNING MUNCH

A day or so after Charles Munch arrived here from France to begin his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, members of the press were called in to meet and chat with the new leader. Present were most of the critics on the Hub's newspapers plus a couple of photographers, a radio-station commentator and Jeff Wylie, of Life-Time, who often attends these musical affairs in the fond, though not often realized hope, that possibly there will be a story for the eclectic Life-Time public.

It seemed to me that Mr. Munch was somewhat apprehensive at first. He gave us a very charming but rather obvious statement, in French, about hoping to maintain the orchestra at the high level it enjoys at present and so on. But as he discovered that we were all really quite a harmless bunch without too many awkward questions to trip him up, he thawed out more and more to disclose himself as a warm, genial person of considerable charm and wit with a very fair command of the English language at his disposal.

He is a very modest person and rarely speaks of his accomplishments except in the most casual terms. On the other hand, he semed very pleased indeed that he had been chosen by 10,000 women readers of the Parisian periodical, "Elle," next only to Winston Churchill, as the man they would most like to have lunch with. Of course, Mr. Munch had tongue in cheek, so to speak, and his pretended pride in this "victory" over all males, except the redoubtable Winston, was quite delicious and even touching, in a way.

In person, Mr. Munch fits very well into the latest mode of popular hero. About six feet tall, his somewhat lined, but handsome and expressive face is topped by a semi-controlled mane of iron-grey hair. His weight is well distributed around an active and athletic frame. His sense of humor and appreciation of other's humor is well developed. Altogether our new conductor is a fine type of person, as far as can be judged from an hour's observation.

Most of the questions concerned music he will be listing as the season advances. While he has some very definite ideas, he seems very willing to listen to the suggestion of others and several of the critics had favorite works to commend to him. Whether or not this will work out in practice as a usual rule is a moot point. For my part I am quite happy to leave the choice of program entirely to a man who has in his very distinguished past demonstrated a catholicity of taste admirable in an interpreter. We may, of course, expect to hear a good quantity of French music and we would certainly not wish it otherwise. We can expect completely authoritative interpretations not only in the standard masterpieces, but also in many works off the beaten track.

In France, Mr. Munch's interpretations of German music are as much admired as is his treatment of Gallic music. Nor should this be at all strange. Mr. Munch is an Alsatian with roots and ties in both countries. His name is German, his religion Protestant, his cultural experience German-French as is his family.

One fact of interest, among many others, brought out by the interview, is Mr. Munch's relationship by marriage to that great musical genius and even greater humanitarian, Albert Schweitzer, whose brother in law Mr. Munch happens to be.

During the course of the conference I did try out a sort of controversial question by asking Mr. Munch if he found any particular difference between European and American orchestras. Mr. Munch very understandingly avoided the question by stating that in orchestras it is all a matter of "l'esprit." This reticence is understandable and even admirable, but it would have been interesting to gain some insight in the differences and superiorities from one who has had experience on both sides of the Atlantic.

As for all the works discussed for performance, there are some very interesting events coming up for Symphony subscribers which will all be announced in due time, I have little doubt. There is much to look forward to.

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES
SEP 27 1949

NEW CONDUCTOR: In Boston—Charles Munch, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tried out a new organ on a test keyboard while Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Symphony, looked on.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER
SEP 25 1949

Munch To Repeat 1900 Program In Boston Hall

NEW YORK, Sept. 24—(UP)—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to Serge Koussevitzky on October 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston Symphony Hall on October 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's tenth conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in midwinter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

★ ★ ★

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER
SEP 30 1949

Sold Out

BOSTON, Sept. 30 (UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra reports that all seats for its concerts have been sold for the entire season—despite a change in conductors.

Charles Munch, succeeding Serge Koussevitsky as head of the group, will give four series of concerts in Boston besides appearances in Providence, R. I., Cambridge and in New York at Carnegie Hall and the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES
SEP 28 1949

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra will return to the air on WIBA for its second season of "Dress Rehearsal" programs at 10:30 p. m. Monday, Oct. 3. Charles Munch is the new regular conductor of the famous orchestra. Munch was appointed to direct the Boston Symphony after the resignation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who inaugurated this broadcast series last year.

Munch takes over the orchestra coincident with the 50th anniversary of Symphony hall in Boston, where the programs originate. His first concert will be a repeat of the first concert given in the hall. Music of Weber, Handel, Schubert, and Beethoven is scheduled.

The program will be a half hour of a regular working rehearsal of the orchestra preparing its concerts of the week. Olin Downes, noted author, critic, and commentator, again will interpolate explanations during the broadcast.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD
SEP 30 1949

Boston Symphony Again Has Sellout

Boston, Sept. 29. (UP)—The change in conductors didn't affect the popularity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra reported today that all seats for its concerts had been sold for the entire season. Charles Munch, who is replacing Serge Koussevitzky, will give four series of concerts in Boston and also will appear in Providence, R. I., Cambridge, Carnegie Hall, New York, and the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
SEP 30 1949

Boston Symphony Seats Sold Out

Boston, Sept. 30 — (UP)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra reports that all seats for its concerts have been sold for the entire season — despite a change in conductors.

Charles Munch, succeeding Serge Koussevitsky as head of the group, will give four series of concerts in Boston besides appearances in Providence, R. I., Cambridge, and in New York at Carnegie Hall and the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

E BOSTON DAILY GLOBE-

Symphony Season Sold Out Here

A week before the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season in Symphony Hall on Oct. 7 under its new conductor, Charles Munch, the last available seat has been suscribed for the season.

The orchestra gives four series in Boston, two in Carnegie Hall, New York, and a series in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. A series in Providence is planned to be given in the new State Auditorium when it is completed.

There is a waiting list for future seasons for each of these series mounting, in the case of New York, into the hundreds.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
SEP 30 1949

All Sold Out

Boston, Sept. 30. (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra reports that all seats for its concerts have been sold for the entire season—despite a change in conductors.

Charles Munch, succeeding Serge Koussevitsky as head of the group, will give four series of concerts in Boston besides appearances in Providence, R. I., Cambridge, and in New York at Carnegie Hall and the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

[14]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
SEP 24 1949

Radio Again Will Air Symphony Rehearsals

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

The return to the air of the Boston Symphony's "Dress Rehearsal" over NBC early next month will again accord listeners to an orchestral work-out.

Rehearsal, needless to say, is what makes a conductor and an orchestra. The picture of the conductor in action at concert time is merely the formal rounding out of a gruelling process begun days before.

As a rule, conductors don't like having anybody but the orchestra around during the throes of rehearsal. Many of them admit feeling hampered when they know outsiders are present in the house. They need privacy for the artistic tantrums.

Stories are legion of the rehearsal technics used by various conductors. Some have succeeded with the approach of soft cajolery; some use sardonic thrusts when the going is rough, and one or two are known to erupt like volcanoes when a pianissimo is faintly out of line.

During the concert, of course, nothing of this comes through. Everything seems sunny and harmonious in the relation between the conductor and the orchestra. Things move smoothly. The conductor may mutter an angry oath, and even the front-row subscribers may not overhear it.

Very rarely is a performance stopped in mid-career at a concert. Once or twice I have witnessed a sudden halt, but only where a piano or violin soloist got snarled up in a clash of tempo with the conductor, or where a string snapped.

At rehearsal both conductor and personnel go through agonies of trial and error. Phrases are often gone over dozens of times till you half expect the violins and oboes to double up from sheer fatigue or boredom.

Some conductors can be so sharp in their gibes one often wonders why a whole orchestra doesn't walk out of a rehearsal hall in protest. I suppose after a while musicians get accustomed to conductors' pranks and learn to discount them.

We have all been told how startled the Philharmonic men were the day little Bruno Labate up and snapped at Otto Klemperer, "Mr. Klemp', you talka too much." They were shocked but they were all behind the embattled oboe-player.

As a rule the men take the temperamental storms in stride. I have been told that many musicians refuse to take an easy-going conductor seriously. The suave and gracious approach is supposedly lost on a group of hard-boiled instrumentalists.

Watching the "Dress Rehearsal" series of the Boston Symphony will give instructive glimpses of how an orchestral classic is put through the wringer before it emerges the slick and finished product one hears at the concert.

The fact that an audience is listening will probably curb any impulse on Charles Muench's part to let the orchestra have it during any difference of opinion over tempo or dynamics. His predecessor, Still, audiences can learn to respect both a conductor and an orchestra a great deal more when they are allowed to eavesdrop on the grind that goes into rehearsal.

When you next hear a beautiful legate spun out in the slow movement of Mozart's G minor symphony, it would be well to remember how a hundred men and a fretful conductor sweated out every note of it.

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 24 1949

A Fifth of Beethoven

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 5 in C minor. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (RCA Victor album 1313, $6, WDM 1313, $4.30.)

To the host of great, near-great, and merely employed conductors who have recorded the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven may now be added the name of one who falls into both of the first categories (depending on what work he is conducting) but, curiously, not into the third. It doubtless represents a climax of more than one sort for Koussevitzky: a long-awaited chance to record this great work, an honorary release as he concludes his long tenure with the Boston orchestra.

Aurally, it is certainly one of the better versions of the Fifth now available. Victor has apparently utilized this gala enterprise to acquaint us with something new in Boston Symphony reproduction. Extended range is certainly employed, also a new kind of resonant background. The result, it seemed to me, was that of a good 8-H recording put through an echo chamber, in which the dry, clear, crisp quality associated with that arena is surrounded by some air space. Bigness and clarity are twin foci of this sound, also a rather amazing dynamic range. But the violins still scrape rather than sing, the brasses have punch but little vibrance. I imagine it would all prove out perfectly on a frequency meter; but there is more to good reproduction than that.

Musically and emotionally it is one of a rather remarkable standard for Koussevitzky: methodical, evenly paced, forthright, and consistent. What it lacks, essentially, is personality: either the intensity that Toscanini poured into his incomparable (and often unlistenable) playing or the more human accent of Walter and Furtwängler.

SCRANTON, PA.
SCRANTONIAN
SEP 25 1949

The World Of Music

By the United Press

NEW YORK, Sept. 24 (UP)—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to Serge Koussevitzky, on Oct. 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on Oct. 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's tenth conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in mid-Winter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

ASHEVILLE, N. C.
CITIZEN
SEP 25 1949

Charles Munch To Make Bow

NEW YORK, Sept. 24 UP)—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to Serge Koussevitzky, on October 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on October 19, 1900.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
SUNDAY NEWS
SEP 25 1949

Conductor Divulges Plans Of Boston Symphony Group

BOSTON, Sept. 24 — Charles Munch, who has arrived here to take up his duties as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has divulged to newspaper interviewers his plans and intentions for the orchestra's season which is to open October 7. Mr. Munch, who succeeds Serge Koussevitzky as this orchestra's 10th conductor and the third native of France, has returned from an active season in his own country where he has been conducting the festival in his native Strasbourg and the concerts of the Conservatoire and Government Radio Orchesra in Paris. He is well known in this country from the tour of the latter orchestra last autumn and from many guest appearances in the principal cities.

Mr. Munch flew to New York last week and has been joined by his wife, who arrived Friday on the Ile de France. They have taken up their residence in Milton, Mass., in the house formerly occupied by the late Bishop William Lawrence.

The new conductor will open the season by playing "La Procession Nocturne" of Henri Rabaud, his colleague who conducted this orchestra in 1918-1919 and who died in France, September 6. He will present the Symphonia Domestic by Richard Strauss on his second program in memory of the famous composer who also died in the month. The first program will be a repetition of the program with which Wilhelm Gericks opened Symphony Hall exactly 50 years ago. The half century anniversary of the auditorium will be celebrated then by the dedication of a new organ which is installed and which will be first heard when Handel's Third Concerto is played by E. Power Biggs.

Undertaking a tour outside of New England in its third week, the Boston Orchestra will give concerts in Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, East Lansing and Toledo.

The 200th anniversary in 1950 of the death of Johann Sebastian Bach will be remembered by the performance of the St. John Passion, the Art of Gugue, and Brandenburg Concertos. The French conductor's interest in the music of America is evident in his announcement of a new violin concerto by William Schuman, a Second Suite by Walter Piston, a new cantata by Lukas Foss, and a symphony by Bernard Wagenaar to be performed in the course of the season.

From the conductor's own country there will be Honegger's "Jeanne D'Arc at the Stake," Symphony by Jacques Rivier, a new piano concerto by Francis Poulenc and a suite from his ballet, "Les Animaux Moderne." Music by D'Indy, Roussel, Berlioz and Rameau will also figure on the programs. From England there will be a first performance in Boston of the symphony by William Walton.

A special concert in November for organ with orchestra will be given for the benefit of Albert Schweitzer's Mission in No. Africa. Dr. Schweitzer, who is a famous organist as well as a humanitarian, inspected and autographed this orchestra's new organ when he visited America last summer. He is a relative of Charles Munch by marriage.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 25 1949

Munch Will Make Bow as Conductor In Hub on Oct. 7

CHARLES MUNCH will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to Serge Koussevitzky, on Oct. 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on Oct. 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's 10th conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in midwinter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

U. S. Holds World's Music Leadership

By ADELAIDE KERR

NEW YORK, Sept. 24. (AP)—"The United States leads the world in music. Europe might catch up with us in 20 years if there is no war, but it will never again take the leadership."

The speaker was Sigmund Romberg, Hungarian-born composer of such Broadway musical hits as "Blossom Time," "The Student Prince" and the "Desert Song" and veteran of 40 years' work in American music. He has been an American citizen since 1917.

In the last seven years he has conducted his concert orchestra in 300 American cities and thus has had a first hand look at musical activities in virtually every state.

"Europe used to call America a land of dollar chasers and say we had no real interest or foundation in the arts,' Romberg went on. 'But it is the American dollar that put the solid floor under music in America. In this country music is a billion dollar business. The big money that musicians can make here from radio, recordings, concerts and other sources makes this country the mecca of every artist.

"Today, with its symphony orchestras, opera companies, movies and radio the United States lays more good music before a higher percentage of people than any other country in the world."

The composer-conductor swiftly enumerated his reasons.

"Today there are about 150 orchestras of symphony rank in the United States. Thirty of these are of first caliber. The Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra are world famous and can hold their own with the symphony orchestras of London, Paris and Vienna. Many of our symphony orchestras give summer concerts, at which millions can hear the best music at popular prices.

"There are 200,000 amateur orchestras of London, Paris and Vienna. Many of our symphony orchestras give summer concerts, at which millions can hear the best music at popular prices.

"There are 200,000 amateur orchestras in high schools and universities. (This does not include their bands.) These orchestras play semi-classical music. They also play some classical music arranged in a way that is not too hard for them. These youngsters give their own time to play and every fiddler and tooter among them is a potential patron of the best music when he grows up.

"I do not mean that all of America is symphony conscious. Jack Benny still gets a much higher listener rating than the best radio symphony performance. But the taste of the masses and the number of lovers of good music among them are steadily rising.

"Also, the United States produces more music of the type heard in the best musical shows and motion pictures than any other country in the world. It also has its composers of symphony, choral and opera music. And they don't have to starve here either. Idealism is nice and something that should be honored. But practical idealism is good too. It enables musicians in America to eat three meals a day and maybe send the children to college."

Romberg capped his discussion with a final point.

"Before World War II a musician who wanted a name had to pass the critics of Vienna and Paris. Today he must pass the critics in (New York) Carnegie Hall and Town Hall. The reason, of course is the financial gain an artist can make here. Nowhere else in the world can a singer sing in 60 different cities, each having halls accommodating four thousand or more."

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS
SEP 25 1949

Munch to Repeat 1900 Program In Symphony Debut

NEW YORK, Sept. 24 (UP)—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to [illegible]y, on Oct. 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on Oct. 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's tenth conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in mid-winter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

[15]

BOSTON TRAVELER – SEPT. 30, 1949

Splinters Gave Musician Start As Viola Maker

Symphony Player Found Bits In Trash Can and Won Fame

By ALTA MALONEY

When he picked up from a trash can the shattered bits of a viola, reduced by a truck to splinters smaller than a toothpick, a hobby, which this summer resulted in international recognition, began for a Boston Symphony Orchestra member.

VIOLA FORGOTTEN

George N. Humphrey, who plays the viola in the orchestra, was helping to settle the estate of a friend who had been one of the best makers of violas in Boston.

He had told Humphrey of the ruined viola which he planned to rebuild and which he hoped would be his masterpiece. After his death, the viola was forgotten and his widow, seeing it only as a heap of wood scraps, threw it in its case into a trash barrel.

"The only thing I knew about it was that he thought there was something in it," Humphrey says. So he bought the pieces. He took them to New York to be put together again, but there a maker told him that it would cost $600.

Humphrey didn't have that kind of money, but he had tools and glue which he had been given from his friend's workshop.

Pouring the tiny bits of wood out on the dining room table at his Hawthorne avenue, Arlington, home, the viola player started fitting the puzzle together. He would find one scrap which fit into another, glue them and then sit holding the pieces in his hands for an hour until the fixative set. Then he would add another piece.

It was eight weeks before the instrument was completely reassembled. But when he held the viola under his chin and drew his bow across it, the rich tone from the burnished antique wood and 18th century design told him that he had done a good job.

DECIDED ON NEW ONE

Considering the effort he had put into the restoration of an old instrument, the musician decided to make a new viola! It would be easier, he thought—no puzzle about it. Having just acquired a very fine old viola, he set to work to copy it.

"It came out pretty well," Humphrey says smilingly. "I was very happy about it—at the time. But then I saw only the flaws. I made another and then another."

Shortly after, he met Frederick Haenel, one of the finest makers of violas in the country, whose work he had watched for some 10 years. They had met several times before the Boston Symphony musician had the courage to tell the master that he, too, had made a viola—in fact, several.

Haenel thought Humphrey could do a better job. His instruments made from instruction books, Haenel said, reminded him of a musician playing only the notes of Beethoven's music. Would Humphrey like to study with him?

They picked a different model, an $8000 Gasparo da Salo instrument, a "Stradivarius of violas" made in 1594 which Humphrey had just acquired—the oldest instrument in the Boston Symphony.

Side by side the two worked, first at Lake Placid, then at Haenel's home in Connecticut, then in Boston. Each worked on his own model, the teacher letting the pupil observe and ask questions, but giving no technical help.

Humphrey put into it, not only the design which gave the viola its tone but the crudities of the early craftsmanship. It was made in a month, but it took all winter to varnish it and copy its antique color.

SENT IT TO CONTEST

News came to both last spring, when the viola was done, of an international competition for professional and amateur makers of string instruments to be held at the Hague, Holland. Haenel advised his pupil to send the da Salo copy, and it went off with the professional appraisal of $600 for insurance purposes.

After several months the viola came back with a diploma saying it had been entered in the contest. Humphrey thought it was strange that he had received no critical comment.

It was not until he arrived home from his summer work that he found in his mail, unforwarded by mistake, the notice that he had been awarded a diploma of honor. Another letter told him he had won second place in the amateur viola-making section. He discovered he had the highest number of points of any American entrant.

As he prepares his violas, made over a 10-year period, for exhibition in Symphony Hall this season, the 45-year-old musician laughs at the idea that he might turn to viola-making for his career. He will stick to his first enthusiasm—the playing of the instrument.

It is a consuming ardor which came to him later in life than it does to most virtuoses. He was 17 and a railroad clerk at the terminal town of Bellaire, Ohio, before he even heard good music.

He had saved from his first job to buy a Christmas present for his mother. It was a victrola, complete with 10 records included as an incentive to buy. There were nine Paul Whiteman records and one by violinist Fritz Kreisler.

INVESTED IN KREISLER

The Whiteman records were played until the groaning grooves would no longer respond to the needle. Then George Humphrey had only the Kreisler record to play. He played it over and over, finally deciding he liked it better than the others. He bought all the Kreisler records he could.

With his father's violin, which he scornfully called a "second-hand fiddle," he tried to duplicate Kreisler's music. It didn't sound the same. He tried playing from music. Then he decided to take lessons.

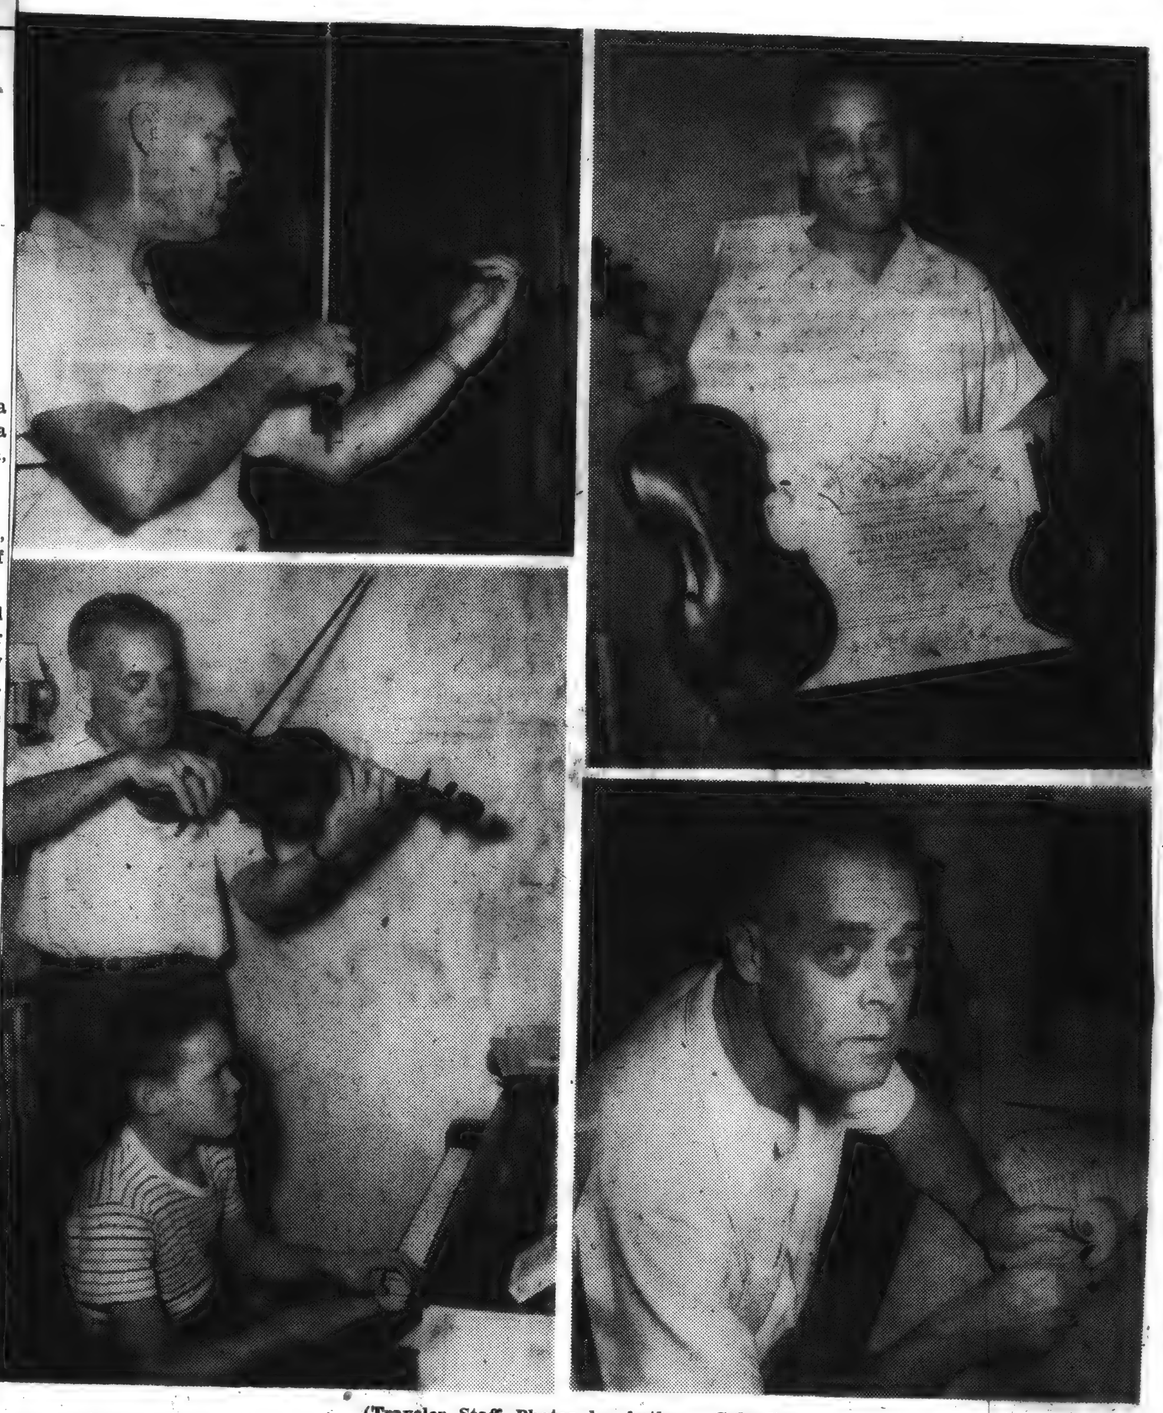
In a year he had taken all the instruction Bellaire could provide for him, so he wrote the U. S. Bureau of Information and asked for the name of the music school with the highest rating. A year later he landed in Boston at the New England Conservatory of Music.

From then on it was work, and only work, to make up for lost time. He practiced 10 hours a day and won himself scholarships for his last three years.

On graduation he got himself a job with the Minneapolis Symphony, moving on from there to Curtis Institute where, despite the fact that he was three years over the age limit and classes were filled, he became a student.

Then Serge Koussevitzky listened to his playing and promised that he would fill the first vacancy in the Boston Symphony. Three years later, in 1934, although there was no opening, Koussevitzky appealed to the board of trustees and Humphrey became the 13th member of the viola section.

"Thirteen," says Humphrey. "That's my lucky number."



(Traveler Staff Photos by Anthony Cabral)

VIOLA WHICH WON HIM PRIZE in international competition for amateur and professional makers of string instruments is played by George N. Humphrey (upper left), member of the viola section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Humphrey copied the instrument exactly from an $8000 viola which he acquired last year and shows both with his citation at upper right. Lower left, Eric Humphrey, 11, is fast becoming able to accompany his father. Humphrey at his work bench in his Arlington home starts the scroll for a new viola. His instruments will be on display this season at Symphony Hall.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 2 - 1949

News of the Orchestras

The Philadelphia Orchestra will open New York's 1949-'50 symphonic season, giving the first concert of its customary quota of ten in Carnegie Hall Tuesday night, Oct. 11, two days before the opening of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra's activities. Eugene Ormandy will take note of Arnold Schoenberg's recent seventy-fifth birthday with a performance of his "Verklarte Nacht" for strings. This program, which also includes Mr. Ormandy's transcription of Bach's organ toccata and fugue in D minor and Brahms's second symphony, will also be played in the first concerts of this orchestra's fiftieth home season next Friday afternoon, Saturday night and the following Monday night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its sixty-ninth season and its first under the conductorship of Charles Munch next Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Boston's Symphony Hall. After offering Henri Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" to commemorate the composer's recent death (Sept. 8), Mr. Munch will repeat the program with which this orchestra, under Wilhelm Gericke, opened Boston's Symphony Hall in October, 1900, including Handel's third organ concerto with E. Power Biggs as soloist. Mr. Rabaud was the Boston Symphony's conductor in 1918-'19.

The Cleveland Orchestra began its thirty-second and, thus far, its longest season in Cleveland's Severance Hall last Thursday and Saturday nights. George Szell devoted his first program to familiar music; his second, next Thursday and Saturday, will include Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony. The Bartok work has had one previous production, Jan. 3 and 5, 1948, under Mr. Szell, as a memorial to the composer, who died in September, 1945. The Clevelanders' regular subscription series consists of twenty-eight pairs of concerts.

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD
OCT 2 1949

Boston Symphony To Mark Anniversary

Charles Munch, new conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present at his first concert Oct. 7, a repetition of the program with which Wilhelm Gericke opened Symphony Hall exactly 50 years ago.

The half century anniversary of the auditorium will also be celebrated by the dedication of a new organ. E. Power Biggs will play Handel's Third Concerto.

Mr. Munch recently conducted the summer festival in his native Strasbourg and concerts of the Conservatoire and Government Radio Orchestra in Paris.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN
OCT 1 - 1949

Charles Munch, who has arrived in Boston to take up his duties as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has divulged to newspaper interviewers his plans and intentions for the orchestra's season which is to open Oct. 7. Charles Munch, who succeeds Serge Koussevitzky as this orchestra's tenth conductor and the third native of France, has returned from an active season in his own country where he has been conducting the festival in his native Strasbourg and the concerts of the Conservatoire and Government Radio Orchester in Paris. He is well known in this country from the tour of the latter orchestra last autumn and from many guest appearances in our principal cities.

[16]

REDUCTION

RATIO

17x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

It's Not Music — But It's Fun

In the course of writing on musicians' hobbies the subject has grown with snowball rapidity. So universal, we find, is musicians' urge to get release outside their strenuous profession that it is impossible to name all the ways they take of doing it. Perhaps the following article may be the means of bringing to light other "outs" for the much beset members of this group. Here, at least, is material enough to show not only musicians' zest for life but their infinite resourcefulness.

Paul Federovsky (l.) and Einar Hansen (r.), Boston Symphony violinists, ponder a chess situation while Melvin Bryant of their section looks on.

ARNOLD SCHOENBERG binds books in his odd hours. He used to paint and has some self-portraits of high artistic merit to his credit. Composer Paul Creston solves riddles and cryptographs. Toscanini watches prize fights over television. Ernest Bloch picks mushrooms and chops wood. Minot Beale (violin, Boston Symphony) raises rare pheasants. Charles Munch (conductor, Boston Symphony) told reporters when he was guest-conducting in New York, "I had a fine time going every day to the zoological gardens to watch four lion cubs."

A century or so back Mozart revelled in dancing the latest steps. Domenico Dragonetti, double-bass virtuoso, collected snuff boxes and elaborately dressed dolls. He often carried a favorite one, dressed all in black, to concerts with him. Beethoven loved to take long solitary walks in the woods. Alexander Borodin was chemist as well as composer.

So if the world has looked to musicians to provide them with a hobby, musicians in turn have sought relaxation in other directions. Herewith we have assembled just a few of the many ways musicians have found to relax.

Take the collectors. Fritz Kreisler collects Fifteenth Century manuscripts; Fabien Sevitzky collects ties (he has 980 of them!); Alec Templeton has more than a hundred music boxes, all shapes and sizes; Powell Weaver has an assortment of bells; composer Burrill Phillips collects (on records) spoken dialects of the United States. Spinoza Paeff (violist, Baltimore Symphony) has unearthed and recorded the laments of the Cape Verde Islands (Portuguese West Africa). Composer Charles Mills collects pipes, flutist John Wummer (New York Philharmonic) flutes, percussionist Emil Sholle (Cleveland Orchestra) cymbals. Boaz Piller (contrabassoonist, Boston) has a rare collection of musical lithographs by Daumier—one of the most nearly complete in the world. Mischa Mischakoff (concertmeister, N. B. C. Symphony) collects Stradivarius violins —has three, as well as one Guarnieri der Gesù.

Carlos Pinfield, a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a skilled wood-carver.

Collectors' enjoyment is of the quiet, ruminating sort. Many musicians, perhaps as a reaction from their sedentary occupation, have a yen for getting somewhere fast. Three inveterate automobile drivers are conductor Eugene Ormandy and composers Edward Burlingame Hill and Lazare Saminsky. Composers who elect to skim the waterways are yachting enthusiast Eric Delamarter and sailboat racer Vincent Persichetti. Band-leader Guy Lombardo is a motor-boat racer.

But for sheer space-coverage, the aviators win out. Violist Harry Hyams and French horn player Mark Fischer are New York Philharmonic members who take to the air in their escape from routine. Roy Gardner (trombone, New Orleans Symphony) has a private airplane pilot's license and often flies to out-of-town engagements. Jose Iturbi is an expert flyer. Marvin Rabin, violinist of the Louisville (Kentucky) Philharmonic, has 3,600 flying hours to his credit. He has piloted three fellow orchestra members to their private flying licenses: Grace Whitney, principal cellist; Delbert Hoon, trumpet player, and Dudley Howe, first horn player. Miss Whitney explains, "Flying is actually easier than driving an automobile. In motoring slowness means safety. In the air height and speed are what count in saving of life and limb."

Some musicians find going places in imagination just as nerve-quieting. Clement J. Barone, piccolo player of the Houston Symphony Orchestra, devotes his spare hours to model railroading. "It's great fun," says he, "to build your own scale models of today's modern streamliners and freight engines and cars. But the greatest thrill is seeing them whizz through realistic country towns and then roar to a stop at a big city station. In process of building a model there are so many small parts to put together that you have to stay calm, cool and collected." Composer Philip Greeley Clapp says he is absorbed in railroad operation "probably because of a certain symphonic quality which I find in 'choo-choos'." Ernst Krenek pores over railroad time-tables. One remembers that Antonin Dvorak used to go to the station when trains were due, just to see the giants come thundering in.

Ernst Panenka, Boston Symphony Orchestra bassoonist, delights in flying toy aeroplanes powered with rubber bands.

Some hobbyists prefer to get places under their own steam. Mountain climbing is the joy of Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, as well as of Rosario Mazzeo (bass clarinetist, Boston Symphony) and of composer Samuel Barber. Swimmers are Laila Storch (oboe) and Gaetano Molieri (viola) both of Houston. George A. Foster (manager, New Orleans Symphony Orchestra) deserts the Symphony office for any fire of more than two alarms.

George Humphrey, violist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes violas and bows. He made his own.

Outdoor sportsmen among musicians go in for everything from deep sea fishing (Alfred Wallenstein, conductor of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra) to marksmanship (Fabien Sevitzky, conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony). Howard B. Mitchell, conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, has won the District of Columbia championship in golf several times. Of a less strenuous cast are the beekeeping activities of composer Paul Nordoff and the bird-watching pursuits of Rosario Mazzeo (bass clarinet), the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ornithologist. William Gebhardt (French horn player of the Boston Symphony) for years has cultivated four acres of vegetables and maintained one hundred and fifty hens. (He sells the eggs to Boston Symphony Orchestra members.) Ralph Liese (trombone, Houston Symphony), goes in for stock-raising. Harold Thompson (percussion, Cincinnati Orchestra) is the delight of fly fishermen. For he ties fly-rod lures. During the coming year specimens of his handiwork will take salmon in the great rivers of the Atlantic watershed and bonefish of the southern seas. Samples of Thompson's workmanship, spread out on a table, look like a garden of tiny wildflowers, but they are actually bits of hair, feathers, wool —even the scale of a giant python, all put together with infinite skill. Fishing enthusiast Clifford Spearing (French horn, Toronto Philharmonic) and he should get acquainted.

And then there's the group that scurries around recording all such activity via film. Photography is a hobby so often resorted to that it is safe to say at least half of professional musicians engage in it with more or less purposefulness. Some are experts in the field. They specialize. Six members of the Cincinnati Orchestra, to concentrate on just one such group, have all but reached professional status: Marcel Dandois, Charles Findlay, Fred Noak, Carl Topie, Harold Roberts and Arthur Knecht. Dandois' specialty is landscapes and character studies; Findlay covered all expenses of a Canadian Rockies trip through proceeds from his pictures; Noak's forte is taking pictures of animals in the zoo.

The professional photographer of the Philadelphia Orchestra is Adrian Siegel, cellist in the group. Conductors Joseph Wagner (Duluth) and Milton Katims (N. B. C. Symphony) make a specialty of taking moving pictures. Katims has one of Toscanini actually conducting.

Chess runs photography a close second. Practically every symphony orchestra has its chess club. When I was shown through the room backstage at the New York Philharmonic, which holds the exhibit of the orchestra's painter-members, I was told please not to look toward the tables of chess players. They didn't have their coats on and would be embarrassed. My guide need not have troubled. When I did cast an oblique glance in the players' direction, I saw they were far too immersed in the game even to notice my presence.

Chess experts among musicians are too numerous to mention, but one might cite Theodore Cella (harp, New York Philharmonic) who has won several tournaments. William Primrose, concert violist, carries on tournaments by correspondence with fellow artists on tour.

Other champions at indoor games are Chris Hebert (violinist, New Orleans Symphony Orchestra) who took the prize as best bridge player in a recent contest in that city, and conductor Izler Solomon, who in his college days was ping-pong champion at Michigan State. He still plays a mean game. Composer Villa-Lobos is an avid billiard player.

That most horizon-searching of indoor sports, namely, reading, forms the chief recreation of innumerable musicians. Clarinetist Schmachtenberg of the Cincinnati Symphony likes to read Huxley, Santayana, Mann and Cocteau; conductor Artur Rodzinski is a student of the Enrico Fabrizio in his workshop. He made the cello he plays in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Daniel Eisler, Boston Symphony violinist, hunts out some dingy and cracked old painting in a second-hand shop, cleans it, mends defects in the paint—and presto, he has a charming antique!

Maurice Van Praag, personnel manager of the New York Philharmonic, Nat Van Praag, assistant librarian, and Leonard Schaller, first clarinet, have a game of Gin Rummy during intermission.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
OCT 2- 1949

Boston Symphony Reports Sellout

BOSTON, (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra reports that all seats for its concerts have been sold for the entire season—despite a change in conductors.

Charles Munch, succeeding Serge Koussevitzky as head of the group, will give four series of concerts in Boston besides appearances in Providence, R. I., Cambridge and in New York at Carnegie Hall and the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

HENDERSON, TEXAS
TEXAS NEWS
OCT 2 1949

WORLD of MUSIC

NEW YORK, Oct. 1. (UP)—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to Serge Koussevitzky, on Oct. 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on Oct. 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's tenth conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in midwinter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 1 - 1949

Bostonians Oversubscribed

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a week before the opening of its home season under Charles Munch's direction next Friday afternoon every available seat has been subscribed for the season in all its series, including those in Boston, Cambridge, New York, Brooklyn and Providence. Each [illegible] a waiting list for future seasons.

It's Not Music—But It's Fun

In the course of writing on musicians' hobbies the subject has grown with snowball rapidity. So universal, we find, is musicians' urge to get release outside their strenuous profession that it is impossible to name all the ways they take of doing it. Perhaps the following article may be the means of bringing to light other "outs" for the much beset members of this group. Here, at least, is material enough to show not only musicians' zest for life but their infinite resourcefulness.

Paul Federovsky (l.) and Sidney Hansen (r.), Boston Symphony violinists, ponder a chess situation while Melvin Bryant of their section looks on.

ARNOLD SCHOENBERG binds books in his odd hours. He used to paint and has some self-portraits of high artistic merit to his credit. Composer Paul Creston solves riddles and cryptographs. Toscanini watches prize fights over television. Ernest Bloch picks mushrooms and chops wood. Minot Beale (violin, Boston Symphony) raised rare pheasants. Charles Munch (conductor, Boston Symphony) told reporters when he was guest-conducting in New York, "I had a fine time going every day to the zoological gardens to watch four lion cubs."

A century or so back Mozart revelled in dancing the latest steps. Domenico Dragonetti, double-bass virtuoso, collected snuff boxes and elaborately dressed dolls. He often carried a favorite one, dressed [illegible] to concerts with him. Beethoven loved long solitary walks in the woods. [illegible]er Borodin was chemist as well as composer.

So if the world has looked to musicians to provide them with a hobby, musicians in turn have sought relaxation in other directions. Herewith we have assembled just a few of the many ways musicians have found to relax.

Take the collectors. Fritz Kreisler collects Fifteenth Century manuscripts; Fabien Sevitzky collects ties (he has 980 of them!); Alec Templeton has more than a hundred music boxes, all shapes and sizes; Powell Weaver has an assortment of bells; composer Burrill Phillips collects (on records) spoken dialects of the United States. Spinoza Paeff (violist, Baltimore Symphony) has unearthed and recorded the laments of the Cape Verde Islands (Portuguese West Africa). Composer Charles Mills collects pipes, flutist John Wummer (New York Philharmonic) flutes, percussionist Emil Sholle (Cleveland Orchestra) cymbals. Boaz Piller (contrabassoonist, Boston) has a rare collection of musical lithographs by Daumier—one of the most nearly complete in the world. Mischa Mischakoff (concertmeister, N. B. C. Symphony) collects Stradivarius violins—has three, as well as one Guarnieri der Gesù.

Collectors' enjoyment is of the quiet, ruminating sort. Many musicians, perhaps as a reaction from their sedentary occupation, have a yen for getting somewhere fast. Three inveterate automobile drivers are conductor Eugene Ormandy and composers Edward Burlingame Hill and Lazare Saminsky. Composers who elect to skim the waterways are yachting enthusiast Eric Delamarter and sailboat racer Vincent Persichetti. Band-leader Guy Lombardo is a motor-boat racer.

But for sheer space-coverage, the aviators win out. Violist Harry Hyams and French horn player Mark Fischer are New York Philharmonic members who take to the air in their escape from routine. Roy Gardner (trombone, New Orleans Symphony) has a private airplane pilot's license and often flies to out-of-town engagements. Jose Iturbi is an expert flyer. Marvin Rabin, violinist of the Louisville (Kentucky) Philharmonic, has 3,600 flying hours to his credit. He has piloted three fellow orchestra members to their private flying licenses: Grace Whitney, principal cellist; Delbert Hoon, trumpet player, and Dudley Howe, first horn player. Miss Whitney explains, "Flying is actually easier than driving an automobile. In motoring slowness means safety. In the air height and speed are what count in saving of life and limb."

Carlos Pinfield, a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a skilled wood-carver.

George Humphrey, violist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes violas and bows. He made his own.

Some musicians find going places in imagination just as nerve-quieting. Clement J. Barone, piccolo player of the Houston Symphony Orchestra, devotes his spare hours to model railroading. "It's great fun," says he, "to build your own scale models of today's modern streamliners and freight engines and cars. But the greatest thrill is seeing them whizz through realistic country towns and then roar to a stop at a big city station. In process of building a model there are so many small parts to put together that you have to stay calm, cool and collected." Composer Philip Greeley Clapp says he is absorbed in railroad operation "probably because of a certain symphonic quality which I find in 'choo-choos'." Ernst Krenek pores over railroad time-tables. One remembers that Antonin Dvorak used to go to the station when trains were due, just to see the giants come in.

Ernst Panenka, Boston Symphony Orchestra bassoonist, delights in flying toy aeroplanes powered with rubber bands.

Some hobbyists prefer to get places under their own steam. Mountain climbing is the joy of Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, as well as of Rosario Mazzeo (bass clarinetist, Boston Symphony) and of composer Samuel Barber. Swimmers are Laila Storch (oboe) and Gaetano Molieri (viola) both of Houston. George A. Foster (manager, New Orleans Symphony Orchestra) deserts the Symphony office for any fire of more than two alarms.

Outdoor sportsmen among musicians go in for everything from deep sea fishing (Alfred Wallenstein, conductor of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra) to marksmanship (Fabien Sevitzky, conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony). Howard B. Mitchell, conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, has won the District of Columbia championship in golf several times. Of a less strenuous cast are the bee-keeping activities of composer Paul Nordoff and the bird-watching pursuits of Rosario Mazzeo (bass clarinet), the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ornithologist. William Gebhardt (French horn player of the Boston Symphony) for years has cultivated four acres of vegetables and maintained one hundred and fifty hens. (He sells the eggs to Boston Symphony Orchestra members.) Ralph Liese (trombone, Houston Symphony), goes in for stock-raising. Harold Thompson (percussion, Cincinnati Orchestra) is the delight of fly fishermen. For he ties fly-rod lures. During the coming year specimens of his handiwork will take salmon in the great rivers of the Atlantic watershed and bonefish of the southern seas. Samples of Thompson's workmanship, spread out on a table, look like a garden of tiny wildflowers, but they are actually bits of hair, feathers, wool—even the scale of a giant python, all put together with infinite skill. Fishing enthusiast Clifford Spearing (French horn, Toronto Philharmonic) and he should get acquainted.

And then there's the group that scurries around recording all such activity via film. Photography is a hobby so often resorted to that it is safe to say at least half of professional musicians engage in it with more or less purposefulness. Some are experts in the field. They specialize. Six members of the Cincinnati Orchestra, to concentrate on just one such group, have all but reached professional status: Marcel Dandois, Charles Findlay, Fred Noak, Carl Topic, Harold Roberts and Arthur Knecht. Dandois' specialty is landscapes and character studies; Findlay covered all expenses of a Canadian Rockies trip through proceeds from his pictures; Noak's forte is taking pictures of animals in the zoo.

The professional photographer of the Philadelphia Orchestra is Adrian Siegel, cellist in the group. Conductors Joseph Wagner (Duluth) and Milton Katims (N. B. C. Symphony) make a specialty of taking moving pictures. Katims has one of Toscanini actually conducting.

Chess runs photography a close second. Practically every symphony orchestra has its chess club. When I was shown through the room backstage at the New York Philharmonic, which holds the exhibit of the orchestra's painter-members, I was told [illegible] not to look toward the tables of chess players. They didn't have their coats on and would be embarrassed. My guide would not have troubled. When I did cast an [illegible] glance in the players' direction, I saw [illegible] were far too immersed in the game even to notice my presence.

Enrico Fabrizio in his workshop. He makes cellos; he plays in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Chess experts among musicians are too numerous to mention, but one might cite Theodore Cella (harp, New York Philharmonic) who has won several tournaments. William Primrose, concert violist, carries on tournaments by correspondence with fellow artists on tour.

Other champions at indoor games are Chris Hebert (violinist, New Orleans Symphony Orchestra) who took the prize as best bridge player in a recent contest in that city, and conductor Izler Solomon, who in his college days was ping-pong champion at Michigan State. He still plays a mean game. Composer Villa-Lobos is an avid billiard player.

That most horizon-searching of indoor sports, namely, reading, forms the chief recreation of innumerable musicians. Clarinetist Schmachtenberg of the Cincinnati Symphony likes to read Huxley, Santayana, Mann and Cocteau; conductor Artur Rodzinski is a student of the

Daniel Eisler, Boston Symphony violinist, hunts out some dingy and cracked old painting in a second-hand shop, cleans it, mends defects in the paint—and presto, he has a charming antique!

Maurice Van Praag, personnel manager of the New York Philharmonic, Nat Van Praag, assistant librarian, and Leonard Schaller, first clarinet, have a game of Gin Rummy during intermission.

BURLINGTON, VT. NEWS
OCT 2- 1949

Boston Symphony Reports Sellout

BOSTON, (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra reports that all seats for its concerts have been sold for the entire season—despite a change in conductors.

Charles Munch, succeeding Serge Koussevitzky as head of the group, will give four series of concerts in Boston besides appearances in Providence, R. I., Cambridge and in New York at Carnegie Hall and the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

HENDERSON, TEXAS NEWS
OCT 2 1949

WORLD of MUSIC

NEW YORK, Oct. 1 (UP)—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to Serge [illegible]itzky, on Oct. 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on Oct. 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's tenth conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in midwinter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

NEW YORK, N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 1 - 1949

Bostonians Oversubscribed

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a week before the opening of its home season under Charles Munch's direction next Friday afternoon every available seat has been subscribed for the season in all its series, including those in Boston, Cambridge, New York, Brooklyn and Providence. Each [illegible], a waiting list for [illegible]

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

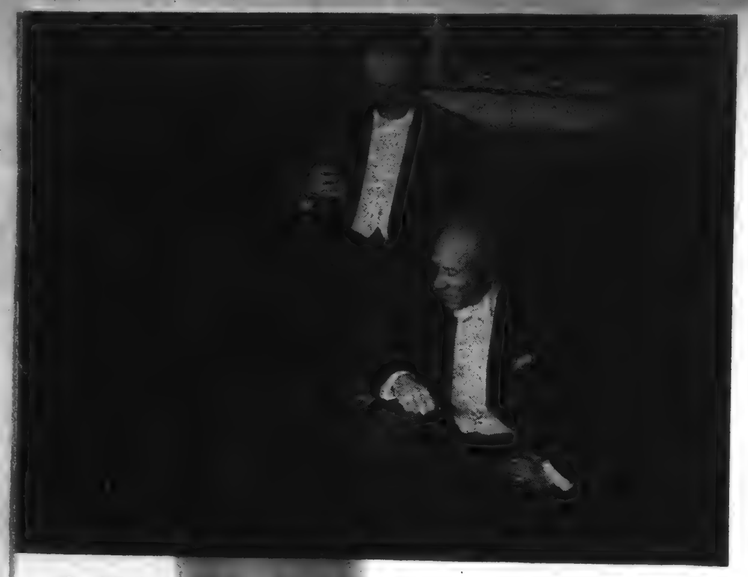
Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

It's Not Music — But It's F

In the course of writing on musicians' hobbies the subject has grown with snowball rapidity. So universal, we find, is musicians' urge to get release outside their strenuous profession that it is impossible to name all the ways they take of doing it. Perhaps the following article may be the means of bringing to light other "outs" for the much beset members of this group. Here, at least, is material enough to show not only musicians' zest for life but their infinite resourcefulnes



Paul Federovsky (b.) and Sidney Jansen (r.), Boston Symphony violinists, ponder a chess situation while Melvin Bryant of their section looks on.

ARNOLD SCHOENBERG binds books in his odd hours. He used to paint and has some self-portraits of high artistic merit to his credit. Composer Paul Creston solves riddles and cryptographs. Toscanini watches prize fights over television. Ernest Bloch picks mushrooms and chops wood. Minot Beale (violin, Boston Symphony) raises rare pheasants. Charles Munch (conductor, Boston Symphony) told reporters when he was guest-conducting in New York, "I had a fine time going every day to the zoological gardens to watch four lion cubs."

A century or so back Mozart revelled in dancing the latest steps. Domenico Dragonetti, double-bass virtuoso, collected snuff boxes and elaborately dressed dolls. He often carried a favorite one, dressed all in black, to concerts with him. Beethoven loved to take long solitary walks in the woods. Alexander Borodin was chemist as well as composer.

So if the world has looked to musicians to provide them with a hobby, musicians in turn have sought relaxation in other directions. Herewith we have assembled just a few of the many ways musicians have found to relax.

Take the collectors. Fritz Kreisler collects Fifteenth Century manuscripts; Fabien Sevitzky collects ties (he has 980 of them!); Alec Templeton has more than a hundred music boxes, all shapes and sizes; Powell Weaver has an assortment of bells; composer Burrill Phillips collects (on records) spoken dialects of the United States. Spinoza Paeff (violist, Baltimore Symphony) has unearthed and recorded the laments of the Cape Verde Islands (Portuguese West Africa). Composer Charles Mills collects pipes, flutist John Wummer (New York Philharmonic) flutes, percussionist Emil Sholle (Cleveland Orchestra) cymbals. Boaz Piller (contrabassoonist, Boston) has a rare collection of musical lithographs by Daumier—one of the most nearly complete in the world. Mischa Mischakoff (concertmeister, N. B. C. Symphony) collects Stradivarius violins—has three, as well as one Guarnieri der Gesù.

Collectors' enjoyment is of the quiet, ruminating sort. Many musicians, perhaps as a reaction from their sedentary occupation, have a yen for getting somewhere fast. Three inveterate automobile drivers are conductor Eugene Ormandy and composers Edward Burlingame Hill and Lazare Saminsky. Composers who elect to skim the waterways are yachting enthusiast Eric Delamarter and sailboat racer Vincent Persichetti. Band-leader Guy Lombardo is a motor-boat racer.

Maurice Van Praag, personnel manager of the New York Philharmonic, Nat Van Praag, assistant librarian, and Leonard Schaller, first clarinet, have a game of Gin Rummy during intermission.

But for sheer space-coverage, the aviators win out. Violist Harry Hyams and French horn player Mark Fischer are New York Philharmonic members who take to the air in their escape from routine. Roy Gardner (trombone, New Orleans Symphony) has a private airplane pilot's license and often flies to out-of-town engagements. Jose Iturbi is an expert flyer. Marvin Rabin, violinist of the Louisville (Kentucky) Philharmonic, has 3,600 flying hours to his credit. He has piloted three fellow orchestra members to their private flying licenses: Grace Whitney, principal cellist; Delbert Hoon, trumpet player, and Dudley Howe, first horn player. Miss Whitney explains, "Flying is actually easier than driving an automobile. In motoring slowness means safety. In the air height and speed are what count in saving of life and limb."

Carlos Pinfield, a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a skilled wood-carver.

Some musicians find going places in imagination just as nerve-quieting. Clement J. Barone, piccolo player of the Houston Symphony Orchestra, devotes his spare hours to model railroading. "It's great fun," says he, "to build your own scale models of today's modern streamliners and freight engines and cars. But the greatest thrill is seeing them whizz through realistic country towns and then roar to a stop at a big city station. In process of building a model there are so many small parts to put together that you have to stay calm, cool and collected." Composer Philip Greeley Clapp says he is absorbed in railroad operation "probably because of a certain symphonic quality which I find in 'choo-choos'." Ernst Krenek pores over railroad time-tables. One remembers that Antonin Dvorak used to go to the station when trains were due, just to see the giants come [illegible].

Ernst Panenka, Boston Symphony Orchestra bassoonist, delights in flying toy aeroplanes powered with rubber bands.

Some hobbyists prefer to get places under their own steam. Mountain climbing is the joy of Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, as well as of Rosario Mazzeo (bass clarinetist, Boston Symphony) and of composer Samuel Barber. Swimmers are Laila Storch (oboe) and Gaetano Molieri (viola) both of Houston. George A. Foster (manager, New Orleans Symphony Orchestra) deserts the Symphony office for any fire of more than two alarms.

George Humphrey, violist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes violas and bows. He made his own.

Outdoor sportsmen among musicians go in for everything from deep sea fishing (Alfred Wallenstein, conductor of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra) to marksmanship (Fabien Sevitzky, conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony). Howard B. Mitchell, conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, has won the District of Columbia championship in golf several times. Of a less strenuous cast are the bee-keeping activities of composer Paul Nordoff and the bird-watching pursuits of Rosario Mazzeo (bass clarinet), the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ornithologist. William Gebhardt (French horn player of the Boston Symphony) for years has cultivated four acres of vegetables and maintained one hundred and fifty hens. (He sells the eggs to Boston Symphony Orchestra members.)

Ralph L
Houston goes in Harold cussion, chestra)
he ties f specimen in the g and bon Thompso
table, loc
but they —even th
gether w
Clifford harmonic

And th around r Photograp that it is musicians posefulnes
They spe cinnati O such grou status: Ma
Noak, Ca
Knecht. character of a Cana from his p of animals

The pr tographer
phia Orche Siegel, c group. Con Wagner (
Milton Ka Symphony)
cialty of t pictures. K of Toscanin ducting.

Chess raphy a Practically phony orch chess club.
shown throu
backstage York Philha holds the e orchestra's

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
OCT 2- 1949

Boston Symphony Reports Sellout

BOSTON, (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra reports that all seats for its concerts have been sold for the entire season—despite a change in conductors.

Charles Munch, succeeding Serge Koussevitzky as head of the group, will give four series of concerts in Boston besides appearances in Providence, R. I., Cambridge and in New York at Carnegie Hall and the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

HENDERSON, TEXAS
TEXAS NEWS
OCT 2 1949

WORLD of MUSIC

NEW YORK, Oct. 1. (UP)—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to Serge [illegible]itsky, on Oct. 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on Oct. 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's tenth conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in midwinter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

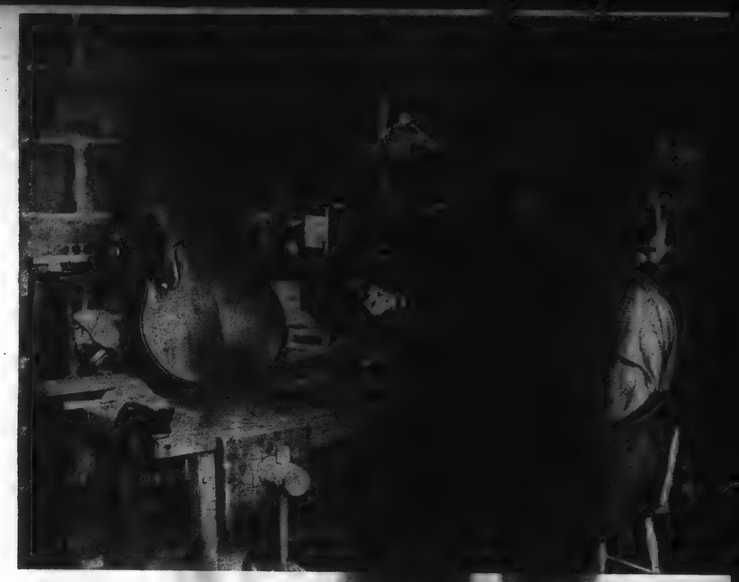
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 1 - 1949

Bostonians Oversubscribed

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a week before the opening of its home season under Charles Munch's direction next Friday afternoon every available seat has been subscribed for the season in all its series, including those in Boston, Cambridge, New York, Brooklyn and Providence. Each [illegible] waiting list for [illegible]

It's Not Music — But It's Fun

In the course of writing on musicians' hobbies the subject has grown with snowball rapidity. So universal, we find, is musicians' urge to get release outside their strenuous profession that it is impossible to name all the ways they take of doing it. Perhaps the following article may be the means of bringing to light other "outs" for the much beset members of this group. Here, at least, is material enough to show not only musicians' zest for life but their infinite resourcefulness.



Enrico Fabrizio in his workshop. He m[akes] cell[os] he plays in the Boston Symphony O[rchest]ra.

ony violinists, tion looks on.

Philharmonic, first clarinet, on.

Fifteenth Century manuscripts; Fabien Sevitzky collects ties (he has 980 of them!); Alec Templeton has more than a ed music boxes, all shapes and sizes; l Weaver has an assortment of bells; oser Burrill Phillips collects (on records) n dialects of the United States. Spinoza (violist, Baltimore Symphony) has und and recorded the laments of the Cape Islands (Portuguese West Africa). Com- Charles Mills collects pipes, flutist John mer (New York Philharmonic) flutes, ssionist Emil Sholle (Cleveland Orchestra) ls. Boaz Piller (contrabassoonist, Boston) rare collection of musical lithographs by ier—one of the most nearly complete in orld. Mischa Mischakoff (concertmeister, C. Symphony) collects Stradivarius violins three, as well as one Guarnieri der Gesù.

lectors' enjoyment is of the quiet, rumi- sort. Many musicians, perhaps as a re- from their sedentary occupation, have a or getting somewhere fast. Three inveter- utomobile drivers are conductor Eugene ndy and composers Edward Burlingame and Lazare Saminsky. Composers who to skim the waterways are yachting en- st Eric Delamarter and sailboat racer nt Persichetti. Band-leader Guy Lom- is a motor-boat racer.

But for sheer space-coverage, the aviators win out. Violist Harry Hyams and French horn player Mark Fischer are New York Philharmonic members who take to the air in their escape from routine. Roy Gardner (trombone, New Orleans Symphony) has a private airplane pilot's license and often flies to out-of-town engagements. Jose Iturbi is an expert flyer. Marvin Rabin, violinist of the Louisville (Kentucky) Philharmonic, has 3,600 flying hours to his credit. He has piloted three fellow orchestra members to their private flying licenses: Grace Whitney, principal cellist; Delbert Hoon, trumpet player, and Dudley Howe, first horn player. Miss Whitney explains, "Flying is actually easier than driving an automobile. In motoring slowness means safety. In the air height and speed are what count in saving of life and limb."

Carlos Pinfield, a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a skilled wood-carver.

Some musicians find going places in imagination just as nerve-quieting. Clement J. Barone, piccolo player of the Houston Symphony Orchestra, devotes his spare hours to model railroading. "It's great fun," says he, "to build your own scale models of today's modern streamliners and freight engines and cars. But the greatest thrill is seeing them whizz through realistic country towns and then roar to a stop at a big city station. In process of building a model there are so many small parts to put together that you have to stay calm, cool and collected." Composer Philip Greeley Clapp says he is absorbed in railroad operation "probably because of a certain symphonic quality which I find in 'choo-choos'." Ernst Krenek pores over railroad time-tables. One remembers that Antonin Dvorak used to go to the station when trains were due, just to see the giants come in.

Ernst Panenka, Boston Symphony Orchestra bassoonist, delights in flying toy aeroplanes powered with rubber bands.

eorge Humphrey, violist in the Boston Symphony rchestra, makes violas and bows. He made his own.

Some hobbyists prefer to get places under their own steam. Mountain climbing is the joy of Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, as well as of Rosario Mazzeo (bass clarinetist, Boston Symphony) and of composer Samuel Barber. Swimmers are Laila Storch (oboe) and Gaetano Molieri (viola) both of Houston. George A. Foster (manager, New Orleans Symphony Orchestra) deserts the Symphony office for any fire of more than two alarms.

Outdoor sportsmen among musicians go in for everything from deep sea fishing (Alfred Wallenstein, conductor of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra) to marksmanship (Fabien Sevitzky, conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony). Howard B. Mitchell, conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, has won the District of Columbia championship in golf several times. Of a less strenuous cast are the beekeeping activities of composer Paul Nordoff and the bird-watching pursuits of Rosario Mazzeo (bass clarinet), the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ornithologist. William Gebhardt (French horn player of the Boston Symphony) for years has cultivated four acres of vegetables and maintained one hundred and fifty hens. (He sells the eggs to Boston Symphony Orchestra members.)

Ralph Liese (trombone, Houston Symphony), goes in for stock-raising. Harold Thompson (percussion, Cincinnati Orchestra) is the delight of fly fishermen. For he ties fly-rod lures. During the coming year specimens of his handiwork will take salmon in the great rivers of the Atlantic watershed and bonefish of the southern seas. Samples of Thompson's workmanship, spread out on a table, look like a garden of tiny wildflowers, but they are actually bits of hair, feathers, wool —even the scale of a giant python, all put together with infinite skill. Fishing enthusiast Clifford Spearing (French horn, Toronto Philharmonic) and he should get acquainted.

And then there's the group that scurries around recording all such activity via film. Photography is a hobby so often resorted to that it is safe to say at least half of professional musicians engage in it with more or less purposefulness. Some are experts in the field. They specialize. Six members of the Cincinnati Orchestra, to concentrate on just one such group, have all but reached professional status: Marcel Dandois, Charles Findlay, Fred Noak, Carl Topić, Harold Roberts and Arthur Knecht. Dandois' specialty is landscapes and character studies; Findlay covered all expenses of a Canadian Rockies trip through proceeds from his pictures; Noak's forte is taking pictures of animals in the zoo.

The professional photographer of the Philadelphia Orchestra is Adrian Siegel, cellist in the group. Conductors Joseph Wagner (Duluth) and Milton Katims (N. B. C. Symphony) make a specialty of taking moving pictures. Katims has one of Toscanini actually conducting.

Chess runs photography a close second. Practically every symphony orchestra has its chess club. When I was shown through the room backstage at the New York Philharmonic, which holds the exhibit of the orchestra's painter-members, I was told please not to look toward the tables of chess players. They didn't have their coats on and would be embarrassed. My guide need not have troubled. When I did cast an [un]que glance in the players' direction, I saw they were far too immersed in the game even to notice my presence.

Chess experts among musicians are too numerous to mention, but one might cite Theodore Cella (harp, New York Philharmonic) who has won several tournaments. William Primrose, concert violist, carries on tournaments by correspondence with fellow artists on tour.

Other champions at indoor games are Chris Hebert (violinist, New Orleans Symphony Orchestra) who took the prize as best bridge player in a recent contest in that city, and conductor Izler Solomon, who in his college days was ping-pong champion at Michigan State. He still plays a mean game. Composer Villa-Lobos is an avid billiard player.

That most horizon-searching of indoor sports, namely, reading, forms the chief recreation of innumerable musicians. Clarinetist Schmachtenberg of the Cincinnati Symphony likes to read Huxley, Santayana, Mann and Cocteau; conductor Artur Rodzinski is a student of the Daniel Eisler, Boston Symphony violinist, hunts out some dingy and cracked old painting in a second-hand shop, cleans it, mends defects in the paint—and presto, he has a charming antique!

ON, TEXAS
S NEWS
2 1949

RLD of MUSIC

ct. 1 (UP)— make his bow ductor of the Symphony, in same program estra inaugur-phony Hall on timelessness of 0-year-old pro-

been as easily
t is the over-
"Euryanthe."
ncerto No. 4
d entr' acte of munde." and symphony. E. be the Handel

soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's tenth conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in midwinter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 1 - 1949

Bostonians Oversubscribed

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a week before the opening of its home season under Charles Munch's direction next Friday afternoon every available seat has been subscribed for the season in all its series, including those in Boston, Cambridge, New York, Brooklyn and Providence. Each [illegible], a waiting list for future [illegible]

[17]

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS
Climbing the Grand Teton Range

Bible, as is Fritz Kreisler; Asbourne McConathy (horn, Boston Symphony) does research in Elizabethan music and history of the horn. Detective novels are the meat of at least two composers: Wallingford Riegger and Robert L. Sanders. Kurt Weill pores over newspapers, composer Robert Guyn McBride over comics.

Physicians aplenty have turned to music as a relaxer and a solacer. But how about musicians who find ease from the grind in delving into medicine? Nikolai Zadri, first violinist of the New Orleans Symphony, was trained as a physician in his native Russia and now finds release in diagnosing the ills of the orchestra members. Fritz Kreisler at one time almost gave up music for the practice of medicine. George Rowe, clarinetist of the Philadelphia Orchestra, makes pathology his especial study. Otto Deri, cellist of the Indiana Symphony Orchestra, holds a doctor's degree in psychology. Hypnotism and therapy claim composer Paul Creston's spare-time interest.

A frequent "out" for musicians is the diversion of interest into allied art channels, probably because these offer artistic expression without the usual professional's responsibility for being always letter-perfect or productive only along the lines of employers' or public's desires. Thus Jean Cauhape (viola) and Karl Zeise (cello), both of the Boston Symphony, paint in their odd hours. Last April's issue of The International Musician contained an article, "Busman's Holiday," which dealt with the musician-painters of the New York Philharmonic, who had actually exhibited, namely: M. de Stefano, H. Gomberg, F. Zimmermann, M. Forstat, R. Saginsky, W. Lincer, M. Nazzi, Gullino, A. Namen, C. Stern, L. Busch. Composers Morton Gould and Bernard Rogers have paintings to their credit. Three members of the Houston Symphony who have artistic hobbies are violist Gaetano Molieri who does miniature modeling; Irving Wadler who works in oils, and Betty Barney who paints, with a particular leaning toward the French post-impressionistic period. Armando Ghitalla (trumpet, Houston Symphony) likes to draw (see below) "just for kicks." Cellist Jacobus Landendoen of the Boston Symphony does cartoons, too. Carlos Pinfield (violinist, Boston), an expert woodcarver, converts slabs of wood into bowls, trays, picture frames. Lucienne Lavedan assists her mother in presenting French drama in New Orleans where she is harpist in the symphony. Another harpist, Edward H. Vito (N. B. C. Symphony) remodels and relandscapes old houses in Connecticut. Still another harpist, Elford Caughey (Boston), writes poetry—which, incidentally, gets published.

An even shorter hurdle from occupation to preoccupation is made by the musicians who turn to other aspects of music for recreation. Concert master John Corigliano (New York Philharmonic) plays chamber music with his colleagues. William Bell (tuba, New York Philharmonic) has trained as a baritone. He does "Tubby the Tuba" playing the instrument, singing and reciting the narrative. Composer Lamar Stringfield thinks up innovations on the flute; Saul Goodman (tympanist, New York Philharmonic) designs and builds his own kettledrums. Philip Sklar (first contra-bass, N. B. C. Symphony) makes basses, cellos and violas. Ralph McLane (clarinet, Philadelphia Orchestra) has devised improvements in the Boehm fingering system for the clarinet. Henryk Kaston (Metropolitan Opera Orchestra) has invented a violin mute.

What with all this activity in the wings, even off-hours begin to sound a bit strenuous. Just for a breather, let's remember Handel found his chief pleasure outside music in eating. Gioacchino Rossini, who closed his dramatic career at the age of thirty-seven when he was at the height of his fame, might have been motivated less by frayed nerves than by a hobbyist's fervor, since he thereafter went in heavily for cooking, becoming famous for inventing new dishes, some of which even today are listed on menus under his name. Like him, Leonard Rose (New York Philharmonic) spends a portion of his spare time sniffing critically over steaming products of his culinary skill. Ernst Krenek confesses one of his greatest delights is consuming ice cream; Fritz Kreisler's favorite dish is corned beef and cabbage; Fabien Sevitzky is an inveterate carrot muncher; flutist William Kincaid (Philadelphia Orchestra) breakfasts, at least when he is vacationing at his Maine retreat, on stacks of wheatcakes, spitted steaks and broiled fresh trout; and pianist Andor Foldes and composer Kurt Weill would make good dinner companions, since the favorite dish of each is fried potatoes.

That's an idea! Why not have musicians form friendships, not on their work-a-day routine (which fosters rivalries and discord) but on the innocent diversions of their idle hours. I'd like to watch, for instance, a tennis match between four devotees of that game: Percy Grainger, Roy Harris, Robert Russell Bennett and Alfred Wallenstein. And how about a horse race between those ardent exponents of the saddle, composer Harl McDonald and New Orleans Symphony conductor Massimo Freccia?

—Hope Stoddard

Members of the Louisville Philharmonic Orchestra enjoy their favorite hobby, aviation. Left to right: Grace Whitney, cello; Delbert Hoon, trumpet; Dudley Howe, French horn, and Marvin Rabin, viola.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
OCT 2- 1949

Boston Symphony Reports Sellout

BOSTON. (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra reports that all seats for its concerts have been sold for the entire season—despite a change in conductors.

Charles Munch, succeeding Serge Koussevitzky as head of the group, will give four series of concerts in Boston besides appearances in Providence, R. I., Cambridge and in New York at Carnegie Hall and the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

HENDERSON, TEXAS
TEXAS NEWS
OCT 2 1949

WORLD of MUSIC

NEW YORK, Oct. 1. (UP)—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to Serge Koussevitzky, on Oct. 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on Oct. 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's tenth conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in midwinter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 1 - 1949

Bostonians Oversubscribed

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a week before the opening of its home season under Charles Munch's direction next Friday afternoon every available seat has been subscribed for the season in all its series, including those in Boston, Cambridge, New York, Brooklyn and Providence. Each [illegible], a waiting list for future [illegible].

[17]

"TEMPLE OF MUSIC"

That is what they used to call Symphony Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra moved there in 1900 from the Old Music Hall in Hamilton place. The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 69th season October 7 with a new conductor, Charles Munch, and a magnificent new organ. The drawing, right, shows statuary in niches on the front and side walls. The niches are still there, but the statuary has stood inside, above the second balcony, since the hall was opened.

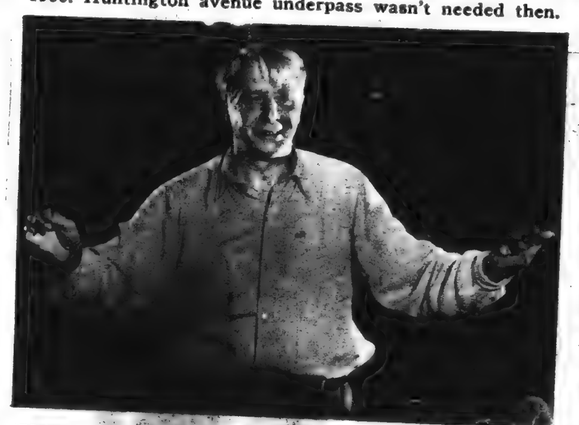
Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
OCT 1 - 1949

The New Recordings

COMPOSITION, PERFORMER, ALBUM NUMBER, NUMBER OF RECORDS	ENGINEERING Recording Technique, Surface	PERFORMANCE AND CONTENT
BRAHMS: SERENADE #1 IN D, OP. 11. Concert Hall Society Symphony Orch., Swoboda. Concert Hall C4 (Limited Edition)	A very beautiful small orchestra recording, with splendid width and depth of perspective. Solo instruments clearly etched, natural (it is semi-chamber music), the whole big sounding and alive. High apparent turnover (bass range bit weak).	(See below.) A recording long awaited, by this one listener at least. The playing of individual soloists is excellent, the ensemble good. Swoboda's Brahms is intense, on the verge of overtautness; some hurrying. But far better this than a stodgy performance! Limited to subscribers.
HAYDN: SYMPHONY #94 ("SURPRISE"). Berlin Philharmonic, Schmidt-Isserstedt. Capitol ECL 8021 (3) (Also on LP and 45 rpm)	Not unlike the above, a small group: clean solo lines but live enough to sound "symphonic." First violins seem a bit close to mike. Excellent highs.	A revelation in familiar Haydn in spite of merely average ensemble — a small orchestra minus usual overblown string section; interpretation minus cuteness or heavy romanticizing, an almost chamber style of playing, wholly authentic. Highly recommended.
*BACH: SUITES #1 IN C; #4 IN D. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Koussevitzky. RCA Victor DM, WDM 1307 (5)	Finest acoustics for the music I can remember — remarkable depth, extra-clear definition of groups of tone color, inner voices, a true "snarl" to the Bach oboes. Some unfortunate breaks between sides — in view of LP!	The recording is so wonderful, bringing out details galore usually missed altogether even in "live" hearings, that poor playing of dance mvts. is minimized. Overtures are much better—D major, a tremendous piece, is worth price of album.

* Reviewed from slow-speed version.

SYMPHONY HALL AT CENTURY'S TURN—Plug-hatted men and billowy-gowned women ride up in carriages to attend first concerts after the hall opened in 1900. Huntington avenue underpass wasn't needed then.



THE NEW BOSS—Charles Munch, French-born musician, who this year will succeed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, faces the Boston Symphony at rehearsal.

A MIGHTY INSTRUMENT—The organ in Old Boston Music Hall, as it appeared from 1863 to 1884. Photograph was presented to William King Covell by Prof. A. T. Davison in 1929.

Left: SOME MAY REMEMBER—The Hamilton place entrance of the Old Boston Music Hall as it appeared after Symphony rehearsals in the spring of 1892. But for those who do not, this drawing in The Sunday Herald of April 24, 1892, will help.

CORDELE, GA.
DISPATCH

New Boston Symphony Leader Is A Great Jazz Music Enthusiast

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 5—(UP)—A silver-haired Frenchman who likes Louis Armstrong's jazz formally took over today as conductor of one of America's top symphony orchestras.

Good-looking Charles Munch is replacing Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has retired after 25 years with the Boston symphony orchestra. On Friday afternoon the orchestra will present its first regular concert of the 1950 season.

There's litle doubt that Munch will add a glamorous touch to Boston musical circles. "He's tall, a good golfer, a neat dresser and he may in time become as popular in America as he has been in Europe.

His popularity rating on the continent was shown recently by a Parisian magazine which caters to women readers. The magazine polled its subscribers —asked them to name the man with whom they'd most like a dinner date.

Winston Churchill was first, but Charles Munch was second, and Charles Boyer was far down on the list.

Munch makes a striking impression, whether he's before an orchestra or outside the concert hall. He's in his middle fifties, athletically-proportioned and dresses so conservatively you might mistake him for a Boston business executive.

This season for the Boston symphony will be a unique one in two respects. A new conductor is mounting the podium for the first time in a quarter-century. And symphony hall will celebrate its 50th anniversary. In honor of that event, Charles Much will lead the orchestra in the same program which opened the concert hall one-half-century ago.

SHY AND ENERGETIC

Rather shy, and nervously energetic at rehearsals, Much has been running through the pieces with a passion for the past week or two. His rehearsals have been somewhat hampered by the fact that he speaks but little English.

But he's already popular with the Boston players who have picked up his French nickname, "Le Beau Charles," which means "Handsome Charley."

EAST LIVERPOOL, O.
REVIEW
OCT 3 - 1949

Boston Symphony Plays On Broadcast At 7:30

"Dress Rehearsal", featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch, will be broadcast at 7:30 over N. B. C.

The opening program of the new Railroad Hour series will present the operetta "Show Boat", starring Gordon Macrae, Dorothy Kirsten and Lucille Norman, at 8 over N. B. C.

Mezzo Soprano Gladys Swarthout will be guest soloist on the Telephone Hour at 9 over N. B. C.

Screen Star Ray Milland will be starred in his original role of a fantastic baseball pitcher in "It Happens Every Spring" at 9 over C. B. S. on Radio Theater.

Linda Darnell, Paul Douglas and Ann Southern will have the leads on "Screen Directors' Playhouse" at 10 over N. B. C.

A speech by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, at the organization's 1949 convention will be aired at 10:30 over M. B. S.

THE LINE FORMS ANYWHERE—But these crowds of concert-goers may be seen outside Symphony Hall any Friday afternoon during the season, waiting to buy unreserved seats.

BOSTON SUNDAY HERALD

[18]

BOSTON

Munch Announces Plans to Mark Symphony Hall's 50th Season

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boston

AT his first interview here as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch showed himself to be an affable, approachable person, without the slightest pretense of pose, and with a warm humanity that completely won over the roomful of critics and reporters. At first somewhat shy and nervous at the prospect of being questioned in a language which still has its difficulties for him, Mr. Munch soon warmed up to dispense with the interpreter and answer himself in a piquant Anglo-Gallic mixture that carries a punch and a point.

About his own activities, the conductor was most reticent, nor would he be drawn into any discussion of the relative merits of European and American orchestras, remarking only that it is always a matter of "l'esprit." He must possess plenty of that quality himself, for in a recent poll of 10,000 women readers, taken by the Parisian periodical Elle, he placed second only to Winston Churchill, the question being, "With what man would you most like to have lunch?" More to the point, however, is the poll the conductor won in Boston from a somewhat smaller group of voters than 10,000—the question being, "What man would you most like to see every Friday afternoon?"

Novelties for Symphony

Mr. Munch (pronounce it Moonch, at least, this is close enough) has some very definite plans for the year ahead. For the opening of the 69th season on Oct. 7, he will celebrate the 50th anniversary year of Symphony Hall with the same program with which Wilhelm Gericke opened the subscription series in 1900. The list includes Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto, to be played by E. Power Biggs on the new Aeolian-Skinner organ which was built and installed this summer to replace the original organ, now retired after fifty years honorable though infrequent service. Another work of anniversary significance is Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, to be played at a Pension Fund concert. It was with this that the hall was dedicated on Oct. 15, 1900, in a special concert. A third major choral work to be heard is Joan of Arc at the Stake, by Honegger, in its initial Boston performance.

Mr. Munch plans to present works by the Americans Barber, Copland, Piston, Wagenaar and others. A Poulenc Concerto is to be premiered here with the composer as soloist. Walton's Symphony will receive its first Boston hearing, as will several other works. In older music and revivals the orchestra will play Bach's Art of Fugue in the orchestral transcription by Ernest Munch, some Rameau, in Saint-Saens' translation, and other interesting, seldom-performed pieces.

Guest Conductor and Soloists

Only one guest conductor is announced, Leonard Bernstein, who will appear in all of the four Boston series. Associate Conductor Richard Burgin will also lead the orchestra for two weeks, leaving twenty weeks of work for Mr. Munch in the Hub, together with tours and series in other cities. In addition to the usual New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge series, the orchestra will appear in Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, East Lansing, Toledo, Newark, New Haven, Hartford, Washington, New Brunswick, Philadelphia, New London and White Plains.

The announced list of soloists include the pianists Byron Janis, Francis Poulenc, Robert Casadesus, Nicole Henriot; the duo-pianists Whittemore and Lowe; violinists Ginette Neveu, Isaac Stern, Zino Francescatti and Ossy Renardy; and the cellist Raya Garbousova. Other assisting artists will be announced later.

Mrs. Munch is the tenth conductor of the Boston Symphony and the third native of France to hold that position, the others having been Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux. Mr. Munch will have the mournful honor of memorializing his recently deceased compatriot, Rabaud, and will also commemorate Richard Strauss.

Announcement of a special concert to benefit Albert Schweitzer's work in Africa brings to light the interesting information that Mr. Munch is a brother-in-law of the celebrated doctor-musician-missionary, both being natives of Alsace.

There is only one new appointment to the orchestra personnel this season. Theodore Brewster, of Boston, joins the bassoon section. In the office, the appointment of Norman Shirk as assistant manager is announced. Mr. Shirk comes here from a similar position with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

ASSUMES HUB BATON . . . Charles Munch, in a candid unposed shot, as he looks to the orchestra while rehearsing. The conductor opens his first season as Boston Symphony Conductor on Oct. 7. (Photo by Geoffrey Landesman, Cleveland.)

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 2- 1949

. . H. Earle Johnson is completing a Boston Symphony book, "Symphony Hall—Boston," for Little Brown's 1950 spring list; a history, it will have an introduction by an earlier historian of the Boston orchestra Mark A. DeWolfe Howe . . . Those inescapable Howes! . . . And the Roosevelts, too. Eleanor R.—"Regina," if you like—has just, as you know, finished her second volume of memoirs, "This I Remember." It has been made the Book-of-the-Month Club choice for N[illegible]

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD
OCT 2 1949
Mrs. Kenneth W[illegible]

MUNCH TO REPEAT HISTORIC PROGRAM

Debut Oct. 7 for Boston's New Conductor

NEW YORK, Oct. 1 (U.P.)—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to [illegible] Koussevitsky, on Oct. 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony hall on Oct. 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's 10th conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in mid-Winter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
OCT 2- 1949

Symphony 'Rehearsal' Returns

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to WBZ-NBC for its second season of "Dress Rehearsal" programs tomorrow at 1 p. m.

Charles Munch is the new regular conductor of the famous orchestra. Munch was appointed to direct the Boston Symphony after the resignation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who inaugurated this broadcast series last year.

Munch takes over the orchestra coincident with the 50th anniversary of Symphony Hall in Boston, where the programs originate. His first concert will be a repeat of the first concert given in the hall. Music of Weber, Handel, Schubert and Beethoven is scheduled.

The program will be a half hour of a regular working rehearsal of the orchestra preparing its concerts of the week. Olin Downes, noted author, critic and commentator, again will interpolate explanations during the broadcast. Jack Wright will be the producer.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
OCT 2- 1949

When Charles Muench directs the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, he will become the 10th permanent conductor of the orchestra since its founding in 1881. Muench, incidentally, is the third native of France to wield the Boston Symphony's baton; the other two were Henri Rabaud (1918-19) and Pierre Monteux (1919-24).

E. J. Dias

Serge Koussevitsky, whose term of 25 years followed Monteux's five-year directorship of the orchestra, will share with Muench the 1950 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood next Summer and will continue as director of the Bershire Music Center.

Muench, who first came to this country in December 1946, when he made his initial guest appearance with the Boston Symphony, is a native of Strasbourg, Alsace, where he was born in 1891. Muench has made his reputation as a conductor, for the most part, in France, where he has led the Paris Symphony, the Lamoreaux Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra.

He founded the Paris Philharmonic, and in 1938 became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. Last Fall, Muench took the Orchestra Nationale de la Radiodiffusion Francaise on a goodwill tour of America.

During the 1949-50 Boston season, Muench will display his interest in American music, for his programs will include a new violin concerto by William Schuman, Walter Piston's "Second Suite," a new cantata by Lukas Foss and a symphony by Bernard Wagenaar. From the conductor's own country there will be Honegger's "Jeanne d'Arc at the Stake," a symphony by Jacques Rivier and a new piano concerto by Francis Poulenc. From England, there will be a performance of a symphony by William Walton.

In November, a special concert for organ with orchestra will be given for the benefit of Albert Schweitzer's Mission in North Africa. Dr. Schweitzer, who is a relative of Charles Muench by marriage, is a famous organist as well as a humanitarian, and, when he visited Boston during the Summer, inspected and autographed Symphony Hall's new organ.

Dr. Schweitzer

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STAR
OCT 1 1949

Broadcasting Of Rehearsals Back on NBC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air on NBC-WLW for its second season of "Dress Rehearsal" programs Monday, Oct. 3 at 1 p. m. Charles Munch is the new regular conductor of the famous orchestra.

Munch was appointed to direct the Boston Symphony after the resignation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who inaugurated this broadcast series last year.

Munch takes over the orchestra coincident with the fiftieth anniversary of Symphony Hall in Boston, where the programs originate. His first concert will be a repeat of the first concert given in the hall. Music of Weber, Handel, Schubert and Beethoven is scheduled.

Munch is the tenth conductor of the Boston Symphony, which was founded in 1881. As conductor of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire du Paris, he established a reputation throughout Europe. In several years of guest conducting in this country he won wide acclaim.

The program will be a half-hour of a regular working rehearsal of the orchestra preparing its concerts of the week. Olin Downes, noted author, critic and commentator, again will interpolate explanations during the broadcast. Jack Wright will be the producer.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
OCT 2- 1949

By KENNETH C. GILL

"I wish with all my heart and soul to maintain the high standard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." This is the sentiment expressed by Charles Munch as he accepted the reins of the world-famous orchestra. Tenth conductor and the third native of France to hold this post, Munch returns from his native Strasbourg and its colorful festival to enter the tremendous schedule anticipated by the Boston organization.

Charles Munch

With its concert tour including Buffalo on October 21st, under the sponsorship of Zorah Berry, it will be a critical audience that awaits the demonstration. And without presuming a bit, by reason of his continental reputation it should be more than satisfactory when Munch concludes, for his past performances have achieved world wide distinction.

He plans an unrelenting search for new works, an unfailing devotion to the great symphonic institutions of the past and overwhelming endeavor to extend the symphony's already far-reaching effects. For new works, Munch proposes suites by Rameau and Couperin, as orchestrated by Saint-Saens, as well as compositions by Honegger and Poulenc.

From the past, Munch has programmed favorites of the audiences of long ago as well as former conductors. As if in answer to the recent blast by Arnold Schoenberg against the orchestra, he will recognize the prophet of the 12-tone system on Schoenberg's birthday with the playing of Transfigured Night.

New American music will be represented in Walter Piston's new suite and a symphony by Bernard [illegible]naar.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
OCT 2-, 1949

The tour outside of New England of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under its new conductor, Charles Munch, in the third week of its 1949-50 season includes Syracuse (Tuesday, Oct. 18, Famous Artists), Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, East Lansing and Toledo.

Munch flew to New York city last week and was joined by his wife who arrived Sept. 23 on the Ile de France. They have taken up residence in Milton, Mass., in the house formerly occupied by the late Bishop William Lawrence.

BOSTON

Munch Announces Plans to Mark Symphony Hall's 50th Season

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boston

AT his first interview here as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch showed himself to be an affable, approachable person, without the slightest pretense of pose, and with a warm humanity that completely won over the roomful of critics and reporters. At first somewhat shy and nervous at the prospect of being questioned in a language which still has its difficulties for him, Mr. Munch soon warmed up to dispense with the interpreter and answer himself in a piquant Anglo-Gallic mixture that carries a punch and a point.

About his own activities, the conductor was most reticent, nor would he be drawn into any discussion of the relative merits of European and American orchestras, remarking only that it is always a matter of "l'esprit." He must possess plenty of that quality himself, for in a recent poll of 10,000 women readers, taken by the Parisian periodical Elle, he placed second only to Winston Churchill, the question being, "With what man would you most like to have lunch?" More to the point, however, is the poll the conductor won in Boston from a somewhat smaller group of voters than 10,000—the question being, "What man would you most like to see every Friday afternoon?"

Novelties for Symphony

Mr. Munch (pronounce it Moonch, at least, this is close enough) has some very definite plans for the year ahead. For the opening of the 69th season on Oct. 7, he will celebrate the 50th anniversary year of Symphony Hall with the same program with which Wilhelm Gericke opened the subscription series in 1900. The list includes Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto, to be played by E. Power Biggs on the new Aeolian-Skinner organ which was built and installed this summer to replace the original organ, now retired after fifty years honorable though infrequent service. Another work of anniversary significance is Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, to be played at a Pension Fund concert. It was with this that the hall was dedicated on Oct. 15, 1900, in a special concert. A third major choral work to be heard is Joan of Arc at the Stake, by Honegger, in its initial Boston performance.

Mr. Munch plans to present works by the Americans Barber, Copland, Piston, Wagenaar and others. A Poulenc Concerto is to be premiered here with the composer as soloist. Walton's Symphony will receive its first Boston hearing, as will several other works. In older music and revivals the orchestra will play Bach's Art of Fugue in the orchestral transcription by Ernest Munch, some Rameau, in Saint-Saens' translation, and other interesting, seldom-performed pieces.

Guest Conductor and Soloists

Only one guest conductor is announced, Leonard Bernstein, who will appear in all of the four Boston series. Associate Conductor Richard Burgin will also lead the orchestra for two weeks, leaving twenty weeks of work for Mr. Munch in the Hub, together with tours and series in other cities. In addition to the usual New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge series, the orchestra will appear in Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, East Lansing, Toledo, Newark, New Haven, Hartford, Washington, New Brunswick, Philadelphia, New London and White Plains.

The announced list of soloists include the pianists Byron Janis, Francis Poulenc, Robert Casadesus, Nicole Henriot; the duo-pianists Whittemore and Lowe; violinists Ginette Neveu, Isaac Stern, Zino Francescatti and Ossy Renardy; and the cellist Raya Garbousova. Other assisting artists will be announced later.

Mrs. Munch is the tenth conductor of the Boston Symphony and the third native of France to hold that position, the others having been Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux. Mr. Munch will have the mournful honor of memorializing his recently deceased compatriot, Rabaud, and will also commemorate Richard Strauss.

Announcement of a special concert to benefit Albert Schweitzer's work in Africa brings to light the interesting information that Mr. Munch is a brother-in-law of the celebrated doctor-musician-missionary, both being natives of Alsace.

There is only one new appointment to the orchestra personnel this season. Theodore Brewster, of Boston, joins the bassoon section. In the office, the appointment of Norman Shirk as assistant manager is announced. Mr. Shirk comes here from a similar position with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

ASSUMES HUB BATON . . . Charles Munch, in a candid unposed shot, as he looks to the orchestra while rehearsing. The conductor opens his first season as Boston Symphony Conductor on Oct. 7. (Photo by Geoffrey Landesman, Cleveland.)

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 2- 1949

. . . H. Earle Johnson is completing a Boston Symphony book, "Symphony Hall—Boston," for Little Brown's 1950 spring list; a history, it will have an introduction by an earlier historian of the Boston orchestra Mark A. DeWolfe Howe . . . Those inescapable Howes! . . . And the Roosevelts, too. Eleanor R.—"Regina," if you like—has just, as you know, finished her second volume of memoirs, "This I Remember." It has been made the Book-of-the-Month Club choice for N[illegible]

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
OCT 2- 1949

When Charles Muench directs the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, he will become the 10th permanent conductor of the orchestra since its founding in 1881. Muench, incidentally, is the third native of France to wield the Boston Symphony's baton; the other two were Henri Rabaud (1918-19) and Pierre Monteux (1919-24).

E. J. Dias

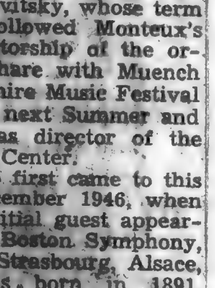
Serge Koussevitsky, whose term of 25 years followed Monteux's five-year directorship of the orchestra, will share with Muench the 1950 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood next Summer and will continue as director of the Bershire Music Center.

Muench, who first came to this country in December 1946, when he made his initial guest appearance with the Boston Symphony, is a native of Strasbourg, Alsace, where he was born in 1891. Muench has made his reputation as a conductor, for the most part, in France, where he has led the Paris Symphony, the Lamoreaux Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra.

He founded the Paris Philharmonic, and in 1938 became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. Last Fall, Muench took the Orchestra Nationale de la Radiodiffusion Francaise on a goodwill tour of America.

During the 1949-50 Boston season, Muench will display his interest in American music, for his programs will include a new violin concerto by William Schuman, Walter Piston's "Second Suite," a new cantata by Lukas Foss and a symphony by Bernard Wagenaar. From the conductor's own country, there will be Honegger's "Jeanne d'Arc at the Stake," a symphony by Jacques Rivier and a new piano concerto by Francis Poulenc. From England, there will be a performance of a symphony by William Walton.

In November, a special concert for organ with orchestra will be given for the benefit of Albert Schweitzer's Mission in North Africa. Dr. Schweitzer, who is a relative of Charles Muench by marriage, is a famous organist as well as a humanitarian, and, when he visited Boston during the Summer, inspected and autographed Symphony Hall's new organ.



Dr. Schweitzer

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD
OCT 2- 1949

Mrs. Kenneth V[illegible]

MUNCH TO REPEAT HISTORIC PROGRAM

Debut Oct. 7 for Boston's New Conductor

NEW YORK, Oct. 1 (U.P.)—Charles Munch will make his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to Serge Koussevitzky, on Oct. 7 with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony hall on Oct. 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It is the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's 10th conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in mid-winter he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
OCT 2- 1949

Symphony 'Rehearsal' Returns

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to WTIC-NBC for its second season of "Dress Rehearsal" programs tomorrow at 1 p. m.

Charles Munch is the new regular conductor of the famous orchestra. Munch was appointed to direct the Boston Symphony after the resignation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who inaugurated this broadcast series last year.

Munch takes over the orchestra coincident with the 50th anniversary of Symphony Hall in Boston, where the programs originate. His first concert will be a repeat of the first concert given in the hall. Music of Weber, Handel, Schubert and Beethoven is scheduled.

The program will be a half hour of [illegible] working rehearsal [illegible] as prepared by its c[illegible] the week. Olin Downes, noted author, critic and commentator, again will interpolate explanations during the broadcast. Jack Wright will be the producer.

Broadcasting Of Rehearsals Back on NBC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air on NBC-WLW for its second season of "Dress Rehearsal" programs Monday, Oct. 3 at 1 p. m. Charles Munch is the new regular conductor of the famous orchestra.

Munch was appointed to direct the Boston Symphony after the resignation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who inaugurated this broadcast series last year.

Munch takes over the orchestra coincident with the fiftieth anniversary of Symphony Hall in Boston, where the programs originate. His first concert will be a repeat of the first concert given in the hall. Music of Weber, Handel, Schubert and Beethoven is scheduled.

Munch is the tenth conductor of the Boston Symphony, which was founded in 1881. As conductor of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire du Paris, he established a reputation throughout Europe. In several years of guest conducting in this country he won wide acclaim.

The program will be a half-hour of a regular working rehearsal of the orchestra preparing its concerts of the week. Olin Downes, noted author, critic and commentator, again will interpolate explanations during the broadcast. Jack Wright will be the producer.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
OCT 2- 1949

By KENNETH C. GILL

"I wish with all my heart and soul to maintain the high standard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." This is the sentiment expressed by Charles Munch as he accepted the reins of the world-famous orchestra. Tenth conductor and the third native of France to hold this post, Munch returns from his native Strasbourg and its colorful festival to enter the tremendous schedule anticipated by the Boston organization.

Charles Munch

With its concert tour including Buffalo on October 21st, under the sponsorship of Zorah Berry, it will be a critical audience that awaits the demonstration. And without presuming a bit, by reason of his continental reputation it should be more than satisfactory when Munch concludes, for his past performances have achieved world wide distinction.

He plans an unrelenting search for new works, an unfailing devotion to the great symphonic institutions of the past and overwhelming endeavor to extend the symphony's already far-reaching effects. For new works, Munch proposes suites by Rameau and Couperin, as orchestrated by Saint-Saens, as well as compositions by Honegger and Poulenc.

From the past, Munch has programmed favorites of the audiences of long ago as well as former conductors. As if in answer to the recent blast by Arnold Schoenberg against the orchestra, he will recognize the prophet of the 12-tone system on Schoenberg's birthday with the playing of Transfigured Night.

New American music will be represented in Walter Piston's new suite and a symphony by Bernard Wagenaar.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
OCT 2- 1949

The tour outside of New England of the Boston Symphony orchestra under its new conductor, Charles Munch, in the third week of its 1949-50 season includes Syracuse (Tuesday, Oct. 18, Famous Artists), Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, East Lansing and Toledo.

Munch flew to New York city last week and was joined by his wife who arrived Sept. 23 on the Ile de France. They have taken up residence in Milton, Mass., in the house formerly occupied by the late Bishop William Lawrence.

ELKHART, IND.
TRUTH
OCT 6 - 1949

Conductor, Popular Abroad, Takes Over Boston Symphony

BY THE UNITED PRESS

A silver-haired Frenchman who likes Louis Armstrong's jazz formally takes over this week as conductor of one of America's top symphony orchestras.

Good-looking Charles Munch is replacing Dr. Serge Koussevitzky who has retired after 25 years with the Boston Symphony orchestra. On Friday afternoon the orchestra presents its first regular concert of the 1949-50 season.

There's little doubt that Munch will add a glamorous touch to Boston musical circles. He's tall, a good golfer, a neat dresser, and he may in time become as popular in America as he is in Europe.

Second To Churchill

His popularity rating on the continent was shown recently by a Parisian magazine which caters to women readers. The magazine polled its subscribers — asked them to name the man with whom they'd most like a dinner date.

Winston Churchill was first but Charles Munch was second. Charles Boyer was far down on the list.

Munch makes a striking impression — whether he's before an orchestra or outside the concert hall. He's in his middle fifties, athletically-proportioned and dresses so conservatively you might mistake him for a Boston business executive.

He was born in Strasbourg in the province of Alsace. That area has been alternately French and German, and this double environment shows up in the conductor's musical background.

Gave Up Organ

Munch started out as an organist, but he gave that up when he was in his teens. He was asked to fill in one Sunday at the organ of St. William's church in Strasbourg, where his father was choirmaster. The young musician got mixed up, forgot to repeat a portion of a hymn and confused the congregation. So young Munch soon turned to the violin and, under his father's direction, studied harmony.

In 1919, after an exhaustive musical education, Munch became a professor at the Paris Conservatory. He frequently appeared with French orchestras as a violin soloist and then went on to study in Germany. In 1932 he returned to France to become a conductor.

Munch came to the United States in the fall of 1946 and led the Boston Symphony in a pair of concerts. His success was immediate. One critic wrote of it as a "remarkable and rewarding occasion."

Memorizes Score

Munch prefers to conduct an orchestra without a score in front of him. That's a feat which requires a phenomenal memory. In directing, Munch is surprisingly agile; he sways in time with the music, and he interprets all music with youthful fervor and a truly remarkable sense of exact rhythm.

He thoroughly enjoys jazz — particularly the American varieties. He's an ardent fan of Louis Armstrong — says he greatly admires the trumpeter's ability.

In fact, Munch is a champion of new music, and the talented young musicians of the new generation often have had their works played by Munch-conducted orchestras.

This season for the Boston Symphony will be unusual in two respects: A new conductor is mounting the podium for the first time in a quarter-century and Symphony Hall will celebrate its 50th anniversary. In honor of that event, Charles Munch will lead the orchestra in the same program which opened the concert hall half a century ago.

TURN OUT FOR FIRST SYMPHONY

Many Arrive Early—Society Folks in Audience

BY ROSE WALSH

A full hour before the 2:30 opening, concert-goers began arriving yesterday afternoon for the beginning of the 69th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the new conductor, Charles Munch.

EARLY ARRIVALS

Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, attired in a navy suit with smart burgundy hat, was an early arrival, accompanied by her attractive young granddaughter, Frances Hiam, a student at Winsor who was making her first appearance at Symphony. Mrs. John W. Myers, just back from a restful summer at Kennebunkport, Me., met her sister, Mrs. Paul R. Reed, in the lobby.

Mrs. Charles G. Minter, Jr., a gay pink hat topping her becoming plum suit, arrived with friends, and Mrs. George A. Parsons, in a slim gray tailleur with emerald green hat, and Mrs. Joseph W. Lund, a mink scarf thrown over her dark green suit, hustled in together.

Others There

Accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. John S. King, Mrs. Frederick Ayer, Jr., came from South Hamilton. Another north shore socialite, Mrs. S. Tudor Leland of Beverly Farms joined her mother, Mrs. Allan Forbes.

Others glimpsed were Mrs. Charles M. Spofford with Mrs. Thomas Shepard; Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, a fur cape over her beige crepe gown; Mrs. Malcolm Bradley French, Mrs. Mason Whiting, Mrs. Morris F. LaCroix, her ribbon-trimmed velour hat a perfect match for her gray tweed suit; Mrs. George Hawley, Eben Draper, Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Mrs. John O'Day, Mrs. Frank M. Sawtelle, Mrs. Charles Hovey, Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray, Miss Dorothy Lee-Jones, her bright orange hat a striking contrast for her French blue suit; Mrs. William Stanley Parker, Arthur Fiedler, Mrs. Charles Summer Bird, Mrs. William McBain and Miss Amy Sacker.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
OCT 9 - 1949

Boston Symphony Under New Conductor Due Here Oct. 18

E. R. Vandeboncoeur and Murray Bernthal, promoters of Famous Artists Series, are congratulating themselves that they seized the opportunity to book the distinguished Boston Symphony orchestra for Syracuse first appearance Tuesday, Oct. 18, with its new conductor, Charles Munch.

Charles Munch

Particularly so, since the raves by critics about the Boston opening Friday night and the enthusiastic crowds still clamoring for seats in an already soldout subscription season in New England and New York.

Conductor Munch is a native of Strasbourg, Alsace, born in 1891. He has a fine, sensitive face, with blue grey eyes and well-shaped nose, broad shouldered and a little under six feet tall. His name Munch comes from the German word "monch," which means monk.

Victor Seroff says "Munch, unlike some other great directors, answers his own telephone, writes his own letters, buys his own tickets, and manages to dress himself and get to his concerts alone.

"Success has not turned Munch's head. He still goes back stage to congratulate other conductors on their performances and still pleads with his men—"Help me," when he feels they are not giving him their best.

"It is indisputable that Munch posses a superb technique and that power to communicate his ideas to both orchestra and audience."

Local music lovers will hear the Weber Overture to "Euryanthe," by von Weber; the Beethoven "Symphony No. 5," "Suite No. 2," by Piston and Suites 1 and 2 of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." The concerts begins at 8.15 p. m. Tuesday, Oct. 18 in Lincoln auditorium.

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra began simultaneously its 69th season, its 50th in Symphony Hall and its first under the direction of Charles Munch.

To add to the eventfulness of an already eventful occasion, the newly rebuilt organ was dedicated, the concert began with a tribute to the late Henri Rabaud, conductor in the season of 1918-19, and the program-proper was a replica of that which Wilhelm Gericke offered at the first pair of concerts in the new auditorium.

The tribute to the distinguished M. Rabaud was both fitting and inevitable. It consisted of a perrormance, and a beautifully articulated one, of his best-known composition, the affecting "La Procession Nocturne," after Lenau's "Faust."

Under the circumstances, applause was not in order; but though Mr. Munch raised a restraining hand, many did not take the hint. Yet aside from its inappropriateness, applause was never more justified. The piece is one of the glories of its particular school and the playing of it suggested that tonally the Boston Symphony was still its familiar self.

However, that particular impression did not prevail throughout the afternoon. Mr. Munch, as we already knew, is a fine conductor, and we may reasonably expect that by the time his first year with this great orchestra is done he will be an even finer one. But he is not Koussevitzky. He does not cultivate a voluptuous and luxurious tone. Nor does he put himself between the composer and the audience.

We listeners heard yesterday Rabaud, Weber, Handel, Schubert and Beethoven, rather than a highly individualized interpretation of their respective pieces. After the Rabaud these were, by the way, the Overture to "Euryanthe," the Organ Concerto in D minor, with E. Power Biggs as soloist, the Ballet and Entr'acte from "Rosamunde" and the Fifth Symphony.

As a reminder of the significant concerts of Oct. 19 and 20, 1900, a reproduction of the first leaf of that program book was inserted in the current one, and the program notes were the original ones by William Foster Apthorp.

The organist then was Wallace Goodrich, present in yesterday's audience, and summoned to his feet by a gracious gesture on the part of Mr. Biggs when the Handel Concerto was done.

So far as could be judged, the rebuilt organ fulfills the high expectations that have been raised regarding it. Especially noteworthy is the clarity of the tone. Mr. Biggs is of course an outstanding performer, and the Concerto, long unheard, was good to hear. So were Weber's Overture, to which Mr. Munch lent due theatrical effectiveness, and the delightful music of Schubert.

This was an old-fashioned program, a Teutonic program. And it fell pleasantly on the ear. The reading of the Fifth Symphony was straightforward, and by that token, welcome. It was the Fifth Symphony, not of Charles Munch but of Beethoven. It may be added that at the first rehearsal the new conductor completely won the hearts and minds of the men. At the first concert he won the audience. We are all set for an exciting and satisfying season.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 9 - 1949

HISTORIC: Any person seeking a little weird fascination might try going to a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Friday or Saturday and then coming down to New York on Sunday evening to hear a dress rehearsal of the same performance. Such a thing is made possible by the magic of radio.

On Mondays at 1 P. M. the NBC network broadcasts a program entitled "Dress Rehearsal" in which the Boston Symphony is heard going over compositions it will play, as a rule, in concert later the same week. The program, however, is not heard locally on WNBC until the following Sunday night at 11:30 o'clock, when it is repeated by transcription. Thus, in many cases the symphony rehearsal is heard after the actual concert has been conducted.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
OCT 6 - 1949

Munch Takes Over Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, Oct. 8.—(U.P.)—Charles Munch made his bow as permanent conductor of the venerable Boston Symphony, in succession to Serge Koussevitzky, last night with the same program with which the orchestra inaugurated Boston's Symphony Hall on October 19, 1900.

Attesting to the timelessness of great music, the 49-year-old program could have been as easily conceived today. It was the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto No. 4, the ballet music and entr' acte of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. E. Power Biggs will be the Handel soloist.

Outstanding during Munch's first season as the orchestra's tenth conductor, will be a performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. John," with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting the orchestra, scheduled for the Friday and Saturday of the 1950 Holy Week. Sometime in mid-winter, he'll conduct a performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," making use of a newly organized chorus.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 8 - 1949

Muench Opens Boston Season

BOSTON, Oct. 7 (AP).—Charles Muench, successor to Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today directed the orchestra at the opening of the 1949-'50 season with the same program as in 1900 to mark the fiftieth anniversary of Symphony Hall. It was the French musician's first concert as conductor of the orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 5 - 1949

PHILHARMONIC LISTS PROKOFIEFF'S SIXTH

Two major works will be introduced to this country by the Philharmonic-Symphony under the baton of Leopold Stokowski, it was announced yesterday. They are Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony and Messaien's "Trois petites Liturgies de la Presence Divine."

The Prokofieff work had its première in Leningrad two years ago, and there was some doubt whether it would have its first American hearing from the Boston Symphony, under Charles Munch, or from the New York organization. It will be played on Nov. 24, 25, 26 and Dec. 4.

The "Three Little Liturgies" will be heard Nov. 17 and 18. It was composed for string orchestra, women's voices, percussion and an onde martenot, an electronic instrument that will be played by Ginette Martenot, daughter of the inventor. The words were written by the composer.

Other contemporary music during the first eight weeks will be Carl Ruggles' "Organum," John Alden Carpenter's "Carmel" Concerto, Louis Aubert's "Offrande," Riegger's Canon and Fugue and Revuelta's "Sensemaya."

Jacques Abram will play the first New York performance of Britten's Piano Concerto Nov. 24-27, and Wanda Landowska will be soloist in the Concerto Campêtre for Harpsichord and Orchestra on Nov. 17, 18 and 20. Other soloists during the first eight weeks will be William Kapell and Isaac Stern.

[20]

Symphony's New Conductor Cheered at First Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch began a new chapter in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon when he gave his first concert as regular conductor. Greeted by a rising audience when he first appeared on the stage and applauded and cheered at the end of the program, the French musician enjoyed a distinct and resounding success.

The occasion was actually of triple significance: Munch's assumption of the post in which he has succeeded Serge Koussevitzky; the 50th anniversary of Symphony Hall as the home of the orchestra, and the dedication of the new organ built to coincide with the 200th anniversary year of the death of that king among organ composers, Johann Sebastian Bach.

Munch was accompanied to the stage, at the beginning, by Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, who said:

"I am strongly opposed to speaking at Symphony concerts. However, today is exceptional. We are welcoming our very distinguished new conductor and it is the 50th season of Symphony Hall. Mr. Munch—I must tell you of our delight that our orchestra is in your strong and capable hands.

"Relatively speaking, we are a young country and yet we have traditions and institutions which we cherish. Your program for today shows that you recognize this. We are grateful. And now let's listen to the music. I hope it is 25 years before another speaker interferes with a concert."

Same as 1900 Program

This program was the same one that Wilhelm Gericke had conducted at the first subscription concerts by the orchestra in Symphony Hall, Oct. 19 and 20, 1900. It consisted of Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto, from Op. 7, this time with E. Power Biggs as soloist; two excerpts, a ballet movement and an entr'acte, from Schubert's "Rosamunde" music, and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

Included in the program books was a reproduction of the title page of the program in 1900. John N. Burk had substituted for his own explanatory notes the ones by William Foster Apthorp, who was annotator in 1900.

But the first music to be heard had not figured on that 1900 program (though it had been composed a year before). This was the symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," inspired by Lenau's "Faust," by Henri Rabaud, who for the season of 1918-19 was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in succession to Dr. Karl Muck. Rabaud died in Paris of pneumonia last Sept. 12, and Munch appropriately decided to honor his memory. "La Procession Nocturne," a beautifully scored work with echoes of Wagner was not entirely unknown to yesterday's audience, for Koussevitzky had revived it several times, as recently as February, 1944. Knowing well the eagerness of audiences to applaud, Munch raised his hands for silence when the piece was finished, but applause broke out as he left the stage.

New Organ Excellent

The new organ is excellent, indeed, judging from what you heard of it yesterday in Handel's spirited little D minor Concerto. Those combinations which Biggs used have a brilliance of their own and they blended well with the orchestra. Now, thanks be, the organ is tuned to the pitch of 444 vibrations a second, which the Boston Symphony uses. The old one used to sag badly.

In receiving the approval of the audience following his performance Biggs graciously gestured to one in the audience to bow likewise. That man was Wallace Goodrich, now director emeritus of the New England Conservatory, who had been organ soloist in the same work 50 years ago. Incidentally, for the third movement intended to be improvised by the organist Biggs used a slow movement from a Handel flute sonata, edited by Seiffert.

Though he had announced that he would not alter the seating arrangement of the orchestra as left by Koussevitzky, Munch had already done some experimental transposition. He has shifted the double basses to the other side of the stage and massed them in the rear corner. The brass were put together in the back at the center of the stage; the harp moved to stage right, at front, and the percussion at stage right, rear.

This meant that the three lower divisions of the string quintet—violas, cellos and double basses—are now all together, a grouping usually regarded as the most practical by most conductors. It also meant a slightly different balance of tone, according to where you sit in the auditorium, but nothing of a radical nature.

Since he had twice been guest conductor of this orchestra, and later appeared here with the French Orchestra National, Munch's conducting style and his temperament were known to some degree. His work yesterday reinforced one's previous impression: care for clarity and shadings, a sense of melody which was absolutely delightful and relaxed in the Schubert excerpts; a warmth that was kindled by such romantic music as the Weber Overture and such dynamic music as the Beethoven Fifth.

Precise Projection

Yesterday his projection of different musical styles was precise and accurate, and also distinctive. He will require some time for the orchestra to accustom themselves to his short initial beat, for Koussevitzky favored a long one, and the habits of 25 years are hard to change. Munch probably will temper his demands from the kettledrums, as he gets used to Symphony Hall. Yesterday they were pretty loud in spots.

He did not exaggerate, although some of the loud tuttis had a rough edge, and he whipped up a pace, toward the end of the Beethoven, that almost taxed the agility of the wind instruments. All these matters are subject to readjustment as conductor and orchestra get used to each other. For the present, let it be said again that he is a leader of authority, perception and skill, and that the men like to work for him. The tone yesterday was as rich and brilliant as ever, perhaps with just a bit of that light brass quality favored by the French. The honeymoon has begun happily!

When the concert was over Munch was rewarded with loud handclapping and cheers, which had broken in before the last chord was finished. Upstairs in the green room—which now is really green, due to to new paint!—he received well-wishers who crowded in to see him.

Mrs. Munch, a pleasant looking woman, dressed quietly but distinctively in black—as French women often do—heard the concert from a seat in the lower part of the hall.

From Koussevitzky, now guest conducting in Rio de Janeiro came congratulatory cables addressed to Munch, to Cabot, and to George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra.

CHARLES MUNCH makes first appearance as regular conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra. New leader, left, smiles as he receives applause of audience. At right, Henry B. Cabot, president of trustees; center, Joseph De Pasquale, first viola.

Today IN SOCIETY

AS SYMPHONY opened its 69th season yesterday with new conductor Charles Munch, Bostonians also observed the 50th anniversary of the opening of Symphony Hall. Isabella Grandin is an early arrival.

Friday Symphony Audience Welcomes Conductor Munch

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

For the first time in 25 years, Boston's famous Symphony Orchestra and its equally famous Friday afternoon audience rose to their feet to honor a new conductor, as France's distinguished Charles Munch succeded Boston's beloved Serge Koussevitzky.

The great audience, augmented by standees yesterday, included all the familiar Symphony faces raised in genuine welcome to the new, square-shouldered figure on the platform. The Roger Wolcotts were there, and the George Lewises. Mr. and Mrs. Francis P. Sears stopped to read the cable from Dr. Koussevitzky sent today from Rio de Janeiro where he is conducting a concert—Mrs. Sears with wine and pink carnations to set off her suave little grey suit—the Eben Drapers greeted on all sides by their friends, Hazel Draper slim and smart in her soft brown suit—Maxim Karolik joining beautiful Mrs. Allan Forbes and her tall lovely daughter, Mrs. Tudor Leland—Mrs. Forbes' wide bittersweet hat, one of the day's smartest—Mrs. Hugh Bancroft and her daughter Jane (Mrs. Edwin Steele)—Arthur Fiedler and Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller—Mrs. J. Amory Sullivan down from the shore for the concert—Mrs. Lewis Bremer, a mink cape over her suit—Mrs. Charles Easton Smith—Henry Cabot, president of the trustees, speaking briefly on the occasion—Mrs. Joseph Lund and Mrs. George Parson, both in nice Symphony suits—Isabella Grandin—Mrs. Edwin J. Cohn in a grey suit and furs—Reinette Plimpton Pier in a deft chocolate and beige suit and furs—Mrs. Charles F. Woodard in Fall browns—Mrs. Everett Morss—Mrs. Alfred McIntyre—Mrs. Donald Watson—Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray—and hundreds more all observing a quiet but historic moment in the record of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 8 - 1940

MUNCH ON PODIUM AT BOSTON OPENING

New Conductor Offers Same Program Presented 50 Years Ago at Symphony Hall

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Oct. 7—Charles Munch began today his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by presenting the same program offered by Wilhelm Gericke at the opening subscription concert in Symphony Hall fifty years ago. It was greeted enthusiastically.

The Alsatian-born musician succeeds Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor for twenty-five years, who cabled his "best wishes" from Rio de Janeiro, where he was making a new debut as guest artist with the Brazilian Symphony Orchestra today.

The Boston Orchestra, now in its sixty-ninth season, officially moved into Symphony Hall, which had been built especially for it, on Oct. 19, 1900. Its first nineteen seasons had been spent in the old Boston Music Hall.

As on the opening occasion half a century ago, the orchestra today had a new organ to supplement its instrumental music. On the new Aeolian-Skinner instrument, E. Power Biggs, as soloist, played Handel's organ concerto No. 4.

As Mr. Biggs acknowledged the generous applause for his rendition, he waved his hand toward the place in the hall where J. Wallace Goodrich, organist fifty years ago, was seated. Mr. Goodrich, now 78 years old, is director-emeritus of the New England Conservatory of Music.

In today's audience also was Daniel Kuntz, 80 years old, a violinist with the symphony orchestra in 1900.

The fiftieth anniversary year of Symphony Hall was begun with a minimum of fanfare. After Mr. Munch had been greeted by an ovation that lasted several moments, Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra trustees, spoke briefly.

Asserting that he had always opposed speaking at a symphony concert, Mr. Cabot said, "we today, however, welcome our very distinguished new conductor.

"I must tell you of our delight, Mr. Munch, in having you with us." He continued, "Ours is a relatively new country, but we have our traditions and institutions which we cherish. Your program shows that you recognize this. We appreciate it. Now, let us listen to the music. I hope it is twenty-five years before another speaker interrupts a symphony concert."

Mr. Munch merely bowed his thanks. Before entering into the regular program, he conducted the orchestra through the "Processional Nocturne," in memory of its composer, Henri Rabaud, who was the Boston conductor in 1918-19, and who died recently.

In today's program was a single page insert, complete to the old type face, of the 1900 presentation. It included Weber's overture to "Euryanthe"; excerpts from Schubert's "Rosamunde"; the organ concerto and Beethoven's Fifth symphony.

Munch Acclaimed at First Concert With Symphony

Repeats Gericke's Program of 1900

By L. A. Sloper

Charles Munch, successor to Serge Koussevitzky, made his first appearance as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening concert of the orchestra's sixty-ninth season. The concert was given in Symphony Hall on Oct. 7, celebrating the beginning of the fiftieth year within those walls.

Mr. Munch was warmly received by a standing orchestra and audience. Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, welcomed him officially in a brief speech.

* * *

In choosing his music, Mr. Munch made two appropriate gestures. He played Henri Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" in memory of his countryman who was conductor of the orchestra in 1918-19. And he repeated the exact program performed under Wilhelm Gericke at the opening of Symphony Hall in 1900.

This consisted of Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Handel's Concerto for Organ in D minor, No. 4; Schubert's Ballet Movement and Entr'acte from "Rosamunde," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The organist on this occasion was E. Power Biggs. The soloist at the earlier concert was Wallace Goodrich, distinguished organist, conductor, and former director of the New England Conservatory of Music. Mr. Biggs shared the applause with Mr. Goodrich, who acknowledged the tribute from his place in the audience. Mr. Munch all this time remained modestly out of sight.

This program, made up of excellent examples of the work of four composers whose place in the annals of music is secure, was welcome for reasons of sentiment, and it was courteous of our new conductor to efface himself by offering a list of works which he probably would not have chosen if he had been thinking of the impression he was to make.

But the program, which was more suitable to 1900 than to 1949, did not give us a very good idea of the capacities of our new director. It is true that he was not entirely unknown to us. He was a guest conductor of this orchestra in 1946, and he led his own French orchestra here last season. We should have been glad to hear a more exciting and more revealing first program. But there will be plenty of time for that, and in any event no conductor can be judged on the evidence of one concert, or two, or three.

In general, Mr. Munch made an excellent impression for his control of the orchestra and for his musicianship. His Weber was lively, his Handel classically cool, his Schubert charming. Beethoven's Fifth had its full measure of German dramatic force, with vanishing pianissimos and vociferous pronouncements from the brass.

* * *

The emphasis on the brass may have been a result of Mr. Munch's rearrangement of the orchestra. He has moved the doublebasses over to his right, behind the cellos and violas, thus bringing the lower strings all together. The percussion has replaced the doublebasses on the conductor's left, and the brass has been tightly assembled in the exact center rear. How this arrangement works out will become apparent as time goes on.

The new Symphony Hall organ had its first public tryout on this occasion. The first impression was that it was in tune with the orchestra, but much too loud for the strings. The complaint about the old one was that it was not in tune and was too muffled. Perhaps the tone may be modified without sacrificing the pitch.

Mr. Munch has reason to be pleased with his reception. He was cheered repeatedly at the conclusion of the symphony.

Byron Janis, who will make his debut with the Boston Symphony as soloist in Rachmaninov's Second Piano Concerto Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 14 and 15.

CHARLES MUNCH HAILED IN SYMPHONY DEBUT

By RUDOLPH ELIE

In an atmosphere charged with anticipation and well wishes from orchestra and audience alike, Charles Munch, Alsatian conductor who succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday made his debut before the Friday afternoon audience in Symphony Hall and achieved a personal and a musical success that bore ample witness to the perfection of his choice.

Few musicians have ever been thrust into a more difficult situation, for following so prodigious a figure as Koussevitzky, for 25 years a nearly legendary character in the city, could be disastrous for a man of lesser stature. But Mr. Munch rose to the occasion; it was clear from the very outset that his musical authority, his sense of being exactly where he belonged and of doing exactly as he should, was absolute.

Escorted to Stage

The six-foot tall conductor, a man of the most sensitive and impeccable appearance, was escorted to the stage by Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees. He stood behind the conductor's stand, his hands clasped in repose before him, his gaze unassumingly averted to the floor, as Mr. Cabot told him (and us) of "our delight that our orchestra is in your strong and capable hands." The conductor bowed to the audience, smiled, and in a moment the lights were down.

From the first phrase of Henri Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," played at this concert in memoriam to the composer who served for one year as conductor of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Munch's singularly artistic approach was disclosed. This brief work is in itself of the sheerest beauty, its textures soft and delicate though never effeminate, never over-refined, and a perfect vehicle for the unique qualities of the orchestra of the Koussevitzky era. Thus it proved particularly grateful to hear it done with every nuance of tone coloring, every sensitivity of blend that has long since made this orchestra preeminent, yet there was even more, and this was Mr. Munch's triumph. For beyond the tonal qualities there was form, proportion and balance; a complete absence of mannerism or eccentricity, a perfection of phrase without undue emphasis on the moulding of phrase.

PROGRAM DUPLICATED

All this, and more, was evident throughout the program, which duplicated (save for the Rabaud) that given on the occasion of the first concert given in Symphony hall on October 19, 1900. So it was that Mr. Munch gave us Weber's Overture to "Euryantho," Handel's Organ Concerto in D minor, Schubert's Ballet and Entr'acte from "Rosamunde" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Such programming is now most quaint; 50 years ago it was quite the thing. And it certainly served to present the new conductor in many roles. In the Weber he uses dramatic, with sudden violences contrasted with tendernesses; in the Handel he was nobly reposed but always forward moving; in the Schubert he was all warmth and glow; in the Beethoven he was everything—and this Beethoven requires everything.

And over all was a certain aura of joy in music-making. This quality seemed to radiate from the orchestra as well as the conductor, and the men never succeeded more happily in fulfilling Mr. Munch's every signal. They played, indeed, with the integration and the one-ness of a string quartet.

The solo in the Handel organ concerto was performed brilliantly by E. Power Biggs on the new organ, incidentally, and though this work hardly discloses the character of the instrument, it is obviously a very great organ. In selecting his registration Mr. Biggs displayed its baroque qualities of clarity, of brilliance and dash. Yet the briefest glance at its specifications listed in the program reveals it to have the fullest (and best) tonal resources of the great romantic organs; I feel certain that we now have in Symphony Hall one of the finest blends of the classical and the romantic organ in the nation; a truly magnificent instrument—and one, it may be added, that is at last in tune with the orchestra.

Though there is still much to be said—of the change in the seating plan of the orchestra with the basses now reinforcing the cellos, of the look of the new conductor as he leads the orchestra, of how he uses the score in some things and doesn't in others, of the charm of his appearance on the stage—even of the way he comes on the stage—there is still much time to say it. For Mr. Munch, in his first concert as the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, gave us only a glimpse of the years ahead—and in that glimpse count our blessings that fate has provided the right man for the right job at the right time.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 8-1949

Charles Munch Gets Cordial Reception As He Takes Over the Boston Orchestra

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

BOSTON — Charles Munch was installed as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, with brief but memorable ceremonies. Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, accompanied the new conductor to the front of the stage at his first entrance and addressed a short single paragraph of welcome to him, ending with the statement that "I hope it is 25 years before another speaker interferes with a concert."

Munch assumes the post which Serge Koussevitzky had filled for the past quarter century and which has been held by a succession of the most distinguished conductors in musical history. Koussevitzky sent the orchestra a message of congratulation from Rio de Janeiro where he was making his South American debut on the very day of the Boston orchestra's first concert of the season.

The orchestra and the immense audience rose to give Munch a cordial reception, and at the completion of the program, the men of the orchestra joined in the applause with a noticeably genuine spirit. It was an historic occasion. It was the 50th anniversary of the inauguration of Symphony Hall. The orchestra had been organized 20 years previously but on Oct. 19, 1900, it moved into its own great new building. Mr. Munch repeated the exact program which Wilhelm Gericke had played on that day. Yesterday was also the inauguration of a new organ built during the past summer; E. Powers Biggs was the soloist in the Handel D minor organ concerto, Opus 7, No. 4, which on the 1900 program had been played by J. Wallace Goodrich. The designer of the organ, G. Donald Harrison, head of the Aeolian-Skinner Company, was in the audience, and was singled out by Mr. Biggs at the conclusion of the concerto to take a bow.

Tribute to Rabaud

The sole variation from the original program was the addition, at the start, of "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henri Rabaud, who had been the orchestra's conductor in the year following World War I, 1918-1919, and who passed away a month ago, on Sept. 11, at the age of 76. Mr. Munch indicated that he wished no applause for this gesture played in memorian of a departed colleague.

The program consisted of the Weber "Euryanthe" overture, the Handel concerto, Schubert's Ballet and Entr'acte from "Rosemunde" and the Beethoven fifth symphony, a mild and necessarily dated program today, in spite of the inclusion of some of the most solid of the orchestra's repertory.

Mr. Munch, a tall, slender man apperently in his early 50's, has an unequivocally definite beat. His gestures are moderate and subdued although when he asks for a vehement accent he could no doubt make the bell ring on county-fair devices. Otherwise, he knows that he is dealing with a band of the most able and experienced men in orchestradom and relies confidently on their execution of the smaller details of the score and of the points developed in rehearsal without recalling their attention to them in the public performance.

His actual conducting, however, seems to be the only calculated part of his appearance. He certainly acts no part in getting to and off the podium. Nor does he consider it below his dignity to do a little furniture moving if his desk is not in a favorable spot. And the orchestra has no breathing spell once he is in front of them. He doesn't quite bring them in simultaneously with his arrival on the podium as Stokowski was wont to do, but the men had better have their bows and embouchures in place when he shows around the corner from the entrance door, for there will be no moment of grace to adjust one's self. The disposition of the orchestra has been changed in one detail. The contrabasses now stand to the rear of the violas and 'celli at the conductor's right.

Mr. Munch is a deeply endowed musician and a man of great experience. He has appeared as guest with the orchestra previously and also appeared in this country last season with the French orchestra of which he was the conductor at the time. In this new post there is every indication that the result will be a completely happy one. He has not yet metamorphosed the orchestra, whether or not he may be contemplating doing so. His personal training as a violinist is apparent in some of the bowing and effects he asks of the string sections. The orchestra played for him with unexcelled warmth and alertness. He asked no exaggerations nor departures from what might be called a sane approach to his music. Boston, and we, next summer, are in for some fine and authentic performances.

[22]

MUSIC

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

We would assume, and in most cases correctly, that an orchestral conductor, holding the whip hand over skilled performers, would himself be a skilled performer—on some instrument or other. Let us examine the local picture. Charles Munch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is an accomplished violinist but began his career at 12 as church organist in his native city of Strasbourg. His activities as violinist took him to the famed Gewandhaus Orchestra of Leipzig. His instrument, the Ysaye Guanarius, is now in his Milton home, but he insists that he has no intention of playing it here publicly.

In this respect he will differ from his immediate predecessor, who played his double bass in concert here at the beginning of his long term. He was, in his heyday, the greatest living master of the bull fiddle and one of the three outstanding bass players of all time.

Mr. Fiedler Talented

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops and Esplanade Concerts, has played professionally the piano, organ, violin, viola and celesta, the last three instruments as a member of the Boston Symphony. Since he was also its concertmaster, that band's associate director, Richard Burgin, is naturally a violinist. Moreover, he is an especially fine one and has been much heard hereabouts in a solo capacity.

There are other conductors in town. Malcolm Holmes, who leads the Conservatory Orchestra, is a violinist and violist. Francis Findlay, who has taken over the new and enlarged orchestra of Boston University, and should do much with it, mastered both the violin and the trumpet. Boris Goldovsky, of the New England Opera Theatre and soon to begin his new duties at the Worcester Festival, is a virtuoso pianist. Paul Cherkassky of the Civic Symphony and occasional guest conductor at the Pops and Esplanade Concerts, is one of the Symphony's first violinists. Wallace Goodrich, who in his long and busy career, has conducted the Boston Opera Company, the Conservatory Orchestra, the Cecilia and Choral Art Societies and the Worcester Festival, is also a distinguished organist.

Sir George Sang

And how about the Symphony conductors other than Munch and Koussevitzky? The first of them, Sir George Henschel, was a baritone singer (also an excellent composer of songs), organist and pianist. He sang with the Orchestra, as did his wife, Lillian, a noted soprano. His successor, Wilhelm Gericke, was equally versatile, playing the piano, organ, violin and cello professionally and the flute as amateur. He too composed. Arthur Nikisch was a violinist and Emil Paur both that and a pianist. Karl Muck played piano and so did Max Fiedler, who occasionally accompanied solo singers at Symphony Concerts. Mr. Fiedler, no relation to Arthur, by the way, is also credited with mastery of the organ.

And now we come to a conductor who made no pretentions to instrumental proficiency, the late Henri Rabaud, who in the season of 1918-1919, bridged the gap between Muck and Monteux, the latter being both violinist and violist, with orchestral and chamber music experience. Rabaud was primarily a composer and was fittingly remembered at last week's concert by his beautiful "La Procession Nocturne."

The dual role of composer and conductor has been filled by many and with varying emphasis on those respective skills. The case of Berlioz is curious: He knew more about every instrument in the orchestra than the men who played them, yet was proficient, if you can call it that, only on the flageolet and guitar. Wagner, who has been called the first modern conductor, played the piano but only as a duffer. The late Richard Strauss was a master conductor and a competent pianist and Boston heard him in both capacities. In the later role he confined himself to his own compositions. It is said that he could play, after a fashion, every instrument in the orchestra.

Mahler the Composer

In his day, Mahler the conductor overshadowed Mahler the composer. The piano was his instrument, as it is of such contemporary leaders as Szell, Walter and Mitropoulos. The two last-named can play a piano concerto and conduct it at the same time, and so can Leonard Bernstein. Toscanini started out as a 'cellist; others in the profession have been the late Hans Kindler and Los Angeles' Alfred Wallenstein. Performers on wind instruments seem to be in the minority here. However, Han Richter, as befitting an eminent Wagnerite, played the French horn and the trumpet as well as the violin. Sir Thomas Beecham, so far as I know, does not play anything. There is still a long list of virtuosi who also conducted, but remained better known as executants. There have been pianists from Liszt to Gabrilowitsch and Iturbi and one cellest, Casals.

* * *

THE CONCERTS

Byron Janis, youthful pianist, will make his local debut at this week's Symphony concerts, playing the Second Concerto of Rachmaninoff. Piston's Second Suite and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" complete the program. On Tuesday evening Mr. Munch will play the compositions by Weber, Schubert, Handel and Beethoven that were heard at the opening pair of concerts.

Muriel Rahn, soprano of "Carmen Jones" fame, will be heard at Jordan Hall this afternoon. Nelson Eddy, baritone, will sing at Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening, and the celebrated English pianist, Solomon, will make his local bow at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 8 1949

Koussevitsky Successor Shows Wares

Munch Is Promising In Boston Premiere

By FEROL SCHOENROCK

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—Friday afternoon, in an aura of intense anticipation, Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a packed Symphony Hall. A slight, well-built man, Mr. Munch as led on stage by a representative of the trustees of the symphony.

The new conductor modestly accepted the spontaneous standing ovation of the audience and then led the orchestra through its first concert of the season.

* * *

RABAUD'S symphonic poem "La Procssion Nocturne," was a tense often nervous. presentation. It seems Mr. Munch is quite conscious of the fact that he is displaying his talents on approval, to a bevy of followers who will not accept any successor to the great Koussevitzky without a bit of doing. The new conductor was nervous and strained.

The orchestra did not sound like itself until quite late in the program and seemed to be trying too hard. It went through the Schubert "Rosamunde" suite as though it were a bit of fluff, and the organ concerto in D minor by Handel was both heavy and unexciting. E. Power Biggs, the soloist, was by far the most inspired.

This piece was significant, however, inasmuch as it proves that Mr. Munch is an extremely apt accompanist. He allowed the soloist complete freedom in both tempo and volume. Anyone who has ever witnessed the Herculean tempests served up by Koussevitzky to unsuspecting soloists cannot but look upon a more reserved practice with a benevolent eye.

* * *

IN WEBER'S "Euryanthe" overture the orchestra became brilliant nd vibrant and Mr. Munch reaxed for a while. He shows an xtreme intensity, tremendous viality, and a great, overwhelming eeling for music. He lacks a little f the dramatic gestures of Koussevitzky, but the music lovers will oon forget this and the show lovers will perhaps be reconciled or make room for more seats for the music lovers.

After intermission, Mr. Munch came on stage all tensed up again and in the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, it wasn't until the third movement that the orchestra became alive. It can be said of Charles Munch, however, that when his orchestra becomes alive, it fairly pops. Munch played his heart out and the smashing chords of the finale brought the patrons out of their seats with a chorus of bravos and applause.

It is a little unfortunate that Mr. Munch had to break in his tenure with such a muddled program, and especially so since it was not of his own choosing. With the exception of the Rabaud poem, which he somehow managed to sneak in.

* * *

THE ORCHESTRA does have the new look, however. Mr. Munch has rearranged the seating plan which makes a drastic change in the timbre of the strings. The violins are all on the left of the conductor, the double basses have been switched to the right, the celli have moved over to keep company with the violas on the right, and both the tympani and horns have shifted to the left.

Your reporter thought that the transfer of the double basses to the opposite side of the violins makes for a less brilliant string section, but it is Mr. Munch's orchestra to do with as he sees fit, at least for the time being.

In a couple of years or so will be able to see whether the any marked effect of the re ing plan upon the quality produced.

Hartford Courier — Oct 10/49

THE MUSIC BOX

Boston Symphony

Charles Munch made his debut as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this weekend, and effectively demolished the illusions of certain musical cynics who held Koussevitzky and the B.S.O. synonomous, and claimed neither could exist without the other.

The opening concert was almost more a tribute to the Orchestra than it was to Munch. It proved beyond question that the Boston Symphony Orchestra lies gleaming in its case like a fine musical instrument, ready to sing in the hands of any great virtuoso. It passes from Koussevitzky to Munch, each with a technique of his own; yet the latent quality of the instrument remains unchanged.

In plain talk, this means the 110-odd men of the Orchestra have been able to shake off 25 years of routine in a little over three weeks, and adapt themselves to a new and different regime. This was especially evident in the excerpts from Schubert's "Rosamunde," which was played with a gentleness and simplicity seldom heard under Koussevitzky. Even the standard Beethoven's "Fifth" sounded almost like a first performance.

Munch seems to take considerable liberties with his classical music. Long dramatic pauses, and abrupt changes in tempo sound a mite strange. In the third movement of the Beethoven, there were moments of uncertainty in the Orchestra, signs of the difficult change of interpretation. But it is nothing serious, and Munch's first concert indicates that Symphony Hall is going to be rocked back on its heels in the weeks to come.

—E. Parker Hayden '50

[23]

MUSIC

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

We would assume, and in most cases correctly, that an orchestral conductor, holding the whip hand over skilled performers, would himself be a skilled performer—on some instrument or other. Let us examine the local picture. Charles Munch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is an accomplished violinist but began his career at 12 as church organist in his native city of Strasbourg. His activities as violinist took him to the famed Gewandhaus Orchestra of Leipzig. His instrument, the Ysaye Guanarius, is now in his Milton home, but he insists that he has no intention of playing it here publicly.

In this respect he will differ from his immediate predecessor, who played his double bass in concert here at the beginning of his long term. He was, in his heyday, the greatest living master of the bull fiddle and one of the three outstanding bass players of all time.

Mr. Fiedler Talented

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops and Esplanade Concerts, has played professionally the piano, organ, violin, viola and celesta, the last three instruments as a member of the Boston Symphony. Since he was also its concertmaster, that band's associate director, Richard Burgin, is naturally a violinist. Moreover, he is an especially fine one and has been much heard hereabouts in a solo capacity.

There are other conductors in town. Malcolm Holmes, who leads the Conservatory Orchestra, is a violinist and violist. Francis Findlay, who has taken over the new and enlarged orchestra of Boston University, and should do much with it, mastered both the violin and the trumpet. Boris Goldovsky, of the New England Opera Theatre and soon to begin his new duties at the Worcester Festival, is a virtuoso pianist. Paul Cherkassky of the Civic Symphony and occasional guest conductor at the Pops and Esplanade Concerts, is one of the Symphony's first violinists. Wallace Goodrich, who in his long and busy career, has conducted the Boston Opera Company, the Conservatory Orchestra, the Cecilia and Choral Art Societies and the Worcester Festival, is also a distinguished organist.

Sir George Sang

And how about the Symphony conductors other than Munch and Koussevitzky? The first of them, Sir George Henschel, was a baritone singer (also an excellent composer of songs), organist and pianist. He sang with the Orchestra, as did his wife, Lillian, a noted soprano. His successor, Wilhelm Gericke, was equally versatile, playing the piano, organ, violin and cello professionally and the flute as amateur. He too composed. Arthur Nikisch was a violinist and Emil Paur both that and a pianist. Karl Muck played piano and so did Max Fiedler, who occasionally accompanied solo singers at Symphony Concerts. Mr. Fiedler, no relation to Arthur, by the way, is also credited with mastery of the organ.

And now we come to a conductor who made no pretentions to instrumental proficiency, the late Henri Rabaud, who in the season of 1918-1919, bridged the gap between Muck and Monteux, the latter being both violinist and violist, with orchestral and chamber music experience. Rabaud was primarily a composer and was fittingly remembered at last week's concert by his beautiful "La Procession Nocturne."

The dual role of composer and conductor has been filled by many and with varying emphasis on those respective skills. The case of Berlioz is curious: He knew more about every instrument in the orchestra than the men who played them, yet was proficient, if you can call it that, only on the flageolet and guitar. Wagner, who has been called the first modern conductor, played the piano but only as a duffer. The late Richard Strauss was a master conductor and a competent pianist and Boston heard him in both capacities. In the later role he confined himself to his own compositions. It is said that he could play, after a fashion, every instrument in the orchestra.

Mahler the Composer

In his day, Mahler the conductor overshadowed Mahler the composer. The piano was his instrument, as it is of such contemporary leaders as Szell, Walter and Mitropoulos. The two last-named can play a piano concerto and conduct it at the same time, and so can Leonard Bernstein. Toscanini started out as a 'cellist; others in the profession have been the late Hans Kindler and Los Angeles' Alfred Wallenstein. Performers on wind instruments seem to be in the minority here. However, Han Richter, as befitting an eminent Wagnerite, played the French horn and the trumpet as well as the violin. Sir Thomas Beecham, so far as I know, does not play anything. There is still a long list of virtuosi who also conducted, but remained better known as executants. There have been pianists from Liszt to Gabrilowitsch and Iturbi and one cellest, Casals.

THE CONCERTS

Byron Janis, youthful pianist, will make his local debut at this week's Symphony concerts, playing the Second Concerto of Rachmaninoff. Piston's Second Suite and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" complete the program. On Tuesday evening Mr. Munch will play the compositions by Weber, Schubert, Handel and Beethoven that were heard at the opening pair of concerts.

Muriel Rahn, soprano of "Carmen Jones" fame, will be heard at Jordan Hall this afternoon. Nelson Eddy, baritone, will sing at Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening, and the celebrated English pianist, Solomon, will make his local bow at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 8 1949

Koussevitsky Successor Shows Wares

Munch Is Promising In Boston Premiere

By PETER SCHOENBROCK

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—Friday afternoon, in an aura of intense anticipation, Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a packed Symphony Hall. A slight, well-built man, Mr. Munch as led on stage by a representative of the trustees of the symphony.

The new conductor modestly accepted the spontaneous standing ovation of the audience and then led the orchestra through its first concert of the season.

* * *

RABAUD'S symphonic poem "La Procession Nocturne," was a tense often nervous, presentation. It seems Mr. Munch is quite conscious of the fact that he is displaying his talents on approval, to a bevy of followers who will not accept any successor to the great Koussevitzky without a bit of doing. The new conductor was nervous and strained.

The orchestra did not sound like itself until quite late in the program and seemed to be trying too hard. It went through the Schubert "Rosamunde" suite as though it were a bit of fluff, and the organ concerto in D minor by Handel was both heavy and unexciting. E. Power Biggs, the soloist, was by far the most inspired.

This piece was significant, however, inasmuch as it proves that Mr. Munch is an extremely apt accompanist. He allowed the soloist complete freedom in both tempo and volume. Anyone who has ever witnessed the Herculean tempests served up by Koussevitzky to unsuspecting soloists cannot but look upon a more reserved practice with a benevolent eye.

* * *

IN WEBER'S "Euryanthe" overture the orchestra became brilliant and vibrant and Mr. Munch relaxed for a while. He shows an extreme intensity, tremendous vitality, and a great, overwhelming feeling for music. He lacks a little of the dramatic gestures of Koussevitzky, but the music lovers will soon forget this and the show lovers will perhaps be reconciled or make room for more seats for the music lovers.

After intermission, Mr. Munch came on stage all tensed up again and in the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, it wasn't until the third movement that the orchestra became alive. It can be said of Charles Munch, however, that when his orchestra becomes alive, it fairly pops. Munch played his heart out and the smashing chords of the finale brought the patrons out of their seats with a chorus of bravos and applause.

It is a little unfortunate that Mr. Munch had to break in his tenure with such a muddled program, and especially so since it was not of his own choosing. With the exception of the Rabaud poem, which he somehow managed to sneak in.

* * *

THE ORCHESTRA does have the new look, however. Mr. Munch has rearranged the seating plan which makes a drastic change in the timbre of the strings. The violins are all on the left of the conductor, the double basses have been switched to the right, the celli have moved over to keep company with the violas on the right and both the tympani and horns have shifted to the left.

Your reporter thought that the transfer of the double basses to the opposite side of the violins makes for a less brilliant string section, but it is Mr. Munch's orchestra to do with as he sees fit, at least for the time being.

In a couple of years or so will be able to see whether the any marked effect of the re ing plan upon the quality produced.

Harvard Crimson — Oct 10/49

THE MUSIC BOX

Boston Symphony

Charles Munch made his debut as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this weekend, and effectively demolished the illusions of certain musical cynics who held Koussevitzky and the B.S.O. synonomous, and claimed neither could exist without the other.

The opening concert was almost more a tribute to the Orchestra than it was to Munch. It proved beyond question that the Boston Symphony Orchestra lies gleaming in its case like a fine musical instrument, ready to sing in the hands of any great virtuoso. It passes from Koussevitzky to Munch, each with a technique of his own; yet the latent quality of the instrument remains unchanged.

In plain talk, this means the 110-odd men of the Orchestra have been able to shake off 25 years of routine in a little over three weeks, and adapt themselves to a new and different regime. This was especially evident in the excerpts from Schubert's "Rosamunde," which was played with a gentleness and simplicity seldom heard under Koussevitzky. Even the standard Beethoven's "Fifth" sounded almost like a first performance.

Munch seems to take considerable liberties with his classical music. Long dramatic pauses, and abrupt changes in tempo sound a mite strange. In the third movement of the Beethoven, there were moments of uncertainty in the Orchestra, signs of the difficult change of interpretation. But it is nothing serious, and Munch's first concert indicates that Symphony Hall is going to be rocked back on its heels in the weeks to come.

—E. Parker Hayden '50

Second Symphony Program

New Work by Walter Piston Heard

By L. A. Sloper

Charles Munch, in his second program as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, paid tribute on Oct. 14-15 to the memory of Richard Strauss. For this purpose he chose the "Symphonia Domestica," which filled the second half of the bill. The first half was made up of Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra, heard for the first time in Boston, and Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto in C minor, No. 2. Byron Janis was the soloist.

♪ ♪ ♪

Some will ask, Why the "Domestica"? Would not the "Heldenleben" or "Zarathustra" or "Tod und Verklärung" have been more suitable? Perhaps; but no doubt the "Domestica" is a favorite of the conductor's, and since Strauss said his tone poems should be considered as music only, what does it matter which one is chosen?

How was it played? It was played with the new tone, the French tone, which Mr. Munch already has exacted from the orchestra. It was played with dash and freedom and relish of the composer's orchestral colors and a mighty volume of sound; and with a merging of the voices of choirs rather than a clear articulation of each. It was eloquent, and it was applauded to the echo.

♪ ♪ ♪

Is it not strange that Strauss and Rachmaninov should have been contemporaries? The one, although no revolutionary, was a composer of originality who brought a new voice to orchestral music. The other is a belated Tchaikovsky, a twentieth-century romantic. They should have been separated by at least 50 years.

And is it not strange, the affection that pianists show for the Second Concerto? It is the Liszt's E-flat of the present day. Certainly it is sure-fire. However banal the melodies, however big bow-wow the climaxes, they never fail of their effect. On the present occasion Mr. Janis and the orchestra won an ovation.

Mr. Piston's Second Suite was composed on commission of the Dallas Symphony Orchestra and first performed by that organization under Antal Dorati on Feb. 29, 1948. It is a celebration of old dance forms, concluding with a fugue. Like many of his earlier works, it seems more like an academic exercise than a work of inspiration. It does not communicate emotion, as did his Third Symphony.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The symphony concerts continue their eventful course. The current pair feature the first local performance of Walter Piston's Second Suite, the local debut of the talented young pianist, Byron Janis, and a memorial to the late Richard Strauss in the form of a performance of the Symphonia Domestica. Mr. Janis' chosen vehicle was the Second Concerto of Rachmaninoff.

To take up these items in their proper order, Mr. Piston's suite was commissioned by the Symphony Orchestra of Dallas and was first heard there a year ago last February. It runs in four movements, favoring the older musical forms, and suggesting in its idiom an allegiance to the contemporary French school, meaning Honegger and Milhaud. As always, Mr. Piston has written here competently, and as usually, rather coolly. Even the one fast movement, the Intermezzo, conveys a sense of repose rather than of excitement. There are academic touches in the first and last movements, bearing witness to Mr. Piston's professional activities. In sum, an agreeable composition, well received by the audience and well played, so far as could be judged, by Mr. Munch and the orchestra.

As a reporter, I can say that Mr. Janis and Rachmaninoff enjoyed a great success. As a critic, I am constrained to observe that the performance was nothing to get excited about. The piano did not meet the current high pitch of the orchestra, this discrepancy being most conspicuous at the beginning of the second movement. Mr. Janis' playing was facile and tasteful but hardly penetrating—if this is a work into which one can any longer penetrate. You still recalled that in the hands of the composer the Concerto sounded like a big piece. Yesterday there was a prevailing quality of salon music, with a rather blatant finish.

The most satisfying musical experience of the afternoon was the Domestica, though the performance did not give us everything that we have been used to in this tone poem. One missed the accustomed depth and richness of tone, and the end has often sounded more brilliant. What Mr. Munch did convey was the impression that this is primarily a domestic idyl. Of felicity there was plenty. He conducted from memory, no small achievement in a work of such complexity, and it was plain that he had made the score a part of himself. Also that he could transmit his conception of it to the players. The optional parts for four saxophones were used for the first time in this city.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 14 1949

Buys Goetz Stradivarius

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 13 (AP).—Norman Carol, twenty-one-year-old Philadelphia violinist and member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is the new owner of the famout Goetz Stradivarius, which he received as a gift, it was announced today. The violin, classed among the best ever made by the Cremona master, has been valued at $25,000. It has been in several major collections in Europe and this country and used in concerts by the late Emil Mylnarski and other artists.

MUSIC

Munch Conducts Piston, Janis in Boston Debut at Symphony Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

The high standards of performance and interest with which Charles Munch began the Boston Symphony season a week ago, are maintained in the second program. This begins with the first Boston performance of the Second Suite for Orchestra by Walter Piston, and continues with the C minor Piano Concerto of Rachmaninoff, in which Byron Janis makes his Boston debut. For the final number there is the Symphonia Domestica by Richard Strauss, played in memory of the composer, who died last Sept. 8.

Commissioned by the symphony orchestra of Dallas, Tex., and conducted there by Antal Dorati Feb. 29, 1948, Walter Piston's Suite is an excellent and a modern piece of music. It exhibits the composer's usual fastidious regard for solid construction and is written with his command both of counterpoint and the orchestra.

The Prelude, a largo, sounds antique in its harmonic structure which goes in for exposed fourths and fifths. The movement ends with a neat fugato. The Sarabande, which is the second movement, also has an archaic flavor (though less so than the first movement), while the Intermezzo (allegro con brio) and the Passacaglia (adagio) and Fugue (allegro energico) are brusquely and briskly of our time.

There are those who will find this music too dissonant and perhaps too dry, melodically, for their taste. But such will be well advused to listen patiently again and again, for such an idiom is not always grasped the first time. For my taste, Mr. Piston's Suite is bracing, healthy and fascinating. The composer was present and was well applauded.

Byron Janis, who comes from Pittsburgh, was educated musically in New York and is now 21, is a highly gifted young musician. Already he has a formidable technic, and the intelligence and perception of a born musician. His performance of Rachmaninoff's wonderfully juicy and romantic Concerto was admirable. From the interpretive point of view, it may be suggested, with no disparagement of Mr. Janis' achievement, that at 21 he does not play the work with the maturity he will have at 31 or 41. Yet such a performance as he gave yesterday would be far beyond the generality of musicians of his age. Mr. Janis enjoyed a robust and painstaking accompaniment from Mr. Munch and the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony sounded just as rich and polished and clear as it ever has through the resounding lengths of Richard Strauss' Domestic Symphony. Here, indeed, was a performance of interpretive and executant virtuosity; big of line, shrewd of tempi, broad of style and loving in its efforts to make the best of the music. The nuances were many and finely detailed.

If for any reason the fact needs repetition, let it be said now that the Boston Symphony remains in the hands of a top notch artist.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.
TRIBUNE SUN
OCT 14 1949

Boston Symphony Finds No Sponsor

Distressing Silence: Those who take pleasure in the orchestral recordings conducted by Charles Muench, the new director of the Boston Symphony, were disappointed that NBC, could not find a sponsor to broadcast at least an hour of the Tuesday, Thursday or Friday concerts. Four or 5 years ago Allis-Chalmers presented a concert-length broadcast, which was reduced to 1 hour.

One winter this super ensemble in thousands of homes by way of recordings was absent from the air. A compromise was effected last year. For one hour a Monday morning rehearsal was broadcast. The same arrangement has been effected for this winter and the first broadcast was announced for 10 a.m., but neither KFSD nor KFI carried it.

A telephone call to the former merely brought the reply that the program was not being carried. "Turntable Talk" can only hope that this omission will not recur. The Boston Orchestra has many "fans" here.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 23 1949

Benefit Organ Concert For Schweitzer Hospital

Boston, Oct. 22—There will be a special concert given by Charles Munch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and E. Power Biggs in Symphony Hall, Monday evening, Nov. 14, with the new Aeolian-Skinner organ having its first complete hearing in solo numbers and orchestral concertos. The proceeds will be donated to the Albert Schweitzer Hospital in French Equatorial Africa in recognition of the great Bach scholar, organist, medical doctor, and humanitarian who, visiting this country last summer, inspected and autographed the new organ at the factory.

The organ, combining in its 4800 stops the qualities of the instruments of the classic and romantic eras, is accounted one of the finest in existence. It has been built in celebration of the 50th year of Symphony Hall as the auditorium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and figured in the opening symphony program of the season.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, gave the second concert of its 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Byron Janis, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

Second Suite for Orchestra ..... Piston
Concerto No. 2 in C minor, Op 18 ..... Rachmaninoff
Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53 ..... Richard Strauss

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It doesn't often happen that a work new to Boston marches off with the honors at a symphony concert, but such was the case yesterday afternoon as Charles Munch demonstrated anew his surpassing stature as the new conductor of the orchestra.

The work in question is Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra, first performed by the Dallas Symphony (which commissioned the work) in 1948. Once again Mr. Piston, working this time in the 18th century form of the suite with a sarabande, passacaglia, fugue and so on, discloses his familiar gift as a master weaver of abstract musical patterns and as a master orchestrator. That the suite doesn't evoke much of anything, save in the opening moments when much of the flavor and even sound of the baroque masters is suggested, is neither here nor there. For Mr. Piston is not the one to fool around with anything obvious (though you often get the notion that he'd like to and could do a very good job of it if he only dared); his music is cerebral, scholarly, unimpeachable, explicit and well-mannered. Occasionally—and this is its saving grace—it has moments of real drama achieved by skillfully contrived harmonic tensions, and never has a smell of the lamp about it despite its cerebral basis. When given the really crack performance it was given yesterday it is good and lively and always interesting listening. You don't get up and shout for a repeat performance, but you know you've heard something worth hearing.

Ordinarily the Rachmaninoff Concerto, thrice familiar although it is, is always worth another hearing. Yesterday it could well be taken or left alone. I did not find Mr. Janis, competent though he is, a particularly inspiring performer. He played with admirable technical facility and achieved a certain simplicity of line in the slow movement that was effective, but on the whole I felt his a rather pallid performance. There were moments of real elan, as in the cadenza of the finale and the final few bars themselves, but the pianist seldom rose above the timber line. Nor, despite Mr. Munch's superb accompanimental skill, did the orchestra; it has done this piece too many times to get into the mood for it unless inspired by a truly transcendent performer at the piano.

Strauss' Symphonia Domestica is a piece curious for the fact it produces a strangely mixed reaction from the listener. Aware from the program that the composer is here supposedly giving us a picture of his private life, which was a fairly frantic one from all reports, the listener finds himself busy analyzing all the sly illusions, listening for the clock to strike seven, for the child to be put to bed, for the husband's "fiery" theme, for the family quarrel, for the creaking of the bed and whatnot. Along about the middle he begins to wonder if eavesdropping is so much fun after all and at the end he feels a little embarrassed. Impressed with all the ingenuity, the pleasant melodies, the lovely cadences, the ferocious climaxes and, not least, the vaste horde of performers on the stage—impressed, but embarrassed. But it is well worth an occasional hearing and nobody could have made that hearing more enjoyable than Mr. Munch. The orchestra is out of town next week but returns on October 28 to do Bach's "The Art of Fugue" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

CANTON, OHIO REPOSITORY
OCT 17 1949

On the Air

RADIO TONIGHT

"Secret Weapon," a skit presented in tribute to Our Lady of the Rosary of Fatima, will be dramatized by Mount Marie division of Central Catholic High School at 5:30 over WAND. Participating will be students Mary Ann Bamberger, Virginia Larke, Camilla Leghart, Betty Jane Seikel, Donna Gill, Joan Berring, Rose Marie Kramer, Nancy Bederman and Cathy Regan.

Charles Munch will rehearse the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works of Bach and Beethoven at 7:30 over NBC-WTAM on "Dress Rehearsal."

A sculptor gets stuck with a lot of chislers and hacks his way out during "Image of Death" on "Inner Sanctum" at 8 over CBS-WGAR.

Gordon MacRae and Nadine Conner will co-star in "The Chocolate Soldier" on "The Railroad Hour" at 8 over NBC-WTAM.

Soprano star Eleanor Steber will sing a selection from "Marriage of Figaro" at 8:30 over NBC-WTAM on "Howard Barlow Hour."

Ezio Pinza will be guest soloist on the "Telephone Hour" at 9 over NBC-WTAM.

"Brain Guy," the tale of a man who was used as a murder weapon by a beautiful woman, will be presented on "Murder By Experts" at 9 over MBS-WHK.

"Band of America" will be carried over NBC-WTAM and television station WNBK at 9:30.

The first major address in this country by the visiting Prime Minister Jawaharlal Pandit Nehru of India will be carried over MBS-WHK at 10:30.

A special Community Chest program will be broadcast at 10:30 over NBC-WTAM with Bob Hope as "emcee" and Phil Harris and Alice Faye and Art Linkletter as guests.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
OCT 13 1949

Munch, Boston Symphony Due

One of the outstanding events of the music season, the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new conductor Charles Munch, will take place on Thursday evening, Oct. 20, in the Eastman Theater.

This will be the second Rochester appearance for Munch, who this Fall replaced Serge Koussevitsky on the podium of Boston's Symphony Hall. Munch made his Rochester debut last January as guest conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic.

Munch, who fulfilled conducting engagements in France during the Summer, opened the symphony's 69th season last Friday in Boston. Greeted by a rising audience when he first appeared on the stage and applauded and cheered at the end of the prgram, the French conductor enjoyed a distinct and resounding success.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 23 1949

AUDIENCES ALERT

Appear to Demand Live Orchestra Programs

As American concert-goers become increasingly sophisticated, musically speaking, conductors have to search more diligently for program material that is fresh and unhackneyed. No longer can a season be carried by the old warhorses of the repertory. As a result, each year one finds more novelties appearing in the programs.

Rivalry for pre-eminence and public notice is also a factor that leads conductors to try out new works, unfamiliar classics and mighty masterpieces. Each city wants to be proud of the news its orchestra makes. And so a glance over some of the programs of the season that is just starting shows that listeners all over the country will be hearing works they have seldom, if ever, heard before.

New Symphonies

Symphonies form the mainstay of any repertory, so the supply of new works in this form coming out each year is of particular interest. The new spate will be quite generous. A new symphony by Olivier Messiaen named "Turangalila" will be introduced by the Boston Symphony. Ernst Krenek's Fifth will be played by the Albuquerque Civic Symphony, Aaron Avshalomoff's Second, based on Chinese scales and rhythms, will be premièred by the Cincinnati Symphony, and a new symphony by Arthur Benjamin will be played for the first time in North America by the Vancouver Symphony.

One of the new symphonies that is sure to arouse the most interest is Prokofieff's Sixth. Leopold Stokowski will introduce it to America with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. It will also be performed by the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Rochester Philharmonic and the Houston Symphony.

Other orchestral works being introduced are Carlos Chavez's Toccata for Percussion, which will receive its United States première in Cincinnati. The Cincinnati Symphony will also première David Diamond's "The Enormous Room," a work that will also be played in Cleveland. Among the Cleveland Symphony's other new works will be a Serenade by Norman Dello Joio.

Frederick Jacobi will have two premières. His "Music Hall Suite" will be done in Cleveland and his "Variations on an Indian Theme" will be played by the Erie Philharmonic, which will also introduce a Suite by Ulysses Kay.

Among the large-scale works being given many performances is Verdi's Manzoni Requiem. It appears on the regular subscription programs of the Minneapolis Symphony, the Duluth Symphony, the Kansas City Philharmonic, the Oklahoma State Symphony and the National Symphony. The Philadelphia Orchestra is playing it too this week at the Worcester Festival.

Bach Fugues

Bach's "The Art of the Fugue" is another master-work that will be heard fairly widely. Charles Munch will give it next Friday with the Boston Symphony in an orchestral arrangement by his cousin, Ernest Munch. The work will be given in its entirety in New York in January by the Mozart Orchestra of the Music School of Henry Street Settlement in a version arranged by Robert Scholz, who leads the orchestra. In the meantime George Szell will lead three of the fugues in Mr. Scholz's transcription with the Cleveland Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
OCT 19 1949

Nearly 3000 at Opening Of Concert Season Here

Springfield Symphony Orchestra and Lucas Foss, Pianist, Present Fine Program at Auditorium

By WILLARD M. CLARK

The Springfield Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its permanent conductor, Alexander Leslie, opened its sixth season with an admirable concert in the Auditorium. It is estimated that nearly 3000 heard this concert, a real tribute to the men and women who labored so valiantly these last few weeks, determined to make this season the largest of all.

It was good to get back to Auditorium and hear our own orchestra. There have been changes in personnel, all of which seemed for the better. It was pleasant to welcome Marlyn Crittendon as concert master. She has the tone, technic, musicality and experience to make a very real contribution to the orchestra.

The soloist was Lukas Foss, official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a composer of note. He was heard in the Bach "Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra." He played this work last summer at Tanglewood. Mr. Foss is a very fine pianist, fleet of fingers, rhythmically sound and the fire glows brightly within him. Mr. Leslie used a reduced string ensemble to better capture the atmosphere of the work and he was eminently successful. Mr. Foss's vitality and sparkle were seconded by the ensemble, with the result that this concerto was given a performance which held the interest of the layman and excited the musicians. Mr. Foss was recalled at least five times and chose to share the applause with the conductor and orchestra.

Beethoven's Overture to "Prometheus" was the opening number and one was made aware, almost immediately, of the fine caliber of the orchestra. It it now a fine toned, flexible and responsive organization.

Hayden and Dvorak

This performance was followed by a first-rate performance of Haydn's "Symphony No. 88 in G Major." It is this symphony that has the delectable Largo movement, one of the loveliest melodies Haydn ever penned. The robust Menuetto and the brilliant final Allegro were played in truly distinguished manner, with the somewhat earthy Haydn humor always in mind.

Dvorak's "New World" symphony concluded the program. Mr. Leslie has delved deeply into this work and the result is a finely conceived, carefully wrought interpretation. The orchestra was at its best in this work. There was remarkable clarity throughout, the inner voices singing clearly, no matter how involved. The familiar melodies were beautifully uttered and the entire performance was worthy of the music.

Boston Symphony to Present First Concert Here Tonight

Aboard their special train, 108 members of the world-famous Boston Symphony orchestra will arrive in Syracuse this afternoon for their first appearance here.

Altho hundreds of Syracuse music lovers have traveled each summer to Tanglewood, at Lenox, Mass., to hear the Boston Symphony this is the first time the orchestra—conceded to be the finest symphony orchestra in the world—has been brought here.

They will play two concerts. The first will be given at 8.15 tonight in Lincoln auditorium for the general public. The second, which will be given at the Coliseum Wednesday night, is for students only.

The new permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch of France, will arrive in Syracuse at 8.30 a. m. today, accompanied by George Judd, orchestra manager. Munch's appearance at the desk of the orchestra in Lincoln auditorium tonight has a special significance because Syracuse will be the first city outside Boston to hear the orchestra under Munch's direction since Munch succeeded Serge Koussevitsky.

The orchestra is being brought to Syracuse by Famous Artists Series and the student concert was arranged by Famous Artists in cooperation with Chancellor William P. Tolley of Syracuse university.

Boston Symphony Plays Here Tonight

FOR THE first time in at least four decades, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert tonight in Syracuse.

The 105-piece organization, Charles Muench conducting, will present a program of Beethoven's Fifth and compositions by Weber, Ravel and Walter Piston, in Central High School.

Tomorrow night, the orchestra, under Muench, will give a concert for students in the Coliseum, with Byron Janis, young pianist, as guest soloist in the Second Rachmaninoff Symphony. Also on the program will be the Beethoven Seventh and a Weber number. In the audience are expected to be 3,500 students from Syracuse University, a large number from Ithaca College, and hundreds of high school pupils from the Central New York area, who will make the trip by special bus.

THE BOSTON Symphony carries its own stage crew and instruments man. The orchestra travels by special tarin on its fall tour, coming to Syracuse direct from Boston where final rehearsal was conducted yesterday under Muench. The orchaostra will go from here to Rochester for a concert in Eastman Theater. Today, in Hotel Syracuse, Muench commented on the beauty of the countryside, as observed from his New York Central car window, just as the fog lifted over the Mohawk Valley.

HE ARRIVED in America a month ago from France, flying overnight from Paris to Idlewild airport, New York. In English, which he is rapidly mastering, Muench said: "Overnight from Paris to America, just like overnight from Boston to Syracuse." Then he added: 'In the air from Paris, champagne; on the train from Boston gingerale."

George Judd, orchestra manager, hopes to contact his Harvard classmate, Bishop Malcolm E. Peabody, while in Syracuse, and also see former Governor Herbert H. Lehman, during Lehman's visit to Syracuse tonight. When Lehman was governor, he and Mrs. Lehman frequently drove from Albany to Tanglewood for Boston Symphony concerts. Tomorrow, E. R. Vadeboncoeur and Murray Bernthal, executives of Famous Artists Series, will give a luncheon for Muench, Richard Burgin, orchestra concertmaster, and a few guests in Hotel Syracuse.

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HERE. Charles Muench, center, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with George Judd, left, orchestra manager, and E. R. Vadeboncoeur, Famous Artists Series executive, are shown today as Muench and Judd arrived from Boston for concerts here tonight and tomorrow night.

Syracuse Daily Orange

"With Fidelity to God, to you, and to ourselves."

Founded 1903

Editor-in-Chief ..... Don Weill
Business Manager ..... Martin Nachbar

SENIOR STAFF

Managing Editor ..... Arnold Friedman
Executive Editor ..... Marilyn Hait
Editorial Director ..... Lora Sulzle
Sports Editor ..... Stan Gillen

Set Up Another Booth For Concert Tix Sale

The world-renowned Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will offer its musical artistry to the students of Syracuse next Wednesday night at the State Fair coliseum.

This fact alone should be enough to sell such an opportunity to the student body. But couple with this the fact that tickets are selling at the remarkably low price of $1.20 and the concert becomes irresistable.

And there's more yet. Chancellor Tolley has agreed to furnish University buses to the Coliseum for students without other means of transportation. Why, with all this to sell the concert—not that it should need selling—a man would be out of his mind not to race over to Crouse college to pick up a ticket or so.

Speaking of ticket sales tho, it wouldn't be a bad idea if those in charge of ticket sales for the Boston Symphony concert would set up another ticket booth somewhere on campus—preferably a central location.

Beethoven, Not Basketball, in Coliseum Tonight

Tickets for tonight's Boston symphony concert at the War Memorial coliseum are available for $1.20 all day today in the box office at Crouse college, a spokesman of the Famous Artists Series announced last night.

The concert, scheduled for 8:15, will feature two world renowned personalities of the music world—Byron Janis, young American piano soloist, and Conductor Charles Munch, who appears here tonight in one of his first American performances.

Janis will perform in Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2, and Munch will conduct the 108-piece orchestra in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Egmont Overture.

Formerly conductor of the French national symphony, Munch directed the Boston orchestra a few weeks ago to fill the baton Serge Koussevitsky, who recently retired.

Munch was "discovered" by Richard French, Harvard professor, in the spring of 1945. French was stationed in Paris and regularly attended concerts of the Paris conservatory orchestra, then under Munch's direction.

Impressed by the performance, French wrote a Harvard colleague suggesting that Munch might be "the logical choice to succeed Koussevitsky in Boston."

This fall Munch ascended the Boston podium in his American debut, commanding the admiration of the concert audience, and winning high praise from Boston music columnists.

A rundown of Munch's career deserves mention of his experiences as a European conductor during the German seige of World War II.

Vigorously opposing the Nazi regime at every turn, Munch defended his musicians from possible capture on political grounds, and stood firm against investigations of religious or racial backgrounds.

At first he refused to conduct before Nazi audiences, but when obliged to, accepted his fees and turned them over to the resistance movement. Munch was asked to appear at the opera but refused because of the many known collaborators associated with the organization.

As recognition for his contributions to French music, Munch was made Chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

Twelve buses, operating in two shifts, will transport students to the Coliseum tonight. The first shuttle leaves the Old Oval at 6:45, with another departing at 7:40. Buses will return students to the Hill following the concert.

Byron Janis

Symphony for Students

By Len Zweig

Tonight will mark a high point in the musical opportunities offered to Syracuse university students.

The Boston symphony orchestra, under the direction of its newly appointed conductor, Alsatian-born Charles Munch, will play to several thousand students—for the admission price of $1.20.

There is no parallel in the history of the orchestra—considered to be the finest in the nation—that could suggest the wide cooperative effort being made by the University administration, Famous Artists, inc., and the Boston symphony.

Years of wonderful performances, the guiding hand of recently retired conductor Serge Koussevitzky, and the enthusiastice support of the city of Boston has placed the orchestra in its cherished and respected position.

It is to the credit of the University that it sanctioned and fostered the plan suggested by the directors of Famous Artists, inc., that the orchestra play a special concert for Syracuse students and faculty. The situation is unique and gratifying.

Scope of the plan includes the construction of a special shell to be utilized by the orchestra at the Coliseum. Transportation to and from the site will be provided for ticket purchasers by University buses. Incidentally, these special arrangements should call further attention to the lack of a municipal center to house audiences of this size.

Munch's accession to leadership of the Boston symphony was announced on the night that Koussevitzky officially retired, to devote his activities to a growing dream—the music center at Tanglewood.

The choice was not surprising from the strict personality view, tho Munch had only been in the United States for two years. However, many Bostonians had been expecting a trial series of guest conductorships, and to them the Frenchmen's appointment was somewhat abrupt.

But certainly Koussevitzky's judgment was long in the making.

Some of the factors that guided his thinking towards Munch may have been expressed in his article that appeared in a 1948 issue of the Atlantic monthly. "Interpreting Music" put the challenge in the following terms: "In all ages, artists were prophets of either the rise or downfall of a culture."

Koussevitzky put the responsibility for musical performance squarely on the artist's and conductor's interpretation.

"I believe that a composer, when creating a work, transfuses it not only with his musical power, but also with the entire meaning of his life—the essence of his being.

"When the artist-interpreter is able to perceive the inner meaning, the central line of a composition, he will find in himself the right emotion to perform it."

The task is not to let "music speak for itself," but for the music to live "in the interpreter himself, in his own emotion, depth, and feeling."

". . . at no time has the standard of musical performance been set as high as it is in America today."

It is thru these word that Charles Munch raises his baton tonight.

Charles Munch

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL
JAN 19 1949

DISTINGUISHED DIRECTOR HERE. Charles Muench, left, conductor of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Murray Bernthal, Famous Artists executive, are pictured in Central High School before last night's concert.

6,000 Crowd Coliseum For Symphony Concert

BY NEVART APIKIAN

The 6,000 persons who filled the state fair coliseum with applause last night for the Boston Symphony orchestra were enacting a scene of "things to come" at the Memorial auditorium in Syracuse.

It was the first time a symphony orchestra had played in the coliseum. In fact it was the first time so many persons had gathered under one roof in Syracuse to hear a major musical event. Practically the entire audience was composed of students—from Syracuse university, its Utica branch, Cornell, schools of the city, and from Manlius came cadets in dress uniform to add color to the scene.

E. R. Vadeboncoeur and Murray Bernthal of the Famous Artists Service, which brought the Boston Symphony to Lincoln auditorium Tuesday evening for its first appearance in Syracuse, proved that more than 6,000 would gather to hear music. The evening proves there is a demand for good music, at moderate prices. And with 7,000 planned seats at Memorial auditorium, concert directors should plan on attracting a wider audience at lower prices.

Recalled for four encores was the young American pianist, Byron Janis, who played Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2, in C minor. He has tamed the piano to purr under his fingers like a gentle kitten or thunder like a tiger. His technic is truly brilliant.

Charles Munch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, directed 106 musicians—whose technic is second nature—in an all-Beethoven program consisting of opening Overture to "Egmont," and the concluding Seventh Symphony in A major. It is a majestic orchestra that does full justice to the grandeur of Beethoven.

Concensus last night was that Munch was "wonderful" and the Boston symphony is "wonderful." The conductor was recalled half a dozen times. There were no encores, but if the audience means anything, there should be an encore appearance next season.

SYRACUSE
HERALD-JOURNAL

FOUNDED BY ARTHUR JENKINS
JAN. 15, 1877

PUBLISHED BY THE HERALD COMPANY
Herald Place Syracuse, N. Y.
MARY E. JENKINS, President
E. A. O'HARA, Publisher
Dwight S. Perrin, Executive Editor
Clarence H. Rinne, Business Manager
Chauncey S. Hurley, Advertising Director
James M. Armstrong, Circulation Manager

EDITORIAL—Robert D Chryst, Managing Editor; C. Fred Betts, Chief Editorial Writer; Kenneth F. Sparrow, City Editor; Lawrence J. Skiddy, Sports Editor.

ADVERTISING—John J. Haggerty, Classified Manager; William J. Kuhn, Retail Manager; Robert O. Smith, National Manager

SUBSCRIPTION BY MAIL
REMITTANCE — ACCORDING TO POSTAL REGULATIONS—MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE

	1 Yr.	6 Mo.	3 Mo.	1 Mo.
Daily	$15.00	$7.50	3.75	$1.25
Sunday	7.50	4.00	2.00	.75
Daily and Sunday	22.50	11.50	5.75	2.00

MEMBER OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
The Associated Press is entitled exclusively to the use for republication of all the local news printed in this newspaper as well as all AP news dispatches.

Entered as second-class matter Oct. 19, 1939, at the Postoffice at Syracuse, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879.

Telephone 2-0211

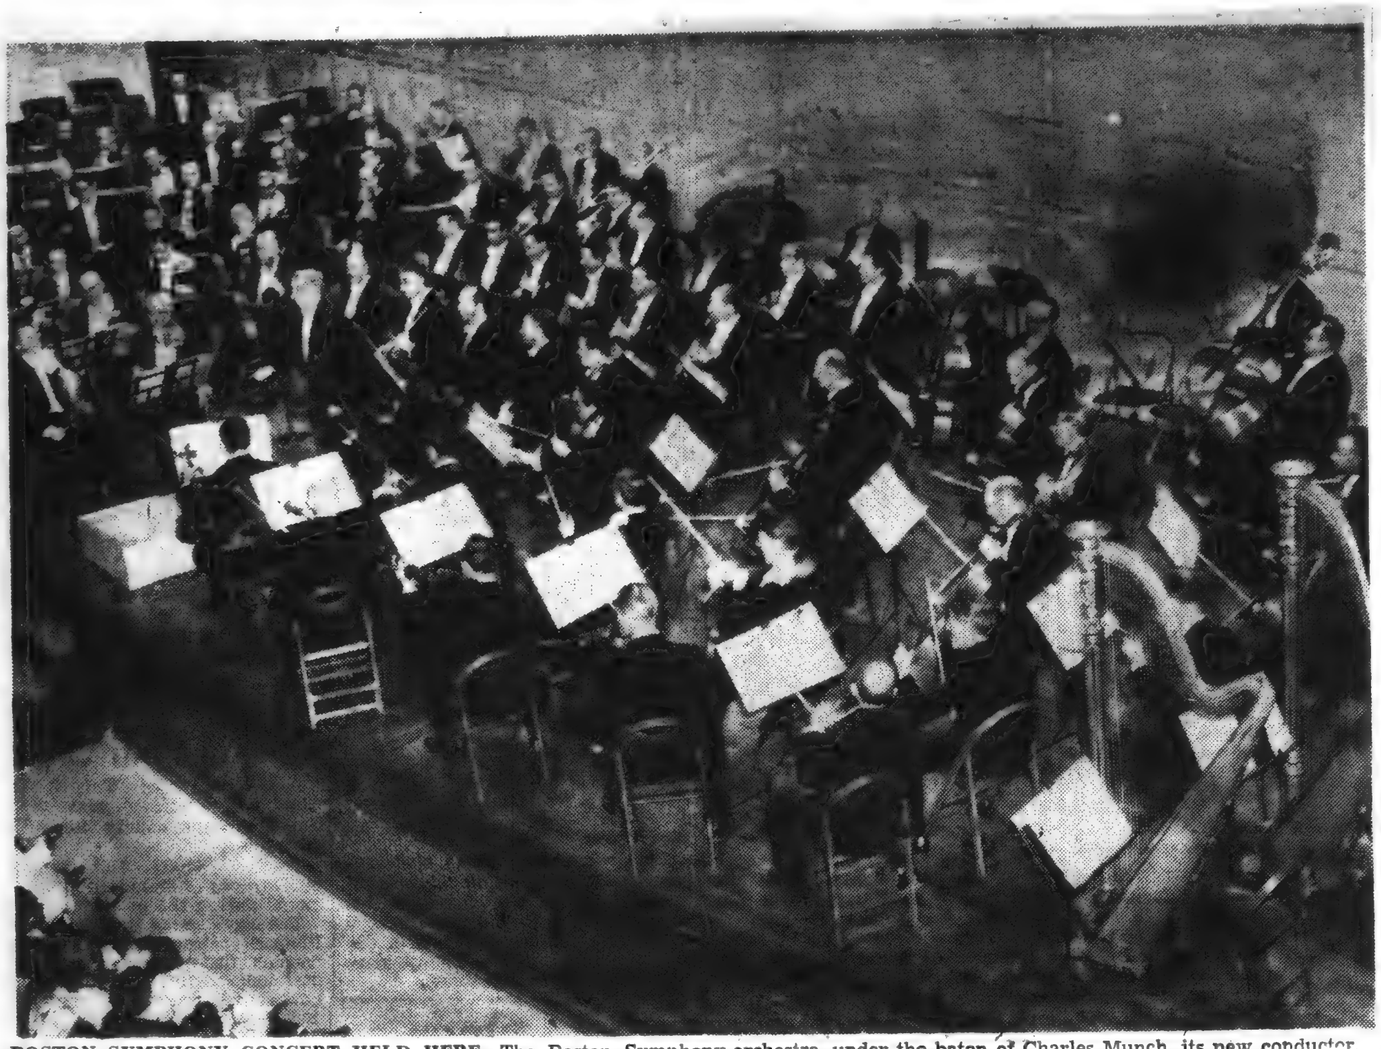
"Ignoring party politics and pursuing an independent course, we shall not hesitate to discuss public questions and to support such men and measures as seem best calculated to advance the best interests of the people."

ARTHUR JENKINS,
In first issue of The Herald.

THURSDAY, OCT. 20, 1949

Music and Youth

The brilliance and lavished splendor of beautiful music brought charm to the vast spaces of the Coliseum last night, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Beethoven and Rachmaninoff, among other compositions. Significant of the interest of the young generation in the worth-while in program making was enthusiasm of several thousand music students from Syracuse University, Ithaca College and high schools throughout the Central New York area. The Boston Symphony management and Director Charles Muench happily agreed with Famous Artists Series of Syracuse, E. R. Vadeboncoeur and Murray Bernthal, executives, to provide a program for so unusual an occasion. For this, there is general appreciation and deserved gratitude.



BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT HELD HERE—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Charles Munch, its new conductor, presented their first concert here last night in Lincoln auditorium. The orchestra is shown immediately preceding its first number. The 108 members arrived in Syracuse aboard their special train at 5 p. m. yesterday. They will appear tonight in the state fair Coliseum before 6,000 senior high school pupils, university and college students. The concert last night was the first presented outside Boston, Mass., under Munch's direction since he succeeded Serge Koussevitzky.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 116,020) (S 381,517)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
SEP 30 1950

Munch Welcomes Sir Thomas Beecham and Royal Philharmonic

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has extended a message or cordial welcome to Sir Thomas Beecham and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London, in anticipation of their appearance at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 22. Since the concert will occur shortly after the opening of the Boston orchestra's 70th season, Mr. Munch expressed the hope that the musical public will consider the visit of the Londoners as a gala event of the semi-centennial of the dedication of Symphony Hall, and the 70th anniversary of the Boston Symphony.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 151,302) (S 381,517)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
SEP 30 1950

Munch Welcomes Sir Thomas Beecham and Royal Philharmonic

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has extended a message or cordial welcome to Sir Thomas Beecham and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London, in anticipation of their appearance at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 22. Since the concert will occur shortly after the opening of the Boston orchestra's 70th season, Mr. Munch expressed the hope that the musical public will consider the visit of the Londoners as a gala event of the semi-centennial of the dedication of Symphony Hall, and the 70th anniversary of the Boston Symphony.

Music Lovers Thrill to Debut Of Symphony Under Munch

BY THOLA TABOR SCHENCK

An atmosphere of excited crowd anticipation and thrill of being among those present highlighted the Syracuse debut concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra under its new director, Charles Munch, in Lincoln auditorium last night. The concert, which opened the limited annual tour of the orchestra to cities of the nation, was an "extra" event in the Famous Artists local series.

Instrumentalists completely filled the shallow stage in far from ideal grouping, but tone quality, precision, inspirational playing by the eminent aggregation under Director Munch's baton immediately gripped respectful attention and enjoyment of the opening von Weber Overture to "Eurianthe."

The melting theme after drums announcement, the dramatic pauses and familiar music started the tumultuous welcome which grew apace with each succeeding programmed number.

Beethoven's so-called "Fate" symphony, "No. 5 in C minor" was the long work selected. Directing without score, Munch led his players with thoro knowledge and benign expression of pleasure at their magnificent interpretation. Favored by musicians everywhere, the monumental pages from the Beethover album breathed with new life and power for enthralled listeners.

New to many, the Piston "Symphonic Suite" evidenced a provocative charm. Dissonance modulated into melody in the Prelude and somber Largo while oriental thematic bits color Sarabande and return to influence the last movement's Passacaglia. Intermezzo abruptly dissipates the quiet of the Andante with brisk and lively tempo and fortissimo.

Skittering oddments over a flowing melody, plucked strings, tricky tempo and a crashing finale of the fugue intrigued the ear.

The greatest applause followed the inspirationally performed "Daphnis et Chloe" by Ravel. It evidently is music which Munch, again without score, hears in its most heavenly form and so interprets thru co-operating players. Especial honor fell to the flutist, but the entire orchestra, instrument by instrument, participated in performance which left listeners breathless and led to long ovation.

Printed programs revealed that due to pressure on Famous Artists there have been a few seats set aside in the Coliseum tonight to accommodate the public at the special "for students only" concert. Reservations may be made today at the Clark Music building office.

—SUPERB MUSIC— Boston Symphony In Fine Program Under Muench

Picture: Page 18

SOMETHING OF the magic that is especially of "Tanglewood" was transplanted in Syracuse last night when the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Central High School under direction of Charles Muench, recently arrived from France. The concert, revealing a new world in symphonic music to the Central New York area, was an extra event under local management of Famous Artists Series. Much has been written and told of these music makers and their superb artistry. Your reporter, in the Berkshires for concerts in several succeeding seasons, and in Boston's Symphony Hall, again emphasizes the glow of the music, the tones beautifully etched, the sonorities, the pattern richly beautiful.

DIRECTOR MUENCH has both amenity and dignity on the podium. He draws a melodic line lovingly from the strings and contrives climaxes skillfully. One is impressed with his capacities, the sensitivity of his reading, the simplicity of his manner. With this is the firm will, the sovereign music mind, the intense purpose.

THE PROGRAM comprised the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," the Beethoven Fifth in C Minor Opus 67; the Symphonic Suite of Walter Piston, and the Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2, by Maurice Ravel. Such a climax has not been heard in orchestral music in Syracuse as the Ravel. Here was breath-taking beauty, beauty such as is demanded by the pastoral poem by the Greek Sophist Longus, written in the second or third century of the Christian era. In the tumultuous wind instruments we see the splashing of the fountains, later the brass chords catch the beauty of the dawn as night lifts its sky curtain.

ON AND on the music flowed in what is described as a vast musical fresco, to give the philosopher's answer to the questions of the boy and girl: "Nothing can be done about love, save to love." Every section of the orchestra was eclectic. The finale was dexterously played, in a whirl of exceeding beauty and brilliance. Small wonder that the audience, with such music falling magically on the ear, gave Muench and his men a tremendous ovation.

A PROGRAM including Beethoven is of importance to the symphonic music lover and last night's Fifth was memorable in many respects. It was played with such excellence that it was apparent from the first that Director Muench well knew how to limn all his musical forces, notably the cello and viola sections. There was good balance in lyrical intensity in all movements, with lofty ideas preserved in harmonies and contrasts. As to the "Euryanthe" overture, it was lighted well, particularly with the violin choir section. In contrast to the subleties of Ravel was the modern Symphonic Suite by Walter Piston described as musical thoughts which are "his own and of his time." We liked the slow movement—the second. Piston made his debut as a composer a score of years ago. His compositions have been played by orchestras in all large American music centers.

DIRECTOR MUENCH last night signaled George Laurent, flutist, to acknowledge applause and Alfred Krips, substitute concertmaster for Richard Burgin, taken suddenly ill. Tonight's program in the Coliseum, Muench conducting, will include the Beethoven Seventh. Byron Janis, young guest pianist, will play the Rachmaninoff Second with Orchestra. Tonight's concert is for students and teachers with thousands expected from many upstate centers. Syracuse University will send 3,500 students; Ithaca College several hundred. E. R. Vadeboncoeur and Murray Bernthal, Famous Artists Series executives, deserve commendation for their enterprise vision, and music-conscious attitude in bringing such a wealth of symphonic music to us. With such programs, should come that expanded, deepened and extended over-all clear for a bigger and better hall in which to meet in musical thought.—E.V.W.

NOW AND THEN

THE WHOLE town's talking about the magic of music, as brought to us by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the conductorship of Charles Muench. So many items of interest during the Orchestra's stay come to mind: The luncheon given by E. R. Vadeboncoeur and Murray Bernthal, Famous Artists Series executives, with Director Muench, Richard Burgin, concertmaster, George A. Judd, orchestra manager, among Boston guests, meeting, among others, Chancellor William Pearson Tolley and Dr. Alexander Capurso of Syracuse University; the Very Rev. William J. Schlaerth, president of Le Moyne College, Msgr. David C. Gildea, superintendent of Syracuse parochial schools, and G. Frank Lapham, Syracuse public schools music head. Then, during the concert in the Coliseum, Dr. Capurso and Mrs. Capurso, and Dave Salmon, music manager, chatted with Eugen Lehner of the viola section. Lehner joined the Boston Symphony a decade ago. A Hungarian by birth, he toured Europe for years with the justly famous Kolisch Quartet, headed by Rudolf Kolisch. The latter, due to an accident to his right hand, bowed with his left. Programs of this quartet were done entirely from memory.

* * *

DR. CAPURSO also visited with Joseph de Pasquale, first violist, native of Philadelphia, where Capurso knew other members of the de Pasquale family, all musical. The Coliseum concert had special interest also for Dr. and Mrs. Jacob Kwalwasser. When their daughter, Helen, now a successful concert violinist and teacher was seven or eight years old, she used to play the fiddle in the Pittsburgh home of her mother's kinfolk — the Little family. A little dark-haired, dark-eyed boy, a neighbor, used to practice piano in those days and the two children had several music hours together. Last Wednesday night, that little boy, now in his early 20s, was guest artist with the Boston Symphony in the Coliseum, playing the Rachmaninoff second concerto to an audience of 6,000, with astounding musicianship. Meantime, Helen, the girl violinist, has given two Town Hall, New York recitals, has toured Europe, now is in New York preparing for fall programs including an early November appearance in Providence, R. I.

* * *

MISS MARIAN KARP, chief usher for the Famous Artists Series concerts in Central High School, renewed acquaintance with Leslie Rogers, Boston Symphony Librarian, having met him in "Tanglewood" during the Berkshire Festival. Here for the down-town concert were Miss Laura Bryant of Ithaca, nationally known in public school music circles, and Albert Force. They were dinner guests of Dr. and Mrs. Kwalwasser. . . . Among bridal couples noted at the concert were Mr. and Mrs. Cornell Butler Blanding (Shirley Spofford), home from their wedding trip in the east. They arrived with Mrs. William Cornell Blanding, night concerts chairman for Morning Musicals.

220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 8-8860

Cir. (81,842)

This Clipping From
Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.

SEP 30 1950

The Hub—in Tune

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON. By H. Earle Johnson. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 431 pp. $6.

By Moses Smith

THE BOSTON immortality machine, as Virgil Thomson called it in one of his most felicitous moments, has been at work again. This time the subject is not a man but a building. An introduction is contributed by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, the dean of Boston's immortality machine, especially regarding matters pertaining to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The official character of the book is made clear by the fact that it was written at the recommendation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, although the author himself intimates that he was given "a free hand and an independent voice."

This is an unsatisfactory book in many ways. Most bothersome is the lack of an index—shocking in a book of second-hand reminiscences including many hundreds of names. The loose, frequently obscure, often irrelevant Johnsonian prose makes matters harder. Particularly exasperating is Mr. Johnson's coy assumption that the scantest allusion to a Bostonian name will sufficiently identify it for all Christendom.

The author might nevertheless still have made this semicentennial anniversary book about the Hall a plausible panorama if he had avoided some of his faults in presentation and had written more convincingly and fully about matters of general interest. In the long, tiresome account of successive events the author seems mainly concerned with an oh-so-scholarly report of what others have written in another day. When he does deign to take an interpretative position on some moot affair he is as likely as not, by his bumbling non sequiturs, more to confuse than to enlighten the reader. Even the scholarship, despite its pretentiousness, is not good. There are many errors, mostly small matters of detail, it is true, but irritating in bulk. In a single paragraph I found five specific errors in names and dates, not to mention the disorganized rhetorical condition of the paragraph and the confusion resulting from the author's postulating obiter dicta on erroneous statements of fact. The appendices, on the other hand, partly compiled by others, seem accurate.

There are many things that a person familiar with the time and scene would have expected to be more fully covered than they are in this volume and the inclusion of which certainly would have made a more interesting book. Near the end, for example, Mr. Johnson finally gets around to discussing in less than four pages an institution which is almost as famous as the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra themselves—the Pops concerts. They contain enough material, still refreshing for the non-Bostonian at any rate, to warrant a chapter. Again, there is relatively slight allusion to the phenomena of record-making and broadcasting that have made the sound of the Boston Symphony Orchestra familiar to millions who have never seen it or to the interesting physical rearrangements which the Hall underwent for them.

Moses Smith, successor to H. T. Parker on the Boston Transcript, is author of "Koussevitzky" and the recently published "Selective Record Guide."

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL
OCT 20 1949

NOTABLE SYMPHONIC MUSIC. The 106-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Charles Muench, gave a Beethoven-Rachmaninoff program before an audience of 6,000 music-lovers, mostly students, in the State Fair Coliseum last night. Inset: Byron Janis, pianist. This was the first student concert presented in the Coliseum. The crowd was the largest ever assembled under one roof in Syracuse for a major musical event.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
OCT 20 1949

Morning Mail--

Boston Symphony Won't Be Forgotten!

To the Editor of The Post-Standard:

What a really magnificent performance the Boston Symphony under Maestro Munch gave in Lincoln auditorium Tuesday night.

And how grateful the whole Central New York area should be that we have been able to hear first hand one of the world's truly great orchestras in as stimulating a program as I can ever remember in this city. That concert won't be forgotten in a long time.

Syracuse is definitely progressing musically. I noted that the house was packed, with standees, and that this generally apathetic community burst out with more enthusiastic approval than I have heard in a long time.

It is proof of a need, perhaps a thirst, for such music with such great performers.

And I do not mean second rate stuff.

We want the best.

Tuesday night we had it.

It's too bad we couldn't cram the whole city into the Coliseum for Wednesday's performance.

What a wonderful offering for the students of the city and vicinity that concert must have been. Once they get a taste of the real business, they'll realize what music can mean.

Another point should be brought out. These musical events are not just local. Syracuse as the metropolitan center of a large area is the focal points of all such activities. And I noticed at the concert that there were many from out of town—some whom I knew had come a long way.

So it is not just our music, here. It belongs to all who can possibly get into town. It is a sharing of greatness that in very few other fields can a whole chunk of a state sit down together and enjoy.

I, for one of many, am deeply grateful that Syracuse is increasingly taking its place as the hub of Central New York's cultural needs.

STIMULATED.

Syracuse.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL
OCT 20 1949

—'FIRST' IN MUSIC—
Boston Symphony Plays to Throng In Coliseum

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra, foremost in musical tradition and achievement, with all the immensities of its accomplishments added another "first" in the Coliseum last night when a concert was presented to approximately 6,000 students and teachers, Charles Muench conducting. The deportment of the vast audience was exemplary, significant of the importance of the occasion in the mind and heart. It should be set down as wholly in keeping with the strength and beauty of the musical message and the dignity of music and mankind. Guest soloist was Byron Janis, young American pianist. The concert was a Famous Artists Series event.

DIRECTOR MUENCH conducted the Beethoven Seventh from memory (the previous night he conducted the Fifth without score). Interest of the listener is replenished again and again in this virile work, as richness and sonority of tones unfold with new beauties at every turn, in unbroken rhythm. Woven through every section of the orchestra was that supreme excellence that characterizes the playing of these musicians. And over all, that gentle but firm persuasiveness, gentle yet dominant and all-pervasive. Such is the enchantment dispensed by Muench.

THE PROGRAM opened with the overture to Beethoven's "Egmont," written during the fullest and freest flow of his creative genius (as were his third to eighth symphonies). Here was just treatment, as in the Seventh, the shape of a phrase beautifully rounded, the harmonic contrasts given a luster. In the Seventh, there was that glimpse of the gigantis stairs which marked the great master himself, when he conducted the Seventh in Vienna in 1813. The symphony offers many alternations of fortissimo and piano. The second movement fastens itself in the memory; the Presto is light and graceful, taking us on to the final movement all vast music.

BYRON JANIS, playing the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 2 in C Minor, Opus 18, was sensational. Here was dynamic virtuosity with amazing technical command, a vivid deftness at the keyboard and amazing fluency in the lyrical passages. Janis, in his early twenties, is a native of Pittsburgh. One instinctively knows that practice, practice and more practice have wrought the sensitive nuances that he produces. He was recalled to the stage several times to acknowledge applause. Director Muench shared plaudits of the audience with his men. Richard Burgin, concert-master, temporarily indisposed the previous night for the Central High School concert, played last night.

THE BOSTON Symphony long has had a no encores rule. Any musical merriague after Beethoven's Seventh last night would have served only to whip up purely external effects, like a blown bubble, shining only for an instant, and then vanishing. E. R. Vadeboncoeur and Murray Bernthal, Famous Artists executives have made possible to the student public a memorable evening. Tonight, the Boston Symphony plays in Eastman Theater, Rochester.

E.V.W.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
OCT 21 1949

Munch Acclaimed At Concert

By A. J. WARNER

Annual visit of the Boston Symphony is traditionally the apex of our local musical year. Last night that sovereign organization brought its matchless orchestral glories once again to the Eastman Theater with Charles Munch making his first appearance here as Serge Koussevitzky's successor.

WARNER

Mr. Munch is no stranger to Rochester, for no one who heard our Philharmonic play under his baton, on the memorable occasion when he came here as guest conductor, is likely to forget him, and last evening he was accorded a signal ovation.

Mr. Munch, who, for some 15 years was the conductor of France's oldest and best known orchestra, the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, is Alsatian by birth and a French citizen by adoption (in 1918). At one time he was first violinist of the Cologne Orchestra and was a pupil and protege of Furtwaengler. He has had a vast experience in the field of music and he brings great gifts as an interpreter to the magnificent band over which he now presides.

Some there may have been in the large audience who wondered why Mr. Munch chose to spend the incomparable resources of his orchestra on a program comprising so much that is familiar in the orchestral repertoire, particularly as regards the symphony, which was Beethoven's Fifth, probably the most often played of any symphony. The answer could be found in the sheer splendor of the playing—playing which had a luster, a color and an exuberance of tonal beauty that in themselves represented a consumate art. The music was reborn in the performance, the most perfect of which were given in Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," which began the program, and in Ravel's second ballet suite, "Daphnis et Chloe," which brought the concert to a close.

One is profoundly conscious, in "hearing" Mr. Munch, that he is a musician and a conductor of the first order. His beat, and his gestures, sometimes enconomical and often full of movement and a kind of exortation that the Boston Symphony would seem hardly to need, are the product of his own intense and communicative enthusiasm. In the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven there was a kind of freedom that let the orchestra sing, and that allowed it to play the music without fetter. And in the overture, too, there were vigor and magnetism, but no trace of the sensational.

Following the intermission Mr. Munch gave the modern American composer a hearing in the form of the Second Suite for Orchestra by Walter Piston, a member of the faculty in the Music Department at Harvard University. The Suite is in four movements—Prelude, Sarabande, Intermezzo and Passacaglia—and each of them is compact, expressive and quite devoid of any radical departure from orthodox measures.

The "Daphnis and Chloe" suite of Ravel was the climax of the evening. This glittering score, which so often appears on orchestral programs, has long been one of the Boston Symphony's show pieces. Last night it was performed with incandescent virtuosity; all the music's ingenuity, its intensely French character, and the profound simplicity that underlies its shimmering colors being magnetically projected.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE
OCT 21 1949

Ovation Greets Munch, Boston At Eastman

By NORMAN NAIRN

CHARLES Munch, French conductor, received a justified ovation last night at the Eastman, in his first appearance as successor to Serge Koussevitzky, revered director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Munch, it will be remembered, thrilled a great audience last season when he guest-conducted Rochester's own Philharmonic, so there was great curiosity over what he would do with his new charges. Consensus was that the Bostonians are in good hands.

Still, it was not quite like the same orchestra under Koussevitzky. There seems to be a new oomph to it, and mayhap not quite yet the sumptuous brilliance attained formerly by the strings.

Munch opened with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," incidental music for Goethe's drama, into which is distilled the essense of the drama, the gloom of oppression, Egmont's death and the people's triumph—all of it the story of the 16th Century Dutch hero and his role in bringing liberation from the rule of the Spaniards.

The conductor made it a panorama of exciting doings in the cumulative drive for his reading.

* * *

IT WAS IN THE BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY No. 5 in C minor, best loved and most popular of all symphonies, that one might take exception to the interpretation heard last night. We have had innumerable interpretations of this work, and in many ways last night's was magnificent and beautifully balanced, with fervor, conquering virility and power.

But it did seem as though there was not enough tenderness in the second, Andante movement. The Finale had the orchestra sweeping into a challenging affirmation of victory, a finale of splendor.

In the over-all choice of program, this reviewer heard some dissatisfaction, particularly over inclusion of the Second Suite for Orchestra by Walter Piston, member of the faculty in the Music Department at Harvard University. Too, we have had plenty of performances of the Beethoven Fifth.

Utilizing the dance forms of the traditional 18th Century suite, Piston's work, while the product of a master-craftsman, appeals more to the intellect than to the emotions, which is all right if that's what he intended.

To this department there was a varied continuity of melodic line, and of course dissonance, the intriguing rhythmic treatment of the third movement being the most interesting of the piece.

* * *

IT WAS TO BE EXPECTED that Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2 would receive a sumptuous performance. And that it had. Munch's version of the sophisticated, exotic and impressionistic music was roundly sonorous and clear.

The glowing colors, the captivating rhythms, the sunlit charm, the painting of rich tonal colors with Ravel's lavish hand, exerted full magic against and gave the listeners something inspiring.

Five members of the orchestra, many will remember, formerly were with the Rochester Philharmonic. They are John Holmes, solo oboe; Osborne McConathy and Harold Meek, French horns, and Willis Page and Henry Freeman, string basses.

THE POST-STANDARD

The Standard ..... 1829 The Post 1894
The Post-Standard 1899

Published Every Day in the Year by THE POST-STANDARD COMPANY
300 East Fayette Street
Syracuse 1, N. Y.

ERNEST E. OWEN
President and Publisher
Robert L. Vosburgh, Editor
Albert V. Brewster, Managing Editor
J. Leonard Gourman, City Editor
Henry H. Keller, Business Manager

SUBSCRIPTION RATES BY CARRIER
Daily 5 cents a copy 30 cents a week; Sunday 15 cents a copy; Daily and Sunday 45 cents
SUBSCRIPTION BY MAIL
Payable in advance. Remittance should be made payable to The Post-Standard Company in United States funds

IN NEW YORK STATE

	1 Yr.	6 Mo.	3 Mo.	1 Mo.
Daily	$10.00	$6.00	$4.00	$1.50
Sunday	7.50	4.00	2.00	.80
Daily and Sunday	17.50	10.00	6.00	2.30

The above service available only where there is no Post-Standard carrier delivery

RATES IN OTHER STATES AND CANADA

	1 Yr.	6 Mo.	3 Mo.	1 Mo.
Daily	$15.00	$ 8.00	$5.00	$2.00
Sunday	10.00	5.00	2.50	1.00
Daily and Sunday	25.00	13.00	7.50	3.00

(Entered as Second Class Matter Sept. 2, 1917, at the Postoffice at Syracuse N. Y. under the act of March 3 1870)

MEMBER OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
The Associated Press is entitled exclusively to the use for republication of all the local news printed in this newspaper, as well as all AP news dispatches.

6 Friday, October 21, 1949

Their Faces Were Ecstatic

What will doubtles remain the musical event of the season has gone with more than regret. The Boston Symphony did something for Syracuse that is almost immeasurable.

We refer to the special student concert held at the Coliseum Wednesday night. The place was packed with nearly 6,000 high school and college students from all over Central New York.

For many of them it was the first experience at a concert, and not many had ever before heard an orchestra of that caliber at first hand. And it made a memorable evening.

To the sponsors of the two-day visit, Famous Artist Series, the city owes a debt of gratitude. They took a chance on filling the Coliseum at moderate prices so students could afford it, or taking a large loss. That they succeeded, we are very happy. Had they not taken the chance, 6,000 students would have been deprived of a bill of fare that they will not easily forget.

We hope that concerts of this type are now firmly planted as part of the city's cultural life.

But it takes a gamble and it takes determination that such a project will go over. That student concert didn't just happen. E. R. Vadeboncoeur and Murray Bernthal gambled that there was a demand for good music at popular prices. There was. But someone had to have enough faith to make it possible.

Putting it mildly, the audience was delighted. As cars and buses left all one could hear was such remarks as, "That was really wonderful. I never realized what a concert by a symphony orchestra was like."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
OCT 22 1949

Music Review

Charles Munch is not a replacement, he is Charles Munch! Last evening, as the Boston Symphony appeared in Kleinhans Music Hall under the sponsorship of Zorah Berry, a hundred answers came with a rush to a hundred questions and in substance the answers agreed that here was conducting genius.

A program particularly dear to the orchestra, either through first performance or memoriam, offered variety of composing styles, with Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra, former Boston conductor Henri Rabaud's symphonic poem, La Procession Nocturne, and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite, No. 2.

Opening with the Procession, the orchestra once more demonstrated its ability to provide the sheerest of pianissimos and the loveliest of tone quality in every section, and from here on, it was Munch's personality taking over for the audience's delight.

The Beethoven Fifth was a picture that climbed towards speedier production, but nevertheless displayed hues of newness that never harmed. A mild-mannered gentleman off-stage, Munch becomes a whirlwind of creative musical thoughts when on the podium. Astonishing intensity attends every note and signal and, in truth, it brought to light voices from Beethoven that hitherto have been unnoticed.

The Piston Suite was no compromise with its march of furies for a Prelude and its crazy quilt of themes for the Intermezzo. But it was the Ravel handicraft that clinched the arguments in the case of Munch versus the questions. From the first suggestion in the Daybreak to the final thrust of the General Dance, there was naught but growing admiration for the artistry that this conductor draws upon without faltering. From the end of the never-resting baton leaped all the positions of the original ballet. Exciting was the build-up of the tale and awesome was the unleashed abandon in conductor and instruments of the roaring finale.

Charles Munch made many friends in Buffalo last evening and the Boston Symphony doubly renewed acquaintanceship.

K. G.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 22 1949

Munch Performs Masterfully as Head Of Boston Symphony

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

What manner of man was he to whom had been handed the baton Serge Koussevitzky relinquished after 25 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra? This was the unspoken thought in the minds of concert-goers Friday evening in Kleinhans Music Hall.

The occasion was the first concert here by the Boston orchestra since 1943 and Buffalo's first opportunity to appraise the orchestra's new musical director, Charles Munch, noted French conductor.

We learned immediately that Mr. Munch is a sensitive and highly gifted musician, a masterly and masterful conductor. We learned he is a musician of poetry and passion, possessing a tremendous capacity for expressing the music with a strong concentration of emotion and highly-charged dramatic contrasts.

* * *

We learned all this chiefly and with stunning impact in the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, which followed a beautifully-proportioned reading of Henri Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne."

The Fifth symphony is thrice-familiar—some of us sighed regretfully when we first heard it was on the program—but even those who had heard it dozens of times found themselves listening eagerly and expectantly, quite undisturbed by its overfamiliarity.

Mr. Munch's tempos were exhilarating. His interpretation had largeness of scale. And from beginning to end, one felt the conductor to be intent on releasing the very essence of the music, that "elan vital" that epitomizes the spirit of Beethoven himself.

Quite carried away, the audience, which included numerous standees, gave conductor and players an ovation.

* * *

For an American work, Mr. Munch chose Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra, composed on commission in 1947 for the Dallas Symphony. The four-movement work is well made, compact, fashioned with Piston's customary respect for form and structure. There's more brain than heart in it.

While Mr. Munch's sweeping temperament had made the symphony come alive and glowing with truth, it made of Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe (Second Suite) an extravagant, though very exciting, piece of theatricalism.

Here we did miss the Boston's old transparency and shimmer of tone, the finely-chiseled clarity. But the interpretation, individual though it was, did not fail of its effect and the audience responded with another prolonged ovation.

* * *

The tall, silver-haired and handsome conductor, with true French gallantry, shared all the many recalls with his orchestra. The men, it must be noted, played all evening with the intent enthusiasm and high standard synonymous with their organization's name. The concert was a Zorah Berry presentation.

[29]

THE MICHIGAN DAILY - OCT. 25

IT LOOKS EASY, BUT JUST TRY IT:

Expert Musician Explains Triangle Technique

By PHOEBE FELDMAN

What's it like to play the triangle with the Boston Symphony?

Students who first exhibited their musical talent by banging the little three-sided instrument may scoff at the poor percussionist who claims to "play" this geometry figure in musical guise.

* * *

BUT LASZLO NAGY, violinist who doubled in triangle for the Symphony's Sunday performance of "Daphnis et Chloe," by Ravel, says there's more to it than meets the unmusical eye.

"There are all kinds of things to consider," he remarked with a smile during a rehearsal intermission. "Most important is the trianglist's timing. Suppose he missed his cue. Imagine hearing the triangle come in brightly on an off-beat just as the rest of the orchestra has begun building a contrasting quiet passage."

And although well-made triangles are pitch-less, you can get different qualities of sound by the way you strike them, Nagy explained. "If you notice, the triangle is not complete—one angle is unfinished to release the sound vibrations. If you hit the triangle near the opening, you'll get one tone quality; if you hit it away from the opening, you'll get another kind of tone."

* * *

"UNLESS YOU HAVE a good sense of color, you're liable to have it sing when you want it to ring," he explained.

"There are other things to consider, too," Nagy concluded.

"There's the angle with which you hit the triangle, and whether you hold the stick loosely or tightly, or high up or low down. And you have to consider how hard you're going to strike it—and on which side of the triangle."

"And finally, you have to consider the size of the triangle, for they vary in size all the way from a tiny two-inch side with an eighth of an inch thick tube to a two-foot sided triangle with an inch and a half diameter."

Nagy was subbing in triangle for percussionist Charles Smith who was kept busy on the drums Sunday keeping a beat for Ravel's impressionist suit.

Students will have another chance to watch some more musical versatility during the Boston Symphony's concert at 8:30 p.m. today in Hill Auditorium.

Three violinists will be playing the saxophone during Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." Also on the program is Beethoven's "Overture" to "Egmont," and his "Symphony No. 7."

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 25

Symphony Gives Crowd a Thrill

Boston Orchestra Given Thunderous Ovation At M. S. C.

The Boston Symphony orchestra with Alsatian-born Charles Munch as conductor was accorded a rousing ovation by last night's audience attending the lecture-concert series at the college auditorium. The program presented to Series A ticketholders was one of the finest to be offered by Michigan State college.

Mr. Munch chose "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem (after Lenau) by Henri Rabaud, as the opening program work. Depicting in music the pilgrimage of Faust on St. John's Eve, "La Procession Nocturne" was played in memory of Mr. Rabaud, former conductor-composer of the Boston Symphony who died recently.

Conductor and orchestra presented next an interesting reading of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67. His interpretation was straightforward, completely free of frivolous affectations and liberties which are sometimes unfortunately attached to this piece.

Walter Piston's "Second Suite" for orchestra with the movements prelude, sarabande, intermezzo, passacaglia and fugue opened the second part of the program. This work revealed the composer's abilities to adapt the 18th century dance forms to contemporary musical idiom.

The Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2 by Ravel has been one of the Boston orchestra's top recordings. Last night's audience found Charles Munch's interpretation equally exciting and effective. As if transformed by a magic wand, "Lever du Jour" (Daybreak) and "Pantomime" became gems of fine delicate shadings and the joyful "Danse Generale," a triumphant orchestral array of tonal color. Responding to the thunderous ovation which followed, Mr. Munch presented to the audience the concertmaster and first flutist as well as the entire orchestra for deserved applause.

Next in the current season of concerts is the Nelson Eddy recital scheduled for Wednesday at 8 p. m. in the college auditorium, a B series attraction.

—REMO GRUA

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 23 1949

Boston Director

Charles Munch, Frenchman, making musical news in his new post as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will direct this famous ensemble Monday at 8:15 o'clock in the Michigan State college auditorium. He appears on the concert-lecture course of the college.

MUSIC

MUSICIANS and concert goers alike sat astounded by the Sunday evening performance of the Boston Symphony. Throughout the audience one felt an electric concentration on this marvel of music that silenced even the usual dry coughers.

Charles Muench has taken the already fine Boston Symphony and brought it to even greater heights. Always noted for its precision, the orchestra has achieved under Muench a refreshing clarity. Every tone, each attack was distinctly heard.

The programming was excellent. Muench's choice of a French composition, Raubaud's "La Procession Nocturne," was a fitting introduction. The unfamiliar music was harmonically rich, the interpretation warm and lucid. The Piston "Symphonic Suite" suffered in comparison with the other compositions. The audience was caught off guard in the finale. They expected more, both in quantity and quality. The Ravel, however, was very well received as well as superbly played. Laurent's tone did special justice to the flute solos.

Greatest surprise of the evening was Muench's interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Most performances of the so-called standard works are played in the same old way, differing only in the technical perfection of the orchestration, but this time Beethoven spoke with a new voice. Gone was the usual ponderous Wagnerian style. Muench conducted an intense but lyric Beethoven.

Beg, borrow or filch a ticket for tonight's Boston Symphony concert. If the orchestra gives half as good a performance as they did Sunday evening, you can't afford to miss it.

—Dolores Oates.

[30]

ANN ARBOR NEWS

Boston Orchestra Records Triumph Under Muench

By Carl Gehring

Last evening's concert at Hill Auditorium may be described as a musical constellation, so out of this world it seemed. The impact of this concert as a whole, moreover, can be likened to the effect of viewing a constellation on a beautiful star-lit evening; as to its details, the concert glittered with the individual aura which each star contributes to the radiance of a constellation-entire. Such was one's reaction to the stellar brand of music presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Muench, in the third of the season's Choral Union concerts.

Muench a year ago gave us a foretaste of what we might expect when he took over the helm of the Boston Orchestra upon Serge Koussevitzky's retirement; his conducting of the National Orchestra of France in a brilliant concert stamped him as a man of great drive and impeccable artistry whose evident stature made him a worthy successor to Koussevitzky as the leader of one of the country's finest orchestras. As Muench's music had proved so palatable to local music lovers last year, so it was last evening when the response of a capacity house to his inspired directing was quite overwhelming.

Program Changed

A change in the program brought us a performance of Henri Rabaud's Symphonic Poem "La Procession Nocturne," which was substituted for the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" as the opening selection. Welcome as a long-overdue hearing of the "Euryanthe" might have been, a performance of Rabaud's composition was even more so by reason of its unfamiliarity. Rabaud, incidentally, who died in France on Sept. 8, had conducted the Boston Orchestra during the 1918-1919 season. In any case, "La Procession Nocturne" turned out to be an exquisitely wrought example of French writing, wherein a modest opening led to a broader middle section of considerable tension.

Here in this entrancing work the keynote to the evening was established: the composition as a whole was finely realized and with minute attention to detail. With much less going on than transpires in much of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet Suite No. 2, with which the concert ended, Rabaud's score is quite transparent and thereby afforded the hearer a most engaging auditory look, as it were, at the masterful way in which the performance was worked out. Details may be lost in the shuffle in more elaborate works, but in a piece like this they are crystal-clear, and here their realization must have constituted a perfectionist's delight.

Beethoven Symphony

A god-like performance of the Fifth Symphony by music's great Titan, Ludwig van Beethoven, followed, and most Olympian was Muench in his control of the forces under his command. His tempi in the first and last movements were interesting, with the opening movement taken faster than the writer ever recalls hearing and the coda of the finale speeded up to a point almost det[rimental] to instrumental v[irtuosity]. These movements, howe[ver] tremendously effective bursting with vitali[ty]. Theme and Varia[tions] ond movement.

were worked out with scholarly acumen, and permeated with all of the haunting beauty inherent in their pages.

The Second Suite for Orchestra, by the American Walter Piston, was heard after the intermission. Here, as in the Rabaud Symphonic Poem, one's chief preoccupation was with the composition by reason of its unfamiliarity. Like the Toccata by Piston which Muench and the French Orchestra played a year ago, this Suite did not seem so modern in idiom as some of the composer's earlier writings. Structurally, thematically and harmonically interesting, it had moments of considerable dramatic power, the effects of which were heightened by some brilliant orchestration, with the use of the brass choir especially noteworthy.

Concert Ends With Ravel

A stunning performance of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" then concluded the concert on a powerful note. While lustrous strings, pellucid woodwinds and an authoritative brass section and battery had been evident all evening long, these elements had their full say in the climactic measures which conclude the Ravel Suite in a frenzy of orchestral fireworks. This brought down the house. Muench, recalled many times at the close, called on First Flutist Georges Laurent to take a bow for his masterful playing of an extraordinary solo passage which is one of the features of the work.

Orchestrally, then, the concert provided its hearers with a heavenly experience. The occasional vocal accompaniments, however, from an inspired director somewhat clouded the effect of the music. If Muench must sing while he conducts, may we suggest the use of mutes?

Social Leaders Hail Boston Symphony

Festive Crowd Gives Ovation To Conductor

By FRANCES D'HONDT

THE GLITTERING EVENING gowns and sleek fud wraps of Mayfairites as they stepped from their limousines in front of Masonic Temple Saturday evening provided a brilliant prelude to the magnificent concert that followed under the baton of the forceful Charles Munch.

That devotees of classical music were thrilled with the superb presentation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and the works of Piston and Ravel by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was manifested by the uproarious bravos and cheers that recalled the musicians for numerous bows.

Shortly before the start of the concert a standing room only sign was posted.

Mrs. Wilson W. Mills and her companions arrived just in the nick of time to be seated in their boxes before the first note was played.

Glamorous Group

Adding luster to an already glamorous group were the Owen Skeltons, Mr. and Mrs. Haldeman Finnie, John Coulter, Mrs. Eva D. Worcester and Mrs. Mills. The party dined at the Sunningdale drive home of Mrs. Worcester beforehand.

Mrs. Joseph Schlotman, after rising with the appreciative audience in tribute to a fine musical performance, turned to her friends and chuckling, told them how she had lost her tickets, and only through some frantic telephoning in the afternoon had rectified the mishap.

With her were Mr. and Mrs. Hiram H. Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Cameron B. Waterman, Mrs. Allen F. Edwards and Mr. and Mrs. John B. Ford Jr. Before the concert the group dined at the E. Jefferson home of Mr. and Mrs. Ford.

Mrs. Stoepel Hostess

Mrs. Ralph Stoepel entertained at a dinner party in her Touraine road home. Arriving at Masonic Temple with Mrs. Stoepel were Mrs. Richard P. Joy, Mrs. B. S. Warren and Mrs. Wood Williams.

An early arrival was Mrs. Henry B. Joy along with Mrs. Charles A. Metcalf.

Mrs. Griffith Ogden Ellis and her houseguest Mrs. J. B. Lahr of Troy, N. Y., came with Mrs. W. W. Chapin.

Seated together were Mrs. E. S. Barbour, William B. Barbour and Mrs. William Chittden.

Others were Mrs. Edward P. Hammond and Mrs. J. D. Rucker.

Spotted during intermission: Marguerite Stroh, Christine Symington, Mrs. Alger Shelden, Mrs. Fred T. Murphy and her granddaughter, Frances Boyer; Mrs. John S. Newberry and John S. Newberry Jr., Mrs. Frank Coolidge and the Davis Moreigns.

Boston Orchestra Presents Another Splendid Concert

(Editor's note: Confusion has arisen over the spelling of Charles Munch's name, owing to the fact that the "u" in Munch takes an umlaut. Thus the spelling of Munch's name has appeared in The News as Munch and Muench, the latter in an attempt to reproduce the sound of the umlaut "u". To end the confusion, The News referred the matter to George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was advised that Munch had been decided upon as the spelling recommended by the Boston Symphony Orchestra).

* * *

By Carl Gehring

Twice within 48 hours it has been our good fortune to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With the memory of an outstanding Sunday evening concert, third of the Choral Union series, still in our minds, Charles Munch and the Boston Orchestra returned to Hill Auditorium last evening to edify us anew in the second concert of the Extra Concert Series. As was the case on the previous occasion, superlatives again are in order in a report on musical proceedings. As a matter of fact, the orchestra sounded just a bit better than it did on Sunday, if this were possible.

Heard at this time were the Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84, by Beethoven; the same composer's Symphony No. 7 in A Major, Op. 92, and the "Symphonia Domestica," Op. 53, by Richard Strauss. Incidentally, the hearing of a composition apiece by two composers who so recently had died, a work by Henri Rabaud on Sunday evening and Strauss' score on this occasion, was eminently fitting and lent a further unity to two programs each of which had featured a symphony by Beethoven.

Beethoven Overture

The note of the prodigious, evident throughout the performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony on Sunday, sounded forcefully in the dramatic music of "Egmont." The introduction to this Overture was a masterpiece of plan and integration; the way it led into the main body of the work had all the earmarks of inevitability as it carried the hearer along. Great music was germinating, to flower fully as the Overture and the evening progressed. In slow tempo, perfectly poised and gorgeously intoned, what a prelude this was to a concert of such magnitude!

The succeeding allegro, with all the force and promise of such an introduction as a spur, ebbed and flowed in mighty crescendi and decrescendi as Munch, a top-flight conductor if ever there was, guided the orchestra to objectives which only the great may attain. A magnificent pause, just before the chords in the woodwinds that bridge over into the coda, was full of implications. No music was sounded, yet how musical it was, conveying as much to the hearer as the unspoken word may in speech. A brilliant coda then was run off with great elan with every note as clear as a bell.

Symphony Is Charming

The performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was completely charming. The work, identified as the "Dance" Symphony by reason of its vigorous rhythms and characterized by Wagner as "the Apotheosis of Dance herself," reveals an entirely different side of Beethoven than does his Symphony No. 5, which was heard Sunday. It is a lighter side, but nonetheless effective. Here, as in the preceding Overture, a finely stated introduction got matters off to a good start. The intonations in the wood choir were exquisite, with the upward working of the strings hinting pregnantly at the dance rhythms to follow.

With these rhythms once established in the spirited Vivace which follows, Munch showed himself to be just as adept at handling Beethoven in a fanciful mood as he had been with Beethoven in the epic and heroic. The element of contrast was managed with fine subtlety in the first movement, in which both principal themes are in the character of a dance, and again in the second movement, wherein a prevailing rhythm might lead to monotony in less skillful hands. The graver mood of this more subdued Allegretto was beautifully projected, moreover, while the voicing of the wind instruments over plucked strings in the coda left an impression which one retained long after the concert had ended.

Strauss Symphonia

In the Strauss "Symphonia Domestica," witty, sophisticated and, at times, dazzlingly brilliant, Munch and his players had a workout which showed them to be equal to the orchestral acrobatics which any of our cleverest modern composers might devise. With such perfection did these musicians thread the mazes of this complicated score that one was all but blinded to its effectiveness as music by the flashing of such technique. This, of course, raises a question of aesthetics which scarcely can be developed here, but the feat of this performance was the chief impression one had of Strauss' music.

An observation on the Sunday evening concert, of the overall perfection of this orchestra's playing and its minute attention to detail, is particularly applicable to the "Symphonia Domestica." Details of especial interest involved the oboe d'amore, which sounded well indeed in voicing the child's theme, and the four saxophones, which were used in the optional parts that Strauss has indicated. In larger perspectives, the full-orchestra passages were galvanic and awe-inspiring, and kept in perfect balance by a conductor of the foremost rank.

MUSIC

THE SECOND CONCERT of the Boston Symphony proved to be a most interesting experience, which showed what Charles Muench has done with the orchestra both technically and interpretively since his appointment.

The first half of the program was devoted to performance of Beethoven's Egmont Overture and Seventh Symphony in A major. In both of these there was ample drive and energy, but it was of a hectic and nervous sort. Muench always seemed to be grabbing violently at the music instead of gripping it solidly. What we objected to, then, was the lack of what can be called German weightiness which is so evident in the work of such men as Mengelberg and Furtwangler.

On the credit side, it must be said that there was superb clarity throughout both performances, with the brasses being particularly laudable.

In the Symphony there was an unmistakable logic. Muench chose to pace the first movement fast, and so, to maintain his original impression, kept the whole thing a little faster than is usually heard. This may have been detrimental in certain spots, but it created a feeling of unity throughout

The second half of the program was devoted to a performance of Strauss' Symphonia Domestica. This is rather spotty work, with pages of the familiar Strauss genius but with many more of sheer slickness and bombast. It is supposed to depict the life of a family, but it might just as well have represented a phrenetic day in Macy's basement.

One might not have entirely agreed with Muench's interpretations but it must be admitted that he was at all times vital and stimulating. It was this that really made the concert a success, and it is in this respect that the orchestra, in my opinion, has improved.

—Harris Crohn.

Big Crowd Is Stirred by Munch

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN

A CROWD which filled the pit and mustered several hundred standees and certainly totalled a full 5,000 came to the Masonic Auditorium, Saturday evening, for the Boston Symphony's first Detroit visit under its new conductor, Charles Munch. This throng was also from Missouri, having long worshipped at the shrine of Sergei Koussevitzky, from whose venerable hand Munch took the Boston baton, at the close of last season. The mood of the evening's beginning was: Who dares to dares to stand where the great man stood?

Well—it wasn't long before this stately, dubious audience was behaving like a crowd at a wrestling match. For Munch poured such remarkable lashings of vigor into the famous Bostonian cauldron; he endowed a chestnut like Beethoven's Fifth with such astonishing speed and such breathtaking series of novel accents; he smote a great symphonic instrument with such strong, sure fingers; that the only valid response seemed to be to stand up and cheer.

* * *

NOT THE MOST DEEPLY committed of Koussevitzky's votaries could deny that Detroit's first adventure with his successor was a time of excitement, far beyond what is reasonably expected at a symphony concert.

One might conceivably argue that Beethoven's Allegro had dynamics that declined almost to silence and generally pursued a pace which seemed more like a tour-de-force than an interpretation. But the result stirred 5,000 pulses. And the greatest traditionalist in the hall must have felt that not in years and years has anybody topped Munch's magnificent presentation of that great musical moment when the dry, cynical perplexity of the third movement is swallowed up in the enormous, confident proclamation of the fourth.

Moreover, these orthodox citizens surely never heard that swift pattern by the low string which is nicknamed the Dance of the Elephants, come out so crisply and clearly.

* * *

BEETHOVEN'S FIFTH was, of course, Munch's test-piece, because everybody knows it backwards and is able to draw contrasts. But the whole program was in this same spirit of speed, virility and shrewdly calculated emotion.

The evening began with Henri Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," a work about 50 years old which indicates some of the strong beginnings of modernity, but greatly challenges neither conductor nor orchestra. The second half began with the Second Suite for Orchestra, by the American Walter Piston, Koussevitzky's protege long ago, who comprehends his instruments as well as anybody alive. Munch there exhibited every, last subtle resource of his great organization.

And the occasion closed with the "Daphnis and Chloe" Second Suite by Ravel, another chestnut; and everything felt about the Beethoven was felt again in the Ravel. Space forbids more detail. But mark down Munch as a great mans worthy successor; more inclined to "effects" than some, a man of drama, assuredly, but seeking and achieving the valid result, however surprising the route he follows. Did you ever hear a conductor use his brass for timbre, instead of for dominance? That man is Munch.

Detroiters Welcome Boston Symphony in Music Season Opening

BY MARGUERITE RILEY
Free Press Society Editor

A warm welcome to Boston's famous symphony orchestra was extended Saturday night at Masonic Temple by Detroiters whose craving for good music has been intensified by the absence of their own symphonic aggregation.

Denied the luxury of weekly concert trips here in Detroit, music lovers enthusiastically thronged the auditorium to applaud Charles Munch in his first appearance on the podium before the impressive Boston orchestra, opening the winter's Major Symphony Series.

Nothing quite matches a Saturday night event downtown, anyway, and Detroiters matched their mood to the glitter of the premiere.

The John B. Fords, Jr., arrived at the Temple with a group of friends who were their dinner guests beforehand. Mrs. Ford, who favors black for evening, wore a brief mink jacket over her dinner frock.

In the same party were Mr. and Mrs. Hiram H. Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Cameron B. Waterman, Mrs. Joseph B. Schlotman and Mrs. Allen F. Edwards — all of whom found their places in a box on the right-hand side of the Temple's rectangular horseshoe.

MRS. STANDISH BACKUS also entertained at dinner in her home before the opening. Her guests were Mrs. J. Bell Moran, Mrs. R. Boyer Miller, Mrs. Julian P. Bowen and Mr. and Mrs. Charles K. Backus.

Young Mr. and Mrs. Backus returned home with Mrs. Bowen to spend the night, returning to their Birmingham residence on Sunday.

A smoke gray crepe dinner gown, its bolero jacket intricately fastened with gray frogs, was chosen by Mrs. Eva Doty Worcester for the concert.

She arrived at the auditorium with Mr. and Mrs. Haldeman Finnie (the latter wearing black under her black Persian jacket), Mr. and Mrs. Owen R. Skelton and Mrs. Wilson W. Mills, whose husband had to miss the concert because of a flu attack.

Mrs. Skelton's choice of dinner gowns was a floating chiffon and lace model in a delicate heliotrope shade.

* * *

MRS. HENRY B. JOY and Mrs. Charles H. Metcalf arrived together from dinner at the Detroit Club, Mrs. Joy wearing her favorite shade of gray.

Other season subscribers on hand were Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert Pingree and Mr. and Mrs. David B. Moreing, Mrs. Moreing wearing a mink stole over dark green frock which was imprinted with a black scroll design.

Attending with Mrs. C. Edmund Delbos were her son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Fuger, and another threesome was made up of Mrs. G. Ogden Ellis and her house guest, Mrs. J. B. Lahr, of Troy, N. Y., and Mrs. W. W. Chapin.

Mrs. Alexander W. Blain and Mrs. James E. Atkinson sat together, both electing black dinner frocks under fur jackets for the concert.

Among the members of the younger crowd on hand for the concert were Lydia Kerr and Stan Day. We saw them rushing to their seats just before the opening number.

Free Press Photos by Ray Glonka

MRS. J. B. WATERMAN, H. H. WALKER, MRS. A. F. EDWARDS AND MRS. J. B. SCHLOTMAN Hear Boston Symphony under Munch's baton

LYDIA KERR AND STAN DAY
Hurry to concert seats

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
OCT 24 1949

KOUSSEVITZKY SUCCESSOR

New Boston Conductor Is Hailed

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN
Free Press Music Critic

Detroit has had its second experience of the conducting prowess of Charles Munch and is obviously well satisfied.

The French conductor, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his baton, opened the series of concert's by major orchestras at Masonic Temple.

He was heard once before at Music Hall when the French National Orchestra visited this country.

His concert Saturday night was played before an audience of approximately 5,000. The virility and energy of his conducting raised an unparalleled pitch of excitement among them.

* * *

THE BEETHOVEN Fifth Symphony, which we had contemplated in advance with no appreciable rise of blood pressure, was an entirely new experience.

The novelty of the performance, though, had nothing to do with any especially trick treatment.

It was largely a matter of pace, within which the masterful Boston Symphony contained everything dynamic of the great C-minor symphony.

The performance was a classical example of the difference between mere accurate speed and the quality of storming energy. True, a speed beyond anything yet heard here in this work was evident throughout.

* * *

IT WAS A tempo, however, that remained proportionate through all movements, and sacrificed nothing to expression and clarity. The orchestra sang at all times, even in the gruff beginning in the deep strings of the canon of the scherzo.

The symphony, played just before intermission, caused the audience to talk of nothing else in the foyer. No doubt they will be discussing it for many a day to come.

Munch paid tribute to the land of his nativity with the performance of a half-century old composition by Henri Benjamin Rabaud. In the light of contemporary composition, the "Procession Nocturne" was not particularly impressive.

As a forerunner of the impressionistic school that was to develop later, it was interesting.

* * *

A WORK BY the contemporary American, Walter Piston, was received only politely. It was a brilliant display piece for orchestral virtuosity, but rather sterile at first hearing.

The title, Second Suite for Orchestra, covered four sections, ending with a clever Passacaglia and Fugue.

The works which brought cheers from the audience were the Beethoven symphony and a blazing performance of Ravel's second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

Under Munch, it is quite possible the orchestra is taking on a character at variance with that developed by Koussevitzky. The first hearing in Detroit would indicate that the Bostonians will be equally esteemed.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
OCT 24 1949

A Review

Munch Puts Own Stamp On Boston Symphony

CHARLES MUNCH, leading the great Boston Symphony for the first time in Detroit, drew a capacity crowd to Masonic Auditorium Saturday evening.

Any one attempting to fill the shoes of Serge Koussevitzky would be inviting disastrous comparison, in our estimation. Munch wisely doesn't try. He dons new shoes all his own and doesn't attempt to make the orchestra sound just the way it did under Koussevitzky.

They're of different temperaments. Where Koussevitzky commands, Munch exhorts. Where Koussevitzky is analytical, Munch is impassioned. The orchestra just now isn't the perfect instrument it was under Koussevitzky. We don't think the men have quit become accustomed to Munch.

But we think that ultimately hi musicianship is such that he wil create his own formula fo making the Boston Symphon sound perfect.

His conducting—and the men' playing— of the second "Daphni and Chloe" suite is one of th great musical thrills we've ex perienced. Munch seems at his bes in music such as this, wherein th very violence of his body move ments serve to clarify musica patterns for the audience and shape them for his musicians.

We were impressed by his conducting of Beethoven's overworked Fifth Symphony. There was boundless energy and there was also tremendous rhythmic excitement so that it was also a thrilling performance.

HARVEY TAYLOR

[32]

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

OCT 27 1949

Boston Symphony Shows New Flavor Under Munch Baton

Reviewer Finds Old Internal Precision Of Koussevitzky Lacking; Vigor Added

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, was presented in the Peristyle last night on the Museum of Art Blue Series. The program:

Symphonic Poem, La Procession Nocturne ..... Rabaud
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67 ..... Beethoven
Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53 Strauss

By ALINE JEAN TREANOR
Blade Staff Writer

By Toledo yardstick, Charles Munch is no longer "new" conductor of the Boston. Having now led it in some 20 concerts, he and his players have had as much seasoning together as the Toledo Orchestra and its new conductor will have in two seasons.

But the Munch-Boston "combo" was new to Toledo, and novelty increased interest and excitement.

Absent was that long initial Koussevitzky down beat; surprising, almost premature, seemed the quick Munch signal. Oh, the orchestra made it, every time, but not without giving the observant a syncopated heartbeat. It set up odds, gave zest to listening.

Seating Has Changed

Seating has been changed. Violas, 'cellos, basses, massed to front right, bespoke new domination, new virile authority, especially in the Trio of the Beethoven Fifth. Violins behind the graying Burgin gave out with the same ravishing tone of old. Virtuosity of the low brasses (in the Strauss) raised the question, but not too seriously—had they been passed trumpet parts by mistake?

The new oboe player's tone was seductive, dropped few hints of newness. Flutes, clarinets, piccolos, bassoons, blew their same unworldly winds, ventilating the ensemble with fresh currents from never-never lands.

Never was the percussion more subtle, more insinuating, more insistent. All was much as Mr. Munch was asking, with his six feet and more of stature; with the same dynamic vigor we saw last year when he conducted the National Orchestra of France; with the same projection of a personality that we do not yet quite know in the U.S.A., but can look forward with pleasure to knowing better.

Tantalizing ears, as in the late Koussevitzky era, was the 444 pitch, four vibrations higher than we're used to.

Only A Swallow

Yes, it was the same old Boston—all 110 pieces of it—yet with differences. What we had was only a swallow—no long drink. Ultimate conclusions would be gratuitous. But if this reviewer's sign reading is any good, the Boston is in early process of demechanization and rehumanization. From a magnificent, powerful, precision machine built for one-man control, it is reverting to the status of a band of players granted a new boon—that of pleasure in their music making.

It long had been speculated that the Boston's perfectibility had been pushed to the limit and that audiences were feeling diminishing returns. Mr. Munch, it seemed last night, was not so much concerned with the internals of perfection as with the outwardness of the music. He seemed even to allow himself to be stirred by it, and this communicated to players, and also to a highly responsive audience that was fertilized in every section by discriminating knowledgeable listeners.

For the second time in a young season, this reviewer has used up allotted inches reviewing conductor, orchestra, audience. This is a sin against music reviewing that will have to be expiated soon in a Sunday column. We've heard symphonic music that was great, that was precious, that was stimulating, that was grand scale tomfoolery, that was withal rare and beautiful. More about it anon.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

OCT 30 1949

New Organ to Be Heard At Special Concert

The program has been announced for the special concert to be given by Charles Muench, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and E. Power Biggs in Symphony Hall, Monday night, Nov. 14. Mr. Biggs will give the new Aeolian-Skinner organ its first complete hearing in solo numbers and orchestral concertos.

Proceeds of the concert will be donated to the Albert Schweitzer Hospital in French Equatorial Africa in recognition of the great Bach scholar, organist, physician and humanitarian who, when he visited this country last Summer, inspected and autographed the new organ at the factory.

The organ, combining in its 4,000 stops the qualities of the instruments of the classic and romantic eras, is accounted one of the finest in existence. It has been built in celebration of the 50th year of Symphony Hall as the official auditorium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and figured in the opening program of the season.

Muench

One of the features of the benefit program will be the first performance of Josef Haydn's "Concerto for Organ and Orchestra," the original manuscript of which recently was discovered in Vienna. The second number will be the "Organ Concerto" of Paul Hindemith, the composer who is spending the Winter at Harvard on a visiting fellowship. A group of solo numbers will include Bach's "Fantasy and Fugue in G Minor;" Haydn's suite, "The Musical Clocks," originally written for a flute organ in a mechanical clock; Dupre's "Variations on a Noel" and Raubke's "Sonata in C Minor."

The program will close with the "Concerto for Organ, Strings and Kettle Drums" by Francis Poulenc. This work, now a favorite in the United States, had its first performance in Paris under Mr. Muench.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 31 1949

Boston Symphony Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the programs for the first two concerts of its annual series at Carnegie Hall, which will mark its first New York appearances under the conductorship of Charles Munch. On Wednesday night, Nov. 9, the program includes Henri Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," Walter Piston's second suite, the first New York performance of Jolivet's concerto for Ondes Martenot, an electrically operated and controlled instrument, and Beethoven's seventh symphony. Ginette Martenot, sister of the inventor of the Ondes, Maurice Martenot, will be the soloist in the concerto. The program for Saturday afternoon, Nov. 12, consists of Ernest Munch's arrangement of Bach's "Art of the Fugue" and Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica."

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

OCT 27 1949

Boston Symphony Pleases With Fine, Complete Concert

By FREDERICK KOUNTZ

After an absence of several years the Boston Symphony returned to the Museum of Art last evening under its new conductor, Charles Munch. What was first impressive to one who has to meet an early deadline was the excellent length of the program—it was the first complete concert that this reviewer has heard for many months. Mr. Munch directed the orchestra in Henri Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, and the Symphonia Domestica of Richard Strauss.

Each year much is written about the wonders of the Boston Orchestra. What is not often remarked about is the position of the orchestra in its own city. In Boston it is not simply an orchestra but an integral part of the cultural life of the city. And as such it carries everywhere the responsibility of adhering to higher standards of performance than most other orchestras even approach.

In addition there has always been in its playing the kind of spontaniety that is the product of long association between conductor and orchestra. For 25 years the players were with Koussevitzky. That such spontaniety was apparent in their playing last night was very likely due to the assurance in conductor and players that, barring an act of God, they will spend another 25 years with Munch. That's the way the Boston Orchestra functions.

We might speak of Mr. Munch's interpretation of the symphony as Gallic Beethoven. It was more finely drawn, thinner toned than we are accustomed to hear. Perhaps at first it seemed too thin. But, always with a precise delineation, it gained in sweep and power. And in the finale the first measures that burst forth with the trombones at the end of the transition from the scherzo with its swiftly cumulative crescendo were, it seemed to me an indescribable climax. And above all the whole interpretation being all of one piece and aware of the total architecture at a stage of its development, mad sense.

Of all the tone poems of Straus the Symphonia Domestica closely followed by the Alpin Symphony, is the least popula It is long and elaborate. It goe on and on without being pa ticularly memorable at an point. Whether Mr. Munch in cluded the work in his progran as a memorial to Strauss or a the piece which was the mos fitting vehicle upon which to dis play the brilliance of his or chestra is immaterial. In any event no evil is ever done t the score.

The performance was incom parably virtuosic. And not in any derogatory sense. For the whole piece was brightened and given a stature larger than Strauss could have contemplated. In matters of tone, of balance, of explicit statement, of sheer excellence of playing individually and collectively, this was an electrifying experience.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The symphony concerts, interrupted by the orchestra's Western trip, were resumed yesterday afternoon. This week sees the beginning of the observances in honor of Bach, who died on July 28, 1750, the first and major part of the current program being given over to that composer's "The Art of Fugue," as arranged for orchestra by Ernest Munch, a cousin of the conductor. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is the other item.

Save for the Chorale Prelude, "When we are in greatest need," which yesterday followed it, "The Art of Fugue" was Bach's last work. Because of failing eyesight he was unable to complete it, and yesterday's performance stopped at the spot where he laid down his pen. The Chorale Prelude, by the way, was not performed by the orchestra but on the organ by E. Power Biggs. Two of the fugues in this mighty work on a single subject and in a single tonality, D minor, were designed for two pianos. The others bear no instrumental indication, and some have thought that Bach did not intend them for performance at all but only for study. Some sort of arrangement is therefore necessary, and hereabouts we have heard the transcription for chamber orchestra by Wolfgang Graeser, the version for string quartet by Roy Harris and Mr. Bigg's version for organ solo.

The entire work was not heard yesterday and what was played consumed, together with the Chorale Prelude, 55 minutes. Thanks to the adroit orchestration of Ernest Munch, tonal variety offset the monotony of tonality. There was also a very beautiful and sympathetic performance. Those who had their music in their hands, and this reviewer was one, could let the eye supplement the ear. And it would be a remarkable ear that could take in all of the ingenuities of Bach's counterpoint. In fact, certain features of it cannot be grasped that way. The composer's purpose was to subject this single and necessarily simple fugue theme to virtually all the devices of counterpoint and fugal writing. But the work transcends mere ingenuity. In it resides a high degree of beauty. One might almost say the highest degree; and yesterday's performance was a memorable and impressive experience.

With Beethoven, as we have now seen in the Eighth, Fifth and Seventh Symphonies, Mr. Munch's way is dynamic and forthright. By such treatment the Fifth benefitted most, the Eighth least, with the Seventh in between. The finale was excitingly accomplished and called forth shouts of approval. But there is more in the Allegretto than was revealed yesterday. Distinctly, the afternoon belonged to Bach.

MUSIC

Bach's "Art of Fugue" and Beethoven Symphony No. 7 Given by Munch

By CYRUS DURGIN

The pattern of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts takes on a different design this week. Without making any radical change, conductor Charles Munch is turning to unfamiliar sources for his novel music.

Yesterday afternoon and tonight he conducts most of that monument to contrapuntal genius: Bach's "The Art of Fugue"; next week Munch will introduce an electrical instrument, the martenot, unknown here.

"The Art of Fugue," consisting of fugues and canons, has been known to musicians as the ultimate example of technical skill in manipulating the various devices of counterpoint. It was Bach's last major work, composed probably in the last two years of his life, perhaps with no thought of actual performance, and certainly with no indications of how they were to be played.

Various hands have made arrangements for string quartet, orchestra and organ. The one used by Charles Munch is by his cousin. Ernest Munch, for a fairly extensive orchestra and organ.

This is a wonderful arrangement, a model of taste, style and musical understanding, that encompasses Nos. 1, 3, 2, 4, 9, 10, 8, 11 and 19 of the counterpoints, in that order. Omitted are the remaining "contrapuncti," the piece for two claviers and the canons.

Ernest Munch achieved a nicely varied tonal texture by setting out the first four counterpoints for strings alone (in four parts), adding wind instruments for the next three, and bringing in the organ for the final two.

The 19th counterpoint was left unfinished, because Bach's blindness intervened. For conclusion, Ernest Munch has coupled on Bach's final work, the chorale-prelude, dictated in blindness not long before death, "When We Are in Greatest Need." Played by the organ alone, for the most part softly, the chorale-prelude brings a marvelous touch of serene finality.

All this takes an hour to play, but it is no burden, for the expressive qualities of "The Art of Fugue"—apart from its technical skill—are great, indeed.

It is, perhaps, the quintessence of Bach, put in instrumental terms which he himself, conceivably, might have chosen were such resources available in his time. The performance was masterly, including E. Power Biggs' share at the console.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony made the rest of the program, played with tempi on the fast side, including the celebrated allegretto, and with superb clarity and lightness of touch.

The long lines of the phrasing and the sustained but not thumping rhythms of Munch's reading were distinctive and completey enjoyable.

Speed ran away with him in the finale, which ended in a race for the final chord, but that was the only blemish. From first and almost to last, a memorable concert!

Miss Vada R. Ward And Mr. M'Fadden, Of State Dept., Wed

Documentary Film Writer Bride; Husband Chief of Motion Picture Division

FAIRFIELD, Conn., Oct. 29. — Miss Vada Roberts Ward, of New York, daughter of Mrs. Sula De-Walt Hile, of Seattle, and the late Malcolm Geoffrey Ward, of Stockton, Calif., was married this afternoon in Greenfield Hill Congregational Church to Mr. Hamilton MacFadden, of New York, son of the late Rev. Robert Andrew MacFadden and the late Edith Hamilton MacFadden, of Boston. The Rev. Leon Dean, pastor, performed the ceremony.

The bride was given in marriage by her brother-in-law, Mr. Bronson Jones, of Bridgeport, and her sister, Mrs. Jones, was matron of honor. Marchita Jones was flower girl. Mr. Herbert T. Edwards, of Washington, was best man.

Mrs. MacFadden, a graduate of the College of the Pacific, was formerly a reporter on the "Times-Herald," Washington and, in 1945, went to Europe as a civilian with the Army public relations department. Later she was assistant chief of information of the Army Theater Special Services in Europe. She has since been a writer of documentary films.

Mr. MacFadden, Harvard alumnus, is a former Hollywood motion picture producer and director. He is now associate chief of the International Motion Picture Division of the State Department.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the third concert of its 69th season in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:
The Art of Fugue.....J. S. Bach
(arranged for orchestra by Ernest Munch)
Symphony No. 7 in A, Op. 92..Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE

This was, in every sense of the word, a memorable concert. It combined two of the masterworks of the two towering giants of music performed by an orchestra which in all its long career never played more perfectly and it was conducted by Mr. Munch with a matchless sense of artistry and creative vigor.

Curiously enough the word "fugue" frightens many listeners, though why it should any more than "rondo" or "sonata" I cannot quite see. On hearing the word many instantly assume they are about to be spanked with some fierce musico-geometrical weapon and prepare in advance like a child stuffing his pants with a pillow by determining not to allow themselves to be seduced into thinking this is music come what may. But the fugue, in the hands of Bach (and for that matter of Beethoven) is one of the most exalted musical forms ever devised.

Faithful Texture

That Bach's fugues, like those contained in "The Art of Fugue" are also technical constructions of almost unimaginable skill, is entirely beside the point and need only interest those devoted to the analysis of subjects, inversions, stretti and whatnot. The fact is—and I am certain all but a few in the audience realized it yesterday—the fugue can be one of the most enjoyable experiences in all music. All that is needed is a musical memory sufficiently sustaining to hold in mind one or two different melodies (to be able to hold four is even better) and ears alert enough to penetrate inside a musical texture consisting of four (or fewer) voices proceeding in linear fashion.

Yet even without this capacity, most listeners would find "The Art of Fugue" a great experience in Ernest Munch's setting for orchestra. Drawing upon Bach's own examples in, for example, the B minor Mass, Mr. Munch (the conductor's cousin) has clothed this work in textures at once faithful to the spirit of the composer and beautiful to the ear. He uses only about half of the entire work, which was Bach's final major composition and was left unfinished, and rearranges the order of the individual fugues in order to set forth a cumulative design.

He begins with a string quartet and, as the work progresses, adds the full string choir, then the woodwinds brasses and finally the organ. Preceding the final figure where, before he lay aside his pen forever, Bach spelled out his own name in musical notes, Mr. Munch spoke to the audience to underline the significance of the uncompleted masterpiece. As the work came to its unfulfilled end, the orchestra remained silent as E. Power Biggs performed on the organ the chorale "When in the Hour of Deepest Need," which was dictated by the blind Bach to his son-in-law on his deathbed. It is a tremendous piece of music in an extraordinarily beautiful setting and the first desk men and members of the orchestra gave it a truly marvelous performance.

Happy Choice

After this the Beethoven Seventh could not have been a happier choice. I can recall but few performances that have approached Mr. Munch's for breadth of vision, for elan, for power and for overall dramatic impetus.

The conductor, clearly now at home with the orchestra and it with him, all but visually choreographs the musical phrases, the rises and falls of the musical tensions. It was an exciting performance, but one informed with musical sensibility of the very highest order.

Next week we are to hear, for the first time, a new musical instrument known as an Ondes Martenot, for which Jolivet has composed a concerto. It, whatever it may be, will be played by Ginette Martenot, for whom it was named. The program begins with Mozart's "Prague" Symphony and ends with

Art of Fugue' at Symphony

Beethoven's Seventh Conducted by Munch

By L. A. Sloper

Charles Munch listed for his third pair of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Bach's "The Art of Fugue" (arranged for orchestra by the conductor's cousin, Ernest Munch), and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. E. Power Biggs was at the organ in the Bach.

Bach's monumental work was left uncompleted. The composer was halted by the loss of his sight after he had set down and developed three themes (the last on the letters of his name). Therefore it has become customary to complete the work with a Chorale prelude, "Wenn wir in höchsten Nothen sein," which he dictated afterwards, and which was actually his last work. This Chorale was played at this concert by Mr. Biggs as a Finale.

♪ ♪ ♪

Mr. Munch did not, however, include the entire "Art of Fugue." Several fugues and canons were omitted. But enough was performed to occupy about an hour of playing time and to tax, perhaps, the attention of some listeners, although there was warm applause at the end.

Bach planned "The Art of Fugue" as a demonstration of every device used in the fugue. But, being the master musician that he was, he accomplished much more than that. Besides illustrating the possibilities of augmentation, diminution, inversion and so on, he wrote music of extraordinary beauty as well as fascinating design.

The fugues on the main subject and a variant thereof, and their inversions; a double fugue, and another on the inversion of its subjects, and a triple fugue with another on its inverted subjects excite admiration not only for their perfection of form but for their musical message.

♪ ♪ ♪

Ernest Munch's transcription of the score for orchestra was made with the utmost respect for the original and at the same time with complete understanding of its essence and with no attempt to embellish it with irrelevant material. Charles Munch conducted it in the same spirit.

The Chorale prelude brought the work to a quiet close expressing the calm devotion of a great man and a great artist. Mr. Biggs played it beautifully.

The Seventh Symphony received a workmanlike exposition. Mr. Munch seems to incline to very fast tempi, to which he sacrifices some of the refinements of interpretation. His haste apparently makes it impossible to pay close attention to phrasing, or to the more subtle dynamic shades. He gives the effect of rushing through a symphony with little regard for detail.

Of course it is quite possible to give too much attention to detail, and so destroy the continuity and the long melodic line. But it is also possible to play so fast and with such abrupt dynamic variations that the melodic line is lost; and this seems to be Mr. Munch's present tendency. Nevertheless his performance of the symphony called forth enthusiastic applause and shouts of "bravo."

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

Music Record Changer

By ANN HOLMES

You Pays Your Money—

Need a Ninth Symphony? The market's overflowing. At least three well-turned performances of the masterful Beethoven "choral" symphony have appeared on record shelves within the last year.

The first one came from Victor and featured the Boston Symphony with Koussevitzky.

A second—ever by Columbia's Philadelphia Orchestra and Eugene Ormandy, followed fast on the Boston's fourth movement.

And now, Columbia has set up a little competition for itself with a second version by another of its leading recording artists—Bruno Walter at the helm of the New York Philharmonic.

Both the Columbia editions are on the most handy LP discs. The Victor is on standard 78 records.

A comparison of such individually worthy interpretations is always, we think, fruitless. Ormandy, Koussevitzky and Walter are all great men in their field, and the symphonic ensembles they conduct for these records, as near to perfection as it is deemed likely.

However if one must point up the obvious differences in the three symphonic versions it would seem that Mr. Ormandy's is the more stylized and excited; that Koussevitzky's is the better punctuated in clean-cut standard performance; and that Bruno Walter has submitted a version of more conventional strips than the others. The latter one is the more mellow and Germanic in style than the other two.

Both Ormandy and Walter utilize the very fine Westminster Choir directed by John Finley Williams, while Koussevitzky employs the Robert Shaw Chorale.

Soloists for this latter Walter edition include Irma Gonzalez, soprano; Raoul Jobin, tenor; Elena Nikolaidi, contralto (Miss Nikolaidi will sing in concert here Wednesday night), and Mack Harrell, baritone.

Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4, Victor seven-inch album:

There may not be the demand for it yet—but still another Tschaikowsky Fourth has reached the retailers. Bringing the talents of Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony the beloved "Fate" symphony gets a full-blown, almost scenery-chewing interpretation.

Mr. Koussevitzky is not to be judged hardly for his lack of restraint, for Composer Tschaikowsky did not withhold himself exactly in the matters of emotions—and emotion was Tschaikowsky's meat.

Other conductors we know and respect play Tschaikowsky with the minimum of dynamic extremes—presumably as it is marked on the score. Koussevitzky's, however, is the generally accepted handling of the melodic and moody Fourth Symphony, and from that viewpoint is well done.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 30 1949

Delay on Auditorium Holds Up Concerts

By HENRY H. SMITH

PROVIDENCE'S winter concert schedule, normally settled in routine fashion long before this date, is in a state of confusion.

The reason: a delay in completing the interior of the new state auditorium in the Veterans Memorial Building. The former unfinished Masonic Temple is the expected site of major concerts in this city in the future.

The opening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, slated for Nov. 15, has been postponed. The first of five Community Concert Association events, a concert by De Paur's Infantry Chorus, scheduled for Dec. 7, is on the doubtful list.

Four Other Concerts Booked

The symphony is also booked for four other concerts at the new auditorium during the coming season. For many years the Boston orchestra's five Providence concerts have been given at the Metropolitan Theater. Community Concert events last year were presented at the Hope High auditorium, officials of the organization contending that the $1200 a night rental asked by the Met management was too high.

The change in Boston Symphony plans was revealed Friday by George E. Judd, the orchestra's manager. "We have just learned that the new state auditorium will not be ready for our first concert on Nov. 15," he said. "We are sorry, naturally, that the concert will have to be postponed. We still intend to present our usual five concerts in Providence—perhaps by sandwiching No. 1 sometime in December or by making it No. 5 sometime in April. An announcement will be made later concerning the new date."

Judd said the orchestra had made no earlier plans to shift the site of the Nov. 15 concert in the event of the kind of delay which occurred. "We decided the only way to handle the schedule was to make a clean break with the old and gamble that the new auditorium would be ready on time," he said. "We thought that any other plan simply would have confused our subscribers."

Community Concert Board to Meet

Judd revealed that he had been informed of the delay in work at the former Masonic Temple building by Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, president of the Providence Community Concert Association and vice-chairman of the Providence Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"We have learned from Mr. Mancini (Philip S. Mancini, State Director of Public Works) that the first Boston Symphony date is impossible to meet and that the Dec. 7 date for the De Paur Chorus is doubtful," Mrs. Allen said.

"As far as the De Paur concert is concerned, I can't say what we will do until we have a board meeting and also learn from the group's booking agent what future dates are possible. We have no plans to transfer the concert elsewhere. We determined in drawing up this year's schedule to be prepared for possible disappointments, if only it would mean better concert facilities in Providence in the future. Hence, we decided upon a policy of burning our bridges behind us.

"The board will adopt a plan quickly to meet with the new situation. We shall inform our members by mail of the new plan as soon as possible."

Work Resumed Last July

Work on the 2200-seat auditorium was resumed in mid-July 21 years after Masonic groups, their building fund campaign stymied, ceased work on the structure in May, 1928. The state purchased the partly completed temple on June 1, 1944, for $754,000.

A method of financing the job of finishing the building was finally devised by the 1948 General Assembly when a $669,973.75 balance from the state's fire insurance fund was made available for the purpose. Oresto DiSaia is architect in charge of the project. The E. Turgeon Construction Co. was low bidder and won the completion contract.

Besides the De Paur Chorus, the Community Concert group had the following concerts scheduled: Jan. 2, Vronsky and Babin, duo-pianists; Feb. 10, the Cleveland Orchestra, with George Szell conducting; Mar. 1, Elena Nikolaidi, contralto, and Apr. 11, Italo Tajo, Metropolitan Opera bass-baritone.

Other Boston Symphony dates are as follows: Jan. 3, Jan. 31, Mar. 31 and Apr. 4.

Civic Groups to Give Concerts

LIFE

CHARLES MUNCH

Succeeding [illegible] Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, French Conductor Charles Munch last week led the Boston Symphony into its 69th season. With a chivalrous bow to Back Bay institutionalism, he repeated the program played Oct. 19, 1900, when the new Symphony Hall was opened. One of the Cabots got up and bespoke Boston's appreciation.

St. Louis, Mo.
Argus
NOV 4 - 1949

In The News.

Concert Artist Will Sing Nov. 10

CAROL BRICE, noted concert contralto, who will appear in recital at Kiel Auditorium, Thursday night, Nov. 10. She is shown with director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Director Serge Koussevitsky after a triumph as soloist.

The concert is under sponsorship of Gamma Omega Chapter of Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
COMPASS
OCT 31 1949

NEW MUSICAL INSTRUMENT was invented by Maurice Martenot, left, and his sister, Ginette, shown as they arrived from Paris on the Ile de France. The instrument looks like a piano, but has attached to it the gadget shown above, called a singing leaf. Ginette will demonstrate with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Martenot said.

Associated Press Photo

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
OCT 29 1949

Here to Show New Musical Instrument

Maurice Martenot, inventor of a new musical instrument called the Martenot, prepared today to introduce it to American audiences in the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Boston Symphony Orchestra later in the season. He said the electrically operated instrument resembles a small piano, attached to which is another instrument similar to a lute. Sound vibrations are produced in the strings of the lute when the five-octave keyboard of the instrument is touched.

Martenot arrived late yesterday on the French liner Ile de France. Others among the 1,233 passengers included Tom M. Girdler, board chairman of the Republic Steel Corporation, and Louis Kronberg, artist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 27 1949

Martenot and Sister Due Here

Maurice Martenot, French musician, who invented the new musical instrument, known as the Martenot, will arrive in this country for his first visit, tomorrow on the Ile de France. He will be accompanied by his sister, Ginette Martenot, performer on the instrument. Miss Martenot will make her American debut with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, under Leopold Stokowski, Nov. 17 and 18, in Carnegie Hall, and later will be heard as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 27 1949

Martenot In Tomorrow

Arriving With Sister Who will Play Instrument Named for Him

Maurice Martenot, French musician and inventor of the musical instrument which is named for him, arrives for his first visit to this country tomorrow in the Ile de France with his sister, who will play this [illegible] the Boston and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. The sound is both electrically [illegible] and controlled.

Miss Martenot will take part in the Philharmonic performances of Olivier Messiaen's "Three Little Liturgies" on Thursday night and Friday afternoon, Nov. 17 and 18, under Leopold Stokowski's direction. With the Boston Symphony she will play the martenot (or Ondes Martenot) in the American premiere of Andre Jolivet's concerto for this instrument in Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Nov. 4 and 5.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 4 - 1949

To Honor Ginette Neveu

The memory of Ginette Neveu, the French violinist who died in the airplane crash in the Azores last week, will be honored by the Boston Symphony this afternoon and tomorrow, when Charles Munch plays the adagio from Fauré's Requiem. The violinist had been scheduled to play with the St. Louis Symphony on Feb. 4 and 5, and its conductor, Vladimir Golschmann, will dedicate an all orchestral program to her then.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 30 1949

Delay on Auditorium Holds Up Concerts

By HENRY H. SMITH

PROVIDENCE'S winter concert schedule, normally settled in routine fashion long before this date, is in a state of confusion.

The reason: a delay in completing the interior of the new state auditorium in the Veterans Memorial Building. The former unfinished Masonic Temple is the expected site of major concerts in this city in the future.

The opening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, slated for Nov. 15, has been postponed. The first of five Community Concert Association events, a concert by De Paur's Infantry Chorus, scheduled for Dec. 7, is on the doubtful list.

Four Other Concerts Booked

The symphony is also booked for four other concerts at the new auditorium during the coming season. For many years the Boston orchestra's five Providence concerts have been given at the Metropolitan Theater. Community Concert events last year were presented at the Hope High auditorium, officials of the organization contending that the $1200 a night rental asked by the Met management was too high.

The change in Boston Symphony plans was revealed Friday by George E. Judd, the orchestra's manager. "We have just learned that the new state auditorium will not be ready for our first concert on Nov. 15," he said. "We are sorry, naturally, that the concert will have to be postponed. We still intend to present our usual five concerts in Providence—perhaps by sandwiching No. 1 sometime in December or by making it No. 5 sometime in April. An announcement will be made later concerning the new date."

Judd said the orchestra had made no earlier plans to shift the site of the Nov. 15 concert in the event of the kind of delay which occurred. "We decided the only way to handle the schedule was to make a clean break with the old and gamble that the new auditorium would be ready on time," he said. "We thought that any other plan simply would have confused our subscribers."

Community Concert Board to Meet

Judd revealed that he had been informed of the delay in work at the former Masonic Temple building by Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, president of the Providence Community Concert Association and vice-chairman of the Providence Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"We have learned from Mr. Mancini (Philip S. Mancini, State Director of Public Works) that the first Boston Symphony date is impossible to meet and that the Dec. 7 date for the De Paur Chorus is doubtful," Mrs. Allen said.

"As far as the De Paur concert is concerned, I can't say what we will do until we have a board meeting and also learn from the group's booking agent what future dates are possible. We have no plans to transfer the concert elsewhere. We determined in drawing up this year's schedule to be prepared for possible disappointments, if only it would mean better concert facilities in Providence in the future. Hence, we decided upon a policy of burning our bridges behind us.

"The board will adopt a plan quickly to meet with the new situation. We shall inform our members by mail of the new plan as soon as possible."

Work Resumed Last July

Work on the 2200-seat auditorium was resumed in mid-July 21 years after Masonic groups, their building fund campaign stymied, ceased work on the structure in May, 1928. The state purchased the partly completed temple on June 1, 1944, for $754,000.

A method of financing the job of finishing the building was finally devised by the 1948 General Assembly when a $669,973.75 balance from the state's fire insurance fund was made available for the purpose. Oresto DiSaia is architect in charge of the project. The E. Turgeon Construction Co. was low bidder and won the completion contract.

Besides the De Paur Chorus, the Community Concert group had the following concerts scheduled: Jan. 2, Vronsky and Babin, duo-pianists; Feb. 10, the Cleveland Orchestra, with George Szell conducting; Mar. 1, Elena Nikolaidi, contralto, and Apr. 11, Italo Tajo, Metropolitan Opera bass-baritone.

Other Boston Symphony dates are as follows: Jan. 3, Jan. 31, Mar. 31 and Apr. 4.

Civic Groups to Give Concerts

LIFE

CHARLES MUNCH

Succeeding [illegible] Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, French Conductor Charles Munch this week led the Boston Symphony into its 69th season. With a curtain bow to Back Bay institutionalism, he repeated the program played Oct. 19, 1900, when the new Symphony Hall was opened. One of the Cabots got up and bespoke Boston's appreciation.

St. Louis, Mo.
Argus
NOV 4 - 1949

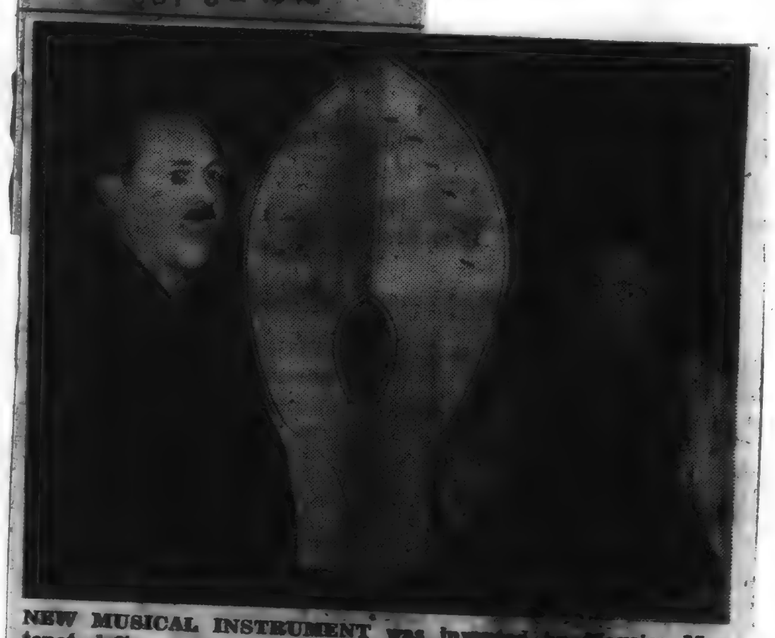
In The News.

Concert Artist Will Sing Nov. 10

CAROL BRICE, noted concert contralto, who will appear in recital at Kiel Auditorium, Thursday night, Nov. 10. She is shown with director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Dixon, Serge Koussevitsky after a triumph as soloist.

The concert is under the auspices of Gamma Omega Chapter of Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
COMPASS
OCT 31 1949



NEW MUSICAL INSTRUMENT was invented by Maurice Martenot, left, and his sister, Ginette, shown as they arrived from Paris on the Ile de France. The instrument looks like a piano, but has attached to it the gadget shown above, called a singing leaf. Ginette will demonstrate with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Martenot said.

Associated Press Photo

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
OCT 29 1949

Here to Show New Musical Instrument

Maurice Martenot, inventor of a new musical instrument called the Martenot, prepared today to introduce it to American audiences in the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Boston Symphony later in the season. [illegible] electrically operated [illegible] resembles a small piano [illegible] to which is another [illegible] similar to a lute. Sound [illegible] also produced in the manner of the flute when the [illegible] keyboard of the instrument is touched.

Martenot arrived late yesterday on the French liner Ile de France. Others among the 1,224 passengers included Tom M. Girdler, board chairman of the Republic Steel Corporation, and Louis Kronberg, artist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

Martenot and Sister Due Here

Maurice Martenot, French musician, who invented the new musical instrument, known as the Martenot, will arrive in this country for his first visit, tomorrow on the Ile de France. He will be accompanied by his sister, Ginette Martenot, performer on the instrument. Miss Martenot will make her American debut with the Philharmonic-Symphony Society under Leopold Stokowski, Nov. 17 and 18, in Carnegie Hall, and later will be heard as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 27 1949

Martenot In Tomorrow

Arriving With Sister Who Will Play Instrument Named for Him

Maurice Martenot, French musician and inventor of the musical instrument which is named for him, arrives for his first visit to this country tomorrow in the Ile de France with his sister, who will play this [illegible] the Boston and [illegible] Symphony Orchestra. [illegible] sound is both electrical [illegible] and controlled.

Miss [illegible] part in the Philharmonic [illegible] ances of Olivier [illegible] Little Liturgies [illegible] Thursday night and Friday afternoon, Nov. 17 and 18, under Leopold Stokowski's direction. With the Boston Symphony she will play the [illegible] of Ondes Martenot in the American premiere of Andre Jolivet's concerto for this instrument in Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Nov. 4 and 5.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 4 - 1949

To Honor Ginette Neveu

The memory of Ginette Neveu, the French violinist who died in the airplane crash in the Azores last week, will be honored by the Boston Symphony this afternoon and tomorrow, when Charles Munch plays the adagio from Fauré's Requiem. The violinist had been scheduled to play with the St. Louis Symphony on Feb. 4 and 5, and its conductor, Vladimir Golschmann, will dedicate an all orchestral program to her then.

[35]

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
NOV 3 - 1949

BSO Names Jackson a Trustee; First Berkshire Man on Board

Special to THE EAGLE

BOSTON—C. D. Jackson, publisher of Fortune magazine and a summer resident of Lenox, has been appointed to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced today. He is the first Berkshire-connected resident to be a member of the board.

Also named was Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston. The two new members replace former Board President Jerome D. Greene and Dr. Robert D. Lee, both of Boston, whose terms expired.

Mr. Jackson, who is married to the former Grace Bristed of Lenox and New York was born March 16, 1902 in New York City. He attended Hill School in Pottstown, Pa., and Princeton where he received his bachelor of arts degree in 1923. He had planned to teach French at Princeton following his graduation but upon his father's death in the summer of 1924, he became president of C. D. Jackson & Company, importers of marble and stone for building purposes.

He remained as president of that company until the fall of 1931 when he joined Time Inc., as assistant to the president. In October, 1937, he was appointed general manager of Life and in 1940 became vice-president of Time Inc. Later in 1940 he took a leave of absence to become president of the Council of Democracy. He returned to Time Inc., a year later.

In October, 1942, he went to Turkey on a mission for the State Department as special assistant to the U.S. ambassador. He returned in March, 1943, and the following month left for North Africa as chief of all OWI operations for North Africa, Middle East and Turkey.

The following year he became

C. D. Jackson

deputy chief of the Psychological Warfare Branch of Allied Force Headquarters, working in North Africa, Sicily and Italy and in January, 1944, he held the same post at Supreme Headquarters in England. He participated in the French and Belgian campaigns and was awarded the French Legion of Honor "for exceptional services rendered during the operations for liberating France."

Later he was in charge of work with Displaced Persons and Liberated United Nations Prisoners. On his return to the United States in July, 1945, he resumed his duties as vice-president of Time Inc. and in September he was made managing director of Time-Life International. He was appointed publisher of Fortune in January, 1949.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
NOV 4 19[illegible]

C. D. Jackson Trustee Of Boston Symphony

Boston, Nov. 3 [illegible] board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight announced the election to the board of Rev. Theodore P. Ferris and Charles D. Jackson, publisher of Fortune magazine. Mr. Ferris is the rector of Trinity Protestant Episcopal Church. Jackson, a New York resident who summers in the Berkshire hills where the orchestra plays its summer concerts, is also vice-president of Time, Inc.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 4 - 1949

Symphony Board Names Two

BOSTON, Nov. 3 (AP).—The board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight announced the election to the board of the Rev. Theodore P. Ferris and Charles D. Jackson, publisher of "Fortune" magazine.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 4 - 1949

On Board of Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Nov. 3 (AP)—The board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight announced the election to the board of the Rev. Theodore P. Ferris and Charles D. Jackson, publisher of Fortune magazine. Mr. Ferris is the rector of Trinity Protestant Episcopal Church. Mr. Jackson, a New Yorker who summers in the Berkshires, is also vice president of Time, Inc.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
NOV 6 - 1949

Orchestras To Use New Instrument

New York. — (UP) — The latest musical instrument, called the martenot, is about to make its bow to America.

It is described as a device in which sound, electrically produced and controlled, has made new tone color possible. Its inventor, the French musician Maurice Martenot, has arrived with his sister and collaborator, Ginette Martenot, who will make her American debut playing the martenot with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony orchestras.

Miss Martenot will appear with the New York Philharmonic under Leopold Stokowski this month and at Carnegie Hall in the first American performance of Messiaen's "Three Little Liturgies," which includes the martenot in its instrumentation.

She will be soloist with the Boston Symphony in two other first American performances: A concerto for martenot and orchestra by Andre Jolivet, conducted by Charles Munch, and "A Grande Symphonie en 10 Mouvements, 'Turangaglia,'" conducted by Leonard Bernstein.

Miss Martenot has introduced the new instrument widely in Europe.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
[illegible] 1949

The Ondes Martenot

This is the first you've ever heard of the Ondes Martenot, which is neither animal, mineral nor vegetable but a musical instrument using electronic vibrations for sound. Mr. Munch will give it its first American tryout with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this weekend.

But whether this aristocratic acceptance means that the Ondes Martenot has made good as an instrument we dare not say. Musical instruments are exceedingly careful about whom they take into their harmonious fraternity. The saxophone has been over 100 years making good, and though gifted with a rich, vibrant voice and wondrous flexibility, still bears a somewhat dubious reputation.

So the Ondes (it hasn't acquired a nickname yet, though it is 21 years old) may have an uphill fight before it, even though it appears to be a lovely instrument—out of this world, really, and somewhere in the region of the stars—with its electronic voice and varying timbres all the way from horn, pipes and strings to the thin wail of a Tibetan boatman (a sound like a strange guest's nightmare). M. Maurice Martenot, its inventor, says that the qualities of its tone are limitless and easily obtainable at the mere touch of a button with the left hand.

The instrument has a keyboard seven octaves long with a little panel below it holding a dozen buttons. There's also a lever which controls the tone, that is the attack, phrasing, etc. The notes are not produced by the handful, as on the piano and organ, but singly. The slightest pressure of a finger—a shaking finger if you wish to produce a vibrato—will elicit the purest of notes.

We hope it makes good. It ought to make good. Spiritually and technically it belongs to this new age. Its music is that of the spheres tuned not only to Western ears but, at a touch of a button capable of making direct appeal to Indian, Cambodian, Japanese and all the rest. It sounds like the instrument the world has been waiting for, international, universal. It must make good.

SPARTANSBURG, S. C.
HERALD
NOV 6 - 1949

Martenot, Latest Instrument, Has American Debut

NEW YORK (UP)—The latest Martenot, is about to make its bow to America.

It is described as a device in which sound, electrically produced and controlled, has made new tone color possible.

Its inventor, the French musician Maurice Martenot, has arrived with his sister and collaborator, Ginette Martenot, who will make her American debut playing the Martenot with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony orchestras.

Miss [illegible] appear with the New York Philharmonic under Leopold Stokowski on Nov. 17 and 18 at Carnegie Hall in the first American performance of Messiaen's "Three Little Liturgies," which includes the martenot in its instrumentation.

She will be soloist with the Boston Symphony in 2 other first American performances: a concerto for martenot and orchestra by Andre Jolivet, conducted by Charles Munch, and "A Grande Symphonie en 10 Mouvements, 'Turangaglia'," conducted by Leonard Bernstein.

Miss Martenot has introduced the new instrument widely in Europe.

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
REPUBLIC
NOV 6 1949

New Musical Instrument To Make Debut In U. S.

NEW YORK, Nov. 5—(UP)—The latest musical instrument, called the martenot, is about to make its bow to America.

It is described as a device in which sounds, electrically produced and controlled, has made new tone color possible. Its inventor, the French musician Maurice Martenot, has arrived with his sister and collaborator, Ginette Martenot, who will make her American debut playing the martenot with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony orchestras.

Miss Martenot will appear with the New York Philharmonic under Leopold Stokowski November 17 and 18 at Carnegie Hall in the first American performance of Messiaen's "Three Little Liturgies," which includes the martenot in its instrumentation.

She will be soloist with the Boston Symphony in two other first American performances: a concerto for martenot and orchestra by Andre Jolivet, conducted by Charles Munch, and A Grande Symphonie en 10 Mouvements, Turangaglia, conducted by Leonard Bernstein.

Miss Martenot has introduced the new instrument widely in Europe.

RACINE, WIS.
JOURNAL TIMES
NOV 8 - 1949

'Martenot,' New Instrument, To Make American Bow Soon

NEW YORK—(U.P.)—The latest musical instrument, called the martenot, is about to make its bow to America.

It is described as a device in which sound, electrically produced and controlled, has made new tone color possible. Its inventor, the French musician Maurice Martenot, has arrived with his sister and collaborator, Ginette Martenot, who will make her American debut playing the martenot with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony orchestras.

Miss Martenot will appear with the New York Philharmonic under Leopold Stokowski on Nov. 17 and 18 at Carnegie Hall in the first American performance of Messiaen's "Three Little Liturgies," which includes the martenot in its instrumentation.

She will be soloist with the Boston Symphony in two other first American performances: a concerto for martenot and orchestra by Andre Jolivet, conducted by Charles Munch, and "A Grande Symphonie en 10 Mouvements, 'Turangaglia'," conducted by Leonard Bernstein.

Miss Martenot has introduced the new instrument widely in Europe.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
NOV 8 - 1949

A NEW musical instrument, the "ondes martenot," was introduced in Boston by the inventor, Maurice Martenot, France, and his sister, Ginette Martenot. Boston Symphony audiences soon will hear it. The electrical instrument is equipped with tubes, similar to a radio, a keyboard and sounding board. Two radio currents of different frequencies are used through a loud speaker and are produced over a range of five octaves on the keyboard, with volume control. —(INP) Photo.

[illegible], N.Y.
LEADER
11/3/49

Martenot, New Instrument to Be Heard in U.S.

(By United Press)

NEW YORK:— The latest musical instrument, called the martenot, is about to make its bow to America.

It is described as a device in which sound, electrically produced and controlled, has made new tone color possible. Its inventor, the French musician Martenot, has arrived with his sister and collaborator, Ginette Martenot, who will make her American debut playing the martenot with the New York Philharmonic Symphony and the Boston Symphony orchestras.

Miss Martenot will appear with the New York Philharmonic under Leopold Stokowski on Nov. 17 and 18, at Carnegie Hall in the first American performance of Messiaen's "Three Little Liturgies," which includes the martenot in its instrumentation.

She will be soloist with the Boston Symphony in two other first American performances; a concerto for martenot and orchestra by Andre Jolivet and "A Grande Symphonie en 10 Mouvements, 'Turangaglia,'" conducted by Leonard Bernstein.

Miss Martenont has introduced the new instrument widely in Europe.

Nov. 3 Herald

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Martenot's Waves--- A New Instrument

The inventor of the musical instrument, a smallish, alert sort of chap with a little black mustache, horn-rimmed glasses and the expression of one somehow fearing the worst, stood by his invention, contained in a long narrow box on legs that looked like a keyboard that had forgotten to be attached to a piano, and prepared to do or die at the hands of the press.

Nearby, on the stage of Symphony Hall, sat his sister, a strikingly attractive woman with dark hair, intrepid eyes and a charming smile. They were M. Maurice Martenot and Mlle. Ginette Martenot, in Boston from Paris with their new musical instrument known as the Ondes Martenot which is to be heard for the first time in Boston on Friday and Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The instrument, explained M. Martenot in English which he said had been pretty good when he was teaching radio to American soldiers of the first World War (and which still sounded pretty efficient to me), was, how you say? electronique, and one could produce a truly formidable number of most musical effects with it. How many, zut, who knew?

Forest of Tubes

The Ondes Martenot, the idea of which could perhaps be most quickly conveyed by describing it as a Solovox with a magna cum laude degree from MIT, was contained, it developed, in several separate parcels. The keyboard itself, with a small square box to the left of the seven-octave row of keys containing a dozen push buttons, was attached by means of electric cords to three boxes equipped with loudspeakers and, inside, presumably, a veritable forest of tubes, condensers, relays and electronics gadgets of subtle design.

A new departure, the inventor explained, was the upright palm-leaf shaped box on the left side of the keyboard. "Even in Europe has this been heard not yet," said M. Martenot, as his sister occasionally prompted him with English words. In addition to the keys, by which the instrument is played with one hand only, the console was equipped with a curious ribbon running into the works from either end. By means of a metal loop in the middle of the ribbon into which the performer could stick the index finger of his right hand, the instrument could also be played by sliding the ribbon back and forth. "Alors," said M. Martenot, "we will demonstration."

The inventor, who has been perfecting his instrument for nearly 30 years, sat at the keyboard, right hand on the keys, left hand on the box with the push buttons. He brushed the keys lightly, pausing to wobble his fingers in a vibrato, and from the loudspeakers there emerged a truly other-worldly sound. At the change of the various button positions, as an organist would change stops, he produced a strange variety of tone colors from the Ondes Martenot, which could possibly be rendered in English as "Martenot's Waves."

Symphony Audiences to Hear "Ondes Martenot" This Week

By CYRUS DURGIN

The audiences at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week will see and hear something totally unknown to most of them. This is a new electronic instrument called, after its inventor Maurice Martenot, the "ondes martenot." As it sits in the middle of the stage front at Symphony Hall, it looks like half a piano made of golden oak, and with a keyboard, but no back. At one end is something that looks like a pointed guitar turned upside down. Behind and to one side are three big boxes containing loud speakers.

This instrument is the product of combined musical sensitivity and electronic science. The word "onde" means simply wave, and the sounds of the ondes martenot are achieved by electrical frequencies turned into sound vibrations. Just how that is done is Mr. Martenot's secret, and he'll naturally keep it behind his high, domed forehead, his round, dark spectacles and bushy black mustache.

This instrument has a normal working range of seven octaves, and even this range can be extended by changing the pitch. By pressing combinations of 12 white and 12 red buttons, changing the overtones, many different colors of tone can be produced. The ondes martenot can sing like a violin or a soprano, pound like a drum or a cymbal, toot like an oboe, clarinet or bassoon, oom-pah like a tuba or scream like a banshee. It can boom like one of those great temple bells Kipling wrote about, or make the eerie sounds you hear in the movies about psychiatry.

4 Duplicate an Orchestra

The ondes martenot, when there are four of them together, can duplicate the total range of the symphonic orchestra. The volume goes from the merest whisper to a blast that can hold its own with the full orchestra. It can play in quarter tones and eighth tones.

"What shall we call it?" asks Mr. Martenot, an amiable Parisian of 50, with a questioning grin. "It is something between a loud speaker and a musical instrument."

It is plain, however that its inventor, who began his career as a pianist and 'cellist, regards it as an instrument of artistic expression, not a mechanism. The instrument can play only one note at a time, though its response is so quick that you can manage rapid arpeggios and vibrato between two notes. Theoretically, however, it can be developed to play chords. For the present Mr. Martenot wants it to remain a single-voiced instrument.

"I regard this as a new musical instrument, and a new instrument must give new possibilities to the composer."

The ondes has been played 4176 times in Europe at concerts, with orchestra, in theatres and in films, between 1944 and 1948. It has been approved for use in the Roman Catholic Church, and next Spring will be played at the Vatican for the Pope and officials of the hierarchy. It has been used in Protestant Churches and synagogues.

The ondes is now installed at the Paris Opera, the Comedie Francaise, the Comedie Luxembourg, at Jean Louis Barrault's Theatre Marigny, and even the Folies Bergeres. The Old Vic company in London took it up for their production of Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream." For sound effects suggesting madness, the ondes was used in a French film about painter Vincent Van Gogh.

Inventor's Sister to Play It

In Boston this week, and New York the next, the ondes will be a solo instrument with orchestra. Mr. Martenot's sister, Ginette, will be heard with the Boston Symphony and Charles Munch in a Concerto for the ondes by Andre Jolivet. Ginette Martenot, who used to be a concert pianist, and like her brother, won a composition prize at the Paris Conservatoire, is the foremost player of the ondes. She will play it again, here and in New York, in December, at the American premiere of Olivier Messiaen's 10-movement, two-hour-long symphony, "Turangalila."

She has demonstrated the ondes all over Europe, and even in Hawaii and Japan before the war. She has not had to scurry about and find arrangements for it, because well-known composers, like Messiaen, Honegger, Milhaud, Schmitt and others have written music expressly for it or using the ondes as a conspicuous voice.

Maurice Martenot got the idea for the instrument late in World War I when, 22, and teaching American troops "wireless," he noticed the interference whistles in the radio condensers. The whistles were musical sounds to him, and he began to invent. By 1928 he had developed a primitive instrument, played by waving the hands in front of it, and this he demonstrated at the Paris Opera. He played it at a concert by the Philadelphia Orchestra and Leopold Stokowski in 1930.

"Palme" to Keyed Part

By 1937, the keyboard had been evolved, and in that year the perfected ondes was shown in Paris at the Palais de Descouvertes. The resonator, which looks like a pointed guitar upside down, is called a "palme," and Bostonians will be the first to hear it. The palme was invented only two weeks before Martenot left for the United States.

The palme consists of 24 strings taut over a resonating chamber, made to vibrate by an electronic "nut." The palme makes a longer tone, sounds like stringed instruments, and has more singing quality.

You can play the ondes two ways, one with the right hand playing the notes on the keyboard, while the left manipulates a panel regulating volume and tone colors. You can also play it with a ring attached to a movable metallized ribbon, producing the tones by touching depressions and metal nodes on a long panel adjacent to the keyboard.

1949 Globe

MUSIC

Ondes Martenot and Concerto by Jolivet Introduced by Munch

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch yesterday afternoon introduced to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts the electronic instrument called the ondes martenot, and a Concerto for it by Andre Jolivet. The soloist was Ginette Martenot, sister of the inventor, Maurice Martenot. The program began with Mozart's "Prague" Symphony (K. 504) and ended with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Like Spring and the solitary swallow, an unconventional instrument cannot be assayed in a day. The ondes has two aspects: it is a versatile producer of "sound effects" and a potential new and individual voice in the instrumental family. While it is useful as an imitator of other instruments, that is its least attractive side.

The ondes will realize its possibilities as a musical instrument only when composers exploit its individuality in a distinctive idiom suitable to tonal patterns and musical structure.

I do not think that Andre Jolivet, a 45-year-old Parisian once identified with the "Jeune France" group, has gone very far in that direction with his long Concerto. It is a rather poor piece, much of it queer and some of it downright ugly. The first two movements are preoccupied with mere sound effects—which are a basis for music but not music itself. Only the third movement sings and builds into real ideas, which is the fundamental nature of music.

The fact that the ondes can sing, when played so skillfully as by Ginette Martenot, all but proves its possibilities. It sounds especially well when the resonating "palme" is turned on. Then the tone is livelier, deeper and purer, and free from that veiled, artificial quality. But I suspect that the ondes will not enter the kingdom of musical Heaven until Mr. Martenot has developed it to play chords.

It was hard to tell the response of the Friday audience. Miss Martenot was cordially received, but the lobby conversations inclined to find fault with both Concerto and instrument. Another proof that it takes times for anything unconventional to make its way.

Yhe "Prague" Symphony and the E minor of Brahms were superbly played. The style for each was just right, the tempi reasonable, and all the inner orchestral detail could easily be heard. Seldom have I heard the Brahms done in so relaxed and lyrical a fashion, yet with so much passion and thorough grasp of the long melodic line and subtle rhythm. Every bar was honest and straightforward and nothing tampered with. That is Grade A musicianship! One reservation may be entered: the orchestra has not yet mastered Mr. Munch's quick attack and all the sections do not come in exactly together. That was especially noticeable in the variation that emphasizes the brass, in the finale of Brahms' Symphony.

Banshee Chorus, Also

"The sound of the horn of the Tibetan lama," he said, as the gadget roared in the low register. He made it sound like bagpipes, like a clavichord, like a gamelin orchestra, like an Armenian peasant oboe, like a double bass, a trombone, a shepherd's pipe, a great bell, a lute, a piccolo and a chorus of wailing banshees. He made it percussive, like a drum; he made it slither and slide from tone to tone like a serpent weaving in the tall grass; he made it shrill and piercing, like a loon crying in the night; he made it soft and liquid, like a frog in the bottom of a well. Then his sister played it, producing many other effects as M. Martenot played a few supporting chords on the piano. It was, in fine, a singularly musical affair whose palette of tone colors seldom seemed electronic or mechanical and it was in the Martenots' hands, at least, persuasively, artistic.

Aside from the special piece composed for it by somebody named Jolivet (which will be performed by the Symphony this week), a part for it in Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake" and a piece for six of them composed by Messiaen, there isn't much music for the gadget so far. M. Martenot said he was soon bringing out a smaller edition that might sell for around $100, but he didn't want it to be taken up by jazz bands until it was safely established as an orchestral instrument. "The musique of Chopin had to await the piano," he said. "Perhaps somebody is waiting for the Ondes Martenot, no?"

Globe News

'Ondes Martenot' Mimicks African Jungle Music

The new musical instrument—the "Ondes Martenot"—besides functioning, as it did yesterday, as a solo instrument with symphony orchestra, can play exotic scales of China, India and Africa. Since Boston's noted tenor, Roland Hayes, in his Symphony Hall recital of tomorrow afternoon, is presenting a group of "work songs" produced by Frederick Hall of Alabama as a result of a visit to Africa, Hayes and inventor Maurice Martenot enjoyed a get-together. Hayes demonstrated his collection of African instruments, and Martenot mimicked them on his invention—reproducing either the quarter-tones of an "m'bila," or the booming of the tomtom.

"ONDES MARTENOT" AND INVENTOR—Maurice Martenot of France, right, demonstrates his new musical instrument for Roland Hayes, left, noted tenor.

[37]

Electronic Instrument to Make Boston Debut—Co

Inventor's Sister to Play Ondes Martenot

By Harold Rogers

The Ondes Martenot, an electronic musical instrument, has been able to lay a just claim to inclusion in the modern symphony orchestra. First shown at the Paris Opéra in 1928, it is earning its way on a musical and artistic basis.

The Ondes Martenot will make its first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, when Charles Munch will give the first American performance of a concerto by André Jolivet, composed for this instrument.

Mlle Ginette Martenot, sister of the instrument's inventor, Maurice Martenot, will be the soloist. She and her brother, who recently arrived here from Paris, gave a demonstration of the instrument's possibilities Monday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

M. Martenot began his career as a musician and as a student of composition. During the first World War, however, he taught radio (then in its primitive development) to American soldiers in France. When the first radio vacuum tubes were developed, he was quick to recognize the possibilities of adapting electronic vibrations for musical purposes.

* * *

He began his experiments in this direction when he was 18 years old. Since the first demonstration of his new instrument 21 years ago, the Ondes Martenot has undergone many improvements, the last having been completed within the past few weeks.

The Ondes Martenot has captivated the imagination of France's leading composers. Olivier Messiaen, Darius Milhaud, Arthur Honegger, Florent Schmitt, Jacques Ibert, and Charles Koechlin have written for the instrument.

Its appearance is simple. It has a clavier seven octaves long, though by certain combinations it has a range of eight octaves. Slightly below the clavier to the left is a small panel, operated by the left hand, on which are a dozen buttons for different timbres, similar to organ stops. Also on this panel is a lever which, in effect, controls the tone like the bow of a stringed instrument; that is, the attack, release, phrasing, and dynamics.

Since the Ondes Martenot is a melodic instrument, producing only one note at a time, both hands are seldom used on the clavier. This keyboard has a unique feature. A vibrato may be obtained simply by pressing a key and then vibrating the finger from side to side, a technique similar to that of a string player. When this is done, the entire keyboard shifts from side to side.

* * *

The Ondes Martenot can also be played by means of a shifting tape, stretched directly in front of the clavier. On this tape is a metallic spring, through which the index finger is inserted. The finger is then moved across a guide board of frets. A metallic portion of the tape thus passes before a series of condensers to produce the variation in pitch. By using the tape, the performer is able to obtain glissando and portamento effects.

The tone produced by the Ondes Martenot, is so pure and so perfectly controlled that the player can easily secure quarter tones and even eighth tones with ease.

M. Martenot explained that the inertia, which must be overcome by a musician in order to transform his conception into tone, is cut down to the finely sensitive distance between the ball of the finger and the keyboard or the tape. The instrument is therefore extremely responsive to the most subtle nuances of interpretation.

* * *

M. Martenot has persistently aimed to have his invention accepted as a legitimate symphonic instrument before making it readily available to the public. He cited the history of the saxophone, which has only recently, after more than a century, vindicated the effects of its immediate popularization. When the Ondes Martenot is firmly established in the symphonic field, then M. Martenot does not care how it is used in popular music. The instrument is included in the curriculum at the Paris Conservatoire.

The latest development in the Ondes Martenot, completed only a few weeks ago, is what M. Martenot calls "the palm," for want of a better name. It is a sounding board, shaped like a large palm leaf, attached vertically to the left side of the instrument. There are 12 strings on either side of this board, tuned to the chromatic scale.

These strings, which run out fanwise from the bottom of the palm, are attached at the base to a single nut. This nut vibrates according to the pitch produced at the keyboard. Each string is then set into vibration according to the pitch to which it responds. This device adds resonance when the instrument is played in small rooms or in radio studios.

The variety of timbres producible by the instrument are almost countless. Besides the usual timbres to which the western ear is cultivated, Miss Martenot produced Tibetan, Indian, Cambodian, and Japanese effects, some of which are percussive in nature.

M. Martenot pointed out that Chopin could not have written his works for the clavecin—he had to wait for the piano. In like manner, he believes that the Ondes Martinot is a progressive instrument that will one day have its Chopin.

John Brook

Ginette Martenot and her brother, Maurice Martenot, inventor of the Ondes Martenot, electronic musical instrument. Mlle Martenot will play the instrument with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concerto by Jolivet at the week-end concerts in Symphony Hall.

roduces A New Instrument

Concerto for Ondes Martenot Is Played

By L. A. Sloper

Charles Munch introduced to Boston in his fourth program as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Nov. 4-5) the Ondes Martenot, an electronic instrument which has already been heard in many European cities.

Nineteen years ago in Philadelphia, Maurice Martenot, its inventor, appeared as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski, playing an "electrical instrument" of the "musical waves" in a symphonic poem by Dimitri Levidis. As the program notes also remind us, since the advent of radio there have been experiments with many such instruments besides the "Théréminvox," which was heard here some years ago.

* * *

But M. Martenot has been discreet. He told The Christian Science Monitor the other day that he has tried to see that the Ondes Martenot is accepted as a symphonic instrument before it is taken up by the exponents of jazz. In this he has so far succeeded, whether or not with the cooperation of the jazz players, one cannot say.

The first question is, obviously, what is the tone like? Because it is capable of so many timbres, it is like almost anything. It resembles now a saxophone, now a cello, now a bassoon, now a piercing whistle, now an organ, now a choralcello, and always a radio. It would go well with a creepy film; it has already been used in "The Red Shoes." It hardly seems necessary to join it with other orchestral instruments.

Is it going to be adopted into the society of symphonic instruments? It is hard to say. We are told that we may expect to hear more of it this year. It has a prominent place in Messiaen's new symphony, "Turangalila," which is to have its first performance by the Boston orchestra next month.

* * *

The work which introduced the instrument to Boston was a Concerto by André Jolivet. Ginette Martenot, a sister of the inventor, was the soloist. Jolivet is a former pupil of Edgar Varèse and a member of the group known as "La Jeune France." This will give some idea of his concerto, which is in three movements, but otherwise is not conventional. It opens with an Allegro, goes on with a scherzo, and concludes, oddly enough, with a Largo cantabile, which, however, has a fortissimo conclusion.

A writer in "L'Intransigéant" of Paris said of the Ondes Martenot on August 26 last that "it allows the amateurs to express themselves with a greatly reduced period of study, the technic being quite simple." That sounds alarming. Miss Martenot is obviously no amateur; but the possibilities for use of this instrument in popular music, whether M. Martenot desires it or not, are obvious if we may take the French writer's word.

The program opened with Mozart's "Prague" Symphony and closed with Brahms' Fourth. Mr. Munch's Brahms, by evidence of this performance, is better than his Beethoven. The conductor obviously had a clear conception of the music, and while there were aspects of his interpretation with which one disagreed, the performance was right in style and consistent in approach.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Mozart and Brahms received their due, and more than their due, at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. Full justice was also done to Andre Jolivet, but somehow that seems a matter of less importance.

Between a beautiful performance of Mozart's "Prague" Symphony and a superb one of the Fourth of Brahms, there came for the first time in America, M. Jolivet's Concerto for Ondes Martenot and orchestra, with Ginette Martenot playing expertly and tastefully the solo part for the instrument invented by her brother Maurice. The Martenot waves might be described as a cross between the theremin and the Hammond organ, with several features not found in either. Equipped with a keyboard and also a ribbon that may be propelled back and forth by the performer's forefinger, while his left hand pushes the various buttons and controls a dynamic lever, the Ondes Martenot can sound like most orchestral instruments and also produce sounds you never heard before. When the player applies a vibrato one thinks of the violin or cello. The prevailing suggestion is of a wind instrument, especially the flute, while the irreverent may find themselves reminded of a musical saw.

A limitation of the instrument, as it stands at present, is that it can sound but one tone at a time, though there is no note, high or low, that cannot be played upon it. Also possible are intervals smaller than the half tone and both the lowest audible tone and sounds above the range of human hearing. A remarkable contraption, this, and because of this range of sound effects, it is something that should find a welcome in Hollywood.

Several French composers have written for the Ondes Martenot, though this, I believe, is the only concerto for it thus far. Jolivet, whose music had not been heard here before and who is in his 45th year, has here produced a piece that gives the electrical instrument, and also the full orchestra, a thorough workout. The net impression is one of contrivance.

To return to matters of greater musical consequence, Mr. Munch's performance of the Brahms Fourth was something we have waited a long time to hear. He restored to the first movement the wan autumnal quality proper to it. The slow movement was warmly songful but not overjuicy. The frequently clumsy Scherzo was both light and lively; the final passacaglia richly varied and brought to a noble climax. So far there have been two opinions regarding Mr. Munch's Beethoven. If his version of the Fourth may be accepted as a criterion, there can be but one regarding his Brahms.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth concert of its 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Ginette Martenot, ondist, was the soloist. The program Symphony in D, "Prague," K 504) ..... Mozart Concerto for Ondes Martenot ..... Jolivet Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 ..... Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

So that new instrument the Ondes Martenot or, to thrust it ruthlessly into English, Martenot's Waves, has at last been heard in Boston and the question before the house at the moment is, is this another shot to be head around the world? A fairly reliable phophecy, I think, would be yes—but certainly not in the particular fashion or composition we heard it in yesterday.

As has been previously set forth, Martenot's Waves is a musical instrument by which the tonal discipline of the keyboard is enforced on the limitless sounds and effects that can be produced in the vacuum tube when two currents of different frequency are introduced. This is also, at least from my limited understanding of things electronic, the basic principle of the Hammond organ and of the Solovox, to which Martenot's Waves are a very refined but exotic relative.

The prevailing sound of the Ondes Martenot might be described as that of an alto saxophone in the highest register, but its colorations of tone yesterday ranged (with the pressing of buttons on the keyboard by the performer) from that of a musical saw to the throaty cry of a donkey caught by the ear, from the smallest flute stops of the organ to the sound of Merle Oberon calling for Heathcliff in "Wuthering Heights." This is not, you understand, to ridicule the instrument; it is capable of the most subtle of musical expressions and it is unquestionably destined for a most useful and effective career in the symphony orchestra, not to mention in Hollywood and on "Portia Faces Life."

Yet it is not an instrument, or so it seems to me, that a great composer might choose to set forth his most exalted musical utterances for a soloist. The reason for this is that, despite its astonishing capacities, it is not a living thing. It may be argued that an organ console is not exactly unmechanical, but every part of the loft responds to every other part while the building containing it still further responds to lend a living pulse to the sound. However, a loudspeaker is a loudspeaker; it does not have the memory that the wood of a violin or the strings of a piano have for the notes or sounds that have happened before.

Considering Jolivet's intention, which was to display the Ondes Martenot, he managed an interesting and occasionally exciting piece of music, if one that tended in its climaxes to utter confusion. He might have been more impressive if he had settled for something less pretentious and lengthy, for the Ondes does not wear well as a solo instrument in its most characteristic registration, and can be bizarre when its possibilities are too deliberately explored. And it must be said that Mlle. Martenot proved herself a very impressive virtuoso on the instrument; surely if anyone could give it life and humanity she did. All in all, this was a decidedly interesting and worthwhile novelty reflecting happily on Mr. Munch's enterprise.

The rest of the concert, which is to say the Mozart and the Brahms, were a joy to hear. The Brahms, in particular, came as a revelation exactly as the Beethoven did last week, for Mr. Munch finds music in it that few of us have heard before. Already it is easy to hear the subtle changes he is working in the tone colors of the orchestra, to hear the great clarity of the voices, the endless gradations of dynamics, the precision of the attacks and releases.

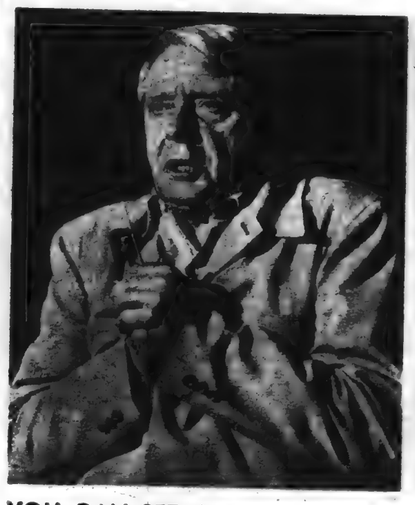
His conceptions make up in intellectuality and in musical sensitivity what they may lack in soaring emotional incandescence, and they are proving, week in and week out, a gratifying experience. All I hope is that Mr. Munch has been told that the scramble of the Friday afternoon audiences for the door at the concert's end is as traditional as its hats, and must be taken in stride. The orchestra is out of town next week, but returns on Nov. 18 to do Berlioz' "Corsair" Overture, Roussel's Fourth Symphony, Copland's Statements and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

Boston Symphony's New Conductor

By CYRUS DURGIN
Globe Drama & Music Critic

Here are nine remarkable pictures of Charles Munch rehearsing the Boston Symphony in Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2. Gestures and facial expressions indicate the shadings of speed, volume and tone color which make a distinctive interpretation.

MUNCH'S EYES are closed and his face rapt at the quiet beginning, which is slow although the flutes are fluttering up and down. The music represents the dawn of day. [6]



YOU CAN SEE the mounting tension in Munch's face as, with baton clasped in hands, he implores the orchestra to play "mysteriously." [5]

THE CONDUCTOR wants a "tutti fortissimo"—in other words, for everyone to play very loud. The stick, caught at the top of the beat, in an instant will slash downward for that loud chord. [11]

YOU CAN'T SEE IT, but Munch has leaped out of his rehearsal chair to signal a sudden increase of volume, leading up to another "tutti fortissimo." [14]

"LOUD, BUT PLAY IT WITH THE HEART!" yells Munch, pointing to his own heart. That clenched left hand is also a technical signal to the violins, meaning "more vibrato." [1]

HAVING ASKED the woodwinds to be "more ex-press-ive," he then stopped the orchestra and had the piccolo play the passage alone. Munch was delighted. [13]

EVERY NERVE is taut as, once again, the conductor demands a crescendo leading into tremendous volume. His baton has a thick hand-grip for comfort. [10]

THE MUSIC grows quiet, and slackens its pace, but in the frenzied excitement of the moment before, Munch's bushy gray hair has fallen over his eyes. "Mysterioso," he whispers. [12]

MUNCH smiles approvingly as the orchestra goes up, up, up into that enormous crash, the final chord of "Daphnis and Chloe." [7]

GLOBE STAFF PHOTOS BY GIL FRIEDBERG

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 5 - 1949

Munch Displays Great Talent

By ALLEN BOLE

Boston, Mass.—A superbly conceived and executed performance of Brahms' Fourth Symphony, long a staple of the Boston Symphony Orchestra repertoire, revealed again here on Friday the special talents of Conductor Charles Munch and his orchestra.

Though the music itself moved many deeply, the note that struck us particularly was the sanity and good-humor of the conductor. Direct and dignified, he is also relaxed and self-assured. His numerous smiles gave a special serenity and radiance to Mozart's "Prague" Symphony which opened the program, but if there were more to be expected there, how surprising in a way it was to find it in the Brahms which closed it.

* * *

IT IS noteworthy that the orchestra is playing with a fresh precision and accuracy. Munch does not distort the rhythm of the opening movement of the Brahms symphony, but a vigorous rhythmic emphasis, a superb balance, equally interesting articulation (the two things which mark great conducting for us anyway) give the music new distinction. The woodwind passages of the Andante are played with unusual simplicity, and more surprising still, the Allegro Giocoso had a quite humorous jocularity.

For the first time in America, and certainly in wierd contrast to Mozart and Beethoven, the orchestra presented the Concerto for Ondes Martenot and Orchestra by Andre Jolivet, played by Ginette Martenot.

The instrument is a complex electronic one, whose tone sounds at times like a tenor saxophone, violin, human voice or guitar. The tone is purer and surer than that of the thermin, and probably because the instrument is played with a keyboard.

* * *

THE SOLO instrument, played by the right hand alone, rises above a wild and stormy orchestral background, simply described in the program as "without key or rhythmic signature, and the beat changes from bar to bar throughout the score."

The effect is bewitching in places, and in others reminiscent of a triple-feature horror show. At those moments of greatest expression, the instrument seems to warble like a child in the wilderness, a limited but nevertheless touching effect.

The soloist played without the slightest hesitancy, and the audience accepted the instrument without further to-do. Munch conducted the staggering score with complete control, and managed to exact from a modulation in the last movement the work's one moment of sheer power. This will be remembered with a modulation in the Mozart Andante as among the afternoon's real accomplishments.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 6 - 1949

Boston Symphony Returns With New Conductor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its new conductor, Charles Munch, will give the first concert of its current Brooklyn season next Friday evening with a performance in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Featured in the program will be Bach's "Art of the Fugue," in a special orchestral arrangement by Ernest Munch. E. Power Biggs will be the assisting artist at the organ. The remainder of the program will be given over to the "Symphonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss.

As in past years, the Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will consist of five concerts held on Friday evenings at monthly intervals. The remaining concerts this season are scheduled for Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 17 and March 17. The series is held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, acting in co-operation with the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Journal American (B'klyn Sect.)
NOV 8 - 1949

MUNCH WAVES 1c BOSTON BATON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its new conductor, Charles Munch, will give the first concert of its current Brooklyn season Friday evening at 8:30 o'clock in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Featured in the program will be Bach's "Art of the Fugue," in a special orchestral arrangement by Ernest Munch. E. Power Biggs will be the assisting artist at the organ.

The remainder of the program will be given over to the Symphonia Domestica, by Richard Strauss.

As in past years, the Brooklyn Series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will consist of five concerts held on Friday evenings at monthly intervals.

FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
NEWS
NOV 8 - 1949

INTRODUCE NEW ORGAN

E. Power Biggs, the official organist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will introduce the west new organ recently installed in Symphony hall at a concert there on Monday evening, November 14, for the benefit of the Albert Schwitzer hospital fund. He will present an all-Bach program of solos on the organ. It will be recalled that the great Albert Schwitzer, is not only the world's most celebrated authority on organ but also on Bach.

LEXINGTON, KY.
LEADER
NOV 6 - 1949

Security And Permanence Of Fine Arts Depend On Government, Conductor Says

(Editor's note: Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 years and an RCA Victor recording artist, writes the following article exclusively for The Herald-Leader. A review of his most recent Victor album may be found in this week's "Off the Record.")

By Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

BOSTON, Nov. 5 (Special)—Of all existing problems, the problem of musical education remains outstanding, for here we venture into a deep, dense forest which we shall not attempt to explore in detail—because we soon may lose the forest for the trees.

We shall approach our problem from an overall viewpoint of basic principles, noting visible signs of the insufficiency of our system.

For instance: Much has been written and said lately about the decline of string players in our country, which bears evidence that a vital limb of our music-tree is affected and is losing its life-stream.

It is for us, musicians, to correct the harm done through our mistake, for, without any doubt, we have been neglecting and slipping in our principles.

A string instrument has a great and growing power or attraction. Next to the human voice it possesses in the fullest and richest degree the element of revelation, stimulating to a beginner and satisfying to an advancing student.

What is the reason for the present decline?

Is it because the string instrument demands years of work, intensive practice, patience and perseverence, to reach professional and artistic perfection?

Half a century ago we believed that the harder the work, the richer the reward. This principle served us well.

Today, however, many notions are inverted. In the past, the artist and the artisan strived for perfection. Time and labor were only means to attain this goal. Man had to surpass himself to maintain his principles, and the profession of his faith.

In our days we have grown pedestrian. We sacrifice quality for quantity. We simplify problems by a process of elimination. We think more of our security and less of our standards. Too often our source of inspiration is the source of our income. So we lower our principles and so we injure our art.

How far can we follow this line of descent? Imagine for a moment that we shall, first, forsake the strings for woodwinds and brass instruments, requiring less painstaking time and perseverence. Next, in our process of elimination, we shall favor percussion as a simplified and accelerated means of making a professional living and career.

What will become of our musical literature? We shall first be deprived of our classical repertoire, which requires the string element. Our literature will be limited and devoted to woodwind and brass ensemble. Finally, our composers will be forced to exert themselves to compose exclusively for percussion. In short, we shall return to jungle music and to primitive sound.

Beside the unpardonable mistake of neglecting the string instruments—a mistake which, collectively, signalizes a serious crisis in our symphonic and musical life, and, individually, means the frustration of a wonderful gift (a blessing given, and lost either voluntarily or abandoned under the pressure of circumstances)—we observe other points of disturbance and danger.

Let me mention two such powerful factors of modern life, pertaining to the realm of sound, as radio and television, and compare the use of music and the musical programs presented to the public. Music is used mostly as a medium for entertainment, while the art of music is virtually nonexistent. Classical music is treated as a step-child, overshadowed by the glitter and glamor of trivial musical material.

If we condemn those who censure music, and who level it to commonplace grounds, let us beware, and not be opened to criticism. Let us raise our own ground, enrich our soil, and explore the wide communicative and educational possibilities, offered to us by human research and the advance of science.

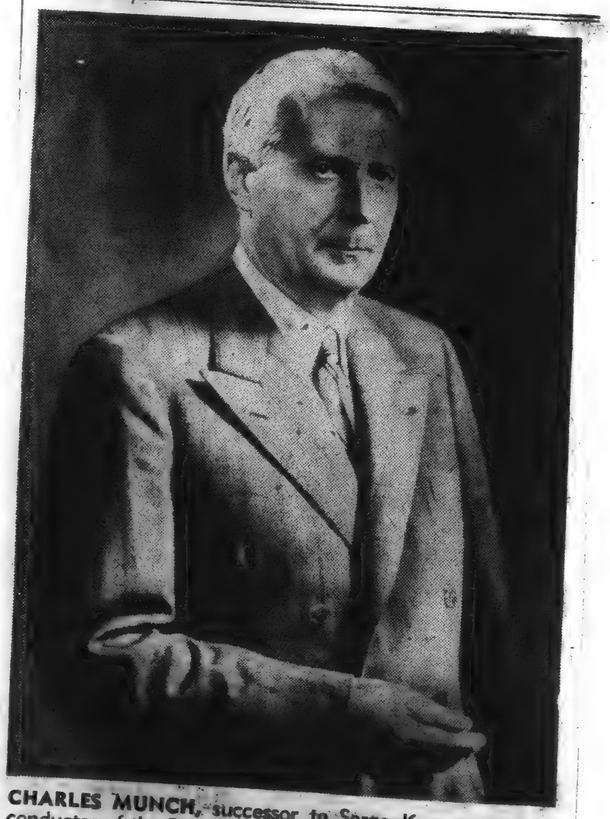
The miraculous inventions of our time hold a rich promise to the future of art. To transform the promise into practice we need the support of the government. Once again, we strike an old chord: The security and permanence of the fine arts depend on the support of the federal state.

Four years ago, when I first spoke from Tanglewood of the necessity of a Department of Fine Arts, I felt like a lonesome traveler on a long and lonely road. Today the idea is gaining followers. The need for the support of the arts by our government becomes an imminent and major step for the benefit of the cultural, educational and artistic life of our country.

The individual support, like so many streams feeding the vast river, is not enough. We need a great reservoir, a mighty dam to turn the river into power and provide the life energy to the arts.

The new current is slow, but is in progress. We must stand by, and be well prepared to witness an evolution, which will not alone strengthen the foundation of our artistic and cultural structure, but also reflect upon the high stat[illegible] of our country.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 6 - 1949



CHARLES MUNCH, successor to Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Munch will appear for the first time in Brooklyn when he conducts the orchestra at its opening concert of the season Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 6 - 1949

NEW CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Charles Munch, who will conduct his first New York concerts with the orchestra at Carnegie Hall this Wednesday and Saturday. He is Serge Koussevitsky's successor. Geoffrey Landesman

[40]

Great Instrument to Be Dedicated Monday, With Benefit Concert for African Hospital

What Went Into the Building of Symphony Hall's New Organ

By JOHN WM. RILEY

Imagine, for a moment, a self-contained communications system comprising 100 miles of wiring, more than 2000 switches of many varieties. Enough to service an office building with telephone lines, buzzer systems

Then imagine the ducts, blowers, fans and pipes required for an air conditioning system for this office building, or hotel. Then think of the thousands of board feet of fine woods which went into the furniture for that building.

Consider the men who worked on the electrical system, the air conditioning, and the furniture: electricians and their helpers, carpenters, cabinet makers, wood carvers, painters and wood finishers, metal workers, tinsmiths, foundry men, and so on; the designers, engineers and planners.

However, it is not an office building or a hotel in which these materials are contained—but an organ—the new one recently installed in Symphony Hall. It takes nearly as long—about six months—to build a real concert organ, as it does to put up a small building. And many of the materials which go into an organ, can also be found in a building.

The Symphony Hall organ has more than 4800 pipes, ranging from tiny metal ones a half-inch in length, to wooden ones, made of California sugar pine, nearly 32 feet tall. There are metal ones—the reed pipes—just as large.

The activating mechanism of the organ is electrical, the impulses carried through 100 miles of fine wire from the key, to intricate switchboards and thence to the valve which, when released, admits air under pressure to the pipe corresponding to the key depressed. In the back of the console there is a switchboard, called a Recorder Board, on which the organist can preset any combinations of the various stops. There are more than 1800 of these tiny switches. Then, if you include the keys of the four manuals, and pedals and the various stops, you have a total of far more than 2000 switches.

The console itself is made of oak, beautifully finished, with mahogany trim. Most of the wooden pipes are made of California sugar pine, a very fine-grained wood, with some small parts of cherry.

ORGAN PIPES are made of "spotted metal" (because the mixture roughly 45 percent tin, 55 percent lead, does not blend perfectly) unique for its resonating qualities. The metal is poured, not rolled or cast, in Aeolian-Skinner's basement foundry near Columbia Station, Dorchester.

The metal pipes are poured (never rolled) from a mixture of tin (about 45 percent) and lead (about 55 percent). Since the two do not blend perfectly, the resultant metal has a curious spotted effect. Pipes made of this metal have special resonating properties.

Behind the impressive gold and gray facade of the Symphony Hall stage, is an incredible maze of these 4800 pipes, arranged in curious groups, like soldiers of varying heights and shapes. Some are square, some round, some metal, some wood, some with flared bells, some doubling back on themselves.

Down in the cellar is a blower, like that for an air conditioning system (except that this one turns much faster). It is operated by a 15-horsepower electric motor. It maintains a steady air pressure in large tin pipes which in turn carry it to equalling chambers, thence to reservoirs under the banks of pipes. Then, when a key is depressed, and the electrical impulse releases the valve under a pipe, the air is immediately ready to rush in the base of the pipe, past the lip and out again. This the pipe "speaks" (an organist never says that it "sounds"—it "speaks").

Incidentally, it might be observed the air does not travel through the length of the pipe. Instead, it crosses the lip of the opening at the foot of the pipe. This sets the column of air inside the length of the pipe vibrating, which in turn produces the sound.

Like so many events that occur at Symphony Hall, the construction of the new organ is tied in with a variety of anniversaries. It marks the 50th anniversary of Symphony Hall, the 200th of the death of Bach, greatest of all composers who wrote for organ.

The new instrument came about largely through the offices of E. Power Biggs, the Symphony's organist. Last year Mr. Biggs presented to George E. Judd, Boston Symphony manager, a check for $1000 toward the reconditioning of the organ then used. This had been installed when Symphony Hall was built, 50 years ago, and had about outlived its usefulness. When Mr. Judd and the trustees had talked it over, they decided to add substantial sums to the $1000 and to plea for more funds, in order to have a completely new and more appropriate instrument installed.

Mostly Hand Work

A little more than six months ago, G. Donald Harrison of Dorchester's Aeolian-Skinner Organ Company, was called in. Mr. Biggs, Serge Koussevitzky, Wallace Goodrich (who had been the first to play the old Symphony Hall organ 50 years ago) and Charles Munch, the orchestra's new conductor, were all consulted. The specifications were given to Mr. Harrison and his firm went to work, its 100 artisans and craftsmen beginning the long job of tailoring the new instrument to exact requirements.

Into the factory, close by Columbia Station, went pigs of lead and tin (for pipes), hides of leather (for valves), coils of wire (for internal wiring), raw, unplaned lumber (for pipes and the console), sheet metal for aid ducts, and so on. All practically raw materials. Every bit of the construction of the organ, including even of the winding of small metal cores for electric magnets, was done in the factory, most of by hand, or with basic power tools.

Mr. Biggs was a frequent visitor to the factory. The organ was also inspected during construction by Albert Schweitzer, the famed Alsatian Bach authority, organist, physician, and so on. Mr. Schweitzer also autographed a small plaque which is fastened on the back of the console.

For a good many years, Schweitzer has maintained a hospital for natives in French Equatorial Africa. Fittingly, then, the first real test of the new organ will be made at a Symphony Hall concert Monday evening, Nov. 14. Mr. Biggs will be the organist, and members of the Boston Symphony under Mr. Munch, will accompany him. The proceeds of this concert will benefit Mr. Schweitzer's hospital.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 12 1949

BOSTON BENEFIT CONCERT

Monday at 8:30 p. m. the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch will present in Symphony Hall, Boston, a benefit program for the Albert Schweitzer Hospital in French Equatorial Africa.

E. Power Biggs will be the soloist on the new Aeolian-Skinner organ in a program of works by Haydn, Handesmith, Poulene Bach, Reubke and Dupre.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
NOV 10 1949

Munch On Podium

New York, Nov. 19—(AP)—With a brand new conductor, a brand new musical instrument and a program of new and old music, the Boston Symphony paid its first fall visit to Carnegie Hall last night.

Charles Munch, assuming the difficult task of carrying on where the quarter-century tenure of Serge Koussevitzky ended, carried on. The capacity audience was deeply impressed and moved, as the applause showed.

The new instrument was the "Ondes" Martenot, or Martinot "waves." Ginete Martenot, sister of inventor Maurice Martenot, was soloist in a concerto by Andre Jolivet. An electronic instrument with keyboard and sounding strings, it seems rather a combination of vaguely familiar instruments than anything new, a sort of three-in-one device. Developed after long experiment, providing an astounding range of effects and already in use in numerous musical compositions, the "waves" had more than a curiosity value, but at this hearing they did not promise definitely to become permanent waves.

The concerto itself was exciting, as was the program as a whole, much of which had been heard on the orchestra's recent Midwest tour. Other numbers were Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," Piston's full-bodied second suite for orchestra, and a fast-paced and beautiful Beethoven Seventh.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 10 1949

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY

CARNEGIE HALL

First New York concert of the season. Charles Munch conducting. Soloist: Ginette Martenot, playing the "Ondes Martenot." The program:

La Procession Nocturne.....Rabaud
Suite No. 2 for Orchestra.....Piston
Concerto for Ondes Martenot and Orchestra.....Jolivet
(first New York performance)
Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92..Beethoven

In Every Way Suitable

A LONG time ago, some fifteen years I think, the present writer predicted in "Modern Music" magazine that Charles Munch would be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night in Carnegie Hall he conducted his first New York concert in that incumbency. He led well; the orchestra played well; the program contained live music; the audience was pleased. There is every reason now, no less than back in the '30s, to consider his appointment a suitable one.

* * *

When an orchestra changes its leader, it is likely to sound suddenly either very much better or very much worse. The Boston Symphony sounded better last night than it has in some years, lighter in color, sweeter in tone, more relaxed, more musical, more alive. This phenomenon means nothing to the discredit of Serge Koussevitzsky, the retiring conductor. It means merely that the orchestra is a sound one and not a group of ill-assorted players only to be held in line by a familiar hand. The fact is therefore a happy one to note. A new and particular animation has come into the ensemble. Mr. Munch produced no marvels last night, but he made music and so did his players.

* * *

The music he made consisted of Rabaud's dated but still agreeable "Procession Nocturne," a new-to-New York Suite (No. 2) by Walter Piston, an also-new Concerto for Ondes Martenot and Orchestra—by Andre Jolivet and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The latter, being familiar to all, offered the best occasion for judging the conductor's classical style. This seemed to your observer thoroughly sound and enlightened. He rode the piece hard, perhaps, but he did not ask it to do what it could not do. He remained Beethoven. It even took on an incandescence far from common. It glowed and sang and moved forward. And if the tuttis were sometimes a little rough, they were never ugly. A certain rough enthusiasm is not unbecoming to Beethoven.

* * *

Walter Piston's Suite is a neo-classic piece in its author's familiar style. Pandiatonic sonorial harmony and angular melodic material are its usage. Early eighteenth-century elegance I take to be its subject. The writing is clear in every way but not very communicative or personal. A pleasant scholastic piece, but not, I should think, a memorable one.

* * *

Ginette Martenot

Associated Press

Who played the "Ondes Martenot" in yesterday's Boston Symphony concert

Andre Jolivet's Concerto is stronger tea. Harmonically and rhythmically sophisticated in the new Paris way (he is a companion-in-arms of Messiaen) it is also unusually elaborate in orchestral coloration and plainly alcoment of speech in the climaxes. One could wish our public to hear more of this admirable writer's music, and without the injection of the electronic Ondes Martenot. He is a richly imaginative and skillful composer. His music bears acquaintance.

The Ondes Martenot is the best, by far, of all the electronic instruments, but it is not yet a really proper solo instrument. Its value in the orchestra has long ago been proved by French composers. Its study is admitted by the Paris Conservatory, which offers instruction to that end. It has many virtues. Its voices are a lack of characteristic color and of volume limitation. It can do too many things to do any really well, and it can make a loud noise far too easy. Ginette Martenot, the inventor's sister, who played it last night, is a musician of taste. But one hates to think of its unlimited possibilities for vibrato, glissando and fortissimo being exploited by a lesser artist. Please, can't we leave it for a while to French composers and French-trained instrumentalists? It could be such a horror in reckless hands! Even in theirs it is none too attractive.

[41]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

Munch Begins as Director of Boston Orchestra.

[illegible] those episodes of historic change occurred yesterday when Rudolf Bing making his first formal, if highly [illegible] appearance in the afternoon as the incoming director of the Metropolitan Opera, and Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony for the first time as successor to Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall in the evening. In terms of background, musical life here seems to be proceeding on the (Central) European plan.

IRVING KOLODIN.

Munch comes to us as no new phenomenon, nor did he undertake to persuade us that he is. His several appearances with the Philharmonic have given us the measure of a man intensely musical, completely alive and no more than ordinarily flamboyant. To date, his interaction with the rich, settled quality of the Boston Symphony has tended to thin out, slightly, some of the richness, and agitate—more than slightly—its [illegible]. Thus, the best [illegible] night—in the Seventh symphony—[illegible]ated (which the dic[illegible] as "to oxygenate [illegible] by contrast with too [illegible]ression. Retained [illegible] was the superb e[illegible] past master has [illegible]ve years. [illegible] to tell what emer[illegible] but the soul [illegible]

[illegible] was largely of a [illegible] entitled a "Procession [illegible]" by Henri Rabaud, to [illegible] passing of that respected composer, who died in [illegible]er the conducted this or[illegible]n the season 1918-19); a Walter Piston, resident composer, for the en[illegible] and a "Concerto" by [illegible]olivet, for "Ondes Mar[illegible]l orchestra to show us [illegible] aesthetic wind is blow[illegible]days in France.

[illegible] who have heard the [illegible] or similar electronic [illegible]nts have a fair idea of "Ondes Martenot" (Mar[illegible]s inventor and "Ondes" [illegible]aves" sounds like minus [illegible]ey intonation of the [illegible] Instead of a vague [illegible] the tune is controlled [illegible]keyboard, producing fairly [illegible]mation which is subject [illegible]mplification as the [illegible]ostates. Beside the pe[illegible]t's case the inventor's [illegible]ronette operating from [illegible]olks like a streamlined [illegible]machine, is a device re[illegible]s a Maori war shield, with [illegible]across it for additional [illegible]. What's musical utility [illegible]was left unanswered by [illegible] piece, a banal arrange[illegible]orchestral cliches de[illegible]show off the "Ondes" [illegible]capacity to glide [illegible]or quaver. It does [illegible]way to whet the ap[illegible]Miklos Rosza, should [illegible]Spellbound" score come [illegible]ted a good deal more [illegible]animated, well[illegible]of the Beethoven [illegible]. It had no excess of [illegible]cluding excess — [illegible]co-ordinated rhyth[illegible]a sensible dynamic [illegible]a potent response to [illegible]magic that reposes [illegible]. The allegretto [illegible]ther active feet, but [illegible]the trio of the [illegible]ably balanced with [illegible]he movement, the [illegible]climax in a way [illegible]bors to do their [illegible]apologetic risk [illegible]avenue should be [illegible]the Munch regime.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 10 1949

Music

Eerie Ondes Introduced By Munch

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Rivaling the debut of Charles Munch as the Boston Symphony's new director in Carnegie Hall last night was an electronic instrument called "Ondes Martenot."

Mr. Munch wasn't exactly spot news, since every concert-goer in America knows he ranks with the best batonists in the field as technician and interpreter.

The "Ondes Martenot" aroused excitement because it made Carnegie Hall sound haunted and because it was scored for in a special concerto by Andre Jolivet.

Works Like Radio.

The "Ondes" works on the same principle as radio—combining two currents of varying frequencies to produce rhythmic beats then transformed into audible tone.

A keyboard and a metallized ribbon ringed to a finger make the current sing.

As operated by the inventor's sister, Ginette Martenot, the "Ondes blended strikingly with the heaving orchestral color provided by composer Jolivet. At times it sounded like a horn blaring eenily in a long tunnel.

The sounds were weird and ghostly, as if they came from an unreal world of shadowy terror, moving closer on special feet. One sensed the grisly flight of a vampyre bat or the cobweb creepiness of Draclua.

If any proof were needed that the "Ondes" rate a seat in the orchestra, Miss Martenot supplied it last night. Her brother Maurice certainly started something when he fished music out of the air.

Conducts with Power.

Mr. Munch conducted with marked power last night, as if he felt the responsibility of taking over an orchestra world-famous for its tonal polish and precision. He made it sound better than ever.

The playing mounted in a rising tower of excellence, topped by Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. A smart new Suite by Walter Piston came in for especially bright rendering.

As a tribute to his friend the late Henri Rabaud, Mr. Munch gave a warm and poetic reading of "La Procession Nocturne." It turned out to be a tribute to both Mr. Munch and the orchestra too.

Mr. Munch seemed to leave everybody satisfied last night that as new custodian of the Boston Symphony, he is worthy of his predecessor, Serge Koussevitzky—and of his own reputation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 10 1949

MUNCH PRESENTS TWO NEW WORKS

Conducts Boston Symphony Here in Piston's Suite and a Concerto by Jolivet

By OLIN DOWNES

Charles Munch appeared for the first time in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. He gave proof immediately of the catholicity of his taste, his sincerity as an interpreter, and his passionate musical nature. Here, too, was proof of the freedom from sensationalism of theatrical intention on the part of Mr. Munch, for his program was designed to include the works of the masters of the past and the latest examples of present tendencies in musical composition.

The concert opened with the poetical if Gounod-flavored "Procession Nocturne" by Henri Rabaud, Mr. Munch's near and dear friend and a conductor in a past season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died last September. This was beautifully played, with sensuous tone color and reverent feeling. Then came two "first times" for New York, in the instances of Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra and André Jolivet's Concerto for Ondes Martenot and orchestra, which involved the appearance as soloist on this electrical instrument of Ginette Martenot, the sister of the inventor. The program concluded with the Beethoven Seventh Symphony.

There were no concessions for applause, no occasions for spectacular deeds of derring-do on the conductor's part; simply a balanced program of music old and new, demanding many different interpretive approaches, for the sole benefit of the audience.

Munch Absorbed in Music

The objectivity of the program, fortunately chosen or otherwise, was companioned by the simplicity of the conductor's bearing and his palpable and unaffected absorption in the music. This does not mean that Mr. Munch is a merely objective, self-contained interpreter. He is uncommonly full-blooded, imaginative, dramatic by temperament. He will sacrifice neatness, balance, suavity of tone any time for the rhythmic pulse and the emotional communication. Style is for him wholly a means to an end, and there is no pose in his make-up.

The charming music of Rabaud requires no uncommon degree of perception, but rather the conductor's authoritative mastery of his means to convey it to the audience. A much greater test of the orchestra and the conductor was the Piston Suite, which is not music of merely temporary or superficial appeal. Whether it is music that will in a later time beguile as well as interest discerning listeners by the modernity of its chord-structure and counterpoint is to be seen.

The music is immediately arresting because of its workmanship and the good bite of its independent voice-leading, by the compactness of the style and the clarity of the old forms which the different movements embody. The most emotional, indeed tragical moment, at an initial hearing, is the climax of the Sarabande. But this is not music of romantic posturing, but of unportentous and clear formal intent. So the third movement is lively and [illegible] and the vigor of the final [illegible] ps the work with its adroitly contrived stretto and the final punch of its propulsive rhythm.

New Instrument Studied

As for the new instrument—new to these concerts and, we believe, to symphonies in Carnegie Hall—it has a wide range, a considerable variety of tone color in its different registers, a wide range of sonority and supposedly a greater control of intonation than other instruments of its species which produce tone by electrical means. It is played on a keyboard with the right hand, while the left regulates pitch and intensity. One might have taken more kindly to this interesting instrument if it had been used in a composition of more worth than the horrible-sounding concerto of Jolivet, with its Grand Guignol orchestration, its general clatter and bombast and deafening racket. Through and above this racket, which surpassed the noisiest scores that we can recall at this moment, the "Ondes Martenot" shrieked or sang, and rode the instrumental tempest like a circling discordant gull.

Miss Martenot played expertly, and at last a really very bad and aimless piece of sound was over. The instrument employs qualities of interest in the dispassionately assessed, but nothing whatever was gained for music by its atrocious context. If this is the best that the new group of French composers calling themselves "La Jeune France" can do for music—and they all, including Messaien, Lesur and Bandrier, compose for the "Ondes Martenot," then indeed the rising generation of French creative musicians is badly off. But we know that Messaien has done better. Unhappy the audience which must endure such concatenation as this concerto.

Beethoven's familiar symphony cleared the air and was given a rousing performance. There could be differences of opinion with Mr. Munch concerning a balance here and an accent or alteration of tempo there. But is there only one way to treat every detail of a classic? Indeed that is just the trouble, this religious rigidity of the so-called "tradition." For a change, at long last, we heard an orchestra shaken, singing, chanting with Beethoven's noble vehemence, and super-terrestrial vision, and earth-shaking belly laughter.

For Mr. Munch is no man to sample a piece of inspired music from a safe place, where he can consult Emily Post's standards of musical propriety, or finicking niceties of the latest musical fashion. No more was the Beethoven of the Seventh symphony less than an unmannerly titan.

An exceedingly dynamic first movement put everyone on the "qui vive." Favoring incisive rhythmic accents, Munch generated considerable intensity punctuated by invigorating shifts from pianissimo to forte playing. It was masterful conducting to which the orchestra responded superbly. The other movements reflected a keen mind at work both in matters of detail (there was some remarkable clarity in the playing) and of design.

At the end of this first concert there was no doubt that the Boston Symphony is in the hands of a superior conductor. It played like a rejuvenated orchestra.

Music

Boston Symphony Heard With Munch

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

Whatever the musical historians may say of Charles Munch, they can never accuse him of irresolution in opening his term as conductor of the Boston Symphony concert series in New York. Determined and impetuous on the podium, almost to the point of [illegible], he is also a man of tenacity in [illegible] grams. A portion of last night's concert in Carnegie Hall was devoted to Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra, a cerebral piece put together with the efficiency of a court stenographer and with a correspondingly dispassionate result. Mr. Piston's point of view is that of the urbane gentleman who looks at life but who doesn't let it disturb his emotions.

This music was followed by a Concerto for the Ondes Martenot and Orchestra, by Andre Jolivet. The aforementioned electronic instrument was invented by the French scientist-musician, Maurice Martenot and the concerto was played by his sister, Ginette, a personable miss who added a welcome human touch to proceedings.

If my memory is not playing tricks, the Ondes Martenot is a distinct improvement on the Theremin, a similar instrument and one familiar to the local scene.

More esthetic in sound and appearance, the "Martenot" has a keyboard to which an upright set of strings is attached. It also sounds its tones through a metallized "ribbon" that can be moved to right or left.

Because of its principle of generating ether waves electrically, its possibilities of range and volume are enormous. As judged by Jolivet's concerto, however, it's expressive results are still largely negative, and this in spite of the fact that Miss Martenot played accurately in pitch, and with sensitivity. A different kind of work which would favor its "better" nature might, however, give a more positive impression. The final movement, Largo Cantabile, proved that when the tones are soft rather than forceful, they are much more appealing. One can imagine its being effective as a medium for the projection of atmospheric theatre music. It would be unfair to judge it from this one short hearing and there is no doubt that the scientific principles underlying its construction open up new vistas of expression. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony closed the program with a brilliance which was also accompanied by considerable nervous tension. While the orchestra performed admirably from many aspects, the ensemble is obviously not yet thoroughly at home with its new master. Rabaud's poignant symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," opened the evening's music.

Music Tonight . . .

Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski conducting; William Kapell, pianist, soloist in the Beethoven Piano Concerto in B Flat Major, Carnegie Hall, 8:45.

"Carmen" by the New York City Opera Company, City Center, 8:15.

N. Y. POST HOME NEWS

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

NOV 10 1949

Munch Conducts Symphony

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Much ado in a novel way set up the first concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night. Less novel because of his great appearances here but most significant was the "debut" of the orchestra's new conductor, Charles Munch. Most novel was the debut of the electronic instrument "ondes martenot." Two first New York performances provided musical novelties.

It was a busy program Munch chose to open with his countryman Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," in tribute to the former Boston conductor of 30 years ago who died Sept. 11. The music is hyphenated Wagner and all that, but it showed off the orchestra beautifully. Like their new leader, the Bostonians were on their toes.

The first hearing of Walter Piston's "Second Suite for Orchestra" revealed nothing new about this American composer. Its livelier portions proved most palatable while others had a dullish tinge. Including it was a nice gesture on Munch's part, especially with the composer present to take a bow.

Radio Principle

Of the "ondes martenot" opinion will differ on whether it sounds like something new or like a cross between a human voice and a saxophone with various wind variations to account for its exceptional range and power. It works on the radio principle of two currents of different frequencies combined and transformed into air waves.

Ginette Martenot, sister of inventor, used a keyboard instrument, her right hand playing melody, her left controlling volume and articulation.

The instrument introduced Jolivet's Concerto for Ondes Martenot and Orchestra. This bit of musical contemporaneity ranged from raucous outbursts to suave melodic lines with about as wide a scope as the instrument itself.

Firm Direction

Throughout this part of the concert, Munch had disclosed firm direction and the orchestra hearty cooperation. They entered the real testing grounds with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The performance was a challenging one.

[42]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
NOV 10 1949

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

Munch Begins as Director of Boston Orchestra.

One of those episodes of historic change occurred yesterday, with Rudolf Bing making his first formal, if highly informal, appearance in the afternoon as the incoming director of the Metropolitan Opera, and Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony for the first time as successor to Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall in the evening. In terms of background, musical life here seems to be proceeding on the (Central) European plan.

IRVING KOLODIN.

Munch comes to us as no new phenomenon, nor did he undertake to persuade us that he is. His several appearances with the Philharmonic have given us the measure of a man intensely musical, completely alive and no more than ordinarily flamboyant. To date, his interaction with the rich, settled quality of the Boston Symphony has tended to thin out, slightly, some of the richness, and agitate—more than slightly—its sound quality. Thus, the best sound heard last night—in the Beethoven Seventh symphony—was a bit aerated (which the dictionary defines as "to oxygenate, as blood") by contrast with the Koussevitzky tension. Retained, fortunately, was the superb ensemble its past master has achieved in twenty-five years. It is too soon to tell what crops Munch will raise, but the soil is well prepared.

This program was largely of a ceremonial nature: a "Procession Nocturne" by Henri Rabaud, to note the passing of that respected French composer, who died in September (he conducted this orchestra in the season 1918-19); a suite of Walter Piston, resident (Boston) composer, for the ensemble; and a "Concerto" by André Jolivet, for "Ondes Martenot" and orchestra to show us how the aesthetic wind is blowing these days in France."

Those who have heard the Theremin, or similar electronic instruments have a fair idea of what the "Ondes Martenot" (Martenot is its inventor and "Ondes" means waves) sounds like minus the queasy intonation of the Theremin. Instead of a vague hand-pass, the tune is controlled by a keyboard, producing fairly exact intonation which is subject to as much amplification as the player dictates. Beside the performer (in this case the inventor's sister, Ginette) operating from what looks like a streamlined sewing machine, is a device resembling a Maori war shield, with strings across it for additional effects. What its musical utility may be was left unanswered by the Jolivet piece, a banal arrangement of orchestral cliches designed to show off the "Ondes Martenot's" capacity to glide, trill, pierce, or quaver. It does all these in a way to whet the appetite of Miklos Rosza, should a new "Spellbound" score come along.

Munch whetted a good deal more with his secure, animated, well-paced direction of the Beethoven masterwork. It had no excess of anything — including excess — except a finely co-ordinated rhythmic pattern, a sensible dynamic integration, a potent response to the orchestral magic that reposes in this score. The allegretto moved on rather active feet, but was not tripping; the trio of the scherzo was evenly balanced with the bulk of the movement, the whole led to its climax in a way to let it the horns to do their work without apoplectic risk. Symphony Hall would be no summer in the Munch regime.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
NOV 10 1949

Music

Eerie Ondes Introduced By Munch

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

Rivaling the debut of Charles Munch as the Boston Symphony's new director in Carnegie Hall last night was an electronic instrument called "Ondes Martenot."

Mr. Munch wasn't exactly spot news, since every concert-goer in America knows he ranks with the best batonists in the field as technician and interpreter.

The "Ondes Martenot" aroused excitement because it made Carnegie Hall sound haunted and because it was scored for in a special concerto by Andre Jolivet.

Works Like Radio.

The "Ondes" works on the same principle as radio—combining two currents of varying frequencies to produce rhythmic beats then transformed into audible tone.

A keyboard and a metallized ribbon ringed to a finger make the current sing.

As operated by the inventor's sister, Ginette Martenot, the "Ondes blended strikingly with the heaving orchestral color provided by composer Jolivet. At times it sounded like a horn blaring eenily in a long tunnel.

The sounds were weird and ghostly, as if they came from an unreal world of shadowy terror, moving closer on special feet. One sensed the grisly flight of a vampyre bat or the cobweb creepiness of Draclua.

If any proof were needed that the "Ondes" rate a seat in the orchestra, Miss Martenot supplied it last night. Her brother Maurice certainly started something when he fished music out of the air.

Conducts with Power.

Mr. Munch conducted with marked power last night, as if he felt the responsibility of taking over an orchestra world-famous for its tonal polish and precision. He made it sound better than ever.

The playing mounted in a rising tower of excellence, topped by Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. A smart new Suite by Walter Piston came in for especially bright rendering.

As a tribute to his friend the late Henri Rabaud, Mr. Munch gave a warm and poetic reading of "La Procession Nocturne." It turned out to be a tribute to both Mr. Munch and the orchestra too.

Mr. Munch seemed to leave everybody satisfied last night that as new custodian of the Boston Symphony, he is worthy of his predecessor, Serge Koussevitzky—and of his own reputation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 10 1949

MUNCH PRESENTS TWO NEW WORKS

Conducts Boston Symphony Here in Piston's Suite and a Concerto by Jolivet

By ALAN ROWNES

Charles Munch appeared for the first time in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. He gave proof immediately of the catholicity of his taste, his sincerity as an interpreter, and his passionate musical nature. Here, too, was proof of the freedom from sensationalism of theatrical invention on the part of Mr. Munch, for his program was designed to include the works of the masters of the past and the latest examples of present tendencies in musical composition.

The concert opened with the poetical if Gounod-flavored "Procession Nocturne," by Henri Rabaud, Mr. Munch's near and dear friend and a conductor in a past season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died last September. This was beautifully played, with sensuous tone-color and reverent feeling. Then came two "first times" for New York, in the instances of Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra and André Jolivet's Concerto for Ondes Martenot and Orchestra, which involved the appearance as soloist on this electrical instrument of Ginette Martenot, sister of the inventor. The program concluded with the Beethoven Seventh Symphony.

There were no encouragements for applause, no occasions for spectacular deeds of derring-do on the conductor's part; simply a balanced program of music old and new, demanding many different interpretive approaches, for the sole benefit of the audience.

Munch Absorbed in Music

The objectivity of the program, fortunately spoken or otherwise, was companioned by the simplicity of the conductor's bearing and his palpable and unaffected absorption in the music. This does not mean that Mr. Munch is a merely objective, self-contained interpreter. He is uncommonly full-blooded, imaginative, dramatic by temperament. He will sacrifice neatness, balance, suavity of tone any time for the rhythmic pulse and the emotional communication. Style is for him wholly a means to an end, and there is no pose in his make-up.

The charming music of Rabaud requires no uncommon degree of perception, but rather the conductor's authoritative mastery of his means to convey it to the audience. A much greater test of the orchestra and the conductor was the Piston Suite, which is not music of merely temporary or superficial appeal. Whether it is music that will in a later time beguile as well as interest discerning listeners by the modernity of its chord-structure and counterpoint is to be seen.

The music is immediately arresting because of its workmanship and the good bite of its independent voice-leading, by the compactness of the style and the clarity of the old forms which the different movements embody. The most emotional, indeed tragical moment, at an initial hearing, is the climax of the Sarabande. But this is not music of romantic posturing, but of unportentous and clear formal intent. So [illegible] movement is lively and [illegible] the vigor of the finale [illegible] the work with its admirably contrived stretto and the final touch of its propulsive rhythm.

New Instrument Studied

As for the new instrument—new to these concerts and, we believe, to symphonies in Carnegie Hall—it has a wide range, a considerable variety of tone color in its different registers, a wide range of sonority and supposedly a greater control of intonation than other instruments of its species which produce tone by electrical means. It is played on a keyboard with the right hand, while the left regulates pitch and intensity. One might have taken more kindly to this interesting instrument if it had been used in a composition of more worth than the horrible-sounding concerto of Jolivet, with its Grand Guignol orchestration, its general clatter and bombast and deafening racket. Through and above this racket, which surpassed the noisiest scores that we can recall at this moment, the "Ondes Martenot" shrieked or sang, and rode the instrumental tempest like a circling discordant gull.

Miss Martenot played expertly, and at last a really very bad and aimless piece of sound was over. The instrument employs qualities of interest to be impassionately assessed, but nothing whatever was gained for music by its atrocious context. If this is the best that the new group of French composers calling themselves "La Jeune France" can do for music—and they all, including Messaien, Lesur and Bandrier, compose for the "Ondes Martenot," then indeed the rising generation of French creative musicians is badly off. But we know that Messaien has done better. Unhappy the audience which must endure such concatenation as this concerto.

Beethoven's familiar symphony cleared the air and was given a rousing performance. There could be differences of opinion with Mr. Munch concerning a balance here and an accent or alteration of tempo there. But is there only one way to treat every detail of a classic? Indeed that is just the trouble, this religious rigidity of the so-called "tradition." For a change, at long last, we heard an orchestra shaken, singing, chanting with Beethoven's noble vehemance, and super-terrestrial vision, and earth-shaking belly laughter.

For Mr. Munch is no man to compile a piece of inspired music from a safe place, where he can consult Emily Post's standards of musical propriety, or finicking niceties of the latest musical fashion. No more was the Beethoven of the Seventh symphony less than an unmannerly titan.

An exceedingly dynamic first movement put everyone on the "qui vive." Favoring incisive rhythmic accents, Munch generated considerable intensity punctuated by invigorating shifts from pianissimo to forte playing. It was masterful conducting to which the orchestra responded superbly. The other movements reflected a keen mind at work both in matters of detail (there was some remarkable clarity in the playing) and of design.

At the end of this first concert there was no doubt that the Boston Symphony is in the hands of a superior conductor. It played like a rejuvenated orchestra.

Music

Boston Symphony Heard With Munch

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

Whatever the musical historians may say of Charles Munch, they can never accuse him of irresolution in opening his term as conductor of the Boston Symphony concert series in New York. Determined [illegible] on the podium, almost to the point of fierceness, he is also a man of tenacity in [illegible] grams. A portion of last night's concert in Carnegie Hall was devoted to Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra, a cerebral piece put together with the efficiency of a court stenographer and with a correspondingly dispassionate result. Mr. Piston's point of view is that of the urbane gentleman who looks at life but who doesn't let it disturb his emotions.

This music was followed by a Concerto for the Ondes Martenot and Orchestra, by Andre Jolivet. The aforementioned electronic instrument was invented by the French scientist-musician, Maurice Martenot and the concerto was played by his sister, Ginette, a personable miss who added a welcome human touch to proceedings.

If my memory is not playing tricks, the Ondes Martenot is a distinct improvement on the Theremin, a similar instrument and one familiar to the local scene.

More esthetic in sound and appearance, the "Martenot" has a keyboard to which an upright set of strings is attached. It also sounds its tones through a metallized "ribbon" that can be moved to right or left.

Because of its principle of generating ether waves electrically, its possibilities of range and volume are enormous. As judged by Jolivet's concerto, however, it's expressive results are still largely negative, and this in spite of the fact that Miss Martenot played accurately in pitch, and with sensitivity. A different kind of work which would favor its "better" nature might, however, give a more positive impression. The final movement, Largo Cantabile, proved that when the tones are soft rather than forceful, they are much more appealing. One can imagine its being effective as a medium for the projection of atmospheric theatre music. It would be unfair to judge it from this one short hearing and there is no doubt that the scientific principles underlying its construction open up new vistas of expression. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony closed the program with a brilliance which was also accompanied by considerable nervous tension. While the orchestra performed admirably from many aspects, the ensemble is obviously not yet thoroughly at home with its new master. Rabaud's poignant symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," opened the evening's music.

Music Tonight . . .

Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski conducting; William Kapell, pianist, soloist in the Beethoven Piano Concerto in B Flat Major. Carnegie Hall, 8:45.

"Carmen" by the New York City Opera Company, City Center, 8:15.

N. Y. POST HOME NEWS

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
NOV 10 1949

Munch Conducts Symphony

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Much ado in a novel way set up the first concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night. Less novel because of his great appearances here but most significant was the "debut" of the orchestra's new conductor, Charles Munch. Most novel was the debut of the electronic instrument "ondes martenot." Two first New York performances provided musical novelties.

It was a busy program Munch chose to open with his countryman Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," in tribute to the former Boston conductor of 30 years ago who died Sept. 11. The music is hyphenated Wagner and all that, but it showed off the orchestra beautifully. Like their new leader, the Bostonians were on their toes.

The first hearing of Walter Piston's "Second Suite for Orchestra" revealed nothing new about this American composer. Its livelier portions proved most palatable while others had a dullish tinge. Including it was a nice gesture on Munch's part, especially with the composer present to take a bow.

Radio Principle

Of the "ondes martenot" opinion will differ on whether it sounds like something new or like a cross between a human voice and a saxophone with various wind variations to account for its exceptional range and power.

It works on the radio principle of two currents of different frequencies combined and transformed into air waves.

Ginette Martenot, sister of inventor, used a keyboard instrument, her right hand playing melody, her left controlling volume and articulation.

The instrument introduced Jolivet's Concerto for Ondes Martenot and Orchestra. This bit of musical contemporaneity ranged from raucous outbursts to suave melodic lines with about as wide a scope as the instrument itself.

Firm Direction

Throughout this part of the concert, Munch had disclosed firm direction and the orchestra hearty cooperation. They entered the real testing grounds with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The performance was a challenging one.

[42].

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
NOV 13 1949

Music

BIGGS TO GIVE CONCERT AT HUB

By RAYMOND MORIN

A concert of uncommon interest will be given tomorrow nighth in Boston when E. Power Biggs plays the great new organ at Symphony Hall to aid the Albert Schweitzer Hospital.

Mr. Biggs will play three concertos for organ and chamber orchestra (of Boston Symphony players) conducted by Charles Munch. In addition, he will perform the following works by Bach: "Toccata, Adagio and Fugue in C major," three chorale-preludes, and "Toccata and Fugue in D minor."

E. POWER BRIGGS

It has been Mr. Briggs' special pride to play the entire cycle of Bach organ works. He does not believe in catering to what is supposed to be "the public taste in music." In fact he says, "Go ahead and play something that is good, and the public will follow right with you."

In no small way, Mr. Biggs has created a renaissance of the great instrument that came into vigorous prominence in Bach's time, 200 years ago. Concertos for organ and orchestra have been a special problem, and as Mr. Biggs says, "It has not been until our present day that composers have again grasped the unique possibilities of combining these instruments."

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
NOV 12 1949

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK FROM TOUR OF BRAZIL

LENOX, Mass., Nov. 11-AP-Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived home with Mrs. Koussevitzky today after a tour of Brazil.

Koussevitzky gave five concerts—the first on Oct. 7 and the fifth last Sunday—with the Brazilian Symphony Orchestra.

The Brazilian Government gave Koussevitzky the National Order of the Southern Cross. He also was awarded an honorary degree by the University of Brazil.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 12 1949

MUSIC

By Paul Affelder

Boston Symphony Opens Season at Academy With Memorials to Bach and Strauss

It was a rejuvenated Boston Symphony Orchestra that presented its first concert of the season last evening at the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn. There was greater freshness and vigor throughout the orchestra, more fullness of tone in the strings and more control in the wind sections. And there was certainly much enthusiasm on the part of the players.

This transformation in the performance of the Bostonians has come about since the arrival of their new conductor, Charles Munch, who was making his first local appearance. It would be difficult to figure how they could have kept from throwing themselves wholeheartedly into everything they did, for the conductor was constantly exhorting them to give their all. He went to great lengths to achieve the desired results, gesticulating wildly, rising on tiptoe and even jumping in the air. But the sounds that emanated from the stage were worth the effort he put into producing them.

The program, which consisted of only two works, was a memorial tribute to two great creative masters—Johann Sebastian Bach, the 200th anniversary of whose death will be observed on July 28, 1950, and Richard Strauss, who died this past Sept. 8 in Germany. Bach was represented by his last two compositions, "The Art of the Fugue" and the Chorale-Prelude, "Wenn Wir in Hoechsten Nothen Sein," and Strauss by the last of his symphonic poems, the "Symphonia Domestica."

The "Art of the Fugue," Bach's magnificent musical treatise on the subject of fugal writing, was presented in an extremely tasteful arrangement by the conductor's cousin, Ernest Munch. This has been orchestrated more or less cumulatively, beginning with five solo strings, building up to the entire string section, then adding winds and organ as the complexities of the fugues increase. There are also occasional reversions to the solo string group, somewhat in the manner of the concerto grosso. In order to give us sufficient variety, the order of the fugues was altered, and only nine of the 19 in the set were performed. M. Munch gave us a well thought out, noble reading that was a moving tribute to the genius of the Leipzig cantor.

The last of the fugues in "The Art of the Fugue" was left unfinished when blindness interrupted Bach's work on it. Later, however, he dictated the Chorale-Prelude, "Wenn Wir in Hoechsten Nothen Sein," and since this is his final opus, it is usually played after the unfinished fugue. This simple and serene work was played as an organ solo last night and was delivered with great dignity by E. Power Biggs, despite the fact that he was obliged to struggle with the Academy's very poor instrument.

It was in the Strauss score, however, that both conductor and orchestra reached the height of their powers. This is not the strongest of Strauss' symphonic poems, but in M. Munch's enthusiastic unfolding of this "symphony of domestic life," we were given a new insight into its beauties. Never before have we been treated to such a clear, incandescent reading. And, incidentally, never before have we noticed how many germs for "Der Rosenkavalier" this score contains. It is small wonder that the conductor looked as if he could barely drag himself off the stage at the end, and that he had to return many times in response to the ovation he received.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 12 1949

New Leader of Boston Symphony Wins Academy of Music Plaudits

A brilliant audience filled the Academy of Music last night for the season's first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its new conductor, Charles Munch. Mr. Munch immediately won the audience with his gracious personality and striking looks, and received an ovation at the end of the concert for his superb command of his instrumentalists.

Mr. Munch belongs to the athletic school of conductors. A tall man, with shoulders a fullback might envy, he has a magnificent mane of iron-gray hair which, in moments of excitement, falls in great disorder over his forhead. He directs with wide, sweeping gestures and frequently brings his hands high above his head to emphasize a point. In climaxes, he not only rises on his toes, but actually hops into the air; in more relaxed periods of music he, too, relaxes, drooping noticeably and shifting his baton to his left hand while he beats time with small flutters of the right.

Anyway, his style of conducting was quite different from any seen hereabouts and made a distinct hit with his audience. Last night there were only two compositions played, Bach's Art of the Fugue, arranged for orchestra by the conductor's cousin, Ernest Musch, and Richard Strauss' Domestic Symphony.

The organ part in the Art of the Fugue was played by the organist, E. Power Biggs, who has himself made an arrangement of the composition for organists.

Reception for Munch

Following the concert there was an informal reception for Mr. Munch in the Green Room, the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences acting as host. The Boston Symphony concerts are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, acting in cooperation with the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts. Remaining concerts this season are scheduled for Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 17 and March 17.

Mrs. William H. Good had as her guests last night in Box 1, official referee Edwin L. Garvin and Mrs. Garvin, official referee George E. Brower and Mrs. Brower, Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport and Mrs. Edward C. Blum. Members of the faculty of the Friends School were in Box 2, and Box 3 was occupied by guests of the Berkeley Institute.

Also in Boxes

Mrs. John S. Stevens, president of the Brooklyn Women's Club, occupied Box 4 with other members of the club, including Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. H. S. Peare, Mrs. W. E. Howes and Dr. and Mrs. H. S. Rast. Seated in Box 5 were Emma Jessie Ogg and her guest, Julia Logan; Mr. and Mrs. William G. Parker, Mrs. Edward M. Fuller and a guest, and Mrs. Augusta Uhlich and a guest.

Other boxes were occupied by officers from the U. S. naval station in Brooklyn, who were guests of the Brooklyn Institute. Seated in Box 8 were blind veterans and their escorts from the Red Cross, who came as guests of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony concerts.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
NOV 11 1949

Boston Symphony Gives Rutgers Series Flying Start

By JOAN BROOKWELL

A capacity audience gave its enthusiastic stamp of approval last night to Charles Munch in his first appearance here as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There have been many who looked upon the resignation of Serge Koussevitzky as a major tragedy for the popular orchestral group, but Munch's dynamic leadership and personality proved that the orchestra hasn't lost a thing.

The new conductor is a big, shaggy, handsome man, whose technique ranges from a slow, drooping motion of the hand seemingly expressive of great weariness, to the most vigorous and intense performance which literally lifts him off both feet.

Mozart's "Symphony in D Minor," known as the "Prague" symphony, opened the program. This composition, Mozart's 38th symphony, is representative of the composer at his best, and is one of his most popular. Written in three movements, (Mozart omitted his usual minuet) the Prague symphony is a brilliant, fiery work, particularly in the first movement. This is followed by a slower, more polished movement, the "Andante," and ends with a final movement which is full of gaiety and color. With all the lightness, however, there is the typical Mozartian use of the conventional musical form and the Boston orchestra retains this classic purity to perfection.

By far the favorite in last night's trio of compositions was Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet, Suite No. 2. The three parts, entitled "Daybreak," "Pantomime" and "General Dance," tell the story of the love of a shepherd and shepherdess. The lovely melodies, the delicate shading, the strings that imitate the ripple of water and the woodwinds which create the sounds of birds at dawn, and the vast climaxes give this composition a richness which makes it an ever-welcome program choice.

The "Symphonia Domestica," which comprised the second half of the program, was one of the last of Richard Strauss' tone poems, and, according to the composer's guide, is supposed to illustrate a day in a family, with different themes representing the father, the mother and the baby.

However, there is no break between the four "movements" of this symphony, and even with a program guide it is difficult to follow the day's activities. It is a pleasant enough composition, but is perhaps a little too romantic, too joyful, too sentimental, even for Strauss. The overpowering jubilation with which the symphony ends is more charactertistic of domestic happiness.

For the clique of music lovers who believe that the Boston Symphony is incomparable (and we are included) last night's performance was probably the top event in the series slated by Rutgers for the coming season.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
NOV 11 1949

KOUSSEVITZKY HOME AFTER BRAZIL TRIP

Lenox, Nov. 11 (UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 75-year-old conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived at his Lenox estate with his wife today after a month's visit to Brazil where he made his South American debut by conducting five concerts in Rio de Janeiro.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
HOME NEWS
NOV 13 1949

WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

At the Boston Symphony concert last Wednesday, I heard one puzzled old lady say to another during the intermission just after having been introduced to the electronic instrument, the Ondes Martenot—"Did you like being educated?"

Whether they like it or not, Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra patrons will also get a fling at "being educated" when Oliver Messiaen's "Trois Petites Liturgies de la Presence Divine" will have its first American performances by the ensemble in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Friday afternoon. From the advance announcements of this work, however, it looks as if the piece might fit the instrument better than the Jolivet "Concerto" did at the Boston concert. The Martinet for the Martinot would have been a good slogan to describe the listening process involved at that event.

LANDOWSKA

The "Three Little Liturgies" is scored for celesta, vibraphone, maracas, Chinese cymbal, tamtam, piano, onde martenot, a chorus of women's voices and string orchestra. A female contingent from the Schola Cantorum will sing the choral portion and Ginette Martenot, sister of the inventor, will perform on the electronic instrument.

'Offrande' in 1st Performance

Messiaen, born in Avignon in 1908, has composed a great many works of religious character, and for this piece has also written the poem. The first of the liturgies is called "Conversation Interieure," the second "Sepuence of the Word," and the third is "dedicated to God, present in all things."

Messiaen writes that "the author has re-read the Evangele, the Apocalypse, St. Paul, St. Thomas, the Imitation, the Song of Songs, Paul Eluard, and works on medicine, botany, geology and astronomy," in order to create the text. Louis Aubert's "Offrande" will also have its first performance in the United States at these concerts.

[43]

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
JOURNAL
NOV 1

The World of Music

Martenot, New Instrument to Make Bow With U.S. Orchestras

New York, (U.P.) — The latmusical instrument, called Martenot, is about to make ow to America. It is desd as a device in which electrically produced and led, has made new tone possible. Its inventor, the ch musician Maurice Marhas arrived with his sis collaborator, Ginette who will make her debut playing the with the New York nic-Symphony and the Symphony orchestras Martenot will appear York Philharmonic Stokowski on Nov. Carnegie Hall in erican performance "Three Little Litn includes the marnstrumentation.

he soloist with the phony in two othe erican performances: for martenot and oroy Andre Jolivet, con- by Charles Munch, and Grande Symphonie en Mouvements, 'Turangaglia'," conducted by Leonard Bern-

Miss Martenot has introduced the new instrument widely in Europe.

* * *

Mary Garden, who has been "stumping" the United States to impart her ideas of music after a long retirement in her Scottish homeland, will give her final lecture of this season at Town Hall in New York on Dec. 26 and sail the following day for France.

Miss Garden will summarize her observations on the present tate of American artistic and operatic life and tell what she hinks might be done to improve . She will devote part of her ecture to discussing her work with Debussy and the creation of the character of Melisande n his opera. Martial Singher will illustrate her comments ith Debussy songs.

Miss Garden will return next October to lecture again for the National Arts Foundation.

* * *

Marian Anderson, Isaac Stern nd Dimitri Mitropoulus will appear with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony at a conert-supper at the Hotel Astor on Nov. 30 on behalf of the American Fund for Israel Institutions.

It will be Miss Anderson's only appearance this year. Stern's appearance will mark he violinist's return from a tour vith the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. The American Fund helps support the eight leading musical organizations in Israel, including the Israel Philharmonic and the Israel Opera Company.

The fifth annual George Gersh-

Symphony In New York

By NOEL STRAUS
[Boston Herald-N. Y. Times Dispatch]

NEW YORK, Nov. 12—The Boson Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, gave superb performances of Back's "Art of the Fugue" and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" at its concert this afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Special interest centered in the monumental work of Back, which was presented in an orchestral arrangement by Ernest Munch, the conductor's cousin, and made an unforgettably deep impression.

Until Wolfgang Graeser contrived his orchestral version of the "Art of the Fugue," which received its initial New York hearing in 1930, the masterpiece languished in neglect, and the foremost Back authorities, although they admired its supreme skill, agreed that it was a profitless business to attempt to make it viable in any form.

DOUBTS EXPELLED

The success which was scored by the Graeser version, however, led to other arrangements, notably that of Fritz Stiedry for chamber orchestra and the one for full orchestra by Hans T. David, on the latter of which Munch based his transcription. If there were any doubts still existing as to the possibility of making the "Art of the Fugue" effective in public presentation, these were undeniably expelled by yesterday's performance which led to a prolonged and enthusiastic ovation at its close."

The "Art of the Fugue" was the last composition Bach wrote with his own hand, and he died before he had completed it. In it he exploited the possibilities of a given fugue subject not only with a thoroughness that make it unique, but also with a rich fund of human feeling, despite its wealth of intricate technical detail. Of the 19 fugues of the original work, nine were played yesterday, the three "gegenfugen," the four canonic fugues and the three "mirror" fugues being omitted.

Since the four simple fugues, the two double fugues, and the two triple fugues and the unfinished quadruple fugue which were played are aesthetically the cream of the series and were completed by the addition of Bach's chorale, "Vor Deinan Thron," Bach's last composition, which may have been intended to have this plane, the election could be wholeheartedly endorsed."

IN CLASSIC SPIRIT

Munch's orchestration was chaste and entirely in the classic spirit of the work, yet rich, ful-bodied and extremely colorful. The first four fugus were confined to the strings, to which woodwings, and occasionally the organ, were added for the rest of the excerpts. The initial fugue, delicately devised, with the sporano voice largely given over the solo violin, started off the series in a tended mood and gave the impression that the principal subject of the work were being brought to the auditor from a far distance.

The simple fugues were led to gradual climax of volume of sound and of intensity of feeling with the fourth of the group, and then when the double fugues were reached, there was again a constant building up of forcefulness until the entire work reached its apex of emotion and dynamic power at the close of the great triple fugue, No. 11. The quadruple fugue was ended in the incomplete form of the original, with the horn lengthening the last note in anticipation of the chorale, which was played on the organ in inspired fashion by E. Power Briggs and brought the great series to a hushed termination of wonderful effectiveness.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
V 13 1949

To Aid Koussevitzky on Tour

As the result of a request made by Serge Koussevitzky to Dr. George N. Shuster, president of Hunter College, Howard Shanet has been assistant to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's former conductor on his tour, which runs from next January until the middle of June. Mr. Shanet, who is a member of the Hunter College music faculty, studied with Dr. Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., and was on the Berkshire Music Center's faculty as a conductor last summer.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 19 1949

MUSICAL EVENTS

The Admirable Mr. Münch

The symphonic season that had [illegible] submitted no particular claims to [illegible] distinction, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its conductor, Charles Munch, has contributed a more hopeful note. The performances, which were consistently fastidious and sensitive, demonstrated clearly that the Münch regime is going to mean no letdown whatever from that of Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Münch lacks, perhaps, a little of Koussevitzky's glamour and showmanship, but these are superficial lacks. Throughout the opening program he revealed again that he is a musician of fine sensibilities, and a very conscientious and inspired interpreter of any kind of music he undertakes to offer.

The kinds of music Mr. Münch offered on this occasion varied greatly, ranging from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony to Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra, an intricate and deft exercise in atonality that I felt was of purely academic interest. Lying between them in respect to style were the late Henri Rabaud's rather Wagnerian "La Procession Nocturne," which I found charming, and a new work by the French composer André Jolivet, which I found rubbishy. This work, entitled "Concerto for Ondes Martenot and Orchestra," seemed to exhibit the capacities of the Ondes Martenot, an electronic instrument invented some years ago by a M. Maurice Martenot. It looks like a combination sewing machine and radio. As far as I could make out, the Ondes Martenot marks an advance over such electronic instruments as the Theremin in that it sounds less like a fire-engine siren and more like a bassoon played in some large, echoing and semi-square region, such as a sewer or the basement swimming pool of a Y.M.C.A. Though its musical possibilities are only terrifying, it might prove of value in the sound-effects department of a broadcasting studio, where its eerie tone would fit admirably into the repertoire of shivering and hollow sounds that accompany mystery programs.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 13 1949

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECEIVES OVATION

Munch Scores With Bach's 'Art of Fugue' and Strauss' 'Symphonia Domestica'

By NOEL STRAUS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, gave superb performances of Bach's "Art of the Fugue" and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" at its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Special interest centered in the monumental work of Bach, which was presented in an orchestral arrangement by Ernest Munch, the conductor's cousin, and made an unforgettably deep impression.

Until Wolfgang Graeser contrived his orchestral version of the "Art of the Fugue," which received its initial New York hearing in 1930, the masterpiece languished in neglect, and the foremost Bach authorities, although they admired its supreme skill, agreed that it was a profitless business to attempt to make it viable in any form.

The success which was scored by the Graeser version, however, led to other arrangements, notably that of Fritz Stiedry for chamber orchestra and the one for full orchestra by Hans T. David, on the latter of which Mr. Munch based his transcription. If there were any doubts still existing as to the possibility of making the "Art of the Fugue" effective in public presentation, these were undeniably expelled by yesterday's performance which led to a prolonged and enthusiastic ovation at its close."

Bach's Last Composition

The "Art of the Fugue" was the last composition Bach wrote with his own hand, and he died before he had completed it. In it he exploited the possibilities of a given fugue subject not only with a thoroughness that make it unique, but also with a rich fund of human feeling, despite its wealth of intricate technical detail. Of the nineteen fugues of the original work, nine were played yesterday, the three "gegenfugen," the four canonic fugues and the three "mirror" fugues being omitted.

Since the four simple fugues, the two double fugues, the two triple fugues and the unfinished quadruple fugue which were played are esthetically the cream of the series and were completed by the addition of Bach's chorale, "Vor deinn Thron," Bach's last composition, which may have been intended to have this place, the selection could be wholeheartedly endorsed.

Mr. Munch's orchestration was chaste and entirely in the classic spirit of the work, yet rich, full-bodied and extremely colorful. The first four fugues were confined to the strings, to which woodwinds, and occasionally the organ, were added for the rest of the excerpts. The initial fugue, delicately devised, with the soprano voice largely given over to the solo violin, started off the series in a tender mood and gave the impression that the principal subjects of the work were being brought to the auditor from a far distance.

Gradual Climax Achieved

The simple fugues were led to a gradual climax of volume of sound and of intensity of feeling with the fourth of the group, and then when the double fugues were reached there was again a constant building up of forcefulness until the entire work reached its apex of emotion and dynamic power at the close of the great triple fugue, No. 11. The quadruple fugue was ended in the incomplete form of the original, with the horn lengthening the last note in anticipation of the chorale, which was played on the organ in inspired fashion by E. Power Biggs and brought the great series to a hushed termination of wonderful effectiveness.

It would be difficult to overpraise the highly sensitive, remarkably moving and skillfully balanced performance accorded the whole offering by Mr. Munch and his men. From the most ethereal measures at the start to the most expansive climactic moments of the score, where the brasses worked with pronounced impressiveness of effect, the music was kept impeccably transparent and never for an instant lost its hold on the listener.

The performance of Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" was led and played in equally magisterial manner. The "Cradle Song," the "Love Scene" and the concluding double fugue were respectively as gentle, ardorous and turbulent as need be, in beauty of texture, sensuousness and complete projection of every fleeting mood, this was, indeed, a splendid realization of the composer's intentions from the larger line down to the slightest detail.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 12 1949

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL

Charles Munch, conductor, first New York afternoon concert of the season. The program: The Art of the Fugue...Bach, arr. Ernest Munch
Organ: E. Power Biggs
Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53.....R. Strauss

Reversed Expectations

CHARLES MUNCH, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, gave a delicious performance of Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and a largely flavorless one of Sebastian Bach's "Th. Art of Fugue." The latter result was not wholly his fault, since the orchestral version employed, that of his cousin Ernest Munch, is not an imaginative one. The former triumph over a work that easily tends toward tedium was a pure victory of temperament and taste.

* * *

From beginning to end the Strauss piece made lovely sounds, flowed round the ear like bright water. Constantly animated, constantly beautiful, paced with poetry and with passion, glowing, spontaneous, the work swept through to its end without heaviness or noticeable length. It is good to have so elaborate a composition available in so grand a reading. And it is good to forget, in contact with such absorbing sound, whatever reserves about a piece or about its author's style may have prevented one previously from surrendering to its delights.

* * *

Bach's great compendium of fugal device has been presented in many different instrumental forms, no specific one having been indicated by its author. It has been played by pianists, harpsichordists, organists, string quartets, chamber and orchestral ensembles. The largest and most brilliant version I know, that of Wolfgang Graeser, is scored for full modern orchestra. The most exquisite with which I am acquainted, that by Fritz Stiedry, is for a smallish group. Its general style is that of chamber music, its evocation that of eighteenth-century organ sonorities. But no matter how you arrange "The Art of Fugue," it seldom fails to please a musical audience, so direct is the appeal of its melodious flow. So plodding a version as yesterday's is rare.

Charles Munch

Who conducted yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert

This contains nine of the original's fourteen chief fugues, omits five of these, as well as the four canons and the final "mirror" fugue for two harpsichords. It is scored predominantly for strings, beginning with a quartet. As other instruments are added, these for the most part merely doubled the strings. The unfinished fugue, the least monotonous in sound, as arranged, actually has a brief passage for woodwinds alone—a welcome relief. Its whole sound, in fact, has character, the rather growly but friendly character of a not-too-large nineteenth-century French organ. The musicianship of the Ernest Munch transcription is not to be questioned, but its lack of auditory fancy is discouraging.

* * *

Charles Munch directed its performance cleanly and reverently, but he seemed to be impatient about getting on with the piece. At the end E. Power Biggs, who had also helped in the final fugue, played at the organ Bach's last chorale prelude, "Wenn wir in hoechsten Nothen sein." He played it tastefully, devotionally, quietly, made no effect at all in those vast spaces on a public already restless.

[414]

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
JOURNAL
NOV 12 1949

The World of Music

• • •

Martenot, New Instrument to Make Bow With U.S. Orchestras

New York. (U.P.) — The latest musical instrument, called the martenot, is about to make its bow to America. It is described as a device in which sound, electrically produced and controlled, has made new tone color possible. Its inventor, the French musician Maurice Martenot, has arrived with his sister and collaborator, Ginette Martenot, who will make her American debut playing the martenot with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony orchestras.

Miss Martenot will appear with the New York Philharmonic under Leopold Stokowski on Nov. 17 and 18 at Carnegie Hall in the first American performance of Messiaen's "Three Little Liturgies" which includes the martenot in its instrumentation.

She will be soloist with the Boston Symphony in two other first American performances: a concerto for martenot and orchestra by Andre Jolivet, conducted by Charles Munch, and "A Grande Symphonie en 10 Mouvements, 'Turangaglia'," conducted by Leonard Bernstein.

Miss Martenot has introduced the new instrument widely in Europe.

• • •

Mary Garden, who has been "stumping" the United States to impart her views of music after a long retirement in her Scottish homeland, will give her final lecture of this season at Town Hall in New York on Dec. 26 and sail the following day for France.

Miss Garden will summarize her observations on the present state of American artistic and operatic life and tell what she thinks might be done to improve it. She will devote part of her lecture to discussing her work with Debussy and the creation of the character of Melisande in his opera. Martial Singher will illustrate her comments with Debussy songs.

Miss Garden will return next October to lecture again for the National Arts Foundation.

• • •

Marian Anderson, Isaac Stern and Dimitri Mitropoulus will appear with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony at a concert-supper at the Hotel Astor on Nov. 30 on behalf of the American Fund for Israel Institutions.

It will be Miss Anderson's only appearance this year. Stern's appearance will mark the violinist's return from a tour with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. The American Fund helps support the eight leading musical organizations in Israel, including the Israel Philharmonic and the Israel Opera Company.

The fifth annual George Gershwin memorial contest, open to young musicians of the nation, has been announced by B'nai Brith Victory Lodge.

The contest offers a prize of $1,000 for an original orchestral composition. Any composer under 30 (time allowed for service in the U. S. armed forces) who is an American citizen is eligible. The contest closes on Feb. 1 next. The prize-winning composition will be given a first performance at a Carnegie Hall concert on March 26.

Symphony In New York

By NOEL STRAUS
[Boston Herald-N. Y. Times Dispatch]

NEW YORK, Nov. 12—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, gave superb performances of Bach's "Art of the Fugue" and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" at its concert this afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Special interest centered in the monumental work of Back, which was presented in an orchestral arrangement by Ernest Munch, the conductor's cousin, and made an unforgettably deep impression.

Until Wolfgang Graeser contrived his orchestral version of the "Art of the Fugue," which received its initial New York hearing in 1930, the masterpiece languished in neglect, and the foremost Back authorities, although they admired its supreme skill, agreed that it was a profitless visible in any form.

DOUBTS EXPELLED

The success which was scored by the Graeser version, however, led to other arrangements, notably that of Fritz Stiedry for chamber orchestra and the one for full orchestra by Hans T. David, on the latter of which Munch based his transcription. If there were any doubts still existing as to the possibility of making the "Art of the Fugue" effective in public presentation, these were undeniably expelled by yesterday's performance which led to a prolonged and enthusiastic ovation at its close."

The "Art of the Fugue" was the last composition Bach wrote with his own hand, and he died before he had completed it. In it he exploited the possibilities of a given fugue subject not only with a thoroughness that make it unique, but also with a rich fund of human feeling, despite its wealth of intricate technical detail. Of the 19 fugues of the original work, nine were played yesterday, the three "gegenfugen," the four canonic fugues and the three "mirror" fugues being omitted.

Since the four simple fugues, the two double fugues, and the two triple fugues and the unfinished quadruple fugue which were played are aesthetically the cream of the series and were completed by the addition of Bach's chorale, "Vor Deinan Thron," Bach's last composition, which may have been intended to have this plane, the election could be wholeheartedly endorsed."

IN CLASSIC SPIRIT

Munch's orchestration was chaste and entirely in the classic spirit of the work, yet rich, ful-bodied and extremely colorful. The first four fugus were confined to the strings, to which woodwings, and occasionally the organ, were added for the rest of the excerpts. The initial fugue, delicately devised, with the sporano voice largely given over the solo violin, started off the series in a tended mood and gave the impression that the principal subject of the work were being brought to the auditor from a far distance.

The simple fugues were led to gradual climax of volume of sound and of intensity of feeling with the fourth of the group, and then when the double fugues were reached, there was a [illegible] building up of forcefulness until the entire work reached its apex of emotion and dynamic power at the close of the great triple fugue, No. 11. The quadruple fugue was ended in the incomplete form of the original, with the horn lengthening the last note in anticipation of the chorale, which was played on the organ in inspired fashion by E. Power Briggs and brought the great series to a hushed termination of wonderful effectiveness.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV. 13 1949

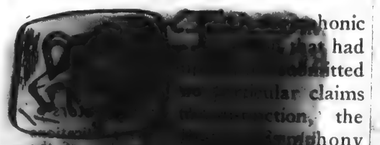
To Aid Koussevitzky on Tour

As the result of a request made by Serge Koussevitzky to Dr. George N. Shuster, president of Hunter College, Howard Shanet will be assistant to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's former conductor on his tour, which runs from next January until the middle of June. Mr. Shanet, who is a member of the Hunter College music faculty, studied with Dr. Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., and was on the Berkshire Music Center's faculty as a conductor last summer.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 19 1949

MUSICAL EVENTS

The Admirable Mr. Münch



[illegible]phonic [illegible] had [illegible]itted [illegible]ular claims [illegible]ction, the [illegible]mphony Orchestra [illegible]nductor, Charles [illegible] contributed a more hopeful [illegible]rformances, which were consis[illegible]stidious and sensitive, demonstrated clearly that the Münch regime is going to mean no letdown whatever from that of Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Münch lacks, perhaps, a little of Koussevitzky's glamour and showmanship, but these are superficial lacks. Throughout the opening program he revealed again that he is a musician of fine sensibilities, and a very conscientious and inspired interpreter of any kind of music he undertakes to offer.

The kinds of music Mr. Münch offered on this occasion varied greatly, ranging from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony to Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra, an intricate and deft exercise in atonality that I felt was of purely academic interest. Lying between them in respect to style were the late Henri Rabaud's rather Wagnerian "La Procession Nocturne," which I found charming, and a new work by the French composer André Jolivet, which I found rubbishy. This work, entitled "Concerto for [illegible]des Martenot and Orchestra," [illegible] to exhibit the capacities of [illegible]des Martenot, an electronic [illegible] some years ago by [illegible] Martenot. It looks like a combination sewing machine and radio. As far as I could make out, the Ondes Martenot marks an advance over such electronic instruments as the Theremin in that it sounds less like a fire-engine siren and more like a bassoon played in some large, echoing [illegible]tion, such as [illegible] the basement swimming [illegible] Though its musical possibilities are only terrifying, it might prove of value in the sound-effects department of a broadcasting studio, where its eerie tone would fit admirably into the repertoire of shivering and hollow sounds that accompany mystery programs.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV [illegible] 1949

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECEIVES OVATION

Munch Scores With Bach's 'Art of Fugue' and Strauss' 'Symphonia Domestica'

By NOEL STRAUS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, gave superb performances of Bach's "Art of the Fugue" and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" at its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Special interest centered in the monumental work of Bach, which was presented in an orchestral arrangement by Ernest Munch, the conductor's cousin, and made an unforgettably deep impression.

Until Wolfgang Graeser contrived his orchestral version of the "Art of the Fugue," which received its initial New York hearing in 1930, the masterpiece languished in neglect, and the foremost Bach authorities, although they admired its supreme skill, agreed that it was a profitless business to attempt to make it viable in any form.

The success which was scored by the Graeser version, however, led to other arrangements, notably that of Fritz Stiedry for chamber orchestra and the one for full orchestra by Hans T. David, on the latter of which Mr. Munch based his transcription. If there were any doubts still existing as to the possibility of making the "Art of the Fugue" effective in public presentation, there were undeniably expelled by yesterday's performance which led to a prolonged and enthusiastic ovation at its close."

Bach's Last Composition

The "Art of the Fugue" was the last composition Bach wrote with his own hand, and he died before he had completed it. In it he exploited the possibilities of a given fugue subject not only with a thoroughness that make it unique, but also with a rich fund of human feeling, despite its wealth of intricate technical detail. Of the nineteen fugues of the original work, nine were played yesterday, the three "gegenfugen," the four canonic fugues and the three "mirrer" fugues being omitted.

Since the four simple fugues, the two double fugues, the two triple fugues and the unfinished quadruple fugue which were played are esthetically the cream of the series and were completed by the addition of Bach's chorale, "Vor deinn Thron." Bach's last composition, which may have been intended to have this place, the selection could be wholeheartedly endorsed.

Mr. Munch's orchestration was chaste and entirely in the classic spirit of the work, yet rich, full-bodied and extremely colorful. The first four fugues were confined to the strings, to which woodwinds, and occasionally the organ, were added for the rest of the excerpts. The initial fugue, delicately devised, with the soprano voice largely given over to the solo vio-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NO[illegible]

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMS[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY
CA[illegible]

Charles Munch, conductor, [illegible] first New York afternoon concert of [illegible] season. The program: The Art of the Fugue, Bach, arr. Ernest Munch
Organ, E. Power Biggs
Symphonia Domestica, op. 53 ... R. Strauss

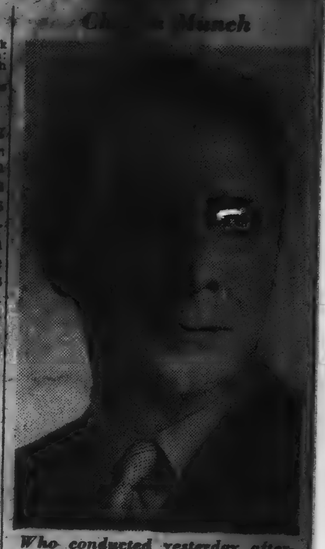
Reversed Expectations

CHARLES MUNCH, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, gave a delicious performance of Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and a largely flavorless one of Sebastian Bach's "The Art of Fugue." The latter result was not wholly his fault, since the orchestral version employed, that of his cousin Ernest Münch, is not an imaginative one. The former triumph over a work that easily tends toward tedium was a pure victory of temperament and taste.

From beginning to end the Strauss piece made lovely sounds, flowed round the ear like bright water. Constantly animated, constantly beautiful, paced with poetry and with passion, flowing, spontaneous, the work swept through to its end without heaviness or noticeable length. It is good to have so elaborate a composition available in so grand a reading. And it is good to forget, in contact with such absorbing sound, whatever reserves about a piece or about its author's style may have prevented one previously from surrendering to its delights.

• • •

Bach's great compendium of fugal device has been presented in many different instrumental forms, no specific one having been indicated by its author. It has been played by pianists, harpsichordists, organists, string quartets, chamber and orchestral ensembles. The largest and most brilliant version I know, that of Wolfgang Graeser, is scored for full modern orchestra. The most exquisite with which I am acquainted, that by Fritz Stiedry, is for a smallish group. Its general style is that of chamber music, its evocation that of eighteenth-century organ sonorities. But no matter how you arrange "The Art of Fugue," it seldom fails to please a musical audience, so direct is the appeal of its melodious flow. So plodding a version as yesterday's is rare.



Who conducted yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert

This contains nine of the original's fourteen chief fugues, omits five of these, as well as the four canons and the final "mirror" fugue for two harpsichords. It is scored predominantly for strings, beginning with a quartet. As other instruments are added, these for the most part merely doubled the strings. The unfinished fugue, the least monotonous in sound, as arranged, actually has a brief passage for woodwinds alone—a welcome relief. Its whole sound, in fact, has character, the rather growly but friendly character of a not-too-large nineteenth-century French organ. The musicianship of the Ernest Munch transcription is not to be questioned, but its lack of auditory fancy is discouraging.

• • •

Charles Munch directed its performance cleanly and reverently but he seemed to be impatient about getting on with the piece. At the end E. Power Biggs, who had also helped in the final fugue played at the organ Bach's last chorale prelude, "Wenn wir in hoechsten Nothen sein." He played it tastefully, devotionally, quietly, made no effect at all in those vast spaces on a public already restless.

[illegible]m, started off the series in a tender mood and gave the impression that the principal subjects of the work were being brought to the auditor from a far distance.

Gradual Climax Achieved

The simple fugues were led to a gradual climax of volume of sound and of intensity of feeling with the fourth of the group, and then when the double fugues were reached there was again a constant building up of forcefulness until the entire work reached its apex of emotion and dynamic power at the close of the great triple fugue, No. 11. The quadruple fugue was ended in the incomplete form of the original, with the horn lengthening the last note in anticipation of the chorale, which was played on the organ in inspired fashion by E. Power Biggs and brought the great series to a hushed termination of wonderful effectiveness.

It would be difficult to overpraise the highly sensitive, remarkably moving and skillfully balanced performance accorded the whole offering by Mr. Munch and his men. From the most ethereal measures at the start to the most expansive [illegible] moments of the score, where the brasses worked [illegible] sounded impressiveness [illegible] the music was kept [illegible] transparent and never for [illegible] lost its hold on [illegible] listener.

The [illegible]ance of Strauss' "Symphonia [illegible]tion" was led and played [illegible] magisterial manner. [illegible] Cradle Song," the "Love S[illegible] and the concluding double [illegible] were respectively as gentle [illegible] and turbulent as need [illegible] ty of texture, sensi[illegible] complete projection of every fleeting mood, this was, indeed, a splendid realization of the composer's intentions from the larger line down to the slightest detail.

[44]

Boston Sunday Globe

Published by GLOBE NEWSPAPER COMPANY
242 Washington St. Boston 7, Mass.
(Established March 4, 1872. Evening edition first issued March 7, 1872. Sunday edition first issued Oct. 14, 1877.)

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1949

MINIATURE ALMANAC.....NOV 13

Eastern Standard Time

Sun Rises	6:33	Moon Rises	4:17 a m
Sun Sets	4:25	High Water	1:32 p m
Length of Day	9:53	Moon Sets	11:20 p m
Height of Tide		8.3 ft a m, 9.2 ft p m
Light Automobile Lamps at			4:55 p m

Moon's Quarters

New Moon, Nov. 20, 7:48 p. m.
First Quarter, Nov. 27, 3:01 a. m.
Full Moon, Dec. 5, 10:12 a. m.
Last Quarter, Dec. 13, 6:48 p. m.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES

	Daily Per Mo.	Daily Per Yr.	Sunday Per Mo.	Sunday Per Yr.
Boston Postal Zone	1.25	15.00	.80	9.60
New England States	1.00	12.00	.75	9.00
Elsewhere in United States, Canada, Newfoundland, Labrador	1.35	16.00	.95	11.40
Central and South America	1.35	16.20	1.00	12.00
Other Foreign Countries	2.50	30.00	1.50	18.00

(Please do not send cash. Use money orders or checks.)

Back numbers (per copy): 1 week or older, 5c daily; 20c Sundays; over 3 months old, out of print.

Entered as second class matter at Boston, Mass., under the act of March 3, 1879—242 Washington St.

The Associated Press is entitled exclusively to the use for republication of all the local news printed in this newspaper, as well as all AP news dispatches.

Globe Man's Daily Story

Travelers to Scotland have returned with the story that a sign posted above the clock in the lobby of an Aberdeen hotel says: "This clock for the use of guests only."

TREASURE CHEST

This town must have been feeling its oats. In the first fifteen years of the present century, or, to be more exact, from 1900 to 1916, one of those mysterious tides of public building swept up and fanned out from Huntington Avenue. Twenty-five institutional structures went up, many of them architecturally imposing and most of them still flourishing. It was something similar to what happened with our colleges and universities between the wars; they "built plant," fortunately for them as it proved, when funds were still ample for plant-building.

They say a man is never safer than when he is under the laugh, or an institution when it is taken as a matter-of-course. By this second test, Symphony Hall must be fairly safe, for it is so intricated with the life of the New England community that we scarcely try to imagine ourselves without it.

"The first fifty years of Symphony Hall" implies another fifty years. Since the Hall was opened, October 15, 1900, with a performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given 12,000 concerts there, and to these must be added 3000 other events, about half of them recitals of music other than orchestral, the other 1500 being civic observances as various as conventions, political meetings, commencements, inaugurations, religious worship, debates, flower shows, fashion shows, automobile shows, balls, banquets—the variety is kaleidoscopic. That a hall built as a temple of music should have become also a focus for the life of the city is one of the prophetic portents of the mid-20th century.

* * *

Only two other auditoria in this country were built by and for orchestras—one in Chicago, the other in Cleveland. Neither of those is a hall in the Symphony sense, the one in Chicago being an ellipse, and the other in Cleveland being in theatre style. How often an architect turns over to its owners a building beautiful inside and out, only to suffer the chagrin of seeing said owners immediately start committing acts of mayhem upon its harmonious design. The treatment received by Symphony Hall in its first fifty years is answer to an architect's prayer: outside or in, a casual observer would hardly notice any change at all. A booth for the projection of moving pictures has had to be added, and an amplification system, microphones, and equipment for recording; but no apparatus is obtrusively conspicuous, and even the original wall-tints of the auditorium have been adhered to. Twenty-five years ago the seats were increased from 2569 to 2631 and by now the Hall could do with a few hundred more, though certainly not by enlargement at the expense of acoustics.

Acoustically the Hall is a triumph. Sometimes when a man is buying a phonograph, an exemplarily candid salesman will say, "Which are you paying for, cabinet-work or sound?" Symphony Hall inside and out has enough architectural cabinet-work to remain a quiet pleasure to the eye; but what the Hall has for sale and what we citizens are primarily in the market to buy of it, is sound; and the quality of sound in Symphony Hall has few parallels anywhere. When it was being designed, Professor Wallace Sabine, one of the kindest gentlemen who ever graced a Dean's office in University Hall at Harvard, was given authority to work out with the architect, Mr. McKim, the size and character of all reflective surfaces; and those copies of Graeco-Roman sculpture in niches high on the walls were the architect's solution for Mr. Sabine's insistence on broken surfaces.

To sound, add smell—or the absence of it. The Hall has that clean smell which means no smell. How many public buildings have not acquired, even when a few years old, an odor more or less distinct, sometimes so distinct that, if taken in blindfold, your nose would tell you where you were? The absence of smell in the Hall is thanks to the good sense of its first superintendent who permitted nothing stronger than mild soap, soda, and water for cleaning.

* * *

Across this platform in its first half-century walked nearly every orchestral conductor and concert artist of first rank, European and American; as, of course, they still do. In the earlier years these were figures who are now as legendary as Nellie Melba, Theresa Carreno, Maud Powell, Eugene Ysaye, and the one-and-only Paderewski. Of all these veterans, or Olympians, the only two still living are Joseph Hoffman and Fritz Kreisler.

Then there were, and are, the quiet people, the men in the shadow, who help keep the wheels turning but never appear on the platform. Three distinguished for their services to the Orchestra are commemorated in its foyers, either in triple bronze or hewn marble, Major Henry L. Higginson, its founder and for decades its sustainer, Professor Sabine, and Judge Cabot. The first manager and impressario whose extraordinary ability was equalled only by his talent for low personal visibility, was C. A. Ellis, still affectionately remembered; then the able and urbane W. H. Brennan, and always at his elbow the tall, white-haired, witty, and long-enduring Lewis Mudgett, known to friends as "Lew." Three notable reviewers and musicographers still walk those foyers in the spirit, Louis Elson, Philip Hale, and Henry T. Parker, though this last fabulous figure is commemorated in a more tangible form. That wide board all around the openwork metal of the balconies was put there because Parker's cane, a massive cudgel, slipped through one of the holes and just missed bouncing off the heads of people seated below.

For the matter of that, the Hall, like every institution much frequented by the human race, accumulates comic folklore. When Mr. Kreisler had been appearing there for about a quarter of a century, a supper party was given him by the Management after the regular Saturday night concert.

"Do you remember, Lew," asked Mr. Kreisler of Mr. Mudgett, "what you said the first time my manager proposed that you put me on in Chickering Hall for a recital?"

"No. I don't believe I do."

"You said, 'Who the hell is Kreisler?'"

When the laugh had subsided, Mr. Mudgett drawled,

"And do you remember, Fritz, what the box office receipts were?"

"No. I can't say that I do."

"Well, I can. They were forty-eight dollars and fifty cents."

Again, at Symphony Hall, there was deep chagrin after a political rally. Despite strict vigilance at the doors, some one smuggled into the auditorium a lot of gas-filled balloons which, in a moment of exuberance, were released as a part of the hullaballoo. They were supposed to come down of themselves during the night, but several of them didn't and next day there they still were against the ceiling and out of reach. During the Symphony matinee, they did start to come down, one at a time—very hesitatingly—one going across the shoulders of the conductor, Mr. Monteux, and through the violins. (Just suppose that had happened to some conductors!)

* * *

"Certain citizens of Boston build a hall, without regard to return in money, and by this act care for the happiness, the convenience, the education of the inhabitants for twenty miles around this spot . . ."

Thus Major Higginson in 1900 when the Hall was first opened. In the half-century since, those twenty miles have been, by radio wave-lengths and by the fame of the Orchestra, widened to hundreds and thousands of miles. The pilot of a plane over the Pacific, about to meet a Japanese fighter squadron, picked up by wireless a Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, and lived to tell of it. And yet, what tells most is the solid fare of this first half-century, those 12,000 regular concerts of the Orchestra in its own home. How these have enriched the minds, and often unawares ennobled the lives of our citizens, is one of those voltages which are measured only in the Celestial Power-Plant. We may, and perhaps should, take Symphony Hall as much for granted as ocean's two tides a day, but we would soon feel the difference if it weren't there.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

RETAILING DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 17 1949

RCA Head Denies Issue of 33⅓ Discs

FRANK M. FOLSOM, president of Radio Corporation of America, denied yesterday a trade report that RCA Victor would issue its first 33⅓ r.p.m. long-playing classical discs on Feb. 1. The report added that the price of LP discs would be $4.50, or 35 cents less than similar discs produced by competitors. Serial numbers of the RCA LP's were said to be the 14,000's.

The first three releases, according to the report, will be Tchaikowsky's 4th Symphony, with Koussevitsky conducting, 14,001; Siegfried selections, sung by Set Svanholm, 14,002, and Verdi's Otello, conducted by Toscanini, 14,003.

Mr. Folsom denied that the above information was correct.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 16 1949

WORKMEN DISPLACE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Plasterers Still Labor in Masonic Temple; Early 1950 Completion Seen

Yesterday, on the day when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was to have given a concert in the state's new 2300-seat auditorium in the old Masonic Temple building, workmen still were laboring to complete the job begun last July.

A maze of 80-foot steel scaffoldings rose from the floor nearly to the ceiling. Almost out of sight, a half-dozen artists painted in gold and crimson on the delicate plaster designs. An army of ornamental plasterers was at work on the walls.

Harry Carr, the plastering contractor, said the auditorium will not be completed until after the New Year. Officials of the Community Concerts Assoication still are hoping that the Boston Symphony can play at the unveiling sometime during the winter season.

The new auditorium, largest in the state, will be the central attraction of the structure the state has re-christened the Veterans' Memorial Building. It was begun as a Masonic Temple and left unfinished in 1928.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
NOV 14 1949

Munch Conducts Boston Symphony

Charles Munch revealed the breadth of his music-making in his unusual program in Carnegie Hall on Saturday.

The purity of the orchestra's performance of Bach's "Art and Fugue" and the comprehensiveness or Munch's grasp of Strauss' Domestic Symphony spelled extraordinary gifts for the conductor and a new lease of life for the Boston Symphony.

This concert left no doubt of the B. S. O.'s good fortune and that of the audience to hear such playing.—M. K.

[45]

Symphony Hall O

E. Power Biggs at Console With Munch and Orchestra

By Harold Rogers

The new organ in Symphony Hall had its first thorough tryout before the public last night when E. Power Biggs gave a special concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting. This program, to which the participants donated their services, benefited the Albert Schweitzer Hospital in French Northern Africa.

The organ has a certain tight brightness that proclaims its newness from almost every stop. Perhaps, like a new pair of shoes, it must undergo a breaking-in period, if there is such a thing with organs, or else a mellowing-up with the passing of a few years.

Built by the Aeolian-Skinner Company, it is essentially the baroque organ of Bach's era in effect, or so it would appear with Mr. Biggs at the console. When let loose, it is almost unbearably loud. Now that we have ridden the horse at full gallop, a canter or even a trot would be more restful.

♪ ♪ ♪

Mr. Munch opened the program with the unpublished Organ Concerto in C major by Haydn, composed in 1756. Haydn, according to the program note, wrote it for Therese Keller, a pupil. Mr. Biggs obtained copies of the parts from Austria, where the manuscript was preserved in the Melk and Göttweig monasteries. This was its first American performance.

In three movements — Allegro moderato, Largo, and Allegro molto—the concerto is characteristic of Haydn's gentlemanly graces and deserves its rightful place among his well-known works. Mr. Biggs chose a registration that was predominantly brass for the first movement, woodwind for the second, and a mixture of bright colors for the finale.

The Hindemith Organ Concerto, composed in 1929, calls for a chamber orchestra of woodwinds, brass, and strings minus fiddles. It is a scholarly and intricate piece of contrapuntal writing, conservatively modern in feeling.

♪ ♪ ♪

Mr. Biggs played the broad slow movement with little dynamic change or variety in registration, though such a reading may be called for in the score. The last movement was a delightful bit of fugal chatter.

Mr. Biggs' section for organ solo was devoted to Bach: the exclamatory Toccata, Adagio, and Fugue in C major; three chorale preludes, "Sleepers Wake! a Voice is Calling," "Abide with Us, Lord Jesus Christ," "Comest Thou Now Jesus, from Heaven Above"; and the well-known Toccata and Fugue in D minor.

♪ ♪ ♪

While the chorale tune of "Sleepers Wake!" was far too loud for the accompanying melody, the last two preludes were excellent examples of balance, restraint, and color. Mr. Biggs performed the final Toccata with tremendous power and brilliance.

Mr. Munch brought the program to a close with Poulenc's Concert (in one movement) for Organ and String Orchestra with Timpani. Here the baroque approach was partially abandoned for the romantic. Surely Poulenc must write with a smile on his lips. At any rate, his deft concerto came in welcome contrast to the preceding austerity.

A full house enthusiastically approved the new instrument and Mr. Biggs' performance.

MUSIC

Munch, Biggs and Boston Symphony in Schweitzer Benefit

By JOHN WILLIAM RILEY

When we come to [illegible] up the musical [illegible] Boston's season of 1949-50 [illegible] which already has brought us much) there certainly will be one event which stands out. It is the concert in Symphony Hall last evening at which the new Aeolian-Skinner organ was introduced by E. Power Biggs with the assistance of Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony. Furthermore, the event had historic importance. All participants gave their services that the total proceeds could benefit the efforts of one of the greatest of living men —Albert Schweitzer.

In a large but select circle of the modern world, Albert Schweitzer, Alsatian-born in 1875, is known and revered. For he is a philosopher, theologian, organist, Bach scholar and, last of all, and most important to him, a physician, surgeon and missionary. After building fame in all of these endeavors (each enough for a single man's lifetime), Schweitzer left Europe as a young man to found a hospital and do missionary work in French Equatorial Africa. There he works today, giving comfort to the least civilized of mankind.

The audience last evening very nearly filled Symphony Hall and the proceeds—almost $5000 even—will go to aid Dr. Schweitzer's work.

Every aspect of the event was fitting. For instance, Mr. Munch's father, Ernst, was Schweitzer's first organ teacher. The real introduction of the fine, new organ could not have had a better purpose. And Mr. Biggs, as well as those who assisted him, gave his finest artistry.

The program began with a Haydn Concerto in C [illegible] its first performance in America. A fine sunny piece for displaying the classical potentialities of the new instrument. It continued with Hindemith's Concerto for Organ and Chamber Orchestra — comprising cellos, basses, woodwinds and brass —a sort of awkward, shaggy but strong work.

In the middle of the program Mr. Biggs performed solo a Bach group: the Toccata, Adagio and Fugue in C Major, three Chorale Preludes and finally the Toccata and Fugue in C Minor. Here he was able to show both his own artistry and the clean, clear speaking qualities of the new organ. It was a magnificent display.

The evening closed with Poulenc's one-movement Concerto for Organ and String Orchestra with Tympani. It was a sort of tuneful Stravinskyian piece, full of circusy figures and colorful, bright trappings. Altogether this was a memorable, noteworthy event in this season's musical history.

ORGAN CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The new organ at Symphony Hall, heard in the opening pair of Symphony Concerts and again when Mr. Munch performed Bach's Art of Fugue in the transcription of his cousin, Ernest Munch, received a thorough workout last evening. This unusual program of organ concertos and solos, with E. Power Biggs officiating at the console and Mr. Munch and the Symphony Orchestra assisting, was given to benefit the Albert Schweitzer Hospital in Africa. When Dr. Schweitzer was in Boston last summer he enthusiastically endorsed the new instrument and wrote an inscription on it. The concert must have served well its worthy purpose, since the hall was filled.

The organ concertos were three in number: an early one by Haydn, performed for the first time in America; one by Hindemith, employing a chamber orchestra of 18 musicians; and the diverting Concerto of Poulenc, with the accompaniment of string orchestra with tympani, heard at a pair of Symphony Concerts last season with Richard Burgin conducting.

It is seldom that one encounters music from Haydn's early years. This unpublished Concerto was written when he was 24, and while agreeable, is hardly Haydnesque in the accepted sense of the term. Mr. Hindemith's Concerto is, however, typically Hindemithian, replete with energetic rhythms and dissonant counterpoint. The audience definitely liked it, or Mr. Bigg's playing, or both, for it applauded loud and long.

Mr. Bigg's solos came from Bach: the Toccata, Adagio and Fugue in C major, three Chorale Preludes and the Toccata and Fugue in D minor. The new organ is supposed to combine the 19th century French organ with the reconstructed Baroque organ (of Bach's day), with its emphasis on clarity and, one might add, shrillness. These particular ears were made uncomfortable more than once last evening by Mr. Bigg's zeal in the latter respect. His is an amazing virtuosity, but too often Bach's message and Bach's spirit were left by the wayside. The Chorale Preludes, except the familiar "Wachet Auf," came off very well, but for my taste the greatest pleasure of the evening was afforded by the concertos. In them Mr. Biggs shone and Mr. Munch and his men were their usual admirable selves.

vision. He presents glimpses of

New Organ Dedicated by Biggs, Munch

By PAUL STEVENS

The country's leading organist, playing the nation's finest organ, drew a tremendous ovation at a benefit concert that marked the instrument's dedication at Symphony Hall last night.

All seats were taken and music lovers vied for standing-room-only vantage points as E. Power Biggs played himself to new glory at the console. The Boston Symphony Orchestra provided a perfect background, with Charles Munch conducting.

The concert, which opened with one of Haydn's few organ-orchestra compositions (possibly his only organ-orchestra composition), was held to benefit the Schweitzer Hospital at Lambarene in French Northern Africa.

The piece, "Concerto in C Major, for Organ and Orchestra," was executed in three movements. The first two movements reflected muddy, sober moods, but the third movement mirrored assertiveness that ran to ebullience.

For his second part of the program, Biggs and 18 Symphony Orchestra musicians, played the three movements of the "Concerto for Organ and Chamber Orchestra," by Hindemith, the modernist. The score was threaded with dissonance, with that the accent rather than rhythm.

Written completely in the modern idiom, the ending of the first movement came abruptly, suggesting the sound of a train shunted to a standstill on a siding. The second movement suggested shimmering apparitions, and it seemed to produce a kind of pleasant musical hysteria in some of the listeners.

In the third movement, grim, like something wrapped in mummy cloths, Biggs played with the organ's full majestic power. Biggs played without accompaniment during part of the third movement.

GREAT OVATION

The playing of the Hindemith composition brought enthusiastic audience response, but it paled by comparison with the truly great ovation Biggs received by demonstrating his virtuosity in three succeeding Bach compositions. He played these without accompaniment. The clapping came and went, and then, like gathering rain, came on again to bring the musician back to the stage. This was repeated time and again.

It was a great personal triumph for Biggs.

The program ended with a concerto scored for strings, organ and timpani by Poulenc, the French composer whose works have been well received in Boston.

Last night's concert marked the first time the Haydn composition had been played in this country. Discovered hidden away in obscurity, the score was seized upon by Biggs as a find of momentous importance. He had it micro-filmed and prepared for use in this country.

G. Donald Harrison, president of the Aeolian-Skinner Company, the firm which built the organ, was in the audience. He said the organ which has 67 stops and almost [illegible] pipes, would have cost $70,000 to build if all parts had been new. Actual cost of the organ was $45,0[illegible] as a result of use of pipes and other parts of the old organ.

The Schweitzer Hospital was founded 35 years ago by Dr. Albert Schweitzer, medical doctor, theologian, organist, Bach scholar and philosopher. His hospital provides free care to upwards of 700 patients, many of whom suffer from tropical maladies. It is the only hospital of its kind in all Africa.

E. POWER BIGGS watches Albert Swoitzer test a rank of pipes for the new Symphony organ. Mr. Biggs will play at Symphony Hall, Monday evening, Nov. 14.

THE MUSIC BOX

Brenton Welling Jr.

B.S.O. at Sanders

Rabaud	"La Procession Nocturne"
Beethoven	Symphony No. 7 in A major
Piston	Second Suite for Orchestra
Ravel	"Daphnis et Chloe," Suite No. 2

In 1881, when Henry Lee Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he stipulated that several concerts each year must be played in Cambridge for the benefit of the Harvard community. Tuesday night marked the beginning of this year's Cambridge season, and that part of the Harvard community lucky enough to get into Sanders Theater was certainly benefited immeasurably.

The audience, which was made up largely of faculty members and their wives, heard Charles Munch conducting the orchestra for the first time in this area. When the concert was over the listeners rose to give the conductor a standing ovation, something almost unheard of for Harvard.

Hearing the concert Tuesday night was like listening to a new orchestra. With a few exceptions, the members of the Boston Symphony are French, and now they have a French conductor. The "rapport" thus created resulted in a sound totally different from that made by the same musicians under Serge Koussevitzky.

The two main differences are dynamics and precision. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which received the greatest applause, probably showed these differences most clearly. The first movement was played at a tempo as lively as has been heard in a long time. Yet the staccato notes of the entire string section came out as clearly as one instrument. The second movement, a funeral piece in contrast, was played with all the quiet dignity and feeling that could be expected by even the most demanding.

The outstanding work of the evening as far as performance was concerned if not musical excellence was probably Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite. Here both the orchestra and the conductor were in their element. A completely impressionistic work such as this requires deep understanding, and the orchestra, which has been seated differently to create a different tonal effect, certainly gave it that.

Charles Munch, who is capable of the most energetic gymnastics during the forté passages and the most subdued style of conducting during the piano parts to draw out the orchestra, used his ability to the utmost. The effect was such that Ravel's work sounded like a new and wonderful piece being performed for the first time.

The sounds of the birds and the brook in the beginning were created with great peace and restraint, and at the next moment Sanders Theater was rocked by the loud and wild dance. Enormous credit is due to Georges Laurent, first flutist, whose performance was inspired.

The first work on the program, another French piece though not impressionistic, was also well done. Rabaud's romantic and moody Le Procession Nocturne requires tremendous feeling on the part of both orchestra and leader. And that was certainly manifest in its performance Tuesday.

It is unfortunate that Walter Piston's Second Suite did not go over better than it did. It is a difficult piece both to play and understand. The orchestra certainly did its part in the performance, but the audience sat on its hands until the composer went up to the podium to congratulate Mr. Munch.

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony gave a truly great concert Tuesday night. If the inspiration shown by both continues, the Harvard community is in for many benefits this coming winter.

[46]

Symphony Hall O

E. Power Biggs at Console With Munch and Orchestra

By Harold Rogers

The new organ in Symphony Hall had its first thorough tryout before the public last night when E. Power Biggs gave a special concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting. This program, to which the participants donated their services, benefited the Albert Schweitzer Hospital in French Northern Africa.

The organ has a certain tight brightness that proclaims its newness from almost every stop. Perhaps, like a new pair of shoes, it must undergo a breaking-in period, if there is such a thing with organs, or else a mellowing-up with the passing of a few years.

Built by the Aeolian-Skinner Company, it is essentially the baroque organ of Bach's era in effect, or so it would appear with Mr. Biggs at the console. When let loose, it is almost unbearably loud. Now that we have ridden the horse at full gallop, a canter or even a trot would be more restful.

♪ ♪ ♪

Mr. Munch opened the program with the unpublished Organ Concerto in C major by Haydn, composed in 1756. Haydn, according to the program note, wrote it for Therese Kelley, a pupil. Mr. Biggs obtained copies of the parts from Austria, where the manuscript was preserved in the Melk and Göttweig monasteries. This was its first American performance.

In three movements — Allegro moderato, Largo, and Allegro molto—the concerto is characteristic of Haydn's gentlemanly graces and deserves its rightful place among his well-known works. Mr. Biggs chose a registration that was predominantly brass for the first movement, woodwind for the second, and a mixture of bright colors for the finale.

The Hindemith Organ Concerto, composed in 1929, calls for a chamber orchestra of woodwinds, brass, and strings minus fiddles. It is a scholarly and intricate piece of contrapuntal writing, conservatively modern in feeling.

♪ ♪ ♪

Mr. Biggs played the broad slow movement with little dynamic change or variety in registration, though such a reading may be called for in the score. The last movement was a delightful bit of fugal chatter.

Mr. Biggs' section for organ solo was devoted to Bach: the exclamatory Toccata, Adagio, and Fugue in C major; three chorale preludes, "Sleepers Wake! a Voice is Calling," "Abide with Us, Lord Jesus Christ," "Come! Thou Now Jesus, from Heaven Above"; and the well-known Toccata and Fugue in D minor.

♪ ♪ ♪

While the chorale tune of "Sleepers Wake!" was far too loud for the accompanying melody, the last two preludes were excellent examples of balance, restraint, and color. Mr. Biggs performed the final Toccata with tremendous power and brilliance.

Mr. Munch brought the program to a close with Poulenc's Concert (in one movement) for Organ and String Orchestra with Timpani. Here the baroque approach was partially abandoned for the romantic. Surely Poulenc must write with a smile on his lips. At any rate, his deft concerto came in welcome contrast to the preceding austerity.

A full house enthusiastically approved the new instrument and Mr. Biggs' performance.

ORGAN CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The new organ at Symphony Hall, heard in the opening pair of Symphony Concerts and again when Mr. Munch performed Bach's Art of Fugue in the transcription of his cousin, Ernest Munch, received a thorough workout last evening. This unusual program of organ concertos and solos, with E. Power Biggs officiating at the console and Mr. Munch and the Symphony Orchestra assisting, was given to benefit the Albert Schweitzer Hospital in Africa. While Dr. Schweitzer was in Boston last summer, he enthusiastically endorsed the new instrument and wrote an inscription on it. The concert must have served well its worthy purpose, since the hall was filled.

The organ concertos were three in number: an early one by Haydn, performed for the first time in America; one by Hindemith, employing a chamber orchestra of 18 musicians; and the diverting Concerto of Poulenc, with the accompaniment of string orchestra with tympani, heard at a pair of Symphony Concerts last season with Richard Burgin conducting.

It is seldom that one encounters music from Haydn's early years. This unpublished Concerto was written when he was 24, and while agreeable, is hardly Haydnesque in the accepted sense of the term. Mr. Hindemith's Concerto is, however, typically Hindemithian, repleat with energetic rhythms and dissonsion. He presents glimpses of ant counterpoint. The audience definitely liked it, or Mr. Bigg's playing, or both, for it applauded loud and long.

Mr. Bigg's solos came from Bach: the Toccata, Adagio and Fugue in C major, three Chorale Preludes and the Toccata and Fugue in D minor. The new organ is supposed to combine the 19th century French organ with the reconstructed Baroque organ (of Bach's day), with its emphasis on clarity and, one might add, shrillness. These partilar ears were made uncomfortable more than once last evening by Mr. Bigg's zeal in the latter respect. His an amazing virtuosity, but too often Bach's [illegible] and Bach's spirit were left by the wayside. The Chorale Preludes, except the familiar "Wachet Auf," came off very well, but for my taste the greatest pleasure of the evening was afforded by the concertos. In them Mr. Biggs shone and Mr. Munch and his men were their usual admirable

New Organ Dedicated by Biggs, Munch

By PAUL STEVENS

The country's leading organist, playing the nation's finest organ, drew a tremendous ovation at a benefit concert that marked the instrument's dedication at Symphony Hall last night.

All seats were taken and music lovers vied for standing room only vantage points as E. Power Biggs played himself to new glory at the console. The Boston Symphony Orchestra provided a perfect background, with Charles Munch conducting.

The concert, which opened with one of Haydn's few organ-orchestra compositions (possibly his only organ-orchestra composition), was held to benefit the Schweitzer Hospital at Lambarene in French Northern Africa.

The piece, "Concerto in C Major, for Organ and Orchestra," was executed in three movements. The first two movements reflected muddy, sober moods, but the third movement mirrored assertiveness that ran to ebullience.

For his second part of the program, Biggs and 18 Symphony Orchestra musicians, played the three movements of the "Concerto for Organ and Chamber Orchestra," by Hindemith, the modernist. The score was threaded with dissonance, with that the accent rather than rhythm.

Written completely in a modern idiom, the ending of the first movement came abruptly, suggesting the sound of a train shunted to a standstill on a siding. The second movement suggested shimmering apparitions, and it seemed to produce a kind of pleasant musical hysteria in some of the listeners.

In the third movement, grim, like something wrapped in mummy cloths, [illegible] with the organ's full majesty [illegible] played without [illegible] during part of the third movement.

GREAT OVATION

The playing of the Hindemith composition brought enthusiastic audience response, but it paled by comparison with the truly great ovation Biggs received by demonstrating his virtuosity in three succeeding Bach compositions. He played these without accompaniment. The clapping came and went, and then, like gathering rain, came on again to bring the musician back to the stage. This was repeated time and again.

It was a great personal triumph for Biggs.

The program ended with a concerto scored for strings, organ and timpani by Poulenc, the French composer whose works have been well received in Boston.

Last night's concert marked the first time the Haydn composition had been played in this country. Discovered hidden away in obscurity, the score was seized upon by Biggs as a find of momentous importance. He had it micro-filmed and prepared for use in this country.

G. Donald Harrison, president of the Aeolian-Skinner Company, the firm which built the organ, was in the audience. He said the organ which has 67 stops and almost [illegible] pipes, would have cost $70,000 to build if all parts had been new. Actual cost [illegible] was $45,0[illegible] as a result [illegible] and other parts of [illegible].

The [illegible] was founded [illegible] years ago by Dr. Albert Schweitzer, medical doctor, theologian, organist, Bach scholar and philosopher. The hospital provides free care to upwards of 700 patients, many of whom suffer from tropical maladies. It is the only hospital of its kind in all Africa.

MUSIC

Munch, Biggs and Boston Symphony in Schweitzer Benefit

By JOHN WILLIAM HALEY

When [illegible] to [illegible] the musical [illegible] Boston [illegible] season of 1949-50 [illegible] which already has brought [illegible] much) that certainly will be one event which stands out. It is the concert in Symphony Hall last [illegible] which the new Aeolian-Skinner organ was introduced by E. Power Biggs with the assistance of Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony. Furthermore, the event had historic importance. All participants gave their services, that the total proceeds could benefit the efforts of one of the greatest of living men —Albert Schweitzer.

In a large but select circle of the modern world, Albert Schweitzer, Alsatian-born in 1875, is known and revered. For he is a philosopher, theologian, organist, Bach scholar and, last of all, and most important to him, a physician, surgeon and missionary. After building fame in all of these endeavors (each enough for a single man's lifetime), Schweitzer left Europe as a young man to found a hospital and do missionary work in French Equatorial Africa. There he works today, giving comfort to the least civilized of mankind.

The audience last evening very nearly filled Symphony Hall and the proceeds—almost $5000 even—will go to aid Dr. Schweitzer's work.

Every aspect of the event was fitting. For instance, Mr. Munch's father, Ernst, was Schweitzer's first organ teacher. The real introduction of the [illegible] organ could not have had a better purpose. And Mr. Biggs, as well as those who assisted him, gave his finest artistry.

The program [illegible] with Haydn Concerto in C [illegible] given its first performance in [illegible] A fine sunny piece for displaying the classical potentialities of the new instrument. It continued with Hindemith's Concerto for Organ and Chamber Orchestra — comprising cellos, basses, woodwinds and brass —a sort of [illegible] but strong work.

In the [illegible] program Mr. Biggs per[illegible] Bach group: the Toccata, [illegible] and Fugue in C Major, three Chorale Preludes and finally the Toccata and Fugue in C Minor. Here he was able to show both his own artistry and the clean, clear speaking qualities of the new organ. It was a magnificent display.

The evening closed with Poulenc's one-movement Concerto for Organ and String Orchestra with Tympani. It was a sort of tuneful Stravinskyian piece, full of circusy figures and colorful, bright trappings. Altogether this was a memorable, noteworthy event in this season's musical history.

E. POWER BIGGS watches Albert Schweitzer test a rank of pipes for the new Symphony organ. Mr. Biggs will play at Symphony Hall, Monday evening, Nov. 14.

THE MUSIC BOX

Brenton Welling[illegible]

B.S.O. at Sa[illegible]

Rabaud		La Procession Nocturne
Beethoven		Symphony No. 7 in A major
Piston		Second Suite for Orchestra
Ravel		"Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2

In 1881, when Henry [illegible]ngton founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he stipulated that several concerts each year must be played in Cambridge for the benefit of the Harvard community. Tuesday night marked the beginning of this year's Cambridge season, and that part of the Harvard community lucky enough to get into Sanders Theater was certainly benefited immeasurably.

The audience, which was made up largely of faculty members and their wives, heard Charles Munch conducting the orchestra for the first time in this area. When the concert was over the listeners rose to give the conductor a standing ovation, something almost unheard of for Harvard.

Hearing the concert Tuesday night was like listening to a new orchestra. With a few exceptions, the members of the Boston Symphony are French, and now they have a French conductor. The "rapport" thus created resulted in a sound totally different from that made by the same musicians under Serge Koussevitzky.

The two main differences are dynamics and precision. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which received the greatest applause, probably showed these differences most clearly. The first movement was played at a tempo as lively as has been heard in a long time. Yet the staccato notes of the entire string section came out as clearly as one instrument. The second movement, a funeral piece in contrast, was played with all the quiet dignity and feeling that could be expected by even the most demanding.

The outstanding work of the evening as far as performance was concerned if not musical excellence was probably Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite. Here both the orchestra and the conductor were in their element. A completely impressionistic work such as this requires deep understanding, and the orchestra, which has been seated differently to create a different tonal effect, certainly gave it that.

Charles Munch, who is capable of the most energetic gymnastics during the forte passages and the most subdued style of conducting during the piano parts to draw out the orchestra, used his ability to the utmost. The effect was such that Ravel's work sounded like a new and wonderful piece being performed for the first time.

The sounds of the birds and the brook in the beginning were created with great peace and restraint, and at the next moment Sanders Theater was rocked by the loud and wild dance. Enormous credit is due to Georges Laurent, first flutist, whose performance was inspired.

The first work on the program, another French piece though not impressionistic, was also well done. Rabaud's romantic and moody Le Procession Nocturne requires tremendous feeling on the part of both orchestra and leader. And that was certainly manifest in its performance Tuesday.

It is unfortunate that Walter Piston's Second Suite did not go over better than it did. It is a difficult piece both to play and understand. The orchestra certainly did its part in the performance, but the audience sat on its hands until the composer went up to the podium to congratulate Mr. Munch.

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony gave a truly great concert Tuesday night. If the inspiration shown by both continues, the Harvard community is in for many benefits this coming winter.

[46]

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 19 1949

Charles Munch and French Music

Symphony Memorial Moving Performance

Boston, Mass. — This afternoon Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony in Faure's Adagio from Pelleas et Melisande, the music which Gabriel Faure composed for a death scene, in memory of Kinette Neveu. The young violinist who lost her life in a plane crash in the Azores two weeks ago was to have performed with the orchestra on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. Munch had known the brilliant violinist since her childhood, and it was obvious that everyone was deeply moved by his brief dedication before the performance. This was followed by a minute of silence by the standing audience.

* * *

MUNCH has definitely found his way with the orchestra. The Faure piece was sensitively projected and the orchestra seemed to know exactly what Munch wanted from them.

"The Corsair" by Berlioz is a fascinating piece of music and it is strange that it isn't performed more often.

Here, as in the Faure, Mr. Munch did with his musicians as he liked. The men seem to be getting more accustomed to the long beat of Munch, and in the Roussel Fourth Symphony, they were so much putty in the hands of a master sculptor.

The tenseness present in Munch's first concerts has completely disappeared. He is vibrant, poised, always in command. In the French music, whose idiom is his own, he seems to become greatly inspired, and the musicians seem to be spurred on to even greater heights by his own enthusiasm.

* * *

THE BOSTON Symphony has changed a great deal since Mr. Munch took over. The tone is of a different timbre and, at first hearing, sounded a bit thin. Yet, now it is not obvious whether it is just as good, worse, or even better than it was before. The listener's impressions are constantly shifting, as is the seating arrangement of the orchestra, and it is difficult to know what to expect from one concert to the next.

One thing is certain, however, and that is that Mr. Munch has a genius which is just beginning to assert itself in the Boston Symphony and more the intimacy between orchestra and conductor grows, the more it is going to be heard.

The seating arrangement that at first seemed to threaten the brilliant tone of the orchestra is still in a process of change. However, the horns are consistently too loud or too soft, and often there is a brassiness which takes the edge off a moderately loud passage. This was especially apparent in the Roussel symphony, and at the present time, that seems to be an Achilles heel of this orchestra. Not that it matters a hill of beans when you can hear music played the way Munch and his players played it today.

* * *

IN THE COPLAND "Statements for Orchestra," Munch had an opportunity to demonstrate his brand of comedy, especially in the portion entitled "Jingo," although neither this correspondent nor probably anyone else, knows precisely what a jingo is. At any rate, the undeniable strains of East Side, West Side were clearly distinguishable and enjoyed by all, and Mr. Copland was in the audience to accept that applause.

The program ended with the "Daphnis et Chloe" suite by Ravel and it left the audience thoroughly wilted. Munch loves this piece. No one could play it the way he does unless he did. His crescendos are something to hear. They begin somewhere along the line and go on and on until you feel sure something will explode unless he ends it all.

Something evidently did explode, because the audience was left breathless at the end, and even Mr. Munch seemed pleased with the performance. It was a rare concert from all angles.—F. S.

Aaron Copland's 'Statements' For First Time at Symphony

By Harold Rogers

Charles Munch chose an essentially French program for his concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week end in Symphony Hall. The exception is Aaron Copland's "Statements," performed for the first time at these concerts.

Mr. Munch prefaced the program with the Molto Adagio from Fauré's "Pelléas et Mélisande," dedicated to the memory of Ginette Neveu, who was to have been soloist with the orchestra this week end. Before playing it, however, he asked the audience to refrain from applause and to rise for a few moments of silence at its conclusion.

Besides the Copland number, the program consisted of Berlioz' Overture, "The Corsair," Roussel's Fourth Symphony, and Ravel's Suite No. 2 from his ballet, "Daphnis et Chloé."

* * *

Mr. Munch is concerned with the inside of the music as much as he is with the outside. If he were a painter, he would find the detail of a scene as intriguing as the broader outlines. He adjusts the orchestra to a three-dimensional focus that does not sacrifice inner voices to the more obvious line and flow of the work.

Through his remarkable control of dynamics he achieves contrasts of the most delicate shadings or elfin pianissimos burgeoning into gigantic crescendos. He used these effects successfully in the finale of the Berlioz, and again throughout the Ravel.

Copland is particularly adept at capturing an idea in sound. In the six short movements of his "Statements," completed in 1935, he employs the following concepts —militant, cryptic, dogmatic, subjective, jingo, and prophetic.

His ranging melodies and harmonies, in this suite as in his other works, generally sound as if they were scattered by a high wind over an endless prairie. High comedy is the backbone of the "Jingo" section with its subtle use of snare drum, trumpet, and other patriotic effects. Those acquainted with Mr. Copland are at once impressed with his ebullient sense of humor.

Present in the audience, Mr. Copland twice rose from his seat to acknowledge the applause.

* * *

The symphony by Albert Roussel, his fourth and last, is an unusual blend of beauty in conception, orchestral color, and sound craftsmanship. He was happily able to develop a forthright style while many of his contemporaries were lost in the mazes of sentimentality.

Mr. Munch's reading of the Ravel suite was exciting, to say the least. His tempo for the "Pantomime" section was slower than most conductors take it, allowing the flutist time to bring out the niceties of his solo. Georges Laurent's performance, as usual, was flawless. There is nothing like French music played by a French conductor. Mr. Munch has shown us why.

Leonard Bernstein, guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Saturday evening, and Sunday afternoon, and in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, Tuesday evening, Nov. 29.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Symphony Concert

At Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fifth program of the Friday afternoon series; the selections were as follows:

Faure . . . Molto Adagio from "Pelleas et Melisande"
In Memory of Ginette Neveu
Berlioz . . . Overture, "The Corsair," Op. 21
Roussel . . . . . Symphony No. 4, Op. 53
Copland . . . . . Statements
Ravel . . . . . Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet Suite No. 2.

By ELINOR HUGHES

Charles Munch began his program at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon with Faure's Molto Adagio from "Pelleas et Melisande," played in memory of the brilliant young French violinist, Ginette Neveu, who was, prior to her tragic death, announced as soloist for this week's symphony concerts. The Faure was followed by a brief silent tribute with the audience standing.

The afternoon then took on a livelier cast with a spirited performance of Berlioz's overture, "Le Corsaire," not heard at these concerts for 33 years. This is a very dashing work, which was originally titled "La Tour de Nice" and "Le Corsaire Rouge," which may or may not have been inspired by Byron's poem, "The Corsair," but Berlioz, though a great admirer of the Byron work, stated that it was composed in 1831 in three days time "during a voyage protracted by a storm." Whatever the source, the work is romantic and joyous, full of crashing chords and turbulent passages suggestive of a stormy sea, and Mr. Munch and the orchestra played it with a fine display of orchestral color and enthusiasm.

Prior to the intermission, Mr. Munch gave us the first hearing in 15 years of Roussel's Symphony No. 4, a work of exceptional buoyance and felicity, easy to enjoy and as stimulating to the mind as it is to the ear. A second hearing re-enforces earlier impressions of the skill of the orchestration and provides new appreciation of the clarity and ingenuity with which Roussel has developed his simple but engaging themes. The intellectual vigor of the opening movement is most refreshing, the lento molto has a lovely lyric quality, and the scherzo is so exuberant that it is not surprising to learn that it had to be repeated at the first performance of the Symphony in Paris in 1935. The orchestra and the conductor did full justice to this notable composition, giving admirable expression throughout to its varying musical moods.

Aaron Copland's "Statements" had its first Boston hearing in the second half of the program. Dating from 1935, when it was commissioned by the League of Composers and performed in part by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra in 1936, this composition finds the composer working partly in the dissonant vein of his earlier works and looking toward his present style. It is divided into six movements: militant, cryptic, dogmatic, subjective jingo and prophetic, each section lasting about three minutes. The most entertaining were the third and the fifth, the latter of which, with its use of the popular song, "East Side, West Side," and its suggestion of bands and parades, should do very nicely in future at the Pops. The composer was in the audience to acknowledge the applause, which was polite rather than frenzied.

The concert ended with a fiery and exciting performance of the "Daphnis and Chloe" Ballet Suite No. 2. The program will be repeated tonight, and next week Leonard Bernstein as guest conductor will offer Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony and Piano Concerto in B-flat major and Brahms' Symphony No. 2.

Symphony Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Twice this season a Boston Symphony program has been prefaced by a tonal tribute to a musician recently departed. At the opening pair of concerts Henri Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" was performed in honor of the distinguished musician who conducted the orchestra in the season of 1918-19. The program heard yesterday, and to be repeated this evening, is prefaced by the touching Molto Adagio from Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas and Melisande," played in memory of Ginette Neveu, who was to have been the violin soloist on these occasions. Mr. Munch made a short address in which he expressed his regard for the gifted young woman, tragically killed in an airplane accident, and requested that there be no applause but that at the conclusion of the music the audience stand for a minute in silence. This was done.

The current list is predominantly French. The opening number, Berlioz' Overture, "The Corsair," had not been heard here since 1916. The ensuing piece, Roussel's Fourth Symphony, had a single performance here in 1935. The last number, the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," has showed up almost seasonally of late years. The one non-Gallic item, Aaron Copland's "Statements," completed in 1935, was new to Boston.

Ravel was sometimes referred to as a "petit maitre." Yesterday he seemed, by contrast with those who had just preceded him, not a little master but a great one. Here was music of technical expertness replete with vital and salient themes. The youthful Berlioz of "The Corsair" had a dash and daring that still excite and astonish, particularly in a performance such as that of yesterday. But along with all this brilliance and brio is a certain amount of shoddy and tinsel. Just the same, the piece was good to hear and as Mr. Munch resurrects some other Berlioz overtures there will be no complaint from this quarter.

Roussel's Fourth Symphony is a more satisfying work than the popular Third. There is much beauty in the slow movement, though it is long and rather rambling; the Allegro scherzando is entertaining, the finale effective. The difficulty with Roussel is that he did not have the thematic invention necessary to an enduring symphonist. The idea basic of Mr. Copland's statements (Militant, Cryptic, Dogmatic, Subjective, Jingo and Prophetic) was a clever one, and the music is almost as clever as the idea. Mr. Copland was present in the audience and was politely applauded. You might say that it took courage on Mr. Munch's part to tackle so soon such a Koussevitzky specialty as the "Daphnis" Suite. The fact of the matter is that he has here something of his own to offer. The long familiar Koussevitzky performance was notable for its gorgeous tone and its orgiastic finish. The Munch version has more variety of mood and color and conveys a more definite sense of the theatre. It received yesterday a well-deserved ovation.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 24 1949

1½-HR. SYMPHONY

Leonard Bernstein to Conduct Boston Orchestra in Premiere

Boston, Nov. 23.—(UP)—The youngest topflight symphony conductor will guest-conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dec. 2 in the world premiere of the longest orchestral score ever performed in the 69-year history of that group.

Leonard Bernstein, who is only 31, will substitute for vacationing conductor Charles Munch when the orchestra presents Turangalila, a 10-movement, 90-minute symphony by the French composer, Olivier Messiaen. In sheer length this work surpasses by 15 minutes the previous record, held by Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony.

MUSIC

Munch Honors Memory of Neveu; "Daphnis et Chloe" Brilliantly Done

BY CYRUS DURGIN

"Ginette Neveu was to have been with us this afternoon," said a grave-faced Charles Munch to the Friday Boston Symphony subscribers when he first appeared on the Symphony Hall stage yesterday. "We shall play in her memory Faure's adagio (from the Pelleas et Melisande Suite). I ask you not to applaud, and after the performance to observe a moment of silence, standing."

The conductor's request was observed to the letter, and thus he honored the memory of his artistic protegee and cherished fellow musician who was killed in the plane crash over the Azores Oct. 28. Had the French violinist lived, she would have been soloist this week in Chausson's "Poeme" and the "Tzigane" of Ravel.

The regular program of this fifth pair of concerts begins with Berlioz' sky-rockety Overture, "The Corsair," last done at these concerts in 1916, and continues with the first B. S. O. performance since 1935 of Roussel's Fourth Symphony. The novelty is Aaron Copland's "Statements," a product of 1935, but not previously heard here, and the final number is Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2.

From first notes to that smashing chord which ends "Daphnis et Chloe," the afternoon was a prime example of orchestral virtuosity and conducting of great distinction. Berlioz, taken at a speed which almost tripped even the technical experts of this orchestra, was flashy, as it ought to be, but never tawdry.

With Mr. Munch's coming, the Boston Symphony has taken on a new quality: vitality without strain. It is a far more important quality that you might think, and it has exerted its power at every concert so far. Yesterday it resulted in a quite different sort of reading of the abstract and astringent Roussel Symphony. In this light, the work rippled and glinted, almost with humor, which is, perhaps, the key to Roussel as a whole.

Until I heard Munch do "Daphnis et Chloe," I had thought that Koussevitzky's performance was pre-eminent. Now it can be said that there are two superlative readings, each quite different; Munch's is faster and lighter in tone and expressive weight, but in the Danse Generale perhaps the more erotic. Certainly it is a stunning interpretation, and it aroused cheers. Mr. Munch literally pushed that marvelous flutist, Georges Laurent, to stage front to share the applause. This was a gracious gesture and thoroughly deserved, for Mr. Laurent had performed his difficult part with the finesse of a great virtuoso.

Mr. Copland was in the audience to hear his "Statements," which is really a suite of six short movements given the catchy but not too serious titles of "Militant," "Cryptic," "Dogmatic," "Subjective," "Jingo" (bringing in the tune "Sidewalks of New York") and "Prophetic," which last indicated that Mr. Copland was prophesying darkly. What of the music? For my taste, it is pepper-and-pickles music, pretentious, grindingly dissonant, that gets nowhere and proves nothing and in the meantime has been anything but pleasant. No more so than the statements one gets every month from the bank.

LES séances de la "Philharmonique" se succèdent avec l'absence d'éclat qu'on avait notée depuis le début de la saison. Et pourtant cette semaine M. Stokowski a racheté quelques unes les ses erreurs passées. En effet, son interprétation de l'exquise symphonie (dite l'Horloge en raison du motif onomatopéique du second mouvement) fut vivante, dynamique et, une fois encore, l'orchestre fit entendre ces sonorités riches et veloutées que M. Stokowski, lorsqu'il le veut, sait si bien produire.

Le soliste de la semaine fut l'excellent violoncelliste Pierre Fournier, dont la collaboration fut remarquable. Avec une souplesse féline, M. Fournier s'adapte aux

ROBERT CASADESUS

C'est le 3 décembre à 8 h. 30 au Hunter College Assembly Hall que le grand artiste se fera entendre. Au programme: Debussy Rameau, Schumann.

circonstances et en tire le parti le plus favorable pour mettre sa personnalité en valeur. Jeune encore mais déjà célèbre, il mit son impeccable virtuosité au service d'une très belle exécution du concerto de Schumann, jouant avec la "Grundlichkeit" et l'"Innigkeit" requises et donnant ainsi un nouveau témoignage de ses affinités avec le génie allemand.

Une ouverture, habilement écrite, de David Diamond et des extraits du "Macbeth" d'Ernest Bloch, dont la musique est toujours captivante, complétèrent avantageusement le programme.

☆

En sa nouvelle qualité de directeur général de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, M. Charles Munch a pris son premier contact avec le public new-yorkais. Ce fut un contact électrique, car les milliers d'auditeurs qui remplissaient la salle jusqu'au dernier fauteuil prouvèrent avec unanimité la pénétration du courant engendré par cette dynamo humaine qu'est Charles Munch.

L'orchestre de Boston s'est taillé depuis de longues années la réputation d'être le meilleur du monde. Cette supériorité que nul ne songe à contester, se manifestait principalement par la qualité inégalable de sa sonorité, c'est-à-dire, à proprement parler, qu'elle était surtout d'ordre physique. Sous la baguette de Charles Munch, un élément nouveau est venu consolider la suprématie du "Boston Symphony": c'est la vitalité extraordinaire animant tous les musiciens qui, à leur souci constant de tisser une belle trame sonore, ajoutent désormais celui de briller par leur entrain, leur fougue, l'acuité de leurs attaques, leur jeunesse. On dirait que M. Munch a plongé ses hommes dans un bain de jouvence.

La première partie du programme comprenait la "Procession Nocturne" d'Henri Rabaud — en souvenir du compositeur qui, lui aussi, fut directeur de l'orchestre de Boston et qui est mort à Paris, il y a deux mois, à l'âge de soixante-seize ans — une suite pour orchestre de Walter Piston, et, en première audition à New-York, le concerto d'André Jolivet pour "ondes Martenot" et orchestre, avec Mlle Ginette Martenot jouant de l'instrument inventé par son frère Maurice Martenot.

Dans la famille des instruments électrophoniques, les "ondes Martenot" occupent une des premières places. Plus souple et plus précise que le "Théremin", l'instrument Martenot est plus expressif que le "Hellertion" ou que le piano électrique Wurlitzer, en ceci que tout en utilisant le truchement d'un clavier pour faciliter l'intonation, il permet à l'exécutant de faire "vibrer" le son, comme sur un violon, sans recourir pour obtenir cet effet à aucun dispositif mécanique. Ce "vibrato" purement humain rend expressive la sonorité froide et impersonnelle qui est dans la nature de l'instrument.

Mlle Martenot est une musicienne avertie et une virtuose remarquable. Quant au concerto de Jolivet, sa substance musicale n'est guère plus riche que ses ressources harmoniques ou rythmiques. Je crois — dans la mesure où il est permis de juger de prime abord — qu'il n'a pas utilisé avec un maximum d'efficacité les possibilités des "ondes Martenot" et tout ce qu'elles pouvaient apporter de nouveau dans le vocabulaire de l'expression musicale.

Quatuor LOEWENGUTH

Le célèbre quatuor de Paris donnera trois récitals au Times Hall les 15, 18 et 22 novembre.

Ainsi qu'il est traité par Jolivet, l'instrument se substitue aux instruments déjà connus (auxquels, dans leurs domaines respectifs, il est naturellement inférieur) plutôt qu'il ne crée des effets qui lui appartiennent en propre. Notamment, les possibilités de "crescendo" et de "fondu" de l'instrument ne paraissent pas avoir été exploitées intensivement. En tous cas, ce fut une première d'un grand intérêt et il faut savoir gré à M. Munch de nous l'avoir offerte.

EDGARD FEDER

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR
NOV 30 1949

Munch Stirs Our Orchestra

Boston's Conductor At the Plateau Hall

...the Plateau Hall this week ...nch does not merely ... orchestra; he inspires ... way to play as it has ... played before. There ... done about this in the ... notes of Handel's "Water ... which began the concert. ... and colour of this were ... excellent, and there was some ...ularly good work by the ... which have much to do in ... The quality of the playing ... course be distinguished ... in Beethoven's seventh ... which got a very fine ... performance, with admirable work ... the strings, including a lovely ... which was specially ... in the second movement; but the fact unfortunately remains that the Plateau Hall is not big enough for such a symphony as this to get its full effect.

These two works in themselves made so complete a concert that a few people went away at the interval, feeling that they had already had a good evening's music. There was, however, more to come. First there was Henri Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne"; a symphonic poem of which the program is so simple that its music, also very simple in its material, can stand for itself. It is all thoroughly tuneful and very impressive. This is distinctly music of the nineteenth century. Albert Roussel's fourth symphony is just as distinctly of the twentieth century, with its querulous tunes and abrupt endings. For the most part it is concerned more with rhythm than with tune and suggests a certain restless discontent, even in its third movement, which is a dance without gaiety. It is short and was well played and quite interesting and attractive in some places, but came as something of an anti-climax after Handel, Beethoven and Rabaud.

H.P.B.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 20 1949

Boxholders Await Boston Concert Here

Many Washingtonians, particularly those of Boston descent, are marking December 8 a red letter day on their calendars, because the Boston Symphony gives the first of [redacted] local concerts that evening.

Charles Munch, its new conductor, formerly with the French Orchestra Nationale, makes his first appearance in the Capital with the Bostonians. He will bring them here again on January 12.

Mrs. William R. Castle, herself a Bostonian, has been appointed chairman of boxes and has already enlisted many of Washington's music lovers for both concerts.

The Ambassador of France and Mme. Bonnet will also be present, having a special interest in hearing their countryman, Mr. Munch, conduct one of the greatest of American orchestras. Other boxholders include Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Woodward, the Minister of Luxembourg and Mme. Le Gallais, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew J. Snow, Judge and Mrs. George D. Neilson, Mrs. Edwin M. Watson, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Meyer, Mrs. Florence Keep, Mr. and Mrs. Earl Campbell, Joseph Sanders and Dr. and Mrs. Maurice Friedman. Still others are the Ambassador of New Zealand and Lady Berendsen, the Ambassador of the Netherlands and Mme. van Kleffens, Mrs. Paul Bartlett, Dr. and Mrs. Irving Brotman, Col. and Mrs. James Hendrick, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Rabbi and Mrs. Norman Gerstenfeld, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Grew, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon and Mrs. William Crozier.

Pat Hall

MUSIC

Re-Appraisal of Conductor Munch

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Having conducted [redacted] weeks' worth of concerts in Boston, taken the orchestra on a jaunt to several Western cities and on another to New Haven, New York and Brooklyn, Charles Munch is now resting up for a fortnight while Leonard Bernstein, the season's only guest conductor, takes over.

Despite his guest appearances in the season of '46-'47 and '47-'48, Mr. Munch, as of last October, was still something of an unknown quantity. Guest conductors, if not rankly incompetent, have the cards stacked in their favor. They can present programs of their particular specialties, while the men, glad of a respite from their regular boss, give of their best.

Under these happy conditions Mr. Munch made a favorable impression, but not an entirely favorable one. He seemed prone to overdrive himself, the players and the music. He would jump clear off the platform; his hair was soon all awry, and on one occasion his clothing followed suit. This department, greatly impressed with Mr. Munch when he made his initial appearance at Symphony Hall, and aware that he had the goods, suggested that all he neede to do was to take it easy.

Has Slowed Down

And that is exactly what Mr. Munch has done. On assuming command of the orchestra he has assumed a new command of himself, a quieter authority, that is as gratifying to witness as its results are gratifying to hear. Mr. Munch knows by now that he has won the respect and admiration of the players, the Symphony-going public and —whatever it means to him—of the critical press as well. The New York reviewers, presumably quite unprejudicd, praised Mr. Munch highly. I shall quote one of them, although since he writes on a magazine and not a newspaper, some of my readers may have already seen his comments.

Mr. Sargeant's Comment

The music columns in The New Yorker are now for the first time on a par with those devoted to the drama, movies, books, art and poetry. This season the magazine acquired the services of Winthrop Sargeant, one of the soundest critics in the business. Wrote Mr. Sargeant of these Carnegie Hall concerts.

"To a symphonic season that had up to then submitted no particular claims to distinction, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new conductor, Charles Munch, last week contributed a more hopeful note." The performances, which were consistently fastidious and sensitive, demonstrated clearly that the Munch regime is going to mean no letdown whatever from that of Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Munch lacks, perhaps, a little of Koussevitzky's glamour and showmanship, but these are superficial lacks. Throughout the opening program he revealed again that he is a musician of fine sensibilities, and a very conscientious and inspired interpreter of any kind of music he undertakes to offer."

In its years under Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony had become famous for its tone, of which the strings were the foundation. Rich and sumptuous, deep and lustrous, it could be incandescent in moments of excitement. Tone was the Russian leader's special concern. Yet the story goes that at the season's first rehearsal Mr. Munch told the men that while they were capable of a wonderful tone, it lacked variety. He then gave them an extensive workout in Rabaud's "La Procession Nocture" and in these five programs nothing has been more beautifully accomplished.

"New French Tone"

What the late Leslie Sloper, writing of the performance of Strauss' "Domestica," called the orchestra's "new French tone" is something that the attentive ear can hardly miss. When it mentioned to one of the string players, a Munch enthusiast like all of his colleagues, that their collective tone was somewhat lighter, he hesitatingly agreed but added that it had more vitality This quality has been in evidence all along and in such varying pieces, as the aforesaid Rabaud, the music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," the Beethoven Fifth, the Brahms Fourth, Mozart's "Prague," Berlioz' flashy "Corsaire" Overture and that Koussevitzky war horse, the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." And if formerly these things might have sounded somewhat alike they were now essentially different. You are getting the impression that if the Slavic sensuousness, sometimes very much to in order, may be lacking, you are hearing not so much the voice of their interpreter as that of the several composers themselves. This is all to the good.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
NOV 25 1949

Hub Will Hear Long Symphony

Boston, Nov. 25 (UP)—The youngest topflight symphony conductor will guest-conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dec. 2 in the [redacted] of the longest orchestral score ever performed in the 69-year history of that group.

Leonard Bernstein, who is only 31, will substitute for vacationing conductor Charles Munch when the orchestra presents "Turangalila," a 10-movement, 90-minute symphony by the French composer, Olivier Messiaen. In sheer length this work surpasses by 15 minutes the previous record, held by Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony.

Turangalila also requires greater orchestral resources. In addition to the regular 100-odd instruments (except kettledrums), this symphony calls for: Keyed glockenspiel, celesta, vibraphone, temple blocks, wood block, small cymbals, suspended cymbal, Chinese cymbal, tam-tam and maracas.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
NOV 24 1949

Boston Orchestra Has Youngest Conductor

Boston, Nov. 23 — (UP) — The youngest topflight symphony conductor will guest-conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dec. 2 in the world premiere of the longest orchestral score ever performed in the 69-year history of that group.

Leonard Bernstein, who is only 31, will substitute for vacationing Conductor Charles Munch when the orchestra presents "Turangalila," a 10-movement, 90-minute symphony by the French composer, Olivier Messiaen. In sheer length this work surpasses by 15 minutes the previous record, held by Shostakovitch's seventh symphony.

Turangalila also requires greater orchestral resources. In addition to the regular 100-odd instruments (except kettledrums), this symphony calls for: Keyed glockenspiel, celesta, vibraphone, temple blocks, wood block, small cymbals, suspended cymbal, Chinese cymbal, tam-tam and maracas.

The week end following the world premiere here, Turangalila will be performed by the Boston Symphony in New York's Carnegie Hall.

[48]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Leonard Bernstein, the season's only guest conductor, is directing the three concerts of this week end and next week's pair. At the latter he will introduce a concert-long, Koussevitzky commissioned Symphony by Messiaen. So complex and difficult is this work that much of this week's rehearsal time has been devoted to it, and that is undoubtedly why yesterday's program ran almost entirely to familiar music, the one exception being Mozart's Piano Concerto in B-flat major, K 450, previously heard at Symphony Hall only at a Monday-Tuesday pair in 1940.

Not only did this concerto, in which Mr. Bernstein was both soloist and conductor, contribute the afternoon's only novel touch, it was also the most successfully accomplished, the most thoroughly enjoyable item on the list. Before it came the familiar "Haffner" Symphony of Mozart and after it what is probably the most overworked of all Symphonies, the Second of Brahms. For some reason, the Brahms Second was not played last season; and two seasons without it would, of course, be absolutely unthinkable.

This program, by the way, was curiously like the one Mr. Munch offered two concerts ago, when he gave us the Mozart "Prague," the Jolivet Concerto for Ondes Martinot and the Brahms Fourth. There were admirable moments in both the Mozart and Brahms Symphonies as Mr. Bernstein read them, but in both he was inclined to fuss, to over-interpret, rather than let the music run its natural course. The finale of the "Haffner" just missed being a scramble, so fast was it played, and the orchestral tone was none too pure. The first movement of the Brahms was marred by an unstable tempo; the finale received the shot-in-the-arm that is the customary procedure of the school of conducting to which Mr. Bernstein subscribes. Exciting? Yes. And there was answering excitement on the part of the audience.

But the concerto, as suggested above, was a joy. What Mr. Bernstein did may be a stunt, but it is a stunt that he can bring off perfectly. The concerto itself, unaccountably neglected, is charming. Mr. Bernstein's performance was a model of fluency and grace, and always accurate although he took the first movement at a very fast tempo. The fact that he could not actually conduct and play at the same time, save for an occasional nod of the head, and that the performance still went so well, made you feel that a good deal of the conducting that is done, particularly that which entails great physical activity on the part of the conductor, may after all be somewhat superfluous.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert was entirely given over to the world premiere of the "Turangalila-Symphony" for piano, Onde Martenot and orchestra by Olivier Messiaen. Leonard Bernstein conducted this work, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and completed a year ago. Dr. Koussevitzky was to have presided over its first performance but there were delays, and Mr. Bernstein, faced with a task of exceeding difficulty, made a worthy substitute. Incidentally, in Mr. Messiaen's effulgent sonorities one heard again the voluptuous Koussevitzkian tone.

Mr. Messiaen came from Paris for the performance, bringing with him an extraordinary pianist, Yvonne Loriod, for the taxing piano part. The Onde Martenot solo was played by Ginette Martenot, who came to this country for the double purpose of assisting in this premiere and playing the part for her brother's theremin-like instrument in the Concerto by Jolivet that a few weeks ago introduced it to Boston.

We must take Mr. Messiaen's word for it that turangalila is an East Indian word meaning love song, "with connotations of rhythm" though he admits that it is the sound of the word rather than its sense that has intrigued him. Love is the pervading motive of the symphony. Of its 10 sections two are called Love Song, another Garden of the Sleep of Love, a fourth Development of Love, and the fifth movement, Joy in the Blood of the Stars, is supposed to express the "peak of carnal passion." Mr. Messiaen here used a motive that reminded listeners variously of Stephen Foster, a hillbilly tune and a popular song of the Gay Nineties.

The Symphony consumes about an hour and 10 minutes, and yesterday, fortunately for the ears of all and the sanity of some, there was an intermission in the middle.

This new work by a composer generally known as a religious mystic is remarkable for its rhythmic complexity, most of which cannot be taken in by the ear, for its alternations of frenzied excitement and idyllic—even obvious and slightly corny—passages and for its large array of percussion instruments; glockenspiel, celesta, vibraphone, temple blocks, wood blocks, small cymbal, suspended cymbal, Chinese cymbal, tam-tam, tambourine, triangle, maracas, side drum, snare drum, bass drum, tubular bells—and Mr. Bernstein's right foot, a gratuitous and perhaps necessary addition. No such tintinnabulation has been heard in Symphony Hall since Henry Eichelm gave us his "Java-Burma."

Like certain Renaissance painters and modern composers of opera, Mr. Messiaen is concerned with the contrast between earthly and ideal love, his expression of the former being violent rather than sensuous and of the other decidely soothing. The program notes dealt with strange concepts, such as rhythmic diminution in "zigzag," rhythmic augmentation in "scissors," rhythms like a "spreading fan" and a canon in non-reversible rhythms. Several listeners left at the intermission, but those that remained applauded mightily at the end, especially when the composer came to the stage. Will we hear all this again, save for this evening's performance? I doubt it.

MUSIC

Bernstein Piano Soloist and Guest Conductor in Mozart, Brahms Program

By CYRUS DURGIN

Leonard Bernstein is back for two weeks as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His first program is thoroughly classic and entirely pleasant, consisting of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony and B-flat major Piano Concerto (K. 450), and the Second Symphony of Brahms. Once again Mr. Bernstein is his own soloist, conducting from the keyboard.

It is a commonplace among musicians that the deceptive simplicity of Mozart is hard, indeed, to master. When you have mastered it, you have, in a sense, "arrived." Certainly Mr. Bernstein has arrived, for he gave the "Haffner" Symphony a performance of the greatest straightforwardness and beauty imaginable. Mozart was in the right dynamic frame, too, nothing to loud or soft; the pace exactly right, and no details either neglected or fussed up.

The whole piece "sang" from start to finish, and the tone of the Boston Symphony was clear, limpid and healthy. When done with such honesty and musicianship, Mozart ripples along, and that is precisely how he ought to be played.

Much the same could be said of the Piano Concerto, which was almost as admirable in the solo part as in the orchestral accompaniment. Probably it is impossible so to divide concentration that one man can conduct and play the piano simultaneously with equal distinction. There were a few attacks and other places not so neat as they would have been otherwise. But all the same, this was an exhibition of formidable talent and versatility, and Mr. Bernstein deserves plaudits.

Though he began the first movement of Brahms' D major Symphony very slowly, and soon thereafter picked up the tempo, Mr. Bernstein gave a really masterly reading of this hackneyed score. The general character was a pervading lyricism, with a clear texture and no sentimentality. The third movement, which passes for a scherzo, was especially light and delicate and these abrupt changes of speed and metre were navigated adroitly. It was novel, the way he did the finale, making this, too, comparatively light in weight and never attempting to dramatize music that is essentially buoyant and not at all grandiose.

All in all, this was a memorable Symphony concert, and it was most enthusiastically applauded. Mr. Bernstein will repeat this program at Symphony Hall tonight and Sunday afternoon, and next Tuesday evening at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. On Dec. 2 and 3 he will conduct at Symphony Hall the world premiere of Olivier Messiaen's gigantic Symphony, "Turangalila."

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, gave the sixth concert of the 60th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Symphony in D (K. 385), "Haffner"; Mozart
Piano Concerto in B flat (K. 450)
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 Brahms

BY RUDOLPH ELIE

The conducting of Leonard Bernstein (back as of yesterday for a fortnight's engagement as guest conductor) is an exceedingly stimulating thing.

You don't have to go along with him on everything—though he is not easy to resist—nor do you have to lose yourself in him to experience the urgency of his musical perceptiveness. But there is about hi ma sense of pure creativeness, of musical incandescence if you will, combined with a full developed orchestral technique that sets him apart as the only American product of his years—or any years, when it comes to that—who has won a position among the established first-line conductors of the day.

Yesterday, again playing the role of soloist and conductor, he achieved his finest moment in a truly memorable performance of Mozart's B-flat major Piano Concerto, a little-known but exquisite work. It may be admitted that a more bravura performance might have been accomplished in the conventional conductor-soloist manner, but only at the sacrifice of the extreme clarity of design, the subtle interplay of phrase and the perfect blending of the opposed forces of piano and orchestra that set this beautiful performance apart. This was, I am certain, the spiritual kin of the performance Mozart himself achieved, though there can be little doubt Mozart would have been as astonished to hear Bernstein's piano as he would have been amazed to hear the unanimity, the ensemble, the [illegible] shading of the orchestra.

This is the way to hear these incomparable works, to me the only way, and if Mr. Bernstein will promise to do one or more on his every visit, we in Boston will be evermore his oyster. And we can only hope that Mr. Munch, when he feels he knows us well enough, will do the same for Mozart and Haydn (and us) with his violin.

It was interesting to note how deeply Mr. Munch has impressed his personality and his particular orchestral technique on the men of the orchestra in so short a time. In something less than six weeks the orchestra has already come to lean more and more on the conductor, rather than its instinct, in locating the stresses of the beat.

Mr. Bernstein, however, derives his style and even his inspiration from Koussevitzky, moulds his phrases with improvisational freedom, often thrusting the responsibility for metrical exactitude on the men. When this works, as it always did with Koussevitzky and with Bernstein conducting Koussevitzky's orchestra, it makes for a truly electric performance. When it doesn't—and yesterday both in the "Haffner" and the Brahms it always didn't—it makes for a certain lack of technical finesse. Notwithstanding this, there were moments of rare beauty in the Mozart, of true excitement in the Brahms.

And it certainly demonstrated for all the immense though anything but obvious role a conductor plays in the basic speech, the fundamental musical attitude and response of a great symphony orchestra, Koussevitzky, Munch, Bernstein—poles apart; Koussevitzky the improviser, the apotheosis of musical imagination and vigor; Munch the most elevated comingling of heart and mind; Bernstein the creator, essentially erring but never dull. And all served by 110 men willing to subjugate their own personal musical egos to the common cause of great music superbly set forth.

Next week Mr. Bernstein is to conduct the 10-movement symphony of Olivier Messaien subtitled "Turangalila," which seems to mean, in Hindu, "Love Song." This is to occupy the entire program and will doubtless occupy the entire audience with something to talk about until the ice goes out.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

DEC 1 1949

Charles Munch . . . leads Boston Symphony here Thursday

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, gave the seventh program of the 60th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was devoted entirely to the Turangalila Symphony of Olivier Messiaen. The assisting artists were Yvonne Loriod, pianist, and Ginette Martenot, ondist.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

How is one to write about this immense musical composition Olivier Messiaen has thrust upon us in his ten-movement, 70-minute symphony of love?

Are we to say, as the composer might well expect us to, that this is the most revolutionary and significant thing to appear since "The Rite of Spring?"

Are we to say that it points the way, in its formidable manipulation of rhythms in the contrapuntal sense that Bach manipulated melodies, to the music of the future?

Are we to say that it is a gigantic—and largely successful—attempt to marry the music of the east and the west?

Or are we to say that it is empty of real musical significance, that it is primarily the conceit of an idiosyncratic composer here striving, with apoplectic fury, to demonstrate himself a musical genius of almost abandoned creativeness?

At this moment I frankly do not know, but I suspect there is some measure of truth to all these queries, or I would if it weren't for one little thing——

Symphony Itself

But first of the symphony itself. The 37-year-old composer, inspired first by an absorption in the music of the east (and particularly in that of India, Java and Bali), in the second place by a profound interest in rhythm, in the third by the East Indian word "Turangalila" which seems to mean love song, and fourth by a seeming determination to attract notice as an eccentric, has here assembled a strange medley of instruments and put them to work more feverishly than any one else to this moment.

These instruments, besides the conventional symphony orchestra, include the piano, the ondes Martenot (a sort of Solovox with delusions of grandeur), the keyed glockenspiel, the celeste, the vibraphone and a vast gang of cymbals, maracas, gongs, chimes, bass drums, tambourines and temple blocks. For these instruments Messiaen has composed music evocating various aspects of love, which is a subject hard to go wrong on. He deals with ideal love, tender love, carnal love and delirious love, and with various levels of each, most of them accompanied by songs of the birds and all of them accompanied by anywhere from one to three rhythms simultaneously.

The prevailing sound of all this is distinctly eastern and often wonderfully exotic, wonderfully beautiful, wonderfully exciting. From the point of the technical listener its superimposed rhythms, its rhythms set canonically, in augmentation, in diminution and in reverse are astonishing, though few if any are the ears capable of holding the original rhythms in mind long enough to recognise them in variation. This fact, the human lack of memory for complex rhythms (as contrasted with the strong memory for melody) is one reason the basic vocabulary of the symphony is so baffling. That others will explore Messiaen's path in the future and produce better works than this is clear, and in this respect his symphony may be considered revolutionary.

Possible Emptiness

But the "little thing" referred to above, the clue to the possible fundamental emptiness of this work, is the appalling melodic tawdriness of the three big cyclical themes heard throughout. Here Messiaen tips his hand. For the first is a motto of six notes Gershwin would have thought better of; the second might make the grade as a tune for Dorothy Lamour in a sarong, and the third, the dance of joy, might be ascribed to Hindu Hillbillies, if there be such. Had Messiaen's melodic inspiration been on a sublimer level, I should have unhesitatingly pronounced this a masterwork of revolutionary significance. As it is I cannot believe it to be very much more than the novelty of novelties—an interesting, exciting, almost frightening tour de force.

I cannot muster the words to sufficiently praise Leonard Bernstein, the pianist Yvonne Loriod (whose feat at the piano was electrifying) and every member of the orchestra. We can't realize what they all went through preparing this fantastic piece, which was commissioned, incidentally, by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Although the audience thinned out a bit during the performance, a large audience was on hand at the end to applaud bravely when the composer appeared on the stage.

Olivier Messiaen Now in Boston

The French composer Olivier Messiaen is in Boston to hear the performance of his new Symphony "Turangalila" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight and a special performance of his Chamber Quartet, "For the End of Time" tomorrow night at the New England Conservatory of Music. The Conservatory concert begins at 8:30 P. M. and is free and open to the public.

TRENTON, N. J.
SUNDAY TIMES ADVERTISER

DEC 4 - 1949

Competition Is Scheduled For Toscanini

NEW YORK —AP— The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just been scheduled to make its first NBC network telecast the evening of December 10. The program will originate from New York's Carnegie Hall as part of the observance of United Nations Human Rights Day.

The time selected, 6 to 7:30, will put the orchestra in competition for the last hour of the telecast with the regular weekly NBC radio broadcast of Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony, which goes on at 6:30.

The concert will be preceded at 5:30 by a telecast of the awarding of a citation to David Sarnoff, president of RCA, for his contribution to the advancement of human rights.

The Boston Symphony, which has been broadcasting many years, now has a weekly radio series on NBC at 1 p. m. Mondays in the form of a rehearsal. The program is in its second season.

[49]

...ien Symphony in Première

Bernstein Leads 10-Movement 'Turangalila'

By Harold Rogers

"Today will be a big day in music," Serge Koussevitzky said while preparing to attend the concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

He was referring to the world première of a work he commissioned—Olivier Messiaen's ten-movement symphony, "Turangalila," introduced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Leonard Bernstein.

And Dr. Koussevitzky was right. It was a red-letter day, a new page in the history of modern music. But whether future musicologists will refer to "Turangalila" as the dividing line of our century remains to be seen.

Koussevitzky, however, is convinced that "Turangalila" is the first milestone to appear on the musical horizon since Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." Time may confirm what he perceives.

As in the case of Bach and Wagner, Messiaen's music may be the summation of an era, rather than the herald of a new school. It is certainly the synthesis of all known techniques, as Koussevitzky has pointed out. It may be more evolutionary than revolutionary.

The principal difference between "Le Sacre" and "Turangalila," according to Bernstein, is that Stravinsky had no system, whereas Messiaen has devised a system basically simple, aurally complicated.

But yesterday afternoon his symphony did not create the storm of protest that "Le Sacre" did when Pierre Monteux first conducted it in Paris in 1913. American audiences are not so volatile. If Bostonians suffer, they do so in silence. They simply withhold their applause or leave the hall.

More than a few left yesterday; there was considerable applause withheld; but the majority of the listeners remained to cheer. We have come a long way since 1913. Boston may be conservative, but for new music it is the least conservative city in America.

Messiaen speaks of his music thus: "It is a gleaming music that we seek, bringing to the ordinary senses of the listener pleasures voluptuously refined."

"Turangalila" (an East Indian word meaning love song) contains some of the most voluptuous music ever penned. Certain sweeping passages in the eighth and tenth movements recall Wagner's "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde."

And there is the tender melody in the sixth movement, progressing in consecutive sevenths on the strings and ornamented with bird calls played on the piano. Whatever serves his purpose, be it the popular song or jazz progressions, he employs unabashedly.

It would be interesting, if space allowed, to delve more deeply into Messiaen's system. When explained, it is extremely comprehensible on paper. Its main fault, however, lies in its incomprehensibility to the uninitiated listener.

But this symphony is not so cryptic that it cannot be appreciated by a seasoned concertgoer. Many of its movements have strong popular appeal. The composer makes brilliant use of percussion and the gamelan, an Oriental gong orchestra consisting of glockenspiel, vibraphone, piano, and celesta. His exotic rhythms are Hindu in origin, as are the modes he chooses for melody.

Yvonne Loriod, who came from Paris expressly to play the piano part, has an incisive technique that glitters. She made the bird calls fluid and clear. Her execution of the splattered cadenzas was almost unbelievable.

Messiaen's score also provides an integral role for the Onde Martenot, the electronic instrument played by Ginette Martenot, sister of its inventor. It added distinctive color to the tonal fabric and is more acceptable in ensemble than in solo.

Bernstein fulfilled this difficult assignment with distinction. "Le Sacre" would be child's play to what he accomplished yesterday.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

DEC 3 - 1949

Critics Dislike New Symphony

BOSTON, Dec. 2 (AP)—There was mixed reaction today to the Boston Symphony orchestra's world premiere of French Composer Olivier Messiaen's new work, "Turangalila."

Cyrus Durgin, Boston Globe music critic, called the 10-movement symphony "the longest and most pointless music within one memory. Some of the more extreme pages do have a suggestion of a tool and die works with a rush order."

The composer was applauded when he appeared on stage after the performance.

Durgin described the work as "gigantic and ear-blasting. As music it isn't much. For in the two or three million notes that Mr. Messiaen put to paper with sublime persistence, the only offense is to the ear. . . . It sounds like 125 different compositions."

Although Durgin said the work is "tricky and futile" he added that "some of the sounds are nice."

Leonard Bernstein, a Lawrence native, conducted the orchestra in the absence of Conductor Charles Munch, who is vacationing. The new Messiaen symphony, which takes well over an hour to play and therefore was the only work on the program, was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired recently as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, listened from the balcony.

Warren Storey Smith, Boston Post music critic, said "the symphony consumes about an hour and 10 minutes, and today, fortunately for the ears of all and the sanity of some, there was an intermission in the middle.

"This new work by a composer generally known as a religious mystic is remarkable for its rhythmic complexity, most of which cannot be taken in by the ear, for its alternations of frenzied excitement and idyllic—even obvious and slightly corny—passages and for its large array of percussion instruments. . . ."

4—The Berkshire Evening Eagle, Thursday, Nov. 17, 1949 ★★

Critic Says Tanglewood Fame Is Due to New Compositions

Tanglewood has won its high place in the world of music because of the new compositions introduced there, Jay C. Rosenfeld, musician and music critic of The Eagle, told 40 members and guests of the literary group of the Pittsfield College Club at a meeting last night at the home of Mrs. Philip C. Ahern, 52 Broad Street.

Although there has been something of a popular demand by Berkshire people for the playing of the more familiar compositions, Mr. Rosenfeld said that it is the new and untested works that attract music critics from far and wide to Tanglewood and thus spread the fame of this great musical center. Mr. Rosenfeld expressed grave doubt that much attention would be paid to Tanglewood outside the Berkshires were it not for this programming policy of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees.

Mr. Rosenfeld reviewed the musical history of Pittsfield and the Berkshires, noting especially the contributions made by Benjamin C. Blodgett who taught music at the Maplewood Institute and later became head of the Smith College music department; Miss Gertrude Watson and Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, founder of the South Mountain Music Colony.

Miss Katherine Isabel Black presided, and a question period and social hour followed Mr. Rosenfeld's talk.

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Bostonians prefer their Bach and Brahms to modern music, so many of them left yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert earlier than usual. Oliver Messiaen's devoted pianist who joined the orchestra for the first performance of the composer's new Turangalila symphony and the influence of Hindu music on the work were sidelights that seemed too much for many in the large audience.

* * *

But those who had attended Boris Goldovsky's symphony lecture at the Junior League in the morning stayed through the concert. His musically-illustrated discussion about the afternoon Symphony program explained the ten-movement Symphony so that they were able to understand it.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

DEC 4 - 1949

MAJOR & MINOR

Bostonians Can Show Local Musicians How a Well-Arranged Orchestra Sounds

By Glenn Dillard Gunn

IT IS with a sincere desire to help the resident orchestra that the members of the National Symphony association herewith are urged to attend the concert of the Boston Symphony, Thursday evening, in Constitution hall.

The local orchestra has settled into a slough of mediocrity. It is the duty of its directors to hear and observe the orchestras of Boston and of Philadelphia, if they can obtain seats to the latter's eight concerts here. If they can't hear the Boston Symphony this week, they should make reservations now for its second concert Jan. 12.

The Bostonians will come to us under their new conductor, Charles Munch. Washington heard him last season when he appeared with his own symphonies from Paris, L'Orchestre National de France.

This was an exciting and rewarding experience. It was modern orchestral art, such as Stokowski and Koussevitzky, and the late Frederick Stock have shown American music lovers.

On taking over the Boston Symphony when Serge Koussevitzsky resigned, Munch discharged none of the players. He holds the quaint European belief that a position in a symphonic group is a lifetime appointment.

He added a bassoonist to the ensemble and he has rearranged the placing of the players only in the viola, 'cello and double bass sections, leaving the violins where Koussevitzky had them, all grouped together on the conductor's left.

♫

THIS seating arrangement has great accoustic importance, as anyone listening to the Boston or the Philadelphia orchestras can observe. All modern conductors employ it, though when on tour the Philadelphians make some adjustments to suit different auditoriums. Presumably others do the same.

This is known as the first Stokowski seating. The date on which Koussevitzky adopted it is not known to this department. Stock put it into effect in 1931 according to Felix Borowski, his program annotator and to Rene Devries, critic of the Musical curier. I listened to the Chicago Symphony—and sometimes conducted it—from 1900 to 1937 and I even remember the names of the principal string players and their positions—Evans and Powers, leading violas and 'cellos respectively, grouped on the conductor's right; Weicher and Essers, leading first and second violins, grouped on the conductor's left.

♫

THIS is important only because it has been misrepresented in a local publication, perhaps through ignorance or in a desire to sustain Conductor Howard Mitchell of the National Symphony, who is one of the conspicuous "hold-outs" against the new order.

Toscanini, Bruno Walter, and Monteaux are the other conductors who cling to the unaccoustic seating plan of 1790. It still obtains in Germany and in all opera houses where a large orchestra plays in the pit.

Since Toscanini, at 85, conducts in a radio studio about the size of Coolidge auditorium, no comparison with his usage applies today. Admiration for Walter is often qualified. Monteux has the habit of strengthening his seconds with horns, a trick employed by many older conductors especially in the music of Brahms.

For the San Francisco Symphony's violins, divided like those of the National Symphony, are similarly weak.

♫

IF his directors really want to help Mitchell they will first add $75 a concert to the budget and give him the extended stage used in Constitution hall by the Philadelphians and the Bostonians.

Then, if he insists upon keeping the violins divided, he should be given another 20 players in that section, putting most of them in the ranks of the seconds. These changes should help, though of course, they won't cure the present maladjustment. They will be expensive.

Mitchell, of course, can't change his present unaccoustic seating of the National Symphony without losing face. So he won't change. Nor will his directors give him more money.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3,

MUSIC

"Turangalila," or Love in the East Indies, or a Messiaen Afternoon

By CYRUS DUBGIN

"Turangalila" is a girl's name, and a poetic Indian word for love song, and it is also the title of a gigantic and ear-blasting new Symphony by Olivier Messiaen. This piece in 10 movements—count 'em—takes well over an hour to play and it was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Yesterday it was given its world premiere by Leonard Bernstein and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As music it isn't much, but it has focussed attention upon the subject of love in the East Indies, and that is something even in Boston.

Among the titles of the individual movements are "Joy in the Blood of the Stars," "Gardens of the Sleep of Love" and "Development of Love." Upon reading these lines in the program book I was at once convinced they are inflammatory, and searched for a nickel to call up the censor. But when the music began, it was quickly evident how wrong one can be.

For in the two or three million notes that Mr. Messiaen put to paper with sublime persistence, the only offense is to the ears. This work, says Mr. Messiaen, "is written in a very special rhythmic language, and makes use of several new rhythmic principles — quantitative (note values), dynamic (intensity), cinematic (movement), phonetic (timbre), added values, non-reversible rhythms, assymetric augmentations—," etc., etc. Even that "Development of Love" is only a "—canon in non-reversible rhythms, and lyric offshoots of the love theme—" and "—develops the three cyclic themes with a passion constantly increasing."

No, nothing for the censor here. Evidently East Indian love consists only of walloping away at a large number of percussion instruments, while a full orchestra plus piano and the electronic ondes martenot industriously grind away at what sounds like 125 different compositions.

This, however, is not the most acrid music ever heard. Some of the sounds are nice, and the fifth and sixth movements actually have a couple of tunes. But it is the longest and most pointless music within memory, and some of the more extreme pages do have a suggestion of a tool and die works with a rush order. Mr. Messiaen's complicated adventures in rhythm may look wonderful on paper but they sound like—well, they sound like "Turangalila."

At intermission the lobbies buzzed with rebellious and treasonous objections, and by the time the second half began a good many of the Friday subscribers had departed. But enough were left to applaud the composer when he appeared on stage at the end. The real heroes were Mr. Bernstein and the gentlemen of the ochestra, for they must have put in many hours of exhausting effort with this tricky and futile work.

[50]

Sec 1

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Koussevitzky Hero of Brazil

Serge Koussevitzky, looking half his years in a smart grey suit with a brand new Brazilian decoration in his lapel, a fine blue tie and a rich coat of Rio de Janeiro tan, sat in the balcony at Symphony Hall, a thick and seemingly illegible musical score on his lap.

On the stage of the hall below were the men of the orchestra all but crowded off their chairs by pianos, celestes, xylophones, chimes, gongs, bells, and a host of other special instruments (including the Ondes Martenot of recent memory) called for by the composer of the music, a cherubic-faced man with one fragile wisp of hair floating over his bald head, who was, at the moment, on his hands and knees in the center aisle poring over his music in the dim light. It was a rehearsal of Olivier Messiaen's new symphony in 10 movements, Leonard Bernstein conducting, and the former conductor of the Boston Symphony was on hand to hear the work he'd commissioned some years ago.

Ocean Outside Window

But if the 75-year-old conductor was full of the strange music of Messiaen, he was quite as full of his adventures in Brazil, from whence he had just returned from a series of guest appearances with the Orquestra Sinfonica Brasileira. "Eet was formi-dable!" he exclaimed, "vonderful, vonderful, the greatest triumph of my life! I am the hero of Brazil, would you believe it?"

Knowing the overwhelming personality that is Serge Koussevitzky I would most certainly believe it. Indeed, a rough and ready translation of a bale of newspaper clippings that had filtered back from Rio de Janeiro before his return indicated that Koussevitzky had taken that very cosmopolitan metropolis by storm from the outset. As it happened, the city took Koussevitzky by storm, too. "They put me in the Copacabana hotel," he said, "such a hotel, the most beautiful place I have ever seen in my life. And right outside my window is the ocean; I am overwhelmed. It is too beautiful to believe."

But he said the orchestra wasn't too beautiful to believe. It hadn't had very much discipline, it played out of tune and it just didn't measure up to his standards, so he went to work, first announcing to the manager of the orchestra (an admiral of the Brazilian navy) that he wouldn't give a concert until he had the orchestra trained to his own satisfaction. That was all right with the admiral, but after seven rehearsals and still no word from Koussevitzky as to the date, the admiral inquired how much longer it would take. After five more rehearsals, said Koussevitzy, he'd let him know.

The first concert, an all-Beethoven program, was followed by a 20-minute ovation, and some of the most rapturous newspaper reviews a conductor ever got. "He conducts with his whole body," wrote one critic, "giving peremptory orders, speaking, praying, singing, flying, trembling, threatening, stopping his gesticulations completely, giving blows and kicks, cutting the air as with a sword, muttering, nervous, disconcerting, furious as an old colonel with his recruits but spurting forth music from all his pores, subjugating and electrifying the orchestra with a will and a musicality without equal." As for the orchestra, said the critic, it was no longer the old "collection of mistakes" of the past.

To Help Carvalho

In his six weeks Koussevitzky, given a huge car and a chauffeur to run around in, conducted a half dozen or so concerts, one of them devoted entirely to Brahms. "Not Brahms," warned Villa Lobos, Brazil's best-known composer, "they don't like Brahms down here. Why not play Scriabin?" Koussevitzky said no. "I'm an old Scriabin man myself," he added, "but I said we will play Brahms and we will see." The Cariocans all but tore the house down. "They just never really heard Brahms before," he said with a grin.

Although they offered Koussevitzky anything he wanted if he'd stay on and build the orchestra and, in fact, Brazil's whole musical education program, he had to refuse. "You have Carvalho here," he said, referring to the young Brazilian who is his protege, "he can do it and I will help all I can." So they gave him the highest decoration the nation offers as well as an honorary degree, and Koussevitzky embarked for home to prepare for his guest appearances in Israel, Italy, France, Belgium and England this winter.

They wouldn't even let him pay his own hotel bills. "If I'd known they were going to do that," he explained with a laugh, "I'd have been a little more modest in entertaining. What a bill I must have left them!"

TIMES-HERALD DEC 4 - 1949

Times-Herald Photo by Brian Brown

FRENCH-AMERICAN CUISINE: Music-hungry Washingtonians will be treated to an unusual symphonic specialty this week—something resembling Boston baked beans garnished with a fleur-de-lis. The creator of this chef d'oeuvre is Charles Munch, the former conductor of L'Orchestre National de France, who is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony. He will bring the Bostonians to Constitution hall Thursday night in a program liberally seasoned with both American and French works.

WASH. POST DEC

The Music Box

Munch Lists Piston Suite For Concert

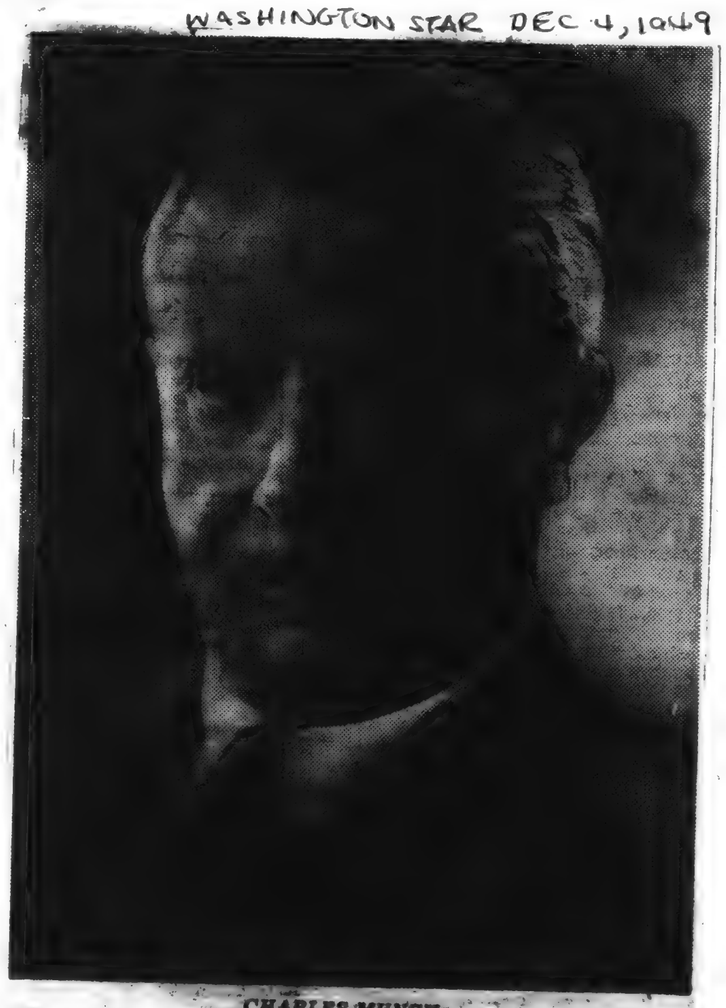
THE Boston Symphony's coming to town again!

Under their new conductor, Charles Munch, the more than proper Bostonians, will play the first of two concerts here Thursday night. Munch lists a new suite of Walter Piston, plus the Beethoven 7th, Daphnis and Chloe, and Rabaud's Procession Nocturne.

MISS BURGE

The National Symphony the night before lists new music by Britten. The week promises more outstanding music in Giovanni Bagarotti's violin recital today at Phillips Gallery, Louise Burge in songs by contemporary Negro composers tonight at the National Gallery, and the Friday Morning Music Club's evening program this Tuesday.

WASHINGTON STAR DEC 4, 1949



CHARLES MUNCH,
The new conductor of the Boston Symphony, which will give a program Thursday in Constitution Hall.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

THIS MAN CHARLES MUNCH

By RAYMOND MORIN

MANY BELIEVE that the critics can make or break a musician's career; in the case of a conductor the orchestra itself can deal the death blows. If there are grounds for this theory, Charles Munch, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, enjoys a position of enviable security.

We received two vivid impressions as we watched Munch conduct one of Richard Strauss' gargantuan orchestrations the other night in Symphony Hall. First, the comradeship between conductor and players was extraordinary. Second, the conductor had a completely clear picture of how he envisioned the music and how to communicate it.

For the past two and a half decades the Boston Symphony has been a conductor's orchestra. There was the same concentration upon its former leader that forever spotlights the elegant hands of Stokowski or the personal legends about Toscanini.

The Boston Symphony gave its conductor slave-like obedience, and one subconsciously felt that any mishap during a concert was bound to be dictatorially thrashed-out backstage. The music it made was predominantly the conductor's own interpretation.

MUNCH has a different approach. In effect it says, "let us make music together," rather than "you play as I say."

It cannot be denied that the Boston Symphony became the masterful organization that it is, during the past 25 years. But it was clearly time for a change. Perhaps it needed these years of intensive domination to attain full growth, and it now remains to be seen whether it maintains that growth in its new freedom.

In no sense of the word are we implying a comparison when we say that Munch is a "man's man." But he is the type of conductor who goes backstage to congratulate other conductors on their performances. When things go wrong at rehearsal, he is capable of enough personal humility to say to the men. "Help me!"

Nor can Munch be accused of the contemptible habit of capriciously firing men over alleged inefficiencies, or the crossing of personal paths. The thought of firing men is horrifying to him. He thinks as do most Europeans, that a symphony job should be a job for life.

He likes people and has the faculty of making them like him. He speaks with the same respect to the ushers at Symphony Hall as to the musical great with whom he deals. He used to call the usherettes at Carnegie Hall, "mes enfants."

Munch has proven to be a breath of fresh air at Symphony Hall, just as he was at Carnegie where he guest-conducted. The New York Philharmonic had been for years the instrument that catered to the personal egoes of a long parade of conductors.

Friendly Charles Munch, new conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, believes in comradeship between leader and players. He doesn't exhaust orchestra during rehearsals, relies on spontaneity and inspiration of the moment in presenting concert programs.

HIS THEORY in this respect is simple: "You see," he says, "in the relation of conductor and orchestra there are two sides. To reconcile the two is the problem. You can lift the level of the orchestra, but you cannot demand the impossible."

The men of the New York Philharmonic sensed this deeply, and showed it by giving a cocktail party for Munch in the Green Room at Carnegie Hall —unprecented for them. Other conductors are lucky if they get a "good morning." The guest returned the favor and the members gave him a cigarette case engraved with an expression of affection and esteem.

The Boston Symphony players probably have had to adapt themselves to a situation that to some is considered dangerous. Munch is not a slave driver. He doesn't believe in exhaustive rehearsals, but prefers to rely on his command over the men for his results.

The rehearsals may be as long, but he is largely content to go over the important and dangerous spots in a score, leaving the details to actual performance. Whereas the men were used to thorough preparation, they are now to a degree uncertain as to gradations of tempo and dynamics. And the fact is that Munch has been known to be carried away by the music and to deviate from tempos he established at rehearsals.

RAYMOND MORIN is music critic of the Worcester Telegram.

ON THE SURFACE this may seem a treacherous procedure, but actually it has its compensations. There are tw types of conductors. One works the men diligently, sometimes to a point of exhaustion. The result is that at the actual performance they may be too tired to do it, but they do know exactly what they are supposed to do.

The other type of conductor, of which Munch is an example, relies on spontaneity and inspiration of the moment. He may not achieve the same perfection of detail, but there will be an alertness and freshness in the results that creates a new form of excitement.

Proper Bostonians have become accustomed to perfection of detail; if and when they detect technical flaws, it remains to be seen what will their reaction.

One one thing you may be certain—many of them will welcome their release as foils for mediocre contemporary composers. There was much to command the ever-presence of new music on their programs, except that much of it was unworthy of their attention or time, and it is no secret that they resented it.

The other night we heard Munch conduct Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra. It is a work of many fine qualities. It has balance, and in the rapid movements a high degree of ingenuity. The composer was in the audience, and from where we were seated it was possible to observe his reactions. He appeared absorbed during the entire performance, and indicated no evidence of conflicting ideas between composer and conductor.

IT IS PROBABLE that the conductor studied this score with the composer, but although Munch is greatly interested in contemporary American music, he confesses to being puzzled by it. Since it is sometimes difficult to decide just where American music is headed, that isn't surprising.

At present he is studying modern scores to learn what he can do about them. The important question, of course, is whether he has or will have Koussevitzky's remarkable ability for analysis and evaluation of new music. Munch's forte is French music.

And now, something about Charles Munch, the man. He has been nicknamed "Le Beau Charles." If that implies that he is a "dandy" it is a misnomer. He has a fine, sensitive face, with blue-gray eyes and a well-shaped nose. When he conducts it doesn't matter that his large head of hair becomes unruly. The other night we heard one prim Bostonian lady say to another: "Doesn't

Continued On Next Page

New Conductor Of Boston Symphony Is Person Of Simple Tastes, Has Had Distinguished Career

23124 Y

[52]

THIS MAN

Continued from Preceding Page

it seem strange to see such a tall man on the podium?" Munch is six feet tall.

He is a simple man and lives a simple life. It is doubtful if he will succeed in remaining aloof of Boston society as he has in the past, because Boston is Boston.

If he does manage to live as he chooses, he will answer his own phone, write his own letters, buy his own tickets, and dress himself. There will be no massaging by a valet during intermissions. He will avoid having a press agent. He will write no manifestos, or turn lecturer between selections of his programs. One good reason may be that he speaks very little English.

THERE WAS QUITE a debate deciding just how his name was to be pronounced in Boston. The French "U" being a difficult sound to make, he agreed to not only change the spelling from Muench to Munch, but to a pronunciation as if spelled "Moonch."

You can even pronounce it as it looks and he won't mind, but if you say it with a sound similar to that of the German town, Muenichen, he will be annoyed. That, to an Alsatian, is distasteful.

Charles Munch comes to the Boston Symphony in the prime of his life, from Europe, with an illustrious career to commend him. He was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891, of a French mother and an Alsatian father.

His first teacher was his father, Ernest Munch, who was director of the Choeur Saint-Guillaume in Strasbourg. He has two brothers, who have likewise distinguished themselves musically. Charles Munch's chosen instrument was the violin, which he studied with his father and later with Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin.

In 1919, he was made professor of the Strasbourg Conservatory and conductor of the orchestra there. Going to Leipzig in 1926, he served as concert master in the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwaengler. In 1932, he went to Paris and after conducting concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra, he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, becoming its regular conductor.

In 1938, he succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. Munch first came to this country in December, 1946, when he made his first American appearance conducting the Boston Symphony as guest.

BESIDES conducting America's foremost orchestras during the past two seasons, he took the Orchestre National de la Radiodiffusion Francaise on an Autumn tour of the United States in 1948, conducting this outstanding French orchestra in many cities from coast to coast.

And so, the Boston Symphony has begun a new era under Charles Munch. What its trustees sought to avoid when they appointed him was a period of experimentation with guest conductors in an effort to find the one best suited to their needs.

Boston Symphony Orchestra assembles for rehearsal under baton of Conductor Munch.

The great Koussevitzky left enormous shoes to be filled, and although there was a genuine need for widening the spotlight to include the players as well as the conductor, it was equally important that virtuosity be maintained.

Some critics, notably in Boston, have described Munch's technique as excessively flamboyant. This may seem justified to the casual observer, but many orchestra musicians explain that the technique is an extremely illuminating one, and that it assists them greatly in performing complicated rhythms or melodies, especially those in modern works.

In any case, the players of the Boston Symphony have no doubt when Munch gives his downbeat . . . an advantage that they have not always enjoyed.

Section of famous painting, "Diane de Poitiers," one of the major attractions at Worcester Art Museum. It is attributed to the French painter Francois Clouet, 1505-72.

ART Of The Ages At The MUSEUM

By WALTER MERKEL

A painting in the Worcester Art Museum's permanent collection which has proved a major attraction is "Diane de Poitiers," attributed to Francois Clouet, 1505-1572.

This article is illustrated by a section of the painting, the bust of Diane, and a view showing her servant at a wardrobe chest in a rear room of the palace. Other parts of the canvas were too dark for good newsprint reproduction.

Under Henry II, king of France from 1547-59 the artistic activities of the court revolved around his mistress, Diane de Poitiers. Her name was associated with that of the pagan goddess of the hunt, celebrated in verse as well as in plastic arts. A model of Diane was used with dramatic effect in the motion picture classic "Beauty and the Beast."

ALTHOUGH Diane de Poitiers was 19 years older than the king she kept her figure amazingly youthful and was so proud of its lines that she was often pictured in the nude in her bath or at her dressing table.

In the canvas at the Worcester Art Museum she is shown in her boudoir, the alabaster hue of her skin glowing softly in the light beneath a diaphanous drape. Her head is adorned with a jeweled tiara and strings of costly pearls encircle her white throat.

Before her is a jewel case filled to overflowing with jewels and trinkets. Sprays of flowers add color to the scene, relieving the somber note of the background against which her body is superbly painted.

The servant, or lady-in-waiting as she may have been called in Henry's time, adds interest to the composition by drawing the vision past Diane into the background.

A JEWELLED mirror on Diane's dressing table which reflects part of her features, is supported by nude caryatids, representing priestesses from the Temple of Diana. Caryatids usually were draped female figures used to support an entablature in place of a column or pilaster.

This charming study is noted not only for its delightful color values but for the delicate manner in which the artist wrought every detail. We note this in the magnificent modeling of the hands, with their long, slim fingers; in the soft yet clear-cut features of the model; in the intricate weaving of the tiara; in the parted drape, as sheer as gossamer.

The canvas is in perfect condition, a tribute to men who knew how to paint for the centuries.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 8 - 1949

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

Bernstein Leads Brahms, Plays Mozart in Carnegie.

Leonard Bernstein and several television cameras lent interest if not charm to last night's visit of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Bernstein was there by pre-arrangement, the cameras as interlopers in preparation for a U. N. event on Saturday in which the orchestra will take part. Two were in boxes, and one, clothed in canvas and straddling a scaffold, usurped a corner of the stage. In consequence, all the musicians were crowded to the front, very likely distorting sonorities all along the line.

IRVING KOLODIN

The sound could not stand too much of this, for Bernstein—now moving from the "wunderkind" phrase of his career to larger responsibilities and sharper comparisons—had not too happy a time with a Mozart-Brahms program. It was a part of facing these responsibilities, no doubt, that impelled him to the choice, for he cannot forever rely on the special works of which he is an unquestioned master. Thus, one can applaud his taste in choosing the "Haffner" symphony and the B flat (K.450) concerto of the former, the second symphony of the latter, if not always for the musical results or even for electing to be his own piano soloist.

Such works, of course, are not mastered overnight — and Bernstein's career is virtually "overnight," as a conductor's development goes. But some of the inclinations thus conveyed were not of the healthiest, allow as one might for the maturing process. Did Bernstein mean for the "Haffner" to sound as tense and breathless as it did, so lacking in "sing" or resilience, or for a Brahms—in large part—so soft in outline, narrow in dynamics or sweetly sentimental in spirit? Or were these momentary inclinations, to be replaced by others at another time?

The absence of a score may accord with Bernstein's way of working, but some ritards in the Mozart, slurs in the Brahms and recurrent lack of rhythmic certainty made one wonder whether they had also been overlooked in the preparation. Some other details, not nearly so relevant, were hammered home with Bernstein's whole arsenal of gesture—mostly blank cartridges that hit no target but the audience's eye. Perhaps it is unfair to minimize the great amount of technical command he brings to his work—but it is only in such terms (the most promising we know) that the results are appraised.

In train, then, the matter of double duty in Mozart. Here is a problem in execution that may well engage a Schnabel on one hand, a Toscanini on the other. Can that problem be solved as well by one man named Bernstein? Not in my opinion. Bernstein plays a facile, well-schooled piano, but not a particularly finished one; and there is no music in which the lack of finish, the ability to articulate every point, is so conspicuous as in Mozart. Much of it was musically inspired—Bernstein as performer is a more certain Mozartian than Bernstein as conductor—but some of the intricate left-hand passages were muddied o'er (not by the pale cast of thought) and several places of inspired dialogue had the skill of a ventriloquist, but not the individuality, or resource, of two fine actors. Piano-conducting is a stunt better reserved for Ravel or Liszt.

At that—save for some stretches of Brahms—the evening did not lack vitality or interest. It lacked, primarily, the attributes that time alone can provide. The massive peroration of the symphony, in a burst of D major glory, saved face for all, scoring the winning run in the ninth, effacing some loose play before. The happy ending included much applause.

Envoy Bonnet Gives Supper After Concert

Champagne and "black tie" plus a little music thrown in by the Boston Symphony orchestra all went into making the perfect party score last night.

The baton portion of the picture was handled by the French-born conductor of the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch, who held down the spotlight from 8:30 til 10:30 p.m. in Constitution hall. Afterwards some of the boxholders as well as a number of diplomats and officials in the audience headed for the French embassy where the Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet hosted an after-the-concert supper.

Some 250 guests sampled French delicacies and clustered around the maestro and Mme. Munch with congratulations on the evening's program.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

DEC 9 - 1949

Town Topics

'Le Beau Charles' Takes A Bow at the Bonnets' After-Concert Festivity

ABOUT 300 members of diplomatic and official circles and personal friends of the French Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet were guests at a reception at the French Embassy last night following the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Constitution Hall.

Honor guest at the after-concert fete was Charles Munch, new conductor of the orchestra, who made his debute in Washington last spring as conductor of the French Orchestra Nationale. Mrs. Munch, who accompanied her distinguished husband to Washington, was also a guest at the embassy party.

Mr. Munch, who is tall, blue-eyed and silver-haired, is called "le beau Charles" by the ladies of Paris. Recently readers of Elle, French women's magazine, voted him second in choice to the question, "What man would you most like to have dinner with?" Only Winston Churchill outvoted him!

Born of an Alsatian father and French mother, Mr. Munch's sympathies have always been French. During the war he kept his musicians together in France, at first refused to play for a Nazi audience. When forced to do so, he turned his fees over to the resistance. For his services to French music he was made a chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

The musician is quickly becoming Americanized. He is studying English diligently, drives a new Oldsmobile through Boston traffic which he considers slightly worse than that of Paris.

He plans to give much American music an airing with the Boston Symphony. Asked his opinion of jazz, he said, "I like it."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 8 - 1949

CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Leonard Bernstein

BERNSTEIN GUEST ON PODIUM HERE

Conducts Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall and Plays Mozart Piano Concerto

Leonard Bernstein, serving as guest conductor of the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, put on a show that revealed some of his best and worst points. On the one hand he conducted with taste, refinement and an awareness of the music's proportions; on the other, he did violence to the spirit of a composition.

Mozart emerged whole and sane. The "Haffner" Symphony was done with felicity of style, and the B-flat major Concerto (K. 450), in which Mr. Bernstein was his own piano soloist, had a sensitive performance. But Brahms' Symphony was pulled out of shape and character to make a conductor's holiday.

To one who has watched Mr. Bernstein's public appearance over a period of years there seems to be a direct ratio between the balance and rightness of some of his performances and the amount of turning, twisting and gesturing he does on the stage. Certainly this was the case last night.

In the "Haffner" Symphony one thought that Mr. Bernstein had turned at last into a restrained, controlled conductor, who could project the emotional impact of the music exclusively through the sounds made by the orchestra. His gesturing was almost ascetic, and the orchestra's playing was transparent in texture and life-giving in the freshness of its phrasing.

In the piano concerto Mr. Bernstein naturally had more to do. It is, of course, no mean trick to keep busy both at the keyboard and to conduct an orchestra. And it may be that such vigilance about cues on the part of the conductor-soloist is not quite necessary; these Boston musicians may be experienced enough to be trusted to keep the right time by themselves at moments when the soloist is most preoccupied. Be that as it may, it was a delightful performance. One could differ about a tempo here or turn of phrase there, but this was the quality of Mozart.

When it came to Brahms, Mr. Bernstein drove the piece above and beyond the call of duty—or the best interests of the music. The Second Symphony is not a tussle with fate; its design is pastoral rather than heroic. But Mr. Bernstein, who by this time was conducting with dramatic gestures and contortions, insisted on making it a big-voiced utterance. Even the usually impeccable brasses of the Boston Symphony seemed to be struggling under the strain.

Finally, there were television cameras on the stage and in the boxes to distract the audience, if not conductor and orchestra. They were there for a rehearsal of a telecast of a special United Nations concert by the Boston Symphony under Mr. Bernstein on Saturday. Those cameras have a way of drawing attention to themselves. If telecasting of concerts becomes a regular thing, a new kind of audience may emerge. And perhaps new kinds of conductors.

H. T.

[53]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 8 - 1949

CONCERT AND RECITAL

By Jerome D. Bohm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
CARNEGIE HALL

Concert under the direction of Leonard Bernstein last night. The program:
Symphony in D major ("Haffner") (K. 385) ..... Mozart
Piano Concerto, B flat, (K. 450) ..... Mozart
Symphony No. 2, D major ..... Brahms

The Bostonians

Leonard Bernstein's concert with the oBston Symphony Orchestra last night had both pleasurable and disaffecting aspects. It seemed at first, during his discourse of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony that he had discarded many of his exaggerated gestures and had attained something approaching poise on the platform. And seated at the piano, with his back to the orchestra as he traversed the same master's B flat Concerto, his demeanor, too, was relatively restrained. But in the Brahms Symphony, all restraint was thrown to the winds and the Bernstein of old was again in action, choreographic agonizing once more replaced the temporary lull in his customary procedure.

The controlled approach was greatly beneficial to Mr. Bernstein's conception of both Mozart works. The "Haffner" Symphony, aside from a want of sufficient intensity in the opening movement, was set forth perceptively, the amiability of the Andante and the Menuetto and the joyous abandon the Finale being effectively conveyed.

Even more telling was his performance of the B flat Concerto, one of the composer's finest products in this form. It was technically adroit, tonally alluring and stylistically impeccable, being especially impressive in its poetic disclosure of the slow movement, with its expressive variations on one of Mozart's loveliest themes, one which he had utilized also for purposes of variation in one of his piano sonatas without changing the tonality, E flat.

It was unhappily a quite different conductor who stepped out to direct the Second Brahms Symphony. And the loss of muscular control was reflected in the interpretatio nof the music. In this Symphony Brahms is essentially a writer of winningly lyrical melodies, but melodies of an unpretentious, almost folkish kind. Mr. Bernstein, however, made of it something like another "Pathetique" Symphony, conducting it in an emotionally overwrought manner, with violent contrasts in pacing an ddynamics, which brought with it a disentegration of the work's architectonics as well as a distortion of its musical meaning. And the orchestra, which had played so persuasively in the Mozart works, reflected in the sounds it produced, the conductor's arbitrary conception, the brasses in the first movement being led by his frenzied gesticulations to overblow.

much of the time, as chief confidant of the hero, Rodolfo, his role is a rather episodic one. It would be good to hear him in a more sustained part at the Metropolitan since it was obvious from last night's performance that he could easily distinguish himself in one.

Lois Hunt, who made her debut on the opening night in a minor role in "Rosenkavalier," sang her first Musetta. This winner of the 1949 auditions of the Metropolitan seemed rather inexperienced for the role, and handled it, visually and vocally, a bit like a musical comedy impersonation. Her high tones were explosive and in general there was not much style.

The other members of the cast are well enough known in their roles to need no further comment at this time. Mr. Tagliavini sang with his usual volume and his authority in matters of Italian style, but forced his tones somewhat. Bidu Sayao as Mimi did her best during the latter part of the evening.

A. B.

Ilse Sass at Times Hall

In her Times Hall recital last night, Ilse Sass, pianist, played numbers by Schubert, Busoni and Smetana. Her program also featured Schumann's "Phantasie," Op. 17, and included a performance of Herman Berlinski's Sonata Brevis.

Miss Sass is a sensitive pianist; there is little spontaneity to her playing, but it is marked by taste and refinement. In addition, she brings with her a serviceable technique and a treble tone flashing color. Her main difficulty is a lack of arm and wrist weight. She allows her fingers to do all the work, with the result that there is no depth to the sound she produces, no power to make it ring.

Miss Sass's performance of her major work, Schumann's "Phantasie," wis one the whole quite uneven. The swashbuckling episodes were forced, the bravura muddy and affected. Only when the music itself reached points of repose, when its thematic growth and sentiment remained on an equable level, did her playing achieve real distinction. She was able on these occasions to spin a fine web of a phrase, symmetrically perfect, supple and strong. But there was not enough of this to sustain the movement of Schumann's passionate, discursive music.

Mr. Berlanski's Sonata Brevis is built along diatonic lines with unobstrusive chromatic elements woven, at static measures, into the chordal fabric. Expressively, it is a pure post-romantic number, rich in color, a shade loose structurally, and rather freakish in melodic profile.

J. S. H.

Munch Scores Triumph Here In Boston Symphony Concert

By Alice Eversman

The impression made by Charles Munch when he appeared here a year ago as conductor of the Orchestre National de France was confirmed last night when as the new director of the Boston Symphony he played his concert in Constitution Hall. A capacity audience greeted him with warmth at his entrance and practically raised the rafters when the closing number completed the evidence of his conducting style. Every expectation was given that an exciting future lies before this great man whose reputation is so well earned.

It might be said that Mr. Munch is at home with music, so sympathetic are his readings. His temperament, and his authority at the same time, is contagious, inspiring the musicians to superior effort and reaching over to the audience with equal force. This is wonderfully exhilarating and greatly rewarding in the broadest sense. It gave the full feeling of the glow and vitality of music and its tremendous aliveness. It produced gorgeous effects for which the confines of the hall seemed too small.

Mr. Munch is not a conductor who fabricates the music step by step or who invokes atmosphere by wizardry. Nor does he take greatly into account the play of one orchestral voice against another. He gathers the colors residing in his instrument together to use in broad brush-strokes on the musical canvas. It is the large design of the pattern that is important rather than the weaving of its individual threads into a completed whole.

One felt this tendency most in Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7" and in the opening portion of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." In the Symphony, the conductor sought to underline its overflowing exuberance and Beethoven's rugged manner of expressing it. The "Allegretto" held no deeper significance and delicacy was not called upon to give variety in the "Presto." Perhaps too much has been read into these movements by other conductors yet the chiaroscuro of the entire work is rested in them. The abandoned spirit in which the finale was played, and the swiftness of its tempo, resulted in a magnificent display of thrilling tone and expertise in the orchestra.

Again in "Lever du jour" of the Raval suite, the conductor's urge toward the more spectacular moments, sacrificed some of the gentleness and lovely mystery of the sunrise description. As the work unfolded, however, Mr. Munch infused it with a passionate intensity and elan of the most brilliant character. It was a virtuoso performance that climaxed the evening and released waves of enthusiastic applause.

The most deeply emotional playing of the program was that of Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," the opening number. In this beautiful and expressive score, richly tinted, the conductor brought out its substance with tender regard. It held undercurrents of personal feeling that was reflected in both nuances and tonal tinting.

Into the riot of color the program presented, Piston's "Second Suite for Orchestra" introduced a cool and intellectual note. It is a modern usage of old, classic dance forms culminating in a brilliant fugue. At a first hearing, the impression of excellent, polished workmanship was uppermost. The clarity of its structure, the occasional flashes of profound inspiration and the genuineness of its intent were brought out in Mr. Munch's detailed reading. An earnest and sincere artist, if a somewhat impatient one at times, the conductor showed his eclectic musicianship in his presentation of this work as much as in the rest of the program where greater scope was given to his interpretive powers.

The orchestra members feel the impact of their new leader's personality and respond in kind. If the tone is not so knowingly fashioned as formerly, it has gained in freedom and spontaneity. All told, it was an exciting concert and the next one, in January, will be awaited with eagerness.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
DEC 9 - 1949

Postlude

Orchestra's New Leader Impresses

By Paul Hume

Charles Munch returned to Constitution Hall last night as musical director of the Boston Symphony.

His appearance last season was as conductor of the French National Orchestra. Boston is fortunate in its choice of a successor to Serge Koussevitsky. Munch made his greatest triumph last night in one of the works most closely associated with his predecessor.

It was Maurice Ravel's second Daphnis and Chloe Suite. Last night one tremendous conception of it was offered in place of another to which we had become accustomed. The change was clearly marked. Never in years has the Boston orchestra played this music under so clear and constant a beat.

Munch leaves nothing to the players' imaginations. He shows them what he wants and gets it of seductiveness but gained a bit of seductvieness but gained a rhythmic quality approaching the frenetic. The motion of the suite was hastened. The orchestra sounded its best and poured out one of its most astounding climaxes.

Next best playing of the evening was in Walter Piston's new second suite for orchetra. Munch understands contemporary music perfectly. The suite is in three movements each of which finds a new way of using old forms. Each is successful in itself. The middle allegro is a brilliant touch. The closing passacaglia, based on an amazingly agile theme, works into a virile fugue.

Munch opened the concert with Henri Rabaud's Procession Nocturne. The quiet, haunting quality of this piece is better than its more sonorous moments. We were happy to hear it so tenderly played.

Beethoven's seventh symphony suffered in several ways last night. Immediately after its opening chords, conductor and orchestra misunderstood each other so seriously as to make the ensuing few measures painfully jumbled. After things straightened themselves out, the work proceeded in routine fashion.

Here Munch's over-insistence on rhythm at the expense of pure melodic lines and balanced sound gave the score a battered tone. This is the very factor it least needs. The orchestra will return in January. It will be interesting to see how much more they have adjusted themselves to their new, and quite different leader.

Boston Symphony Continues to Thrive Under Munch

The brightness and sparkle that Serge Koussevitzky brought to the Boston Symphony is still very much present under the new conductor, Charles Munch, who last night conducted his first Constitution Hall concert as the head of this great orchestra.

The Koussevitzky tradition is well preserved, but the French conductor has introduced some refinements of his own, pianissimos of almost unbelievable delicacy, sharp tonal contrasts and the incisive attacks that marked the playing of the French National Orchestra which Mr. Munch brought here last year.

Mr. Munch's approach to the Beethoven Seventh last night was such that one suspects he is still [illegible] virtuoso resources of the Boston Symphony that offer Mr. Munch a dynamic range such as no other ensemble can. The Beethoven was full of drive and [illegible] tempo that had the [illegible] It was unlike the [illegible] version earlier [illegible] Howard Mitchell. Mr. Munch's version was fully as valid [illegible] to some tastes, even more [illegible]

The opening work, Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," was quiet and mystical. Henri Rabaud wrote this symphonic poem in the late 1900's and it is well within the romantic tradition. Yet it had a beauty all its own that Mr. Munch realized to the fullest extent.

Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra and Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe completed the program. Incidentally, Mr. Munch demonstrated in the Piston that he is as much at home with modern American works as those of his own country.

MILTON BERLINER.

14 TIMES-HERALD
SEC. I Washington, D. C.
FRIDAY, DEC. 9, 1949

Munch Scores Again With The Boston Players

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

The first concert here by the Boston Symphony under its new conductor, Charles Munch, took place last night in Constitution hall, where it lifted a capacity audience to a high state of excitement.

It accomplished a remarkable exhibition of orchestral art. It also enlarged our acquaintance with one of the most interesting musical personalities of the present.

Munch, as we learned last season when he brought L'Orchestre National de France to this city, is a dynamic personality.

Jovian Gesture

It was, perhaps, significant of his arts of address that the climax of the program, which otherwise was given over to the sensuous lures and enticements of modern music, developed in the finale of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. This was at once a classic triumph and a Jovian gesture.

For the routined concertgoer this Beethoven page is not his greatest expression. Habitually one waits for the enchanting Allegretto, enduring the other sections of the work with patience, or respect, as the case may be.

There was no waiting for genius to speak last night. Munch made the broad and sweeping motiff of the introduction a summons to attention that none could ignore. He moved fleetly through the almost riotous dance-patterns of the first movement, made the pensive Allegretto a sad and stately progress, raised the Scherzo to the robust ejaculations of the horns in one rugged gesture, and let the finale rush like a torrent that, in imagined memory still seems to pour out its stream of urgent movement and melody. I never have heard it so superbly done.

Other Kinds of Beauty

There were, however, other kinds of beauty and of expression that demand discussion. Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne" began as a study in sound so soft as to be barely apprehendable, mounted smoothly to ampler sonorities with a melodic development that was a model of Gallic logic and a constantly varied study in orchestral tone. It was new to this public and immediately caught and held the listener's attention.

For the magic of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," the luminous clarity of Boston's wonder-working strings seems to serve best. Other great orchestras have greatly gifted wind and bass players, but the massed violins of the Bostonians achieve delicacy as well as power always with untarnished quality.

NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN-PILOT
DEC 19 1949

Year's Top 10 Men Picked by Newsmen

Los Angeles, Dec. 18.—(AP)—The 10 outstanding men of the year, as chosen by a survey of 1,500 newspapermen, were announced today in the 1949 edition of Year News Annual.

They are:

Dr. Albert Schweitzer, religion; Secretary of State Dean Acheson, statesmanship; Ralph J. Bunche, world peace; Dr. Charles Seymour, president of Yale University, education; Walter Reuther, president of the CIO-UAW, labor; Jackie Robinson, Brooklyn Dodgers second baseman, sports; [redacted]sky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music; Arthur Miller, author of "Death of a Salesman," drama; Stanley Kramer, producer of "Home of the Brave," movies; Milton Berle, radio and television.

[54]

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 9 - 1949

Society

Boston Symphony Concert Box Guests Are Listed

Boxholders of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will entertain guests at the second concert of the season at the Academy of Music this evening. Leonard Bernstein will be the guest conductor and piano soloist.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum will entertain Mr. and Mrs. Eugene S. Taliaferro, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. William M. Parke, Mrs. William H. Good, Miss Anna Alexandre and Anthony Moore. In Box 4 will be members of the Brooklyn Woman's Club including Mrs. John S. Stevens, president; Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. W. E. Howes, Mrs. Henry J. Nauer and Dr. and Mrs. H. S. Rasi.

Seated in Box 5 will be Miss Emma Jessie Ogg and her guest Miss Dorothy Mathews, Mrs. William B. Parker and her guests, Mrs. Augusta Uhlich and her guests and guests from the Brooklyn Home for Children who will attend at the invitation of Mrs. Edward M. Fuller.

Officers from the United States Army Station at Fort Hamilton will be present in Box 7, as guests of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Seated in Box 8 will be blind veterans and their escorts from the Red Cross, who came as guests of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The program will consist of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, K. 385, the Piano Concerto in Bflat, K. 450 by the same composer, and Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major.

The third concert of the orchestra's series in Brooklyn will take place on Friday evening, Jan. 13. The series is presented each season under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, acting in cooperation with the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
DEC 18 1949

D. S. Smith, Noted Composer, Dies

Retired From Yale Faculty In 1946

New Haven, Conn., Dec. 17. (AP)—David Stanley Smith, 72, noted music composer and orchestra conductor, died today in his home here after a long illness. He was a member of the Yale faculty for 43 years until his retirement in 1946.

Smith was Battell professor of the theory of music emeritus at the time of his death. He had served as dean of the Yale School of Music from 1919 to 1940.

He leaves his widow, Mrs. Cora Welch Smith, and a son, Christopher Stanley Smith of Cornwall. Funeral arrangements are incomplete.

Smith gained fame by setting to music George Darley's poem The Falling Star in 1909 for which he was named the winner of the Paderewski international prize competition.

He also was known for his orchestral works, particularly the Prince Hall Overture based on Prince Hall in Shakespeare's Henry IV. In addition, he was the author of four symphonies, numerous chamber music and the setting of other types of poetry to music.

Besides serving as conductor of the New Haven Symphony, he also conducted orchestras all over the Country including Boston, Chicago, Cleveland and Detroit symphonies and the New York Philharmonic.

His compositions have been played by these and other symphony orchestras throughout the Nation.

Smith was a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences and the National Institute of Arts and Letters.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
DEC 9 - 1949

Telecast to Mark First Anniversary Of UN Declaration

The United Nations will mark the first anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Saturday in a two-and-a-quarter hour program over WLW-C from 5:15-7:30 p. m. to be telecast from Carnegie Hall, New York, by the National Broadcasting Co. with outstanding world leaders and musical artists participating.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leo[redacted]rnstein, directing, will make its television bow on this occasion in a concert featuring the premiere performance of a new work by Aaron Copland, based on the preamble to the Charter of the United Nations.

Yehudi Menuhin will be violin soloist with the orchestra. Other distinguished soloists and the Collegiate Chorale will take part in the final movement of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The program will include addresses by Brig. Gen. Carlos P. Romulo, president of the United Nations General Assembly; Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, U. S. delegate to the UN, who played an important role in drafting the Human Rights declaration, and Trygve Lie, UN secretary-general.

Preceding the concert, the UN Department of Public Information will honor Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corporation of America, for his "notable co-operation in the development of public understanding of the work of the United Nations and for his contribution in the field of human rights through advocacy of Freedom to Listen and Freedom to Look as fundamental expressions of Freedom of Information."

The presentation of the award to Gen. Sarnoff, which will open the two-and-a-quarter-hour telecast, will be followed by a round-table discussion on "Freedom of Information." Discussion participants will be Gen. Romulo, Gen. Sarnoff and Dr. Gerrit Jan vanHeuven Goedhart, Netherlands' representative to the United Nations. Benjamin Cohen, UN assistant secretary-general in charge of public information, will be moderator.

DES MOINES, IOWA
REGISTER
DEC 19 1949

10 Leading Men Of Year Chosen

LOS ANGELES, CAL. (AP) — The 10 outstanding men of the year, as chosen by a survey of 1,500 newspapermen, were announced Sunday in the 1949 edition of Year News Annual.

They are Dr Albert Schweitzer, religion; Secretary of State Dean Acheson, statesmanship; Ralph J. Bunche, world peace; Dr. Charles Seymour, president of Yale university, education; Walter Reuther, president of the C.I.O. United Auto Workers, labor; Jackie Robinson, Brooklyn Dodgers second baseman, sports; Serge Koussevitsky, retiring conductor of the Boston, Mass., symphony orchestra, music; Arthur Miller, author of "Death of a Salesman," drama; Stanley Kramer, producer of "Home of the Brave," movies; Milton Berle, radio and television.

Munch Scores Triumph Here In Boston Symphony Concert

By Alice Eversman

The impression made by Charles Munch when he appeared here a year ago as conductor of the Orchestre National de France was confirmed last night when, as the new leader of the Boston Symphony, he directed its concert in Constitution Hall. A capacity audience greeted him with warmth at his entrance and practically stormed the rafters when the closing number completed the estimate of his conducting style. Every evidence was given that an exciting future lies before this great ensemble whose reputation is so widespread.

It might be said that Mr. Munch is ablaze with music, so filled with fire were his readings. His temperament, and his authority at the same time, is contagious, inspiring the musicians to superior effort and reaching out to the audience with equal force. This is wonderfully exhilirating and greatly rewarding in the broadest sense. It gave the full feeling of the glow and vitality of music and its tremendous aliveness. It produced gorgeous effects for which the confines of the hall seemed too small.

Mr. Munch is not a conductor who fabricates the music step by step or who invokes atmosphere by subtletry. Nor does he take greatly into account the play of one orchestral voice against another. He gathers the colors residing in his instrument together to use in broad brush-strokes on the musical canvas. It is the large design of the pattern that is important rather than the weaving of its individual threads into a completed whole.

One felt this tendency most in Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7" and in the opening portion of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." In the Symphony, the conductor sought to underline its overflowing exuberance and Beethoven's rugged manner of expressing it. The "Allegretto" held no deeper significance and delicacy was not called upon to give variety in the "Presto." Perhaps too much has been read into these movements by other conductors yet the chiaroscuro of the entire work is vested in them. The abandoned spirit in which the finale was played, and the swiftness of its tempo, resulted in a magnificent display of thrilling tone and expertise in the orchestra.

Again in "Lever du jour" of the Raval suite, the conductor's urge toward the more spectacular moments, sacrificed some of the gentleness and lovely mystery of the sunrise description. As the work unfolded, however, Mr. Munch infused it with a passionate intensity and elan of the most brilliant character. It was a virtuoso performance that climaxed the evening and released waves of enthusiastic applause.

The most deeply emotional playing of the program was that of Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," the opening number. In this beautiful and expressive score, richly tinted, the conductor brought out its substance with tender regard. It held undercurrents of personal feeling that was reflected in both nuances and tonal tinting.

Into the riot of color the program presented, Piston's "Second Suite for Orchestra" introduced a cool and intellectual note. It is a modern usage of old, classic dance forms culminating in a brilliant fugue. At a first hearing, the impression of excellent, polished workmanship was uppermost. The clarity of its structure, the occasional flashes of profound inspiration and the genuineness of its intent were brought out in Mr. Munch's detailed reading. An earnest and sincere artist, if a somewhat impatient one at times, the conductor showed his eclectic musicianship in his presentation of this work as much as in the rest of the program where greater scope was given to his interpretive powers.

The orchestra members feel the impact of their new leader's personality and respond in kind. If the tone is not so knowingly fashioned as formerly, it has gained in freedom and spontaneity. All told, it was an exciting concert and the next one, in January, will be awaited with eagerness.

Boston Symphony Continues to Thrive Under Munch

The brightness and sparkle that Serge Koussevitzky brought to the Boston Symphony is still very much present under the new conductor, Charles Munch, who last night conducted his first Constitution Hall concert as the head of this great orchestra.

The Koussevitzky tradition is well preserved, but the French conductor has introduced some refinements of his own. pianissimos of almost unbelievable delicacy, sharp tonal contrasts and the incisive attacks that marked the playing of the French National Orchestra which Mr. Munch brought here last year.

Mr. Munch's approach to the Beethoven Seventh last night was such that one suspects he is still reveling in the virtuoso resources of the Boston Symphony that offer Mr. Munch a dynamic range such as no other ensemble can. The Beethoven was full of drive and color taken at a tempo that had the players panting. It was unlike the National Symphony's version earlier this season under Howard Mitchell. But Mr. Mitchell's version was fully as valid, and to some tastes, even more desirable.

The opening work, Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," was quiet and melodic. Henri Rabaud wrote this symphonic poem in the late 1890's and it is well within the romantic tradition. Yet it had a beauty all its own that Mr. Munch realized to the fullest extent.

Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra and Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe completed the program. Incidentally, Mr. Munch demonstrated in the Piston that he is as much at home with modern American works as those of his own country.

MILTON BERLINER.

WASHINGTON, D. C. POST
DEC 9 - 1949

Postlude

Orchestra's New Leader Impresses

By Paul Hume

Charles Munch returned to Constitution Hall last night as musical director of the Boston Symphony.

His appearance last season was as conductor of the French National Orchestra. Boston is fortunate in his choice of a successor to Serge Koussevitsky. Munch made his greatest triumph last night in one of the works most closely associated with his predecessor.

It was Maurice Ravel's second Daphnis and Chloe Suite. Last night one tremendous conception of it was offered in place of another to which we had become accustomed. The change was clearly marked. Never in years has the Boston orchestra played this music under so clear and constant a beat.

Munch leaves nothing to the players' imaginations. He shows them what he wants and gets it of seductiveness but gained a bit of seductvieness but gained a rhythmic quality approaching the frenetic. The motion of the suite was hastened. The orchestra sounded its best and poured out one of its most astounding climaxes.

Next best playing of the evening was in Walter Piston's new second suite for orchetra. Munch understands contemporary music perfectly. The suite is in three movements each of which finds a new way of using old forms. Each is successful in itself. The middle allegro is a brilliant touch. The closing passacaglia, based on an amazingly agile theme, works into a virile fugue.

Munch opened the concert with Henri Rabaud's Procession Nocturne. The quiet, haunting quality of this piece is better than its more sonorous moments. We were happy to hear it so tenderly played.

Beethoven's seventh symphony suffered in several ways last night. Immediately after its opening chords, conductor and orchestra misunderstood each other so seriously as to make the ensuing few measures painfully jumbled. After things straightened themselves out, the work proceeded in routine fashion.

Here Munch's over-insistence on rhythm at the expense of pure melodic lines and balanced sound gave the score a battered tone. This is the very factor it least needs. The orchestra will return in January. It will be interesting to see how much more they have adjusted themselves to their new, and quite different leader.

14 TIMES-HERALD
Washington, D. C.
SEC. I FRIDAY, DEC. 9, 1949

Munch Scores Again With The Boston Players

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

The first concert here by the Boston Symphony under its new conductor, Charles Munch, took place last night in Constitution hall, where it lifted a capacity audience to a high state of excitement.

It accomplished a remarkable exhibition of orchestral art. It also enlarged our acquaintance with one of the most interesting musical personalities of the present.

Munch, as we learned last season when he brought L'Orchestre National de France to this city, is a dynamic personality.

Jovian Gesture

It was, perhaps, significant of his arts of address that the climax of the program, which otherwise was given over to the sensuous lures and enticements of modern music, developed in the finale of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. This was at once a classic triumph and a Jovian gesture.

For the routined concertgoer this Beethoven page is not his greatest expression. Habitually one waits for the enchanting Allegretto, enduring the other sections of the work with patience, or respect, as the case may be.

There was no waiting for genius to speak last night. Munch made the broad and sweeping motiff of the introduction a summons to attention that none could ignore. He moved fleetly through the almost riotous dance-patterns of the first movement, made the pensive Allegretto a sad and stately progress, raised the Scherzo to the robust ejaculations of the horns in one rugged gesture, and let the finale rush like a torrent that, in imagined memory still seems to pour out its stream of urgent movement and melody. I never have heard it so superbly done.

Other Kinds of Beauty

There were, however, other kinds of beauty and of expression that demand discussion. Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Noeturne" began as a study in sound so soft as to be barely apprehendable, mounted smoothly to ampler sonorities with a melodic development that was a model of Gallic logic and a constantly varied study in orchestral tone. It was new to this public and immediately caught and held the listener's attention.

For the magic of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," the luminous clarity of Boston's wonder-working strings seems to serve best. Other great orchestras have greatly gifted wind and bass players, but the massed violins of the Bostonians achieve delicacy as well as power always with untarnished quality.

NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN-PILOT
DEC 19 1949

Year's Top 10 Men Picked by Newsmen

Los Angeles, Dec. 18.—(AP)—The 10 outstanding men of the year, as chosen by a survey of 1,500 newspapermen, were announced today in the 1949 edition of Year News Annual.

They are:

Dr. Albert Schweitzer, religion; Secretary of State Dean Acheson, statesmanship; Ralph J. Bunche, world peace; Dr. Charles Seymour, president of Yale University, education; Walter Reuther, president of the CIO-UAW, labor; Jackie Robinson, Brooklyn Dodgers second baseman, sports; [illegible] Koussevitsky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music; Arthur Miller, author of "Death of a Salesman," drama; Stanley Kramer, producer of "Home of the Brave," movies; Milton Berle, radio and television.

[54]

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 9 - 1949

Society

Boston Symphony Concert Box Guests Are Listed

Boxholders of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will entertain guests at the second concert of the season at the Academy of Music this evening. Leonard Bernstein will be the guest conductor and piano soloist.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum will entertain Mr. and Mrs. Eugene S. Taliaferro, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. William M. Parke, Mrs. William H. Good, Miss Anna Alexandre and Anthony Moore. In Box 4 will be members of the Brooklyn Woman's Club including Mrs. John S. Stevens, president; Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. W. E. Howes, Mrs. Henry J. Nauer and Dr. and Mrs. H. S. Rasi.

Seated in Box 5 will be Miss Emma Jessie Ogg and her guest Miss Dorothy Mathews, Mrs. William B. Parker and her guests, Mrs. Augusta Uhlich and her guests and guests from the Brooklyn Home for Children who will attend at the invitation of Mrs. Edward M. Fuller.

Officers from the United States Army Station at Fort Hamilton will be present in Box 7, as guests of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Seated in Box 6 will be blind veterans and their escorts from the Red Cross, who came as guests of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The program will consist of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, K. 385, the Piano Concerto in Bflat, K. 450 by the same composer, and Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major.

The third concert of the orchestra's series in Brooklyn will take place on Friday evening, Jan. 13. The series is presented each season under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, acting in cooperation with the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
DEC 11 1949

D. S. Smith, Noted Composer, Dies

Retired From Yale Faculty In 1946

New Haven, Conn., Dec. 17. (AP)—David Stanley Smith, 72, noted music composer and orchestra conductor, died today in his home here after a long illness. He was a member of the Yale faculty for 43 years until his retirement in 1946.

Smith was Battell professor of the theory of music emeritus at the time of his death. He had served as dean of the Yale School of Music from 1919 to 1940.

He leaves his widow, Mrs. Cora Welch Smith, and a son, Christopher Stanley Smith of Cornwall. Funeral arrangements are incomplete.

Smith gained fame by setting to music George Darley's poem The Falling Star in 1902 for which he was named the winner of the Paderewski international prize competition.

He also was known for his orchestral works, particularly the Prince Hall Overture based on Prince Hall in Shakespeare's Henry IV. In addition, he was the author of four symphonies, numerous chamber music and the setting of other types of poetry to music.

Besides serving as conductor of the New Haven Symphony, he also conducted orchestras all over the Country including Boston, Chicago, Cleveland and Detroit symphonies and the New York Philharmonic.

His compositions have been played by these and other symphony orchestras throughout the Nation.

Smith was a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences and the National Institute of Arts and Letters.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
DEC 9 - 1949

Telecast to Mark First Anniversary Of UN Declaration

The United Nations will mark the first anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Saturday in a two-and-a-quarter hour program over WLW-C from 5:15-7:30 p. m. to be telecast from Carnegie Hall, New York, by the National Broadcasting Co. with outstanding world leaders and musical artists participating.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein, directing, will make its television bow on this occasion in a concert featuring the premiere performance of a new work by Aaron Copland, based on the preamble to the Charter of the United Nations.

Yehudi Menuhin will be violin soloist with the orchestra. Other distinguished soloists and the Collegiate Chorale will take part in the final movement of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The program will include addresses by Brig. Gen. Carlos P. Romulo, president of the United Nations General Assembly; Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, U. S. delegate to the UN, who played an important role in drafting the Human Rights declaration, and Trygve Lie, UN secretary-general.

Preceding the concert, the UN Department of Public Information will honor Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corporation of America, for his "notable co-operation in the development of public understanding of the work of the United Nations and for his contribution in the field of human rights through advocacy of Freedom to Listen and Freedom to Look as fundamental expressions of Freedom of Information."

The presentation of the award to Gen. Sarnoff, which will open the two-and-a-quarter-hour telecast, will be followed by a round-table discussion on "Freedom of Information." Discussion participants will be Gen. Romulo, Gen. Sarnoff and Dr. Gerrit Jan vanHeuven Goedhart, Netherlands' representative to the United Nations. Benjamin Cohen, UN assistant secretary-general in charge of public information, will be moderator.

DES MOINES, IOWA
REGISTER
DEC 19 1949

10 Leading Men Of Year Chosen

LOS ANGELES, CAL. (AP) — The 10 outstanding men of the year, as chosen by a survey of 1,500 newspapermen, were announced Sunday in the 1949 edition of Year News Annual.

They are Dr Albert Schweitzer, religion; Secretary of State Dean Acheson, statesmanship; Ralph J. Bunche, world peace; Dr. Charles Seymour, president of Yale university, education; Walter Reuther, president of the C.I.O. United Auto Workers, labor; Jackie Robinson, Brooklyn Dodgers second baseman, sports; Serge Koussevitsky, retiring conductor of the Boston, Mass., symphony orchestra, music; Arthur Miller, author of "Death of a Salesman," drama; Stanley Kramer, producer of "Home of the Brave," movies; Milton Berle, radio and television.

Exclusively Yours,

By Betty Beale

Socialites Gather at French Embassy Reception Honoring Charles Munch, French Conductor of the Boston Symphony

The presence of Charles Munch in Washington last night drew, from the rarely-occupied homes of local party-goers, top names, top fashion and top enthusiasm. The famous French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra no sooner scored his usual concert success than he changed into a comfortable business suit—the privilege of an artist at a black tie affair—and dashed up to the French Embassy to be the star attraction at a reception in his honor.

Knowledgeable guests in the field of music approached him from time to time in the salon while he sat in deserved relaxed comfort behind a table bearing ample samples of the buffet. The majority of guests, however, were to be found in the center drawing room or the dining room doing a bit of sampling themselves at this champagne gathering. The French Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet were simply found by each new arrival, which seemed better somehow than having a formal receiving line.

Mme. Bonnet was the epitome of chic in a pencil slim, strapless black moire model by Jacques Fath that had a vest effect of deep blue faille. At the concert she topped it with a matching cape of blue faille appliqued with black lace.

In the melange of familiar faces were Baroness Rene Boel, in a lovely mauve taffeta dinner dress, telling friends she is back from Belgium for several months and ensconced in a Georgetown house; Frances Rosso in a short black and gold evening frock making one of her first appearances since her return from Italy; Jerry Wardsworth having an animated discussion with his friend—no relation—Julius Wadsworth; and Secretary of Agriculture Charles Brannan rushing in with apologies for his business attire. He was fresh from the National Airport and speechmaking in Kansas City and Memphis.

Connie Snow and Governor of the Federal Reserve Board Jim Vardaman were comparing the style of the French National Symphony Orchestra, which Munch conducted here last year, to the Boston Symphony style. They decided that there was a lightness about the former, a more solid quality about the latter, but both were equaly good. Nearby stood M. and Mme. Pierre Paul Schweitzer who are back here, after 18 months absence, in his new capacity as financial counselor to the French Embassy. Lovely looking, poised Mme. Schweitzer is the niece of Charles Munch, her husband the nephew of the famous doctor, philosopher and humanitarian, Albert Schweitzer. The latter is still in his home in Alsace, she said.

There were British Minister and Lady Hoyer Millar, the Theodore Achilles of the State Department, Mme. van Kleffens, wife of the Dutch Ambassador; Swiss Minister and Mme. Bruggmann, the Jouett Shouses, Lady Lewis very elegant in black satin with one shoulder uncovered, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. James Pomeroy Hendrick, Marny Clifford, the William MacCrackens, little Mrs. Paul Bartlett sitting with the John Auchinclosses, and Mrs. A. Mitchell Palmer being served from the buffet by Jim Allen.

British Counselor Gerald Meade and his wife Beatrice were present, the former all smiles because he won't have to spend five days out of every seven in New York any more now that the Fourth General Assembly of the U. N. has ended. He was amused by Degna Paresce's account of the closing hours of the Italian Embassy bazaar. When the numbers were drawn to see who had won the raffled prizes, a great howl went up with the announcement that the fitted cosmetic travelling kit would go to none other than the monseigneur at the Apostolic Delegation. The handsome, long ecru table cloth went to Mrs. Raymond Cox, a decorative table cigarette lighter, to Jane Joyce.

Only quadraped at the party was the hostess' fashionable black French poodle which was sporting a snappy collar that came from some chic store in Paris for les chiens.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 10 1949

MUSIC

By Paul Affelder

Bernstein Conducts Boston Symphony In Mozart-Brahms Program at Academy

Leonard Bernstein was guest conductor and piano soloist when the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its second visit of the season to the Academy of Music last evening. The program, which was devoted to works of Mozart and Brahms, served to show how this talented young man has grown in artistic stature during the past few years. It also demonstrated how much he has yet to grow.

The concert began with Mozart's Symphony No. 35 in D Major—the "Haffner" Symphony—performed in a perfectly straightforward fashion. Everything that the reduced orchestra played was as clean as could be, and there was a refreshing simplicity about the entire presentation. Nevertheless, we missed a certain refinement and subtlety of phrasing—that elusive something that can transform a routine performance into a magically exciting and enduring one.

Some of this refinement and careful phrasing was present in the same composer's Piano Concerto in B flat Major (K. 450), in which Mr. Bernstein played the solo part and conducted from the piano. Here one found much more of the true Mozart spirit, especially in the passages for the piano. Though he was very busy with his two jobs, Mr. Bernstein coordinated the work splendidly, making it emerge as the most artistic offering of the evening.

But we must repeat an observation we made when Dimitri Mitropoulos did a similar stunt with the Philharmonic-Symphony on Thursday night. When a piano soloist conducts his own accompaniment, it is necessary to remove the lid of the instrument, with the result that the sound from it has no directing reflector to send it out into the hall. Consequently, the piano tone may emerge in any one of several ways. Thursday night it bounced off the walls, producing a disturbing echo; last evening, the tone lost its volume and color, going straight up to the ceiling of the stage. Mr. Bernstein must have sensed this, for he kept the orchestra down to a mezza-voce throughout the concerto, thereby robbing it of any tone color, as well.

Let it be said, however, that Mr. Bernstein is a first-rate pianist. We hope he will continue to perform concerti with orchestra; but when he does, it would be well if he had someone else on the podium.

The remainder of the concert was concerned with the Brahms Second Symphony, and it was here that he showed he is still in the process of developing artistically. Everything was correct, except for a slow start in the first movement and overdriven brass in the finale. What was lacking was a warmth of tone and a feeling for the romantic properties of the music. Individual phrases were neatly played and pigeonholed, but they weren't fused into an organic whole. In other words, the symphony had no plan or purpose. Mr. Bernstein imparted plenty of youthful exuberance and excitement to the last movement, however, and set the audience off on a long ovation.

What, No Popcorn?

Even So, Movie Czar's New Theater Is Tops in Luxury

By EVELYN PEYTON GORDON

SOMETIMES the president of the Motion Pictures Association of America, Inc., one Mr. Eric Johnston, is called the "movie czar." And now I'm sure the title has more meaning than I'd thought. Not even a czar—in the days when czars were czars—could view a film more luxuriously than Mr. Johnston and his handful of guests did the other night in the beautiful little theater which has recently been attached to the association's offices on I-st.

Not even the Borgias, whose machinations we viewed in "The Prince of Foxes," took their entertainment more comfortably than did the 50 or more people who were privileged to have a first look at the magnificent picture. When I speak of luxury and comfort I mean a small theater which seats only 70 people; 70 people who settled themselves at once; who do not climb in and out over your feet. I mean deep, soft, swinging seats, equipped with ash trays; plenty of leg room. I mean eye-pleasing gray walls touched with shadowy murals; misty blue curtains unveiling the big silver screen. I mean seeing a picture from start to finish with no interruptions; no selected short features!

Mr. and Mrs. Johnston entertained charmingly; friendly people of varied interests; a small buffet after the picture—a drink, to bring the audience back from 16th Century Italy, from the thrills of Andrea Orsini, the horrors of Cesare Borgia; the breath-taking beauty of the scenery and palace interiors—all but two of the interiors are authentic—which the Johnstons enjoyed last year while in Europe during the filming of the story. A sandwich and an ice over which friends chatted about the production. Oh, you'll see the picture. But maybe not in such perfect surroundings.

• • •

A CARD table in a big drawing room; a sumptuous supper;

Charles Munch — Eric Johnston

a handsome gray-haired man; a handsome woman in the chicest of black frocks. Hundreds of people swarmed around the card table. Hundreds of people sighed as they admired the gray-haired charmer. Hundreds of people wanted to ask the beautifully gowned woman to present them to the gray-haired man. But for the moment the gray-haired man was strictly tabu!

France's Charles Munch was munching his supper. A supper well deserved after the duress of conducting the National Symphony Orchestra thru an interesting and well-executed program. His hostess, Mme. Bonnet, wife of the French Ambassador, had left her hundreds of guests to "protect" M. Munch from the people who wanted to shake his hand. Great conductors don't want to shake hands until they've relaxed!

Ambassador Bonnet was doing the host's duties; parrying requests for his wife. His wife was elegant in Fath's magnificent black satin sheath. As soon as Maestro Munch finished his munching—and what a fine buffet there was—she joined the guests. Several hundred chosen from the Capital's best. Ambassadors were a dime a dozen; officialdom fairly swarmed; Washington "cave dwellers" abounded. Name them? Heavens! The Congressional Directory, the Diplomatic Blue Book, the Social Register will tell better than I can.

But they were all there. Tho Ambassador Bonnet wore his dinner jackt with grace, some of his guests arrived white-tied-and-tailed. The ladies were minked and ermined and sabled; brocaded, satined, and creped. One terrific gown drew eyes from every other—excepting perhaps that of the hostess; the whoops-hooped black velvet creation worn by dynamic red-haired Mme. Brusset, so recently returned from gay Paree. And that was a creation.

Tonight a couple of hundred members of society will wine and dine and later hie to the Sulgrave Club where Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Hill are giving their annual small dance. Dozens of dinners will precede the dance—Mrs. Davies Fitch, Dr. and Mrs. William A. Morgan, Mr. and Mrs. William Heron, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Saul among the dinner hosts.

The club will be decked with palms and ferns and masses of white flowers. Jerry Hill will be glamorous in—well it's not fair to tell ahead of time. But her gown is by Sch[illegible] it is luscious. [illegible] men will be the [illegible] tho they'll be [illegible] still prefer dancing [illegible] small dances. There'll be music—lots of waltzes included—by our own "Sidney"; there'll be champagne aflow and gaiety until the wee hours.

[55]

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 11 1949

Audience Hisses New Symphony

By H. G. ROGERS
(Associated Press Arts Reporter)

New York, Dec. 10—(AP)—Some extremely odd sounds from Carnegie Hall platform today matched the extremely rare sound of some hisses and snorts of laughter from the audience as the Boston Symphony gave the New York premiere of Messiaen's "Turangalila.".

Described as a "symphony for piano, ondes martennot and orchestra," the hour-and-a-half-long work seemed so unsymphonic to a few listeners that they walked out on it.

"I wouldn't give a nickel for the whole blamed thin," said an angry Carnegie Hall employe who had to stay through it.

"If only it was bad enough to start a riot," a member of the audience complained.

Most of the audience, however, clearly found it good enough for generous applause.

Guest Conductor Leonard Bernstein, Pianist Yvonne Loriod and Ondes Martenot, Soloist Ginette Martenot were called back for several bows.

Ondes martenot is an electronic musical instrument invented by Maurice Martenot, a French radio technician. Ginette Martenot, today's ondes martenot soloist, is a sister of the inventor).

To this listener, the symphony seemed like one of the most radical extensions of orchestral range, color and expressivity contrived by any modern composer.

It often was exciting and moving, rarely repetitious.

Despite the climaxes of the various movements, Messiaen still had his big bolt to shoot in the grand climax of the finale.

Composed in 1946-48 by the Frenchman Olivier Messiaen on a commission from the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation, the work calls for an outsize orchestra and some unfamiliar instruments.

It is divided into 10 sections.

According to the composer, quoted in the program notes, the title "is a poetic word of the Indian language, meaning a love song, with connotations of rhythm. It is also known as a girl's name."

LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL
DEC 11 1949

NewSymphony Raises Snorts From Audience

Messiaen's 'Turrangalita' Too Radical for Many

By W. G. ROGERS
Associated Press Staff Writer.

New York, Dec. 10.—Some extremely odd sounds from Carnegie Hall platform today matched the extremely rare sound of some hisses and snorts of laughter from the audience as the Boston Symphony gave the New York premiere of Messiaen's "Turangalila."

Described as a "Symphony for Piano, Ondes Martenot, and Orchestra," the 1½-hour work seemed so unsymphonic to a few listeners that they walked out on it.

"I wouldn't give a nickel for the whole blamed thing," said an angry Carnegie Hall employee who had to stay through it.

Wished It Were Worse

"If only it was bad enough to start a riot," a member of the audience complained.

Most of the audience, however, found it good enough for generous applause.

Guest conductor Leonard Bernstein, pianist Yvonne Loriod, and Ginette Martenot, ondes Martenot soloist, were called back for several bows.

(Ondes Martenot is an electronic musical instrument invented by Maurie Martenot, a French radio technician. Ginette Martenot, today's ondes Martenot soloist, is a sister of the inventor.)

Called Most Radical Yet

To me, the symphony seemed like one of the most radical extensions of orchestral range, color, and expressivity contrived by any modern composer.

It often was exciting and moving, rarely repetitious.

Despite the climaxes of the various movement, Messiaen still had his big bolt to shoot in the finale.

The work was composed in 1946-48 by the Frenchman Olivier Messiaen.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 11 1949

Concert Hails Declaration of Human Rights

First Anniversary Marked at Carnegie Hall. Romulo, Lie and Mrs. Roosevelt Speak

The first anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations General Assembly was observed last night in New York at a special concert at Carnegie Hall at which Brigadier General Carlos P. Romulo, President of the General Assembly, asserted that the declaration "is a tremendous and active force" in the world that has renewed and revitalized the hope of millions."

This document, he said, "is our pledge as members of the world community that we shall do all within our power to achieve a world where those with faith in understanding in co-operation and equality can have their faith justified."

The declaration, General Romulo said, provides for all of the traditional political and civil liberties and provides, in addition, for those social and economic rights without which political and civil liberties mean little.

It states that every one has the right to education, to work, to rest and leisure, to medical care. These are not only recognized rights, but they are now not only recognized but declared to be fundamental.

Dual Nature of Document

The declaration has a dual nature, he asserted: "First, it represents our common agreement as to rights every one, everywhere must have. Second, it is a standard and a measure by which we can judge ourselves as nations . . . it is an ideal which gives us a practical method of finding out where we stand and knowing where we should go from here."

Other speakers at the anniversary celebration were Trygve Lie, Secretary-general of the United Nations, and Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States delegate and chairman of the U. N. Commission on Human Rights.

The concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Leonard Bernstein. Also featured on the program was Ginette Menuhin, violinist, and the Collegiate Chorale, which participated in the chorale finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The program opened at 6 p. m. with the first performance of a work by Aaron Copland, American composer, written for orchestra and chorus and based on the preamble to the United Nations Charter.

Olivier Is Narrator

Laurence Olivier, British actor, flew from London for the occasion to be narrator of the work. It included "Preamble," Sir Laurence reading the Declaration of Human Rights to the audience. The chorus was composed largely of members of delegations of the United Nations.

The program was the world premiere of "Ode and March" by the Soviet composer, Dimitri Shostakovich.

Mr. Lie, Secretary-General of the United Nations, in brief addresses, urged all nations in the world to work for the fulfillment of the principles in the Declaration of Human Rights.

The Secretary-General said that the main program of the United Nations in the declaration as practical and alive as the "eternal desire of the peoples of the world for peace and freedom."

Mrs. Roosevelt's Views

Mrs. Roosevelt said that the acceptance of the document is "one of the things most important to democracy everywhere. Democracy must prove that it has due consideration for the rights and freedoms of the individual.

"The people," she said, "must accept and respect these rights and freedoms in their own communities and in their own lives, and thereby create countries and, in time, a world where such freedoms are a reality."

Prior to the concert, at a forum on "Freedom of Information," Mr. Lie presented Brigadier General David Sarnoff, chairman of the Board of the Radio Corporation of America, with a citation for his "notable co-operation" in informing the public of the work of the United Nations.

The forum and the concert were broadcast from Carnegie Hall by the National Broadcasting Company, which will rebroadcast it on a coast-to-coast radio network at 2 p. m. today. Participating in the

BERNSTEIN LEADS MESSIAEN'S WORK

Conducts Boston Symphony in 'Turangalila'—Yvonne Loriod Is Piano Soloist

By OLIN DOWNES

Hollywood could have devised no more characteristic spectacle than Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Leonard Bernstein, gave the first performance in this city of Messiaen's Turangalila" symphony, which takes an hour and a half in performance and is in ten movements. And no symphony that we can imagine would do better justice to a Hollywood spectacle and Hollywood aparatuses than this one.

It has every conceivable instrumental gadget in it and it utilizes, as a set of gadgets, about all the discoverable devices of rythm and counterpoint that have been placed at the composer's disposal by modern technicians of the art. Now the word "Turangalila" mean in the Indian language a love song, and love appears to be Mr. Messiaen's theme. It is heard in "nonreversible rhythms, asymmetric augmentations with several rhythmic identities (persons), rhythmic modes, and the combination of quantiative and sounding elements in reinforcing the values and timbres of each percussion instrument by chords which form the resonances of these timbres." And more of that quantative and if you like, qualitative, characterization of his work by the composer in the program book.

The orchestra is the biggest, oddest and, on occasion, noisiest ever. It is noisiest, on the whole, in the fifth movement which yesterday came just before the intermission of the concert. It is a hoopla movement, one gathers, of unbridled passion, and the piano solo, brilliant and vehement, participates in the dynamic exacerbatio of this terrible love." Miss Yvonne Loriod played that piano with vehement exacerbation and abounding virtuoso, for which she deserved a hand. She was indeed the equal of the orchestra, also consumed and volcanic in the throes of passion.

Final Hollywood Touch

The movement is indeed athletic. Nor did Mr. Bernstein lose the opportunity for effective gestures and eloquent calisthenics. The television man, plainly manipulating his lens and ducking about in his cupboard overlooking the stage, provided the final Hollywood touch of a piece palpably approrpiate to precisely that order of entertainment.

This, one would say, is the best movement and the most fun of the ten-movement symphonic circus. It is cunningly contrived to entertain and excite after much pretentious obscurity. The next best movement from the box office point of view would presumably be "Garden of the Sleep of Love." This is somnolent, as the title would imply, with a crooning ditty sweetly harmonized and many times repeated, in the strings, while the piano chirps and clucks in ornamentation of the slumber song. No doubt insects and feathered friends in the lover's retreat. O corn, where is thy sting?

But after this Mr. Messiaen was apparently not in the best position, creatively speaking. He had made about as much noise, exuded about as much syrup, and devised as many non-reversible rhythms and asymmetric augmentations as he was able to think of. So the last part of his symphony was anticlimax.

By the time the end was reached the audience was no longer in the amused frame of mind that it had been when it began to giggle at the queer and funny sounds of the first movement. For there is really very little growth in this music, aside from gadgetary manipulations, which are not the same thing.

At the end of the concert the soloists, orchestra, conductor, and composer assembled on the stage, and Mr. Messiaen kissed Mr. Bernstein on the cheek, as they do in France when bestowing the medal of the Legion of Honor. And let it be said in all seriousness that Mr. Bernstein did a perfectly amazing job with an extremely difficult score, deserving any and all recognition that could be given him for his accomplishment.

He held the orchestra together as coolly and masterfully as if he had the whole of a most difficult and inconvenient score by heart. And if he did not have it by heart, apparently he didn't miss a trick. Or a gesture, either, at the right moment for the camera. Well, what of it? Hasn't a conductor a right to get something beside mere credit from such a piece? It was an amazing performance of a piece of most pretentious nonsense, and publicity is what it's for.

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

By Arthur Berger

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

"Turangalila," symphony in ten movements, for piano, Ondes Martenot and orchestra by Olivier Messiaen, in its New York premiere, conducted by Leonard Bernstein Saturday afternoon. Soloists: Yvonne Loriod, piano; Ginette Martenot, Ondes Martenot. Subtitles: 1. Introduction; 2, Love-song I; 3, Turangalila I; 4, Love-song II; 5, Joy in the Blood of the Stars ("Joie du Sang des Etoiles"); 6, Garden of the Sleep of Love; 7, Turangalila II; 8, Development of Love (Developpement de l'Amour); 9, Turangalila III; 10, Finale.

'Turangalila'

Olivier Messiaen's seventy-five-minute-long symphony "Turangalila," heard here Saturday afternoon for the first time, is based on high-sounding rhythmic theories over which erotic sentiments drip. The Hindu rubric of this ten-movement work means "love-song," and it is doubtless because this contemporary Frenchman is at bottom so much a romantic that he needs the intellectual peg to fasten together the impetuous inspirations evoked in him by such a theme. Irving Babbitt has remarked that Mozart obeys rules spontaneously. But since Wagner, with his leit-motiv, the composer has been fairly familiar who must lean on overt schematizations precisely because his feelings are so prone to spill over the normal limitations of form.

In Messiaen's Symphony, as heard Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with Leonard Bernstein brilliantly conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, intellectual claims seemed naive indeed. For much of it was like Hollywood atmosphere music or the grand finales of movie-house organs that impress by engulfing us in huge, sonorous cascades. The textures created by density and wide pitch range, vibrating in the interior with glissandos, tremolos and Ondes Martenot, resulted in blending and obscuring the erudite rhythmic devices of "zigzag," "scissors," "non-reversibles," "personages" (terms coined by Messiaen), so that the effect was often arhythmic. Figures that emerged from the melee here and there, at times mercilessly repeated, had the common profile of our familiar popular song that kept curious company with bird-songs, and Hindue and mystic content.

The jazzy bits seemed to be Messiaen's way of painting earthly and carnal love. But even elsewhere he never kept away for very long from the surgary, sliding harmonies of popular music, and these fused surprisingly with his ultra-chromatic texture and his Straussian climaxes. The suggestion of "Honky-tonk Train" in a bed of gamelon-like sounds in the introduction was one of the happier evocations of jazz—though I am sure Messiaen never heard Albert Ammons play boogie-woogie. A charming, jazzy inspiration opened the scherzo, and throughout the symphony there were many bright touches that might have been salvaged for a shorter work.

Thus, Messiaen cannot be thrust aside, despite his bad taste and grandiloquence. A highly creative mechanism is somewhere at work. I was impressed at the beginning by the new sound-world opened up, but then the scenery did not change enough and was often cluttered up. The Oriental methods of pure color and rhythm, magnified on the screen of an enlarged orchestra, were intriguing, but after a while I became nostalgic for a work never given here, Igor Markevitch's "Flight of Icarus."

Symphonies the length of a concert have been made before, notably by Bruckner and Mahler. But the performance of a new one made Saturday's concert something of an occasion, and the U. N. flags and equipment set up for the television broadcast by the orchestra following the concert contributed their share to the audience's expectant mood. So did the battery of percussion and keyboard instruments. After the first movement the odd sounds and their naive substructure provoked laughter. Indeed, if Messiaen had not taken himself quite so seriously, there would have been quite a bit of fun in this work. But as the afternoon wore on, the reception changed to a respectful and polite one, accompanied by no little boredom.

BANGOR, MAINE
COMMERCIAL
DEC 12 1949

Odd Sounds Come From Carnegie Hall

Ondes Martenot Draws Hisses, Cheers

By W. G. Rogers

NEW YORK, Dec. 12 (AP)—Some extremely odd sounds from the Carnegie Hall platform Saturday matched the extremely rare sound of some hisses and snorts of laughter from the audience as the Boston Symphony gave the New York premiere of Messiaen's "Turangallia."

Described as a "Symphony for Piano, Ondes Martenot and Orchestra," the hour-and-a-half-long work seemed so unsymphonic to a few listeners that they walked out on it.

"I wouldn't give a nickel for the whole blamed thing," said an angry Carnegie Hall employee who had to stay through it.

"If only it was bad enough to start a riot," a member of the audience complained.

* * *

MOST OF THE AUDIENCE, however, clearly found it good enough for generous applause.

Guest conductor Leonard Bernstein, pianist Yvonne Loriod and Ondes Martenot soloist Ginette Martenot were called back for several bows.

(Ondes Martenot is an electronic musical instrument invented by Maurice Martenot, a French radio technician. Ginette Martenot, today's Ondes Martenot soloist, is a sister of the inventor.)

To this listener, the symphony seemed like one of the most radical extensions of orchestral range, color and expressivity contrived by any modern composer.

It often was exciting and moving, rarely repetitious.

Despite the climaxes of the various movements, Messiaen still had his big bolt to shoot in the grand climax of the finale.

COMPOSED IN 1946-48 by the Frenchman Olivier Messiaen on a commission from the Serge Kous Sevitzky Music foundation, the work calls for an outsize orchestra and some unfamiliar instruments.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 11 1949

U. N. CODE OF RIGHTS HAILED ON 1ST YEAR

Mrs. Roosevelt, Romulo, Lie, Olivier, Boston Symphony Join in Program Here

The first anniversary of the adoption of a Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations General Assembly was observed here yesterday with words and music glorifying the brotherhood of man.

United Nations delegates and their guests attended the ceremonies at Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a special performance, with distinguished soloists, and where key United Nations officials described the declaration as one of the great achievements of the world organization.

It was adopted by the General Assembly in Paris on Dec. 10, 1948. President Truman proclaimed the day as United Nations Human Rights Day and asked that it be observed in succeeding years.

The speakers at the celebration were Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, chairman of the Human Rights Commission; Brig. Gen. Carlos P. Romulo, president of the General Assembly; and Trygve Lie, secretary-general of the United Nations.

Olivier Reads Preamble

As the program opened, 3,000 persons stood in silence, as they would for a national anthem, as Sir Laurence Olivier read the preamble to the declaration, which begins with these words:

"Recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world."

The British actor then served as narrator in the première of Aaron Copland's "Preamble," a work for orchestra and speaker based on the opening words of the United Nations Charter. The orchestra was directed by Leonard Bernstein.

Music of many nations was played, including Shostakovich's United Nations March, Paganini Concerto No. 1 in D, with Yehudi Menuhin as violinist; Ravel's Concerto in G Major, with Mr. Bernstein at the piano, and Beethoven's Ode to Joy from the Ninth Symphony, with the Collegiate Chorale and Irma Gonzales, Nan Merriman, Raul Jobin and Nicola Moscona.

Mrs. Roosevelt, who was instrumental in the adoption of the declaration, reported that it already had had an effect on the thinking of men and women in various countries.

"Forty-eight nations voted to accept the Universal Declaration and to try to acquaint their people with its contents and to live up to the standards contained therein as nearly as possible," she said. "That means that all over the world people are now becoming acquainted with that document."

She described acceptance of the declaration as "one of the things most important to democracy everywhere."

"Democracy must prove that it has due consideration for the rights and freedoms of the individual," she said. "A Charter of Human Rights can only be written in a land where democracy reigns because governments cannot impose such a charter. The people must accept and respect these rights and freedoms in their own communities and in their own lives and thereby create countries and in time a world where such freedoms are a reality."

Called an "Active Force"

General Romulo described the declaration as "a tremendous and active force" that had renewed and revitalized the hope of billions, and had assured them that the United Nations did mean something to them.

"It is our pledge as members of the world community that we shall do all within our power to achieve a world where those with faith in understanding, in cooperation and equality can have their faith justified," he said.

Mr. Lie described the occasion as hopeful, but added that action to implement the words of the declaration lay ahead.

"The declaration is as alive as the eternal desire of the peoples of the world for peace and freedom," he said. "May it also be as valid in the years to come."

The concert was preceded by a forum discussion of "Freedom of Information," in which General Romulo, Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff of the Radio Corporation of America and Dr. C. J. van Heuven Goedhart took part. The moderator was Benjamin Cohen, assistant secretary-general of the United Nations.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 11 1949

Concert Hails Declaration of Human Rights

First Anniversary Marked at CarnegieHall,Romulo,Lie and Mrs. Roosevelt Speak

The first anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nation's General Assembly was observed last night in New York with a special concert at Carnegie Hall at which Brigadier General Carlos P. Romulo, President of the General Assembly, asserted that the declaration "is a tremendous and active force" in the world and has "renewed and revitalized the hope of billions."

The document, he aid, "is our pledge, as members of the world community, that we shall do all within our powers to achieve a world where those with faith in understanding, in co-operation and equality can have their faith justified."

The declaration, General Romulo said, provides for all of the traditional political and civil liberties and provides, in addition, "for those social and economic rights without which political and civil liberties mean little.

"It says that every one has the right to education, to work, to rest and leisure, to medical care. These are newly recognized rights, but they are now not only recognized rights but declared to be fundamental."

Dual Nature of Document

The declaration has a dual nature, he asserted: "First, it represents our common agreement as to what rights every one, everywhere, must have. Second, it is a standard, a measure by which we can judge ourselves as nations . . . it is an ideal which gives us a practical method of finding where we stand and knowing where we should go from here."

Other speakers at the anniversary celebration were Trygve Lie, secretary-general of the United Nations, and Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States delegate and chairman of the U. N. Commission on Human Rights.

The concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Leonard Bernstein. Also featured on the program was Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, and the Collegiate Chorale, which participated in the chorale finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The concert opened at 6 p. m. with the first performance of a work by Aaron Copland, American composer, written for orchestra and narrator and based on the preamble of the United Nations Charter.

Olivier Is Narrator

Sir Laurence Olivier, British actor, who flew from London for the occasion, was narrator of the work, which is entitled "Preamble." Sir Laurence also read the Declaration of Human Rights to the audience, which was composed largely of members of delegations of the member states.

Also on the program was the "United Nations March," by the Russian composer, Dimitri Shostakovitch.

Mrs. Roosevelt and Secretary-General Lie, in their addresses, urged that all nations in the world work toward the fulfillment of the hopes voiced in the Declaration of Human Rights.

The Secretary-General said that although the "main program of action lies ahead," the declaration was as public and alive as the eternal desire of the peoples of the world for peace and freedom."

Mrs. Roosevelt's Views

Mrs. Roosevelt said that the acceptance of the document is "one of the things most important to democracy everywhere. Democracy must prove that it has due consideration for the rights and freedoms of the individual.

"The people," she said, "must accept and respect these rights and freedoms in their own communities and in their own lives, and thereby create countries and, in time, a world where such freedoms are a reality."

Prior to the concert, at a forum on "Freedom of Information," Mr. Lie presented Brigadier General David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corporation of America, with a citation for his "notable co-operation" in informing the public of the work of the United Nations.

The forum and the concert were telecast from Carnegie Hall by the National Broadcasting Company which will rebroadcast it on a coast-to-coast radio network at 2 p. m. today. Participating in the

BERNSTEIN LEADS MESSIAEN'S WORK

Conducts Boston Symphony in 'Turangalila'—Yvonne Loriod Is Piano Soloist

By OLIN DOWNES

Hollywood could have devised no more characteristic spectacle than Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Leonard Bernstein, gave the first performance in this city of Messiaen's Turangalila" symphony, which takes an hour and a half in performance and is in ten movements. And no symphony that we can imagine would do better justice to a Hollywood spectacle and Hollywood aparatuses than this one.

It has every conceivable instrumental gadget in it and it utilizes, as a set of gadgets, about all the discoverable devices of rythm and counterpoint that have been placed at the composer's disposal by modern technicians of the art. Now the word "Turangalila" mean in the Indian language a love song, and love appears to be Mr. Messiaen's theme. It is heard in "nonreversible rhythms, asymmetric augmentations with several rhythmic identities (personæ), rhythmic modes, and the combination of quantiative and sounding elements in reinforcing the values and timbres of each percussion instrument by chords which form the resonances of these timbres." And more of that quantative and if you like, qualitative, characterization of his work by the composer in the program book.

The orchestra is the biggest, oddest and, on occasion, noisiest ever. It is noisiest, on the whole, in the fifth movement which yesterday came just before the intermission of the concert. It is a hoopla movement, one gathers, of unbridled passion, and the piano solo, brilliant and vehement, participates in the dynamic exacerbatio of this terrible love." Miss Yvonne Loriod played that piano with vehement exacerbation and abounding virtuoso, for which she deserved a hand. She was indeed the equal of the orchestra, also consumed and volcanic in the throes of passion.

Final Hollywood Touch

The movement is indeed athletic. Nor did Mr. Bernstein lose the opportunity for effective gestures and eloquent calisthenics. The television man, plainly manipulating his lens and ducking about in his cupboard overlooking the stage, provided the final Hollywood touch of a piece palpably approrpiate to precisely that order of entertainment.

This, one would say, is the best movement and the most fun of the ten-movement symphonic circus. It is cunningly contrived to entertain and excite after much pretentious obscurity. The next best movement from the box office point of view would presumably be "Garden of the Sleep of Love." This is somnolent, as the title would imply, with a crooning ditty sweetly harmonized and many times repeated, in the strings, while the piano chirps and clucks in ornamentation of the slumber song. No doubt insects and feathered friends in the lover's retreat. O corn, where is thy sting?

But after this Mr. Messiaen was apparently not in the best position, creatively speaking. He had made about as much noise, exuded about as much syrup, and devised as many non-reversible rhythms and asymmetric augmentations as he was able to think of. So the last part of his symphony was anticlimax.

By the time the end was reached the audience was no longer in the amused frame of mind that it had been when it began to giggle at the queer and funny sounds of the first movement. For there is really very little growth in this music, aside from gadgetary manipulations, which are not the same thing.

At the end of the concert the soloists, orchestra, conductor, and composer assembled on the stage, and Mr. Messiaen kissed Mr. Bernstein on the cheek, as they do in France when bestowing the medal of the Legion of Honor. And let it be said in all seriousness that Mr. Bernstein did a perfectly amazing job with an extremely difficult score, deserving any and all recognition that could be given him for his accomplishment.

He held the orchestra together as coolly and masterfully as if he had the whole of a most difficult and inconvenient score by heart. And if he did not have it by heart, apparently he didn't miss a trick. Or a gesture, either, at the right moment for the camera. Well, what of it? Hasn't a conductor a right to get something beside mere credit from such a piece? It was an amazing performance of a piece of most pretentious nonsense, and publicity is what it's for.

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

By Arthur Berger

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

"Turangalila," symphony in ten movements, for piano, Ondes Martenot and orchestra by Olivier Messiaen, in its New York premiere conducted by Leonard Bernstein Saturday afternoon. Soloists: Yvonne Loriod, piano; Ginette Martenot, Ondes Martenot. Subtitles: 1, Introduction; 2, Love-song I; 3, Turangalila I; 4, Love-song II; 5, Joy in the Blood of the Stars ("Joie du Sang des Etoiles"); 6, Garden of the Sleep of Love; 7, Turangalila II; 8, Development of Love (Developpement de l'Amour); 9, Turangalila III; 10, Finale.

'Turangalila'

Olivier Messiaen's seventy-five-minute-long symphony "Turangalila," heard here Saturday afternoon for the first time, is based on high-sounding rhythmic theories over which erotic sentiments drip. The Hindu rubric of this ten-movement work means "love-song," and it is doubtless because this contemporary Frenchman is at bottom so much a romantic that he needs the intellectual peg to fasten together the impetuous inspirations evoked in him by such a theme. Irving Babbitt has remarked that Mozart obeys rules spontaneously. But since Wagner, with his leit-motiv, the composer has been fairly familiar who must lean on overt schematizations precisely because his feelings are so prone to spill over the normal limitations of form.

In Messiaen's Symphony, as heard Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with Leonard Bernstein brilliantly conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, intellectual claims seemed naive indeed. For much of it was like Hollywood atmosphere music or the grand finales of movie-house organs that impress by engulfing us in huge, sonorous cascades. The textures created by density and wide pitch range, vibrating in the interior with glissandos, tremolos and Ondes Martenot, resulted in blending and obscuring the erudite rhythmic devices of "zigzag," "scissors," "non-reversibles," "personages" (terms coined by Messiaen), so that the effect was often arhythmic. Figures that emerged from the melee here and there, at times mercilessly repeated, had the common pronie of our familiar popular song that kept curious company with bird-songs, and Hindue and mystic content.

The jazzy hits seemed to be Messiaen's way of painting earthly and carnal love. But even elsewhere he never kept away for very long from the surgary, sliding harmonies of popular music, and these fused surprisingly with his ultra-chromatic texture and his Straussian climaxes. The suggestion of "Honky-tonk Train" in a bed of gamelon-like sounds in the introduction was one of the happier evocations of jazz—though I am sure Messiaen never heard Albert Ammons play boogie-woogie. A charming, jazzy inspiration opened the scherzo, and throughout the symphony there were many bright touches that might have been salvaged for a shorter work.

Thus, Messiaen cannot be thrust aside, despite his bad taste and grandiloquence. A highly creative mechanism is somewhere at work. I was impressed at the beginning by the new sound-world opened up, but then the scenery did not change enough and was often cluttered up. The Oriental methods of pure color and rhythm, magnified on the screen of an enlarged orchestra, were intriguing, but after a while I became nostalgic for a work never given here, Igor Markevitch's "Flight of Icarus."

Symphonies the length of a concert have been made before, notably by Bruckner and Mahler. But the performance of a new one made Saturday's concert something of an occasion, and the U. N. flags and equipment set up for the television broadcast by the orchestra following the concert contributed their share to the audience's expectant mood. So did the battery of percussion and keyboard instruments. After the first movement the odd sounds and their naive substructure provoked laughter. Indeed, if Messiaen had not taken himself quite so seriously, there would have been quite a bit of fun in this work. But as the afternoon wore on, the reception changed to a respectful and polite one, accompanied by no little boredom.

BANGOR, MAINE
COMMERCIAL

DEC 12 1949

Odd Sounds Come From Carnegie Hall

Ondes Martenot Draws Hisses, Cheers

By W. G. Rogers

NEW YORK, Dec. 12 (AP)—Some extremely odd sounds from the Carnegie Hall platform Saturday matched the extremely rare sound of some hisses and snorts of laughter from the audience as the Boston Symphony gave the New York premiere of Messiaen's "Turangallia."

Described as a "Symphony for Piano, Ondes Martenot and Orchestra," the hour-and-a-half-long work seemed so unsymphonic to a few listeners that they walked out on it.

"I wouldn't give a nickel for the whole blamed thing," said an angry Carnegie Hall employee who had to stay through it.

"If only it was bad enough to start a riot," a member of the audience complained.

* * *

MOST OF THE AUDIENCE, however, clearly found it good enough for generous applause.

Guest conductor Leonard Bernstein, pianist Yvonne Loriod and Ondes Martenot soloist Ginette Martenot were called back for several bows.

(Ondes Martenot is an electronic musical instrument invented by Maurice Martenot, a French radio technician. Ginette Martenot, today's Ondes Martenot soloist, is a sister of the inventor.)

To this listener, the symphony seemed like one of the most radical extensions of orchestral range, color and expressivity contrived by any modern composer.

It often was exciting and moving, rarely repetitious.

Despite the climaxes of the various movements, Messiaen still had his big bolt to shoot in the grand climax of the finale.

COMPOSED IN 1946-48 by the Frenchman Olivier Messiaen on a commission from the Serge Kous Sevitzky Music foundation, the work calls for an outsize orchestra and some unfamiliar instruments.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 11 1949

U. N. CODE OF RIGHTS HAILED ON 1ST YEAR

Mrs. Roosevelt, Romulo, Lie, Olivier, Boston Symphony Join in Program Here

The first anniversary of the adoption of a Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations General Assembly was observed here yesterday with words and music glorifying the brotherhood of man.

United Nations delegates and their guests attended the ceremonies at Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a special performance, with distinguished soloists, and where key United Nations officials described the declaration as one of the great achievements of the world organization.

It was adopted by the General Assembly in Paris on Dec. 10, 1948. President Truman proclaimed the day as United Nations Human Rights Day and asked that it be observed in succeeding years.

The speakers at the celebration were Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, chairman of the Human Rights Commission; Brig. Gen. Carlos P. Romulo, president of the General Assembly; and Trygve Lie, secretary-general of the United Nations.

Olivier Reads Preamble

As the program opened, 3,000 persons stood in silence, as they would for a national anthem, as Sir Laurence Olivier read the preamble to the declaration, which begins with these words:

"Recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world."

The British actor then served as narrator in the première of Aaron Copland's "Preamble," a work for orchestra and speaker based on the opening words of the United Nations Charter. The orchestra was directed by Leonard Bernstein.

Music of many nations was played, including Shostakovich's United Nations March, Paganini's Concerto No. 1 in D, with Yehudi Menuhin as violinist; Ravel's Concerto in G Major, with Mr. Bernstein at the piano, and Beethoven's Ode to Joy from the Ninth Symphony, with the Collegiate Chorale and Irma Gonzales, Nan Merriman, Raul Jobin and Nicola Moscona.

Mrs. Roosevelt, who was instrumental in the adoption of the declaration, reported that it already had had an effect on the thinking of men and women in various countries.

"Forty-eight nations voted to accept the Universal Declaration and to try to acquaint their people with its contents and to live up to the standards contained therein as nearly as possible," she said. "That means that all over the world people are now becoming acquainted with that document."

She described acceptance of the declaration as "one of the things most important to democracy everywhere."

"Democracy must prove that it has due consideration for the rights and freedoms of the individual," she said. "A Charter of Human Rights can only be written in a land where democracy reigns because governments cannot impose such a charter. The people must accept and respect these rights and freedoms in their own communities and in their own lives and thereby create countries and in time a world where such freedoms are a reality."

Called an "Active Force"

General Romulo described the declaration as "a tremendous and active force" that had renewed and revitalized the hope of billions, and had assured them that the United Nations did mean something to them.

"It is our pledge as members of the world community that we shall do all within our power to achieve a world where those with faith in understanding, in cooperation and equality can have their faith justified," he said.

Mr. Lie described the occasion as hopeful, but added that action to implement the words of the declaration lay ahead.

"The declaration is as alive as the eternal desire of the peoples of the world for peace and freedom," he said. "May it also be as valid in the years to come."

The concert was preceded by a forum discussion of "Freedom of Information," at which General Romulo, Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff of the Radio Corporation of America and Dr. C. J. van Heuven Goedhart took part. The moderator was Benjamin Cohen, assistant secretary-general of the United Nations.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
NOV 11 1949

Snorts, Hisses And Applause Greet Turangalila In Carnegie Hall

By W. G. Rogers
Associated Press Arts Reporter

New York, Dec. 10. (AP)—Some extremely odd sounds from Carnegie Hall platform today matched the extremely rare sound of some hisses and snorts of laughter from the audience as the Boston Symphony gave the New York premiere of Messiaen's Turangalila.

Described as a "symphony for piano, ondes martenot and orchestra," the hour-and-a-half-long work seemed so unsymphonic to a few listeners that they walked out on it.

"I wouldn't give a nickel for the whole blamed thing," said an angry Carnegie Hall employe who had to stay through it.

"If only it was bad enough to start a riot," a member of the audience complained.

Most of the audience, however, clearly found it good enough for generous applause.

Guest Conductor Leonard Bernstein, pianist Yvonne Loriod and ondes martenot soloist Ginette Martenot were called back for several bows.

(Ondes martenot is an electronic musical instrument invented by Maurice Martenot, a French radio technician. Ginette Martenot, today's ondes martenot soloist, is a sister of the inventor).

To this listener, the symphony seemed like one of the most radical extensions of orchestral range, color and expressivity contrived by any modern composer.

It often was exciting and moving, rarely repetitious.

Despite the climaxes of the various movements, Messiaen still had his big bolt to shoot in the grand climax of the finale.

Composed in 1946-48 by the Frenchman Olivier Messiaen on a commission from the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation, the work calls for an outsize orchestra and some unfamiliar instruments.

It is divided into ten sections.

According to the composer, quoted in the program notes, the title "is a poetic word of the Indian language, meaning a love song, with connotations of rhythm. It is also known as a girl's name."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
DEC 14 1949

Notes and Footnotes

WHATEVER has gotten into staid Olin Downes of the New York Times is hard to say, but a fast guess should be easy. He cut loose in reviewing a new symphony played in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, which doesn't half describe Bernstein.

The symphony, it seems, is an ear-splitting modern job with, "every conceivable instrumental gadget in it," writes Downes. "It is noisiest, on the whole," he further complains, "in the fifth movement . . . a hoopla movement, one gathers, of unbridled passion."

"This movement," he adds, "is indeed athletic. Nor did Mr. Bernstein lose the opportunity for effective gestures and eloquent calisthenics. The television man, plainly manipulating his lens and ducking about in his cupboard overlooking the stage, provided the final Hollywood touch . . . O corn, where is thy sting?"

Downes credits the conductor with an amazing job handling the difficult score which incidentally is by Messiaen and is called "Turangalia." "He didn't miss a trick," says the reviewer. "Or a gesture at the right moment for the camera . . . It was an amazing performance of a piece of most pretentious nonsense, and publicity is what it's for."

Hints of Downes's annoyance with the showy conductor who rehearses his own gestures cropped up in last summer's Tanglewood reviews. Bernstein as a video actor evidently threw the switch, and Downes threw the book. We've never seen him that wrought up before.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
DEC 12 1949

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

Messaien, Thebom, Flagstad and Puccini Make News.

A remarkable musical experience came and went on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall in the space of an hour and a half required for the introductory performance of Oliver Messaien's "Turangalila-Symphony" by Leonard Bernstein and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was all a crescendo of interest till Bernstein decreed a halt midway in the ten sections; thereafter, it never re-established the same atmosphere.

IRVING KOLODIN.

"Turangalila," the composer tells us, is derived from the Indian (Hindu) language, and means a love song. In this creation of 1948, Messaien has taken the orchestra apart, and put it together in a way productive of extraordinary new sounds. The "ondes martenot" (the electronic instrument played with a keyboard) shrills higher than any piccolo, sighs more evenly than the clearest saxophone, blankets the strings with vibrato that puts a new wash of color on the bowed box.

With this spectrum of color, Messaien combines a rhythmic detail and variety that made of the first five sections—in alternating phases of tension and release—a gaudy patchwork of pleasure and delight. The virtuosity of the playing, the burbling freshness of the tonal waves, the ever-changing panorama of smash, batter and tinkle, combined to extend musical sensation into a new dimension.

The cooling-off period, however, was something not decreed by the composer, and it put upon him a fresh burden of interest-quickening hardly possible. His melody is a patois of Scriabin, Ravel, Franck and even Ferde Grofe, his harmony varied but too much in a bright, triadial vein to sustain a piece of such length. At last, the whole gigantic structure began to impress one as top-heavy, leaning dangerously, Pisa-like, from the vertical. Bernstein did a prodigious work of recreation, with full authority and quickening imagination. Yvonne Loriod was the able pianist, Ginette Martenot the unrivalled (if only because unique) operator of her brother's invention. The orchestra shared in a really arousing experience.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 15 1949

Library of Congress Honors Koussevitzky

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 (UP).—The Library of Congress announced today creation of a foundation to further music composition under the name of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for twenty-five years. Luther H. Evans, Librarian of Congress, said the original endowment exceeds $100,000, representing a continuation of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, Inc., which the conductor founded at Brookline, Mass., in 1942, under which work was commissioned from thirty-five composers.

Mr. Evans also announced formation of a Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation collection at the library, consisting mostly of original autographs of modern works commissioned by Dr. Koussevitzky from time to time.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
DEC 17 1949

A Commendable Decision By Tanglewood Management

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra deserves an orchid for its decision to extend its season at Tanglewood. The manner of the extension is such as to silence criticism and gratify those whose primary interest is in the music itself.

It is safe to assume that any organization anywhere can use more money, and that the Tanglewood festival is no exception. It is likewise evident that if it set out to do it, could attract audiences to another week end of concerts in the Shed. Instead, the Tanglewood management has chosen to expand the portion of its program that lacks the Barnum & Bailey attributes, and which appeals the most to music-lovers—the Bach-Mozart concerts in the opera-concert hall. Up until now, there have been two week ends devoted to these concerts. Next year there are to be six programs over three week ends, none of the programs being repeated.

The decision represents the best possible solution to the many-sided problem facing the Tanglewood management. The demand for more continues to grow, as do the audiences from afar. At the same time, there is considerable local dissatisfaction. There are those in the immediate neighborhood who declare that if the season is extended by one more toot, they are emigrating. There is also a complaint, especially from Berkshire patrons, who love music but who resent the peanuts and popcorn flavor and the traffic jam on departure from Shed concerts. They maintain that these post-concert annoyances ruin their enjoyment. In addition, there is the technical difficulty. The BSO has a 40-week season, compared with an average of about 30. Musicians, like lesser mortals, need vacations. The preparation for another week end of Shed music would bear heavily on conductor and orchestra alike. The decision to use a small orchestra on the Bach-Mozart programs appears to be a move which will appeal to the real music-lovers while entailing the least possible number of drawbacks.

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST
DEC 15 1949

Koussevitzky Gives $100,000 Endowment for Composers

By ARTHUR EDSON

WASHINGTON, Dec 14.—(AP) Serge Koussevitzky, whose direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra made it one of the world's great musical organizations, Wednesday gave the Library of Congress more than $100,000 to help composers of good music.

Dr Luther H. Evans, Librarian of Congress, announced at the same time the formation of the Serge Koussevitzky Foundation Music Collection. This consists mostly of original autographs of modern works.

Evans said the endowment is a continuation of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, Inc, set up by the conductor in 1942, in memory of his first wife, Natalie.

This private organization arranged commissioned work from 35 composers. These manuscripts now will be placed in the Library of Congress.

Koussevitzky said he wanted some institution to continue this work, and so picked the Library of Congress.

In 1925, congress passed a law which permits the library to receive special endowments. More than $2,000,000 has been given it so far.

Directors of the original Koussevitzky Foundation will serve as advisors to the library. They are Koussevitzky, chairman; Mrs Koussevitzky, Aaron Copland, Howard Hansen, Gregor Piatigorsky, William Schuman, Richard Burgin and Leonard Bernstein.

The foundation not only will hire composers both here and abroad to write music, but also will help get the new works performed.

In the past eight years the Koussevitzky Music Foundation has commissioned such works as Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes;" Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra and ode by Igor Stravinsky, Darius Milhaud's Symphony No 2, Copland's Symphony No 3, Arnold Schonberg's "Survivor From Warsaw," and Marc Blitzstein's opera, "Regina," now running in New York.

In addition to directing the Boston Symphony for more than a quarter century, Koussevitzky organized the Berkshire Music Center and festivals at "Tanglewood" in Lenox, Mass, which he still directs.

Koussevitzky now lives in Scotsdale, Ariz.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 15 1949

Koussevitzky Gives Library of Congress $100,000 to Spur Music Composition

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, whose direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fer a quarter century made it one of the world's great musical organizations, today gave the Library of Congress more than $100,000 to help composers of good music.

Dr. Luther H. Evans, Librarian of Congress, announced at the same time the formation of the Serge Koussevitzky Foundation Music Collection. This consists mostly of original autographs of modern works. Dr. Evans said the endowment is a continuation of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, Inc., set up by the conductor in 1942, in memory of his first wife, Natalie. This private organization arranged commissioned work from thirty-five composers. These manuscripts now will be placed in the Library of Congress. Koussevitzky said he wanted some institution to continue this work, and so picked the Library of Congress.

In 1925 Congress passed a law which permits the library to receive special endowments. More than $2,000,000 has been given to it so far.

Directors of the original Koussevitzky Foundation will serve as advisers to the library. They are Koussevitzky, chairman; Mrs. Koussevitzky, Aaron Copland, Howard Hansen, Gregor Piatigorsky, William Schuman, Richard Burgin and Leonard Bernstein.

The foundation not only will hire composers both here and abroad to write music, but also will help get the new works performed.

In the past eight years the Koussevitzky Music Foundation has commissioned such works as Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes"; Bela Bartok's concerto for orchestra, an ode by Igor Stravinsky, Darius Milhaud's Symphony No. 2, Copland's Symphony No. 3, Arnold Schonberg's "Survivor From Warsaw," and Marc Blitzstein's opera, "Regina," now running in New York.

In addition to directing the Boston Symphony for more than a quarter century, Koussevitzky organized the Berkshire Music Center and Festivals at "Tanglewood" in Lenox, Mass., which he still directs.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
DEC 1[illegible]

Musical Circus

Quite the most amazing premiere took place at the Boston Symphony matinee on Saturday. As a blend of materials and a mixture of styles, Messiaen's "Turangalila" Symphony left few unrecognized.

Whatever it was in the beginning, it emerged in the latter half of its 10 movements as warmed-over Strauss heated by Kostelanetz lushness.

Leonard Bernstein triumphed as ringmaster of this musical circus. He whipped up its French theatricalism for all it was worth—one of the most entertaining works to upset a Boston Symphony audience.

Hollywood could do no better—except supply the right kind of script for this "Symphony of Love."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

DEC 13 1949

Tanglewood Adds Week; Endowment Is Announced

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer will have an extra Bach-Mozart week end, spreading the concert season over six weeks instead of five as in previous years. Heretofore, two Bach-Mozart weekends preceded the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of [illegible]

Conductor Gives Statement

[illegible] announced today of the Bach-Mozart week end at Tanglewood, also that D. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct all of the Bach-Mozart concerts in the Music Shed hall beginning Saturday, July 8 and Sunday, July 9. Dr. Koussevitzky, who gave the Library of Congress $1,000,000 yesterday for the purchasing of manuscripts of composers of good music, said the six programs in the Bach-Mozart series, all of the programs will include different works. There will be no repeat programs.

Serge Koussevitzky

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who met here yesterday with members of the Tanglewood Advisory Committee, explained that the programs will be more heavily weighted with Bach than Mozart because of 200th anniversary of Bach's death. There is a possibility, he said, of some works by Haydn being played. As before, the orchestra will be made up of the first desk men of the BSO.

While details of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts have not been announced as yet, it is known that there will be three series of concerts in the Music Shed, with a benefit concert as before. Charles Munch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance with the BSO at Tanglewood next summer. Dr. Koussevitzky will also appear with the BSO in the Music Shed for a part of the Berkshire Festival concerts. Mr. Munch, who took over as conductor of the orchestra in October, is featured in the current issue of Time magazine.

After Koussevitzky's gift of $100,000 to the Library of Congress was revealed in Washington, Dr. Luther H. Evans, librarian of congress, announced the formation of the Serge Koussevitzky Foundation in music collection. This consists [illegible] of original autographs of modern works.

Extends Original Gift

Dr. Evans said the endowment is a continuation of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation Inc., set up by the conductor in 1942 in memory of his first wife, Natalie. This private organization arranged commissioned works from 35 composers. The manuscripts now will be housed in the Library of Congress. Koussevitzky said he wanted some institution to continue this work, and so he picked the Library of Congress.

In 1925, Congress passed a law which permits the library to receive special endowments. More than $2,000,000 has been given so far.

[illegible] of the original Koussevitzky Music Foundation will serve as [illegible] the Library. They are: [illegible], chairman; Mrs. [illegible] A. Cochrane Howard, [illegible], Richard Burgin [illegible]. The foundation [illegible] composers [illegible] ahead to write [illegible] will help get the new works performed.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE

MUSIC

Wagenaar Conducts Premiere of Own Fourth Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Although composer Bernard Wagenaar had come to Boston merely to attend rehearsals and first performances of his own new Fourth Symphony, he found himself conducting the premiere at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. This was because Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is sick with flu. (He was reported much better, however, and is expected to conduct the Sunday afternoon concert.)

Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor, stepped into the breach for the remainder of the program, in which only one change was made. The three Preludes from the opera "Palestrina" by Hans Pfitzner, scheduled for first Boston performance, was postponed until the return of Mr. Munch, and for them were substituted the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn. The other numbers are Berlioz' Overture, "Beatrice and Benedict," hitherto unplayed by this orchestra, and the Second Symphony of Schubert.

Bernard Wagenaar, one of the best-known academic musicians in the country, has been little performed in Boston, for reasons without ready explanation. His Fourth Symphony is "well-made" music, elegantly scored and of a moderately contemporary, dissonant idiom. Much of it, as sheer sound, is pleasant, indeed.

But there is surprisingly little motion in it, and the five movements seem to follow a labored and plodding course, except for the quasi vivace. It is not that rhythm is lacking, but the rhythms, for the most part, lack salience, and the contours of the melody do not appear to have distinction. Now composers proverbially are not the best conductors of their own music, so it is possible that another might give a more scintillating performance of the work. Until that time let further judgment be suspended. Mr. Wagenaar was cordially received by the Friday audience.

The conducting of Mr. Burgin was better than ever. He is always faithful to the score, but this time Berlioz, Brahms and Schubert of the lovely, naive little B-flat Symphony seemed to go with superb ease and lightness. "Beatrice and Benedict" (Benedict is the way the name is spelled in the title, although Shakespeare's character is Benedick) shows the usual Berlioz brilliance, although the tune invention isn't so good as in the composer's earlier work. As for Brahms' Variations, they are as comfortable as pipe, book, slippers and a hearth fire.

The Boston Symphony evening concert, next week, will be shifted to Thursday, to avoid Christmas Eve.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the eighth program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon. Bernard Wagenaar was the guest conductor in his own composition. The program:

Berlioz ..... Overture to "Beatrice et Benedict"
Brahms ..... Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Wagenaar ..... Symphony No. 4
Schubert ..... Symphony No. 2, B-flat major

By RUDOLPH ELIE

A quietly, consistently rewarding sort of a concert, this one; notable for nothing special but relaxing, genial, warm and wholly enjoyable.

Richard Burgin, assuming command in the illness—fortunately mild—of Charles Munch, displayed his usual unostentatious but exceedingly fine musicianship in the Berlioz, the Brahms Variations (which were substituted for the announced Pfitzner preludes from "Palestrina") and the seldom heard but lovely Schubert symphony, while Bernard Wagenaar's new Symphony No. 4, in a splendid performance with the composer conducting, made its own way very well indeed.

By no means a pretentious or even an important work, Mr. Wagenaar's symphony is nontheless of the first quality. It is filled with ideas, with invention; it moves along, it is attractive, well-made. It is perhaps lacking in real creative force, but it has style and taste and certainly enough impetus to hold attention.

In its two outer movement it has just a little the touch of the scholastic. Everything is a little too carefully designed. The form is correct, the tonal masses build in just the right way, the climaxes fall in the approved spots. The orchestral technique is sure and without reproach. Mr. Wagenaar would get A plus from anybody for these two movements. The three inner movements, however, are of a very different character. All of the above still applies, but here, with the academic requirements fulfilled in the two outer movements, the composer speaks his own mind and a highly musical and cultivated mind it is.

The Andantino, a brief song with a couple of trios, has a delightfully whimsical atmosphere about it. Sparsely, even drily orchestrated, it has amusing surprises, sudden turns and twists of a charming nature. The Quasi Vivace is even more humorous, but here there is something rouguish, almost Till Eulenspiegelish about it (though its overall sound of course is anything but Straussian). The Adagietto has the character and evokes the atmosphere of the night-piece or the romantic soliloquy. An extended song first for the English horn, then the strings, then the flute and clarinet in duet over a sustained string background, it is a very superior piece of work in a fine contemporary (though never an obviously "dissonant") idiom. Mr. Wagenaar, a tall man with an aristocratic bearing, conducted it very capably an dwas very warmly received by the audience.

Curiously enough Berlioz' Overture to "Beatrice and Benedick" has never been done at these concerts before. It is an ingratiating piece filled with melodic charm and moments of drama, and Mr. Munch is to be thanked for having thought to revive it. Much the same might be said of the Schubert. Not all of it is inspired but the inspired moments, as for example the andante and the trio of the menuetto (with its solo oboe role superlatively played by John Holmes), are little short of enchanting.

The program next week, Mr. Munch conducting, offers Handel's "Water Music," Haydn's D major Concerto for Cello with Raya Garbousova as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique." Incidentally, the Saturday evening concert will be given on THURSDAY evening, the Friday afternoon concert remaining uchanged. Also incidentally, there is now on view in the Hall an exhibition of paintings executed by subscribers, members and friends of the orchestra. If you can manage to push the admiring painter gazing in awe upon their own works out of the way, you will find many of the pictures of remarkable quality.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An audience eager to welcome him back after an absence of three weeks (but only two concerts) found that Charles Munch was indisposed and that the faithful and dependable Richard Burgin had been pressed into service. With one change, the associate conductor adhered to the announced program: For the three Preludes from Pfitzner's "Palestrina" he had substituted Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn.

The current program still begins with a local novelty, Berlioz' charming Overture to his opera "Beatrice and Benedick" (after "Much Ado About Nothing") includes a first performance, that of Bernard Wagenaar's Fourth Symphony, with the composer conducting, and concludes with the rarely-heard Second Symphony of Schubert. From the standpoint of the average auditor it is perhaps just as well that the Pfitzner excerpts have been shelved for a time, since the program was heavily weighted on the side of unfamiliarity. One piece from the standard repertory did no harm.

This was the first time that music by Mr. Wagenaar had been heard in Boston. He is Dutch-born, is in his 56th year, and since 1920 has resided in this country. Tall, slender, erect, with an almost military bearing, he made a most agreeable impression, and led the orchestra authoritatively in what proved to be an interesting and effective, if hardly significant work. Running in five comparatively short movements, the Symphony is on the moody side. Its themes are easily grasped but somewhat fragmentary. There are effects of harmony and orchestration that recal Sibelius, but Mr. Wagenaar is no mere imitator, if his style is eclectic. My personal preference was for the quick-speeding third movement, though the two introspective slow divisions have a certain charm. Anyway, Mr. Wagenaar knows his way around and he does not try to be abstruse in the contemporary fashion.

It is surprising that Berlioz's Overture had not been heard here before, and even more surprising that this was only the second local performance of Schubert's Symphony, the first having occurred here, at the hands of Mr. Mitropoulos, five years ago. It is by far the most Schubertian of the early symphonies; delightful throughout and containing strokes of genius, such as the choice of keys for the second subject of the finale. That a boy just turned 18, and with so little formal education, could have written it, is amazing.

It was instructive to compare Berlioz's orchestration, always the most striking feature of his music, with that of Brahms, a later job in this particular instance, but sounding like an earlier one. In the Overture there is the highly personal treatment of strings and woodwinds, the typically flashy brass, while Brahms plods along in the accepted German classical manner. This is the second rare Berlioz overture Mr. Munch has provided for us, and may it not be the last.

DES MOINES, IOWA
TRIBUNE

DEC 17 1949

Eleanor Roosevelt

HYDE PARK, N. Y.—I HOPE A GREAT many of my readers listened to the first anniversary celebration of the declaration of human rights in Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon or at least heard the rebroadcasting on Sunday.

—

SIR LAURENCE OLIVIER READ THE preamble to the declaration beautifully. United Nations Secretary General Trygve Lie delivered a short speech that was very fitting and at the same time absorbing because his diction is still tinged with his Norwegian dialect.

—

THE MUSIC, WHICH WAS PLAYED BY the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Leonard Bernstein, was the main part of the celebration, as it should be, for music is a universal language. Unfortunately, Yehudi Menuhin, because of adverse weather conditions, arrived too late to rehearse with the orchestra and was obliged to play Bach without any accompaniment. He is a master of his instrument, however, and everyone enjoyed hearing him. The ceremonies were closed with the Ode to John from Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in D Minor—a really perfect ending.

—

I HAD TO LEAVE EARLY TO CATCH my train, so Gen. Carlos P. Romulo let me speak before he did. This meant that I had to wait to hear the end of the ceremony on the rebroadcast. I could not help thinking how wonderfully General Romulo spoke. It must have been a tremendous tax on him after the week of hard work in the general assembly, which only came to an end that very day. I think all of us have been very grateful for his work as president of the general assembly. Knowing how much he had to do, I was particularly grateful that he was able to come to this first anniversary celebration.

GEN. ROMULO.

—

I KNOW THAT IN MANY COUNTRIES the world over the anniversary of the acceptance of the universal declaration of human rights was celebrated. I hope it will continue to be throughout the years, since only if we take it seriously enough and try to live by it, will it accomplish the object we all hope for and be one of the foundation stones of a peaceful world.

★ ★ ★

ON THURSDAY I TOOK A GOOD LOOK at my attic and decided that only I could clean it out. I felt that unless it was cleaned out shortly no one would be able to move or to find anything in it. So, right after breakfast Thursday morning I went to work and I am happy to say that by night it looked like a really respectable attic, even though I do ache all over now. Everything is neatly in place and, what is more, I know just where everything is. For the first time in many months I can really go and find anything I want.

—

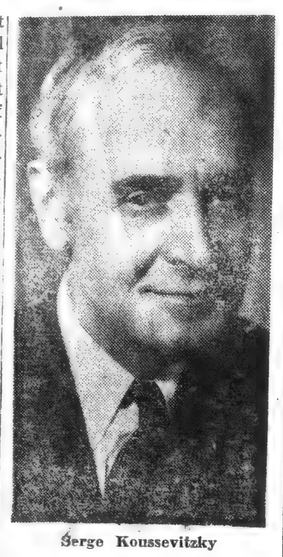
IT IS REALLY AMAZING WHAT ONE accumulates even though one is not a collector. I am trying to give my children and friends as many of my possessions as I possibly can while I am still alive so that I can see them being used and enjoyed. But I seem to have been none too generous, for more turn up every year to be divided and sent off in different directions at Christmastime.

(World Copyright, 1949.)

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
DEC 15 1949

Tanglewood Adds Week; Endowment Is Announced

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer will include an extra Bach-Mozart week end, spreading the concert season over six weeks instead of five as in previous years. Heretofore, two Bach-Mozart weekend concerts preceded the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series in the Music Shed.



Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor Gives $100,000

With the announcement today of the added Bach-Mozart week end it was also revealed that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct all of the Bach-Mozart concerts in the theatre concert hall beginning Saturday, July 8 and Sunday, July 9.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who gave the Library of Congress $100,000 yesterday to help composers of good music, is planning the six programs in the Bach-Mozart series. All of the programs will include different works. There will be no repeat programs.

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who met here yesterday with members of the Tanglewood Advisory Committee, explained that the programs will be more heavily weighted with Bach than Mozart because of 200th anniversary of Bach's death. There is a possibility, he said, of some works by Haydn being played. As before, the orchestra will be made up of the first desk men of the BSO.

While details of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts have not been announced as yet, it is known that there will be three series of concerts in the Music Shed, with a benefit concert as before. Charles Munch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance with the BSO at Tanglewood next summer. Dr. Koussevitzky will also appear with the BSO in the Music Shed for a part of the Berkshire Festival concerts. Mr. Munch, who took over as conductor of the orchestra in October, is featured in the current issue of Time magazine.

After Koussevitzky's gift of $100,000 to the Library of Congress was revealed in Washington, Dr. Luther H. Evans, librarian of Congress, announced the formation of the Serge Koussevitzky Foundation in music collection. This consists mostly of original autographs of modern works.

Extends Original Gift

Dr. Evans said the endowment is a continuation of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation Inc., set up by the conductor in 1942 in memory of his first wife, Natalie. This private organization arranged commissioned works from 35 composers. These manuscripts now will be placed in the Library of Congress. Koussevitzky said he wanted some institution to continue this work, and so he picked the Library of Congress.

In 1925, Congress passed a law which permits the library to receive special endowments. More than $2,000,000 has been given so far.

Directors of the original Koussevitzky Foundation will serve as advisers to the Library. They are: Dr. Koussevitzky, chairman; Mrs. Natalie Koussevitzky, Aaron Copland, Howard Hanson, Gregor Piatigorsky, William Schuman, Richard Burgin and Leonard Bernstein. The foundation not only will hire composers both here and abroad to write music, but also will help get the new works performed.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE

MUSIC

Wagenaar Conducts Premiere of Own Fourth Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Although composer Bernard Wagenaar had come to Boston merely to attend rehearsals and first performances of his own new Fourth Symphony, he found himself conducting the premiere at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. This was because Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is sick with flu. (He was reported much better, however, and is expected to conduct the Sunday afternoon concert.)

Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor, stepped into the breach for the remainder of the program, in which only one change was made. The three Preludes from the opera "Palestrina" by Hans Pfitzner, scheduled for first Boston performance, was postponed until the return of Mr. Munch, and for them were substituted the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn. The other numbers are Berlioz' Overture, "Beatrice and Benedict," hitherto unplayed by this orchestra, and the Second Symphony of Schubert.

Bernard Wagenaar, one of the best-known academic musicians in the country, has been little performed in Boston, for reasons without ready explanation. His Fourth Symphony is "well-made" music, elegantly scored and of a moderately contemporary, dissonant idiom. Much of it, as sheer sound, is pleasant, indeed.

But there is surprisingly little motion in it, and the five movements seem to follow a labored and plodding course, except for the quasi vivace. It is not that rhythm is lacking, but the rhythms, for the most part, lack salience, and the contours of the melody do not appear to have distinction. Now composers proverbially are not the best conductors of their own music, so it is possible that another might give a more scintillating performance of the work. Until that time let further judgment be suspended.

Mr. Wagenaar was cordially received by the Friday audience.

The conducting of Mr. Burgin was better than ever. He is always faithful to the score, but this time Berlioz, Brahms and Schubert of the lovely, naive little B-flat Symphony seemed to go with superb ease and lightness. "Beatrice and Benedict" (Benedict is the way the name is spelled in the title, although Shakespeare's character is Benedick) shows the usual Berlioz brilliance, although the tune invention isn't so good as in the composer's earlier work. As for Brahms' Variations, they are as comfortable as pipe, book, slippers and a hearth fire.

The Boston Symphony evening concert, next week, will be shifted to Thursday, to avoid Christmas Eve.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the eighth program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon. Bernard Wagenaar was the guest conductor in his own composition. The program:

Berlioz ..... Overture to "Beatrice et Benedict"
Brahms ..... Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Wagenaar ..... Symphony No. 4
Schubert ..... Symphony No. 2, B-flat major

By RUDOLPH ELIE

A quietly, consistently rewarding sort of a concert, this one; notable for nothing special but relaxing, genial, warm and wholly enjoyable.

Richard Burgin, assuming command in the illness—fortunately mild—of Charles Munch, displayed his usual unostentatious but exceedingly fine musicianship in the Berlioz, the Brahms Variations (which were substituted for the announced Pfitzner preludes from "Palestrina") and the seldom heard but lovely Schubert symphony, while Bernard Wagenaar's new Symphony No. 4, in a splendid performance with the composer conducting, made its own way very well indeed.

By no means a pretentious or even an important work, Mr. Wagenaar's symphony is nontheless of the first quality. It is filled with ideas, with invention; it moves along, it is attractive, well-made. It is perhaps lacking in real creative force, but it has style and taste and certainly enough impetus to hold attention.

In its two outer movement it has just a little the touch of the scholastic. Everything is a little too carefully designed. The form is correct, the tonal masses build in just the right way, the climaxes fall in the approved spots. The orchestral technique is sure and without reproach. Mr. Wagenaar would get A plus from anybody for these two movements. The three inner movements, however, are of a very different character. All of the above still applies, but here, with the academic requirements fulfilled in the two outer movements, the composer speaks his own mind and a highly musical and cultivated mind it is.

The Andantino, a brief song with a couple of trios, has a delightfully whimsical atmosphere about it. Sparsely, even drily orchestrated, it has amusing surprises, sudden turns and twists of a charming nature. The Quasi Vivace is even more humorous, but here there is something roguish, almost Till Eulenspiegelish about it (though its overall sound of course is anything but Straussian). The Adagietto has the character and evokes the atmosphere of the night-piece or the romantic soliloquy. An extended song first for the English horn, then the strings, then the flute and clarinet in duet over a sustained string background, it is a very superior piece of work in a fine contemporary (though never an obviously "dissonant") idiom. Mr. Wagenaar, a tall man with an aristocratic bearing, conducted it very capably an dwas very warmly received by the audience.

Curiously enough Berlioz' Overture to "Beatrice and Benedick" has never been done at these concerts before. It is an ingratiating piece filled with melodic charm and moments of drama, and Mr. Munch is to be thanked for having thought to revive it. Much the same might be said of the Schubert. Not all of it is inspired but the inspired moments, as for example the andante and the trio of the menuetto (with its solo oboe role superlatively played by John Holmes), are little short of enchanting.

The program next week, Mr. Munch conducting, offers Handel's "Water Music," Haydn's D major Concerto for Cello with Raya Garbousova as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique." Incidentally, the Saturday evening concert will be given on THURSDAY evening, the Friday afternoon concert remaining unchanged. Also incidentally, there is now on view in the Hall an exhibition of paintings executed by subscribers, members and friends of the orchestra. If you can manage to push the admiring painter gazing in awe upon their own works out of the way, you will find many of the pictures of remarkable quality.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An audience eager to welcome him back after an absence of three weeks (but only two concerts) found that Charles Munch was indisposed and that the faithful and dependable Richard Burgin had been pressed into service. With one change, the associate conductor adhered to the announced program: For the three Preludes from Pfitzner's "Palestrina" he had substituted Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn.

The current program still begins with a local novelty, Berlioz' charming Overture to his opera "Beatrice and Benedick" (after "Much Ado About Nothing") includes a first performance, that of Bernard Wagenaar's Fourth Symphony, with the composer conducting, and concludes with the rarely-heard Second Symphony of Schubert. From the standpoint of the average auditor it is perhaps just as well that the Pfitzner excerpts have been shelved for a time, since the program was heavily weighted on the side of unfamiliarity. One piece from the standard repertory did no harm.

This was the first time that music by Mr. Wagenaar had been heard in Boston. He is Dutch-born, is in his 56th year, and since 1920 has resided in this country. Tall, slender, erect, with an almost military bearing, he made a most agreeable impression, and led the orchestra authoritatively in what proved to be an interesting and effective, if hardly significant work. Running in five comparatively short movements, the Symphony is on the moody side. Its themes are easily grasped but somewhat fragmentary. There are effects of harmony and orchestration that recall Sibelius, but Mr. Wagenaar is no mere imitator, if his style is eclectic. My personal preference was for the quick-speeding third movement, though the two introspective slow divisions have a certain charm. Anyway, Mr. Wagenaar knows his way around and he does not try to be abstruse in the contemporary fashion.

It is surprising that Berlioz's Overture had not been heard here before, and even more surprising that this was only the second local performance of Schubert's Symphony, the first having occurred here, at the hands of Mr. Mitropoulos, five years ago. It is by far the most Schubertian of the early symphonies; delightful throughout and containing strokes of genius, such as the choice of keys for the second subject of the finale. That a boy just turned 18, and with so little formal education, could have written it, is amazing.

It was instructive to compare Berlioz's orchestration, always the most striking feature of his music, with that of Brahms, a later job in this particular instance, but sounding like an earlier one. In the Overture there is the highly personal treatment of strings and woodwinds, the typically flashy brass, while Brahms plods along in the accepted German classical manner. This is the second rare Berlioz overture Mr. Munch has provided for us, and may it not be the last.

DES MOINES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
DEC 17 1949

Eleanor Roosevelt

HYDE PARK, N. Y.—I HOPE A GREAT many of my readers listened to the first anniversary celebration of the declaration of human rights in Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon or at least heard the rebroadcasting on Sunday.

SIR LAURENCE OLIVIER READ THE preamble to the declaration beautifully. United Nations Secretary General Trygve Lie delivered a short speech that was very fitting and at the same time absorbing because his diction is still tinged with his Norwegian dialect.

THE MUSIC, WHICH WAS PLAYED BY the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Leonard Bernstein, was the main part of the celebration, as it should be, for music is a universal language. Unfortunately, Yehudi Menuhin, because of adverse weather conditions, arrived too late to rehearse with the orchestra and was obliged to play Bach without any accompaniment. He is a master of his instrument, however, and everyone enjoyed hearing him. The ceremonies were closed with the Ode to John from Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in D Minor—a really perfect ending.

I HAD TO LEAVE EARLY TO CATCH my train, so Gen. Carlos P. Romulo let me speak before he did. This meant that I had to wait to hear the end of the ceremony on the rebroadcast. I could not help thinking how wonderfully General Romulo spoke. It must have been a tremendous tax on him after the week of hard work in the general assembly, which only came to an end that very day. I think all of us have been very grateful for his work as president of the general assembly. Knowing how much he had to do, I was particularly grateful that he was able to come to this first anniversary celebration.

GEN. ROMULO.

I KNOW THAT IN MANY COUNTRIES the world over the anniversary of the acceptance of the universal declaration of human rights was celebrated. I hope it will continue to be throughout the years, since only if we take it seriously enough and try to live by it, will it accomplish the object we all hope for and be one of the foundation stones of a peaceful world.

★ ★ ★

ON THURSDAY I TOOK A GOOD LOOK at my attic and decided that only I could clean it out. I felt that unless it was cleaned out shortly no one would be able to move or to find anything in it. So, right after breakfast Thursday morning I went to work and I am happy to say that by night it looked like a really respectable attic, even though I do ache all over now. Everything is neatly in place and, what is more, I know just where everything is. For the first time in many months I can really go and find anything I want.

IT IS REALLY AMAZING WHAT ONE accumulates even though one is not a collector. I am trying to give my children and friends as many of my possessions as I possibly can while I am still alive so that I can see them being used and enjoyed. But I seem to have been none too generous, for more turn up every year to be divided and sent off in different directions at Christmastime.

(World Copyright, 1949.)

TWENTY CENTS

TIME

THE WEEKLY NEWSMAGAZINE

Boris Chaliapin

BOSTON'S CHARLES MUNCH
The Cabots keep their eyes open.

TIME
THE WEEKLY NEWSMAGAZINE

Boris Chaliapin

BOSTON'S CHARLES MUNCH
The Cabots keep their eyes open.

« PROFILE »

Charles Munch

WHEN CHARLES MUNCH MOUNTS THE podium of the Opera House in November, Brooklyn will experience a different method of conducting. Audiences accustomed to the gracile gesturing of Serge Koussevitzky and familiar with Sir Thomas Beecham's lordly calisthenics, may at first find Munch's economy of motion and brisk, vigorous thrusts somewhat lacking in color, if not in "le dynamisme." That his method is nevertheless singularly effective was made clear from his very first visit to America. "He came unheralded," wrote Miles Kastendieck in a lyrical appreciation, "he left triumphant."

In 1947, as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, the French musician not only took the music world by storm but at the end of his stay the ensemble itself gave him a farewell cocktail party and a lavishly engraved gold cigarette case. These were unheard of tributes from a group notoriously reticent in its approbation of conductors and whose solemn unresponsiveness has broken the heart of more than one bewildered maestro.

Described as France's greatest conductor, the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is amply endowed with the attributes of a virtuoso—superb technical skill, fine musicianship, authority, and polish. But behind that technique lie both imagination and temperament. Whether it be Bach or Beethoven, Honneger or Bloch, Debussy or Ravel that he is interpreting, he communicates to each an "intense aliveness." Although he is now faced with the arduous task of following a brilliant and beloved predecessor, Munch has already made it impressively manifest that he is eminently equipped to do so.

Munch was born in Strasbourg in 1891 of a French mother and Alsatian father. The family, a musical one, numbers several distinguished members, including Charles' two brothers and Albert Schweitzer, the great theologian, Bach authority, and medical missionary. His father, Ernest Munch, a well known organist, was his first teacher. Later he switched to violin, continuing his formal work with Carl Flesch in Berlin and Lucien Capet in Paris. Successful as violinist, teacher, and conductor in his native Alsace and in Germany, Munch came to Paris in 1932. After directing notable ensembles in the capital he succeeded Gaubert in 1938 as head of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, "one of the great orchestras of the world," according to Virgil Thomson.

In the years that followed, Munch extended his already enviable continental reputation and won widespread popularity in England. On the invitation of the Boston Symphony, he came to the United States in 1946 and returned each season thereafter to make appearances in the principal cities of the nation.

"Long, strong, and shy," Munch sheds his retiring manner as soon as he begins conducting. A scholar, with a fine grasp of political affairs no less than broad cultural interests, his conversation reflects his catholic taste and nice discrimination in a happy mingling of wit and urbanity. In appearance he bears a remarkable resemblance to another handsome Frenchman, Hector Berlioz, the great nineteenth century composer. With his strong features, unruly silvery hair, blue eyes, and enormous personal charm, it is small wonder that he is known to his European admirers as "le beau Charles." Nor that in a poll recently conducted by the chic Paris magazine, Elle, he came out a close second to Winston Churchill as the "man you would most like to have to dinner." Munch is still valiantly struggling with the vagaries of our language but what he lacks in English speech he more than offsets in French manner.

MUSIC

"There Will Be Joy"

(See Cover)

The pleasantly dissonant tuning up and chatter stopped in mid-note as the grey-haired man in the tan sport coat walked briskly across the stage to the podium. For a few silent moments his glance flickered over the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his ruddy, cherubic and handsome, melancholy face warm with affection. When his glance had embraced them all, Charles Munch picked up his baton, smiled and said: "Maintenant relax." A moment later, Boston's 56-year-old Symphony Hall was rocking joyously with the rehearsal of Hector Berlioz' bounding overture, The Corsair.

MME. CODREANO (LEFT), ASSISTANT & PUPIL MUNCH
The French shines only dimly through the German fog.

Rapho-Guillumette

Kindly, 58-year-old Alsatian-born Conductor Munch no longer really had to tell his musicians to relax. In eleven weeks as their first new conductor in 25 years, his musicians were freer of tension than they had been for years. In his first speech to them he had vowed, in his painful English, to do his best to maintain the high standards of the Boston. He also hoped "there will be joy." Forthwith, friendly "Charry" Munch (pronounced Moonsh) won their respect as a musician, and their love and obedience as a man. This week, as he rehearsed his 105 musicians for his eighth series of Boston concerts, he could work with confidence that most Bostonians had succumbed to him, man and music, just as his orchestra had.

A Genius in the Pot? To most U.S. musicians and music lovers, the ascension of Charles Munch to the nation's most prestigious musical throne had come with the jolting surprise of one of Hector Berlioz' sudden bursts of brass.

The name of Munch was not big in U.S. music. He had visited for the first time in the 1946-47 season, to be guest conductor in Boston, New York, Chicago and Los Angeles; in 1948 he had conducted the French National (Radio) Orchestra on its U.S. tour. Although he had won respectful notices from critics, his name had seldom appeared in the calculations of the pundits and prophets who wanted to call the tune on Boston's new conductor. From the time 75-year-old Conductor Serge Koussevitzky announced that he would abdicate at the end of his 25 years of autocratic rule (TIME, April 19, 1948), they had been discussing heirs more apparent—31-year-old Koussevitzky Protégé Leonard Bernstein, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony's part-time Conductor Dimitri Mitropoulos, Cleveland's George Szell.

But Boston Symphony President Henry B. Cabot and his 14 fellow trustees had been "keeping our eyes open for conductors for a long time." Boston proceeded "on the strange assumption," says blunt, silver-spectacled Harry Cabot, "that they were all available." The man they were seeking would be "the boss" in every sense of the word: in programing, choice of soloists and guest conductors. The Boston's trustees could promise this because they still follow the enviable first principles laid down by the orchestra's founder, Major Henry Lee Higginson: relationship of orchestra to conductor—absolute obedience; relationship of conductor to Higginson—absolute freedom. They also needed a man who could bear the burden of conducting at least 90 concerts.

The "old guard"—Bruno Walter, 73, Wilhelm Furtwängler, 63, Leopold Stokowski, 67—struck Boston trustees as a bit too old for the job. Another choice, says Cabot, "was to take a big gamble and pick a genius out of the pot. But we didn't see a genius among the younger men."

A Flat Stomach. When Bostonians heard Munch conduct their orchestra on his 1946 visit, his sounds had shocked some. It seemed more vibrant and more rushed, particularly in the allegro movements of Beethoven symphonies. But one man was not at all surprised when Munch was asked to succeed Koussy. The New York Herald Tribune's Virgil Thomson had heard Munch conduct 19 years before in Paris and had prophesied that he would eventually lead the Boston. Why? Says Critic Thomson: "He was a natural Boston conductor, flat-stomached and grey-haired, and he created hysteria, particularly in the female over 50."

Pleasing the grey, matronly Friday matinee-goers was certainly part of the Boston tradition. Some of them would miss the little after-concert ceremony in the greenroom: kissing and being kissed by Koussy. Their new conductor was an affectionate man, but not quite the kissing type. Like many another native of Alsace, Charles Munch is a composite of the characteristics of both France and Germany. In him the French bon vivant shines only dimly through a fog of German Weltschmerz: he enjoys life but seldom seems basically happy.

Nevertheless, he gave his afternoon concerts to packed houses and almost all the oldtimers were there—Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, who has held the same second-row seat for more than 20 years, and a score of others, including Cabots, Coolidges and Saltonstalls who have held their favorite seats as long or longer.

An Essential Condition. If Boston was pleased with Munch, there were also reasons why Munch could be pleased with Boston. As U.S. cities go, it had a long tradition of serious music: it had celebrated the end of the War of 1812 with performances of portions of Haydn's Creation and Handel's Messiah. Boston also boasted a club unique in the U.S. Ten or twelve times a year, as their ancestors have done since 1837, members of the exclusive Harvard Musical Association go to their paneled clubrooms on Beacon Hill for a smoker of chamber music, beans, beer and Welsh rabbit.

The orchestra to which Charles Munch has fallen heir was not the U.S.'s oldest. It was founded in 1881, 39 years after the New York Philharmonic. But it was the second oldest symphonic organization, and Conductor Munch was a descendant of a distinguished line of "permanent" conductors. Founder Higginson believed that "the essential condition for a great orchestra is stability." Over 68 years, only nine men had shaped and polished the Boston Symphony until it was—except for Arturo Toscanini's virtuoso radio orchestra, the NBC Symphony, which is in a class by itself—the U.S.'s finest and one of the top four in the world.*

*The others: Amsterdam's Concertgebouw, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Vienna Philharmonic.

[60]

Yale Joel—LIFE

CHARLES MUNCH
Orchestra to conductor: obedience.

"Some Roughness Here." Each conductor, beginning with German Georg Henschel in 1881, had added something to the Boston's sheen. From 1884 to 1889, and from 1898 to 1906, the Vienna Opera's bearded Wilhelm Gericke, as Founder Higginson wrote, gave to the orchestra "its excellent habits and ideals." It was he, said Higginson, who "taught those violins to sing as violins sing in Vienna alone." Europe's greatest conductor, fiery Hungarian Artur Nikisch (1889-93) taught it how to "poetize," and perhaps he taught too well; at a rehearsal in 1904, Guest Conductor Richard Strauss growled: "You play that finely, but a little too finely. I want some roughness here." The Berlin Opera's Karl Muck (1906-08, 1912-18), wrote one critic, gave the orchestra "a living voice."

Muck's successor, Pierre Monteux (now the San Francisco Symphony's conductor) let it sing modern music—Stravinsky, Falla, Honegger, Milhaud. Then, in 1924, began the 25-year reign of Serge Koussevitzky, onetime bass-viol virtuoso and one of the great conductors of his time. Under his stern but benevolent rule, the Boston had come to a peak of polished perfection, and U.S. composers, subsidized and encouraged with commissions, had found a new home.

Wise Founder Higginson had taken other steps to insure stability. In 1903, he set up a musicians' pension plan, the first in any U.S. orchestra. That is one reason why Boston Symphony musicians stay around and learn how to play together. Eleven men have been in the orchestra 30 years or more, another 40 men more than 20 years.

While the best many another U.S. symphony musician can hope for is a 20-week season, the Boston musicians, most of whom also play in the Boston "Pops" and at Tanglewood in the summer, get 49 paychecks a year from the symphony for 47 weeks of work. The size of the checks helps keep them happy too: first desk men make not less than $10,000, not including broadcasting and recording fees; no one gets less than $4,860 in salary, which is well above the A.F.M. scale.

A Helping Hand. Unlike most U.S. conductors, Conductor Munch will not have to worry about where the checks are coming from. Almost alone among U.S. orchestras, the Boston Symphony has never had a financial crisis and no public appeal for funds has ever been made. It sometimes matches its more than $1,000,000 of annual expenses with more than a million in income from ticket sales, broadcasting fees (last year, $117,000 from NBC) and record royalties (last year, $167,000 from RCA Victor). When expenses and income do not match, the hand that is held out to the "Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra" is always quickly and quietly filled. As white-haired Manager George E. Judd (34 years with the Boston) puts it: "We set our sights on what we want to do and then find a way to pay for it. If there are any deficits, we like to state them not in terms of dollars, but in terms of concerts not given. And we try not to have that kind of deficit."

Yale Joel—LIFE

REHEARSING THE BOSTON SYMPHONY
Conductor to trustees: freedom.

Music & God. The new boss of the Boston likes to tell friends that he is a conductor "only because I am too stupid to be anything else." Actually, he had as little chance of escaping his career as the sons of Johann Sebastian Bach.

The fifth child in a family of six children (two daughters, four sons), Charles Munch was born in 1891 in a plain brown apartment house which overlooked the fast-flowing river Ill in Strasbourg.

Like Bach, father Ernst Munch, professor of music at the Strasbourg Conservatory, was an organist. He was also an austere Protestant—a man whose stern gaze was firmly riveted on his family, music and God. Even so, the first ambition of his shy and unassuming son Charry was to be a locomotive engineer. By six, Charry knew by heart the exact hour when the fast trains would roll into the Strasbourg station, and was often on hand to watch them with ecstasy and envy. Afterward, he would trudge home to study violin with his father, or to prepare his lessons for the Protestant gymnase.

In the Munch household, life was harmonious but not gay. Sundays they all trooped to church. After a big dinner came an afternoon and evening feast of chamber music. Sometimes young Albert Schweitzer, later to be world famous as organist, religious philosopher, and medical missionary, dropped in (his brother married Charry's sister). Summers, the Munches moved out to maternal Grandfather Frederic Simon's rectory at Niederbronn-les-Bains in the Vosges Mountains. There they played chamber music so much that the neighbors nicknamed the house "the music box." At 21, Charry went off to Paris to study violin under Lucien Capet, founder of the Capet Quartet.

Gas at Peronne. In Paris, life was both gay and harmonious. Charry lived in a modest apartment on the Quai des Orfèvres, Ile de la Cité, soaked up French culture and the French way of living. Handsome, with a boyish warmth, he charmed all the women he met, including young Genevieve Aubry, granddaughter of one of the founders of the Nestlé chocolate concern. When summer came, Charry went home to Strasbourg, "the most French of the family."

The harmony was soon disrupted. It was 1914; Alsace belonged to Germany. Within a few months, Charry and his brothers were conscripted into the German army. Four years later, after being gassed before Peronne and wounded at Verdun as a sergeant of artillery, he was demobilized at Cologne. He is not embarrassed by his onetime service for the Kaiser, asks, "Did not [Foreign Minister] Robert Schuman [who was conscripted to work in the arsenal at Metz] do the same? Did this prevent him later from becoming a French cabinet minister?" Like Schuman, Munch was able to pick his side in World War II. He conducted in Paris, scrupulously and often ingeniously avoiding conducting offers from the Nazis, and turned over every shade of his proceeds from concerts to the French underground.

FOUNDER HIGGINSON
For stability, pensions.

"Because of Her." Charles Munch did not conduct his first concert until 1932, when he was 41 years old. Why did he wait so long? "It is very simple: it was so much easier for me to make a living as a violinist. I just could not afford to direct an orchestra earlier; when I was able to, it was because of her." He meant Madame Munch, nee Aubry, with whom he had corresponded during World War I through the International Red Cross and later married (1933); she hired both the hall and the first orchestra Munch conducted.

After the success of his first concert, conducting offers poured in from other

Yale Joel—LIFE
MADAME MUNCH & POMPEY
For stability, flexibility

Paris orchestras, and fans gathered around. Among the musicians, the women and girls who [illegible] admire "Le [illegible]" were [illegible] Les Munchettes.

Even so, one day [illegible] Conductor Munch put down his baton [illegible] up his fiddle. He slipped into the Elysées Theater, sat himself [illegible] last desk of the first violins. [illegible] Debussy's Iberia on his [illegible] a different edition, and [illegible] found his bowing [illegible] of sheep. From the podium the great Arturo Toscanini noticed it [illegible] he chided, then he roared. Munch [illegible] as hundreds of other musicians [illegible] before and since: "I wished that the floor would open and swallow me." Two years ago, he reminded the Maestro of that first meeting. Toscanini shook his head and asked sadly, "How can I do such things?"

Some Consolation. Conductor Munch is not known as a man of temper, but he can be fired. Once, after he had ascended to the conductorship of Paris' fine Conservatory orchestra—a post he held from 1938 to 1946—a drunken trombonist disrupted the calm of a Beethoven adagio with a terrific blast. Everyone, audience and musicians alike, was outraged and Munch gave the man a fortissimo furioso piece of his mind. Next evening, at the second performance, a smiling Charles Munch walked onstage with a big bottle of potent framboise (raspberry brandy) in his hand. Before audience and orchestra, he handed it to the flabbergasted trombonist with the explanation: "I treated you pretty roughly last night; here's some consolation."

In rehearsals, Boston's new conductor coaches and coaxes his men in a mixture of French, English and German. One passage in a Roussel symphony, he told them, undulating his hand through the air, should "glisse—glisse like the snake." One phrase in Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe should float into the air "like smoke"; in another, he whispered, "La nuit . . . you sleep, a tiny bit of sun comes through." Sometimes in rehearsal he will go on bended knee before the cellos to woo more tone from them. His most frequent admonitions are "Accent, more accent!" and "Respirez la musique." He believes that if music is a living thing, it should breathe.

"Less Fat." To the musicians, he is "the most economical rehearser we ever had." Unlike Koussevitzky, Munch does not believe in making the orchestra repeat passages until they play them by rote. As one musician explains the difference: "Performances of a given piece under Koussy were always exactly the same. Munch's may vary from concert to concert. After all, if you were repeating a speech, you wouldn't always try to re-

* In a poll taken last June by the French magazine Elle, 10,000 Parisiennes were asked: "What man would you like to have dinner with tonight if you could make your choice?" Munch ran second to Winston Churchill, just ahead of current French Cinema Idol Jean Marais (Beauty and the Beast), far ahead of President Auriol, Gary Cooper and Joseph Stalin.

David Nilsson

MUNCH & KOUSSEVITZKY
No more kisses in the greenroom

peat it in exactly the same way . . . Your inflections might be different."

Where many musicians felt that Koussevitzky had no confidence in them (snaps Koussy: "I never trust an orchestra until it has given me what I expect"), Munch has won them because he respects them both as men and musicians. He has the same respect ("One must be most faithful") for the composer whose work he is performing.

To many Bostonians, after a fortnight of Munch their orchestra was already beginning to sound a trifle different, more relaxed and spontaneous. Expert ears, such as those of Harvard's Composer Walter Piston, found it "less fat." Composer Aaron Copland thought that "Munch probably looks for sonority more than Koussevitzky. And the orchestra didn't have quite the violence that it has now."

Bostonians would hear pretty much the same kind of programs: Munch's devotion to the moderns is second only to Koussevitzky's. But they would find it a little harder to know the man than his music. Munch's easy assurance on the podium is matched by an often moody shyness away from it.

After concerts he usually hurries out of the greenroom, nods to the waiting knot of well-wishers, then pops into his black Oldsmobile sedan for a dash home to Brush Hill Road in suburban Milton (the former home of the late Bishop William Lawrence). Only when he reaches the sanctuary of his second-story study, with Roger, his chauffeur-valet of 20 years' service hovering around him, does he seem to draw a relaxed breath.

He likes Americans but he is slightly afraid of tackling large groups of them, partly because of language difficulties. So far he has been to only two Boston parties; once there, he charmed everyone he met. He likes to take short walks around the neighborhood with his Welsh terrier Pompey, once stopped to help a neighbor rake the leaves off his lawn.

Summers in Paris. But most of the time, Charles Munch likes to work over scores at his small kidney-shaped desk or at the spinet piano in his study. On mornings when there is a rehearsal, he gets up at 8, eats an unusually hearty breakfast of bacon, scrambled eggs and tea (says Madame Munch: "In Boston we have not yet found good bread"). After rehearsals, if he has no engagement in town, he scoots back to the quiet of Brush Hill Road for luncheon.

He has already developed a taste for a Boston specialty, New England clam chowder, but his favorite dishes are still pot-au-feu and kidneys cooked with Chablis. "You see," says Madame Munch, "he has a modest taste." He likes a good nip of Scotch, is amazed that he has been unable to find good Alsatian vintages in the U.S.

Once a year, however, as long as he keeps the Boston conductorship, Munch expects to go back where they know about such things. His two-year contract (with an optional third) allows him plenty of free time in the summers, and he and Madame Munch plan to spend their vacations in Paris.

There are many things to draw him there. He is an enthusiastic amateur Egyptologist, his 14-room apartment near the Bois de Boulogne is cluttered with Egyptian statuettes and old Dutch etchings. He also likes to take an occasional lesson in harmonious coordination of mind and body at Madame Codreano's "Center for Psycho-Motor Education" (see cut). But he is fascinated with the U.S., and pleased with the thought of staying a while. Moreover, if Conductor Munch grows on Boston, as last week seemed very likely, it was quite possible that Frenchman Munch might develop a taste for the beer, the bread and the beans.

His Own Symphony

Composer's Fourth Heard In Its First Performance

By Harold Rogers

Symphony Hall officials made three last-minute changes when Charles Munch, indisposed, was absent from the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon.

Richard Burgin, concertmaster, took the podium in Mr. Munch's stead. Bernard Wagenaar came forward to conduct the première of his Fourth Symphony. The Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn replaced Pfitzner's Three Preludes from "Palestrina," scheduled for its first performance at these concerts.

But aside from the Wagenaar Symphony, there was yet another first for Boston—the overture to "Béatrice et Bénédict," a comic opera by Berlioz based on Shakespeare's "Much Ado About Nothing." It is a spirited, jovial piece of writing, an ear-tickling curtain-raiser, undeserving of its neglect. Aided by Mr. Munch's programming, Boston will rediscover Berlioz.

After Mr. Burgin's pedestrian reading of the Brahms, the lanky Dutch-American, Mr. Wagenaar, mounted the podium to conduct his new work—a 23-minute symphony in five short movements.

Since Mr. Wagenaar admits to being a neo-romantic, we can take him at his word and add a few more. His new symphony is reminiscent of several late-romantic styles. The shimmering harmonies of French impressionism appear in his introduction. The Andantino also leaned toward the impressionistic, though its curious rhythm—bars of three beats alternating with bars of two—add a clever twist to the graceful melody.

The lively scherzo is "through-composed," a term used by Mr. Wagenaar to indicate the use of several themes in a continuous line. It is strictly horn-pipe material. The Adagio movement then leans toward the romanticism of Sibelius with its dark moods in the strings, its long melody carried by the English horn, and again by the flute and clarinet. Mr. Wagenaar's adept use of chromatic harmony was especially apparent in the fast first and final movements.

All these things add up to a piece that is pleasant to hear but of no great originality. Yet we can hardly criticize him on this point since he readily admits that he is not pioneering, that this symphony contains nothing new. In that case he has reached his aim. Mr. Wagenaar has a fine control of technique and craftsmanship. He should set his sights higher.

Schubert's delightful Second Symphony has met with strange neglect in Boston. This week end marks its second hearing here: the first took place in 1944 under Mitropoulos. Mr. Burgin's successful reading was the high light of the program.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER
DEC 20 1949

Aid And Comfort.

Composers of music should certainly feel encouraged and grateful to Serge Koussevitzky for the fund of $100,000 which he has established to help them. This endowment is an outgrowth of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation established in memory of his first wife, Natalie. Henceforth it will be administered by the Library of Congress, which also has been made the recipient of a large collection of original manuscripts, formerly a part of the Koussevitzky Foundation.

This is all to the good, for presumably this money will be used for the commissioning of new works. Composers of socalled "serious" or "art" music need all the material assistance of this kind that they can get. Unlike their fellow creative artists in other mediums—writers, painters or sculptors, or even interpretive musicians — they would find themselves hard-put to live off the royalties from their compositions. In fact they probably would starve if they tried to. Almost without exception they earn their living by teaching or, if they are proficient enough as performers or conductors, by giving concerts. Some, like Sibelius or the late Richard Strauss, to name two ranking composers of the day, have been aided by state subsidies or lucrative marriages or both.

The composition of good music, like the creation of fine poetry, is important, but unfortunately brings in little financial reward. That is why foundations like the one set up by Dr. Koussevitzky are so drastically needed.

[67]

David Nilsson

MUNCH & KOUSSEVITZKY
No more kisses in the greenroom

peat it in exactly the same way . . . Your inflections might be different."

Where many musicians felt that Koussevitzky had no confidence in them (snaps Koussy: "I never trust an orchestra until it has given me what I expect"), Munch has won them because he respects them both as men and musicians. He has the same respect ("One must be most faithful") for the composer whose work he is performing.

To many Bostonians, after a fortnight of Munch their orchestra was already beginning to sound a trifle different, more relaxed and spontaneous. Expert ears, such as those of Harvard's Composer Walter Piston, found it "less fat." Composer Aaron Copland thought that "Munch probably looks for sonority more than Koussevitzky. And the orchestra didn't have quite the violence that it has now."

Bostonians would hear pretty much the same kind of programs: Munch's devotion to the moderns is second only to Koussevitzky's. But they would find it a little harder to know the man than his music. Munch's easy assurance on the podium is matched by an often moody shyness away from it.

After concerts he usually hurries out of the greenroom, nods to the waiting knot of well-wishers, then pops into his black Oldsmobile sedan for a dash home to Brush Hill Road in suburban Milton (the former home of the late Bishop William Lawrence). Only when he reaches the sanctuary of his second-story study, with Roger, his chauffeur-valet of 20 years' service hovering around him, does he seem to draw a relaxed breath.

He likes Americans but he is slightly afraid of tackling large groups of them, partly because of language difficulties. So far he has been to only two Boston parties; once there, he charmed everyone he met. He likes to take short walks around the neighborhood with his Welsh terrier Pompey, once stopped to help a neighbor rake the leaves off his lawn.

Summers in York. But most of the time, Charles Munch likes to work over scores at his small kidney-shaped desk or at the spinet piano in his study. On mornings when there is a rehearsal, he gets up at 8, eats an unusually hearty breakfast of bacon, scrambled eggs and tea (says Madame Munch: "In Boston we have not yet found good bread"). After rehearsals, if he has no engagement in town, he scoots back to the quiet of Brush Hill Road for luncheon.

He has already developed a taste for a Boston specialty, New England clam chowder, but his favorite dishes are still pot-au-feu and kidneys cooked with Chablis. "You see," says Madame Munch, "he has a modest taste." He likes a good nip of Scotch, is amazed that he has been unable to find good Alsatian vintages in the U.S.

Once a year, however, as long as he keeps the Boston conductorship, Munch expects to go back where they know about such things. His two-year contract (with an optional third) allows him plenty of free time in the summers, and he and Madame Munch plan to spend their vacations in Paris, [illegible]

There are many things to draw him there. He is an enthusiastic amateur Egyptologist; his 14-room apartment near the Bois de Boulogne is cluttered with Egyptian statuettes and old Dutch etchings. He also likes to take an occasional lesson in harmonious coordination of mind and body at Madame Godreano's "Center for Psycho-Motor Education" (see cut). But he is fascinated with the U.S. and pleased with the thought of staying a while. Moreover, if Conductor Munch grows old in Boston, as last week seemed very likely, it was quite possible that Frenchman Munch might develop a taste for the beer, the bread and the beans.

His Own Symphony

Composer's Fourth Heard In Its First Performance

By Harold Rogers

Symphony Hall officials made three last-minute changes, when Charles Munch, indisposed, was absent from the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon.

Richard Burgin, concertmaster, took the podium in Mr. Munch's stead. Bernard Wagenaar came forward to conduct the première of his Fourth Symphony. The Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn replaced Pfitzner's Three Preludes from "Palestrina," scheduled for its first performance at these concerts.

But aside from the Wagenaar Symphony, there was yet another first for Boston—the overture to "Béatrice et Bénédict," a comic opera by Berlioz based on Shakespeare's "Much Ado About Nothing." It is a spirited, jovial piece of writing, an ear-tickling curtain-raiser, undeserving of its neglect. Aided by Mr. Munch's programming, Boston will rediscover Berlioz.

After Mr. Burgin's pedestrian reading of the Brahms, the lanky Dutch-American, Mr. Wagenaar, mounted the podium to conduct his new work—a 23-minute symphony in five short movements.

Since Mr. Wagenaar admits to being a neo-romantic, we can take him at his word and add a few more. His new symphony is reminiscent of several late-romantic styles. The shimmering harmonies of French impressionism appear in his introduction. The Andantino also leaned toward the impressionistic, though its curious rhythm—bars of three beats alternating with bars of two—add a clever twist to the graceful melody.

The lively scherzo is "through-composed," a term used by Mr. Wagenaar to indicate the use of several themes in a continuous line. It is strictly horn-pipe material. The Adagio movement then leans toward the romanticism of Sibelius with its dark moods in the strings, its long melody carried by the English horn, and again by the flute and clarinet. Mr. Wagenaar's adept use of chromatic harmony was especially apparent in the fast first and final movements.

All these things add up to a piece that is pleasant to hear but of no great originality. Yet we can hardly criticize him on this point since he readily admits that he is not pioneering, that this symphony contains nothing new. In that case he has reached his aim. Mr. Wagenaar has a fine control of technique and craftsmanship. He should set his sights higher.

Schubert's delightful Second Symphony has met with strange neglect in Boston. This week end marks its second hearing here; the first took place in 1944 under Mitropoulos. Mr. Burgin's successful reading was the high light of the program.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER
DEC 20 1949

Aid And Comfort.

Composers of music should certainly feel encouraged and grateful to Serge Koussevitzky for the fund of $100,000 which he has established to help them. This endowment is an outgrowth of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation established in memory of his first wife, Natalie. Henceforth it will be administered by the Library of Congress, which also has been made the recipient of a large collection of original manuscripts, formerly a part of the Koussevitzky Foundation.

This is all to the good, for presumably this money will be used for the commissioning of new works. Composers of so-called "serious" or "art" music need all the material assistance of this kind that they can get. Unlike their fellow creative artists in other mediums—writers, painters or sculptors, or even interpretive musicians — they would find themselves hard-put to live off the royalties from their compositions. In fact they probably would starve if they tried to. Almost without exception they earn their living by teaching or, if they are proficient enough as performers or conductors, by giving concerts. Some, like Sibelius or the late Richard Strauss, to name two ranking composers of the day, have been aided by state subsidies or lucrative marriages or both.

The composition of good music, like the creation of fine poetry, is important, but unfortunately brings in little financial reward. That is why foundations like the one set up by Dr. Koussevitzky are so drastically needed.

[67]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 18

KOUSSEVITZKY GIFT

He Turns Over Funds and Manuscripts To Library of Congress Foundation

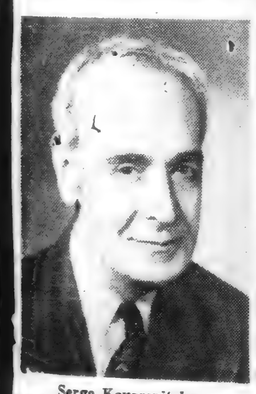
By OLIN DOWNES

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S gift to the Library of Congress of the funds and manuscripts of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, Inc., now to be known as the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation in the Library of Congress, is an event properly characterized by Luther H. Evans, Librarian of Congress, as "an event assured to exert a benign and growing influence upon the history of music throughout the world."

This is no more than the fact. The past productions of this foundation, in the form of new works by composers in America and abroad, which in a number of instances have become important elements of the modern repertory, are testimony to it. The foundation was established in 1942 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky's first wife, Natalie Koussevitzky. It continued and perpetuated, in a special way, the policies of the music publishing firm of S. and N. Koussevitzky established many years previously, early in Koussevitzky's career, in Russia. For Koussevitzky's concept of music publishing was one that arrived not at profits but at the encouragement, in the most practical and progressive manner possible, of the interests of the composer, and hence the propagation of the musical art.

Friend of Composer

In America, as conductor for twenty-five years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky sought as interpreter to further especially, the talents of young American composers, while his natural bent as a musical modernist was always in favor of the progressive composers of all nations whose art, he felt, was particularly in need of the public understanding. Last year Dr.



Serge Koussevitzky.

Koussevitzky came to the conclusion that the foundation's activities could not be continued more advantageously for its purposes than under the distinguished auspices of such an institution as the Library of Congress.

This is seen to be especially the case when one recalls the exceptionally significant work that the music division of the Congressional Library has done for the performance and dissemination of music since 1925. At that time, thanks to the establishment of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, the library acquired its own modest concert hall for programs of less than orchestral dimensions. In this place it has brought to early performance the chamber music compositions commissioned by Mrs. Coolidge's foundation and other works of vital interest to the public. In giving actual performance to music otherwise destined, so far as the library was concerned, to a highly honorable and by no means useless place on its shelves, that great institution has materially vitalized and extended its cultural service to the public.

Other Grants

The library has also benefited from other musical foundations than Dr. Koussevitzky's, as, for instance, by the Gertrude Clarke Whitall Foundation which has presented it with the famous Stradivarius collection of five stringed instruments of that master, and a handsome sum for the purchase of manuscripts.

Owing to this fund the music division is in the possession of the largest single collection of Brahms manuscripts in existence, with numerous other treasures. Mrs. Coolidge's foundation has assured the library of possession of the manuscripts of the modern works of chamber music which constitute the foundation's special province. There are also foundations of more limited purpose, such as the Nicholas Longworth Foundation, for the giving of certain concerts, and the Dayton C. Miller Fund, with its unique collection of over 1,500 flutes and a voluminous literature on the subject.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Music Foundation is the broadest in its scope of them all. Its fund of over $100,000 is not, we believe, the largest, but the kinds of composition which it fosters are the most varied. Works in forms of symphony, opera, chamber music are included in its categories. An exhibition of scores which the Koussevitzky Foundation already has commissioned and received will soon be in order at the library.

The entire list of works which thus far have been commissioned is worth examination here. Two of the composers whom the foundation commissioned in 1942, the first year of its operation, were Benjamin Britten, whose opera, "Peter Grimes," has made the most important opera stages in America, including the Metropolitan where it was given in two successive seasons, and Europe; and Bohuslav Martinu's First Symphony, a work of delightful originality and beauty. Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra will surely rank as one of his best works and an ornament to the modern repertory. In the next year came the work we consider the strongest and most exuberant score William Schuman has produced—Symphony for Strings, which the following year won the prize of the Music Critics' Circle of this city.

Important Scores

Aaron Copland's Third Symphony, Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto and Walter Piston's Third Symphony were among the most important works by native-born composers produced on commission the following three seasons. Marc Blitzstein's opera, "Regina," after the "The Little Foxes" of Lillian Hellman, is now finishing a run on Broadway. Many of the works here listed have not been heard by the writer, but he considered Francesco Malapiero's Fourth Symphony an outstanding score of the vintage of 1947. The number of works now under commission but not as yet completed is eloquent testimony to the foundation's activity and perspective.

The full list of commissions follows:

1942 Nicolai Berezowsky—Symphony No. 4
Benjamin Britten—Opera, "Peter Grimes"
Samuel Barber—Opera (in preparation)
Bohuslav Martinu—Symphony No. 1
1943 Bela Bartok—Concerto for Orchestra
Igor Stravinsky—Ode
William Schuman—Symphony for Strings
William Bergsma—Second String Quartet
Robert Palmer—String Quartet
1944 Darius Milhaud—Symphony No. 2
Aaron Copland—Symphony No. 3
Nikolai Lopatnikoff—Concertino for Orchestra
Burrill Phillips—Overture for Orchestra, "Tom Paine"
1945 Olivier Messiaen—Symphony
Heitor Villa-Lobos—Madona
Howard Hanson—Piano Concerto
Lukas Foss—Capriccio for 'Cello and Piano
Alexei Haieff—Eclogue for 'Cello and Piano
David Diamond—Symphony No. 4
Harold Shapero—Symphony (for Classical Orchestra)
Nikolai Nabokov—"The Return of Pushkin" (Soprano and Orchestra)
1946 Walter Piston—Symphony No. 3
Marc Blitzstein—"Regina" ("The Little Foxes"), Opera
1947 Roy Harris—Symphony (in preparation)
Francesco Malipiero—Fourth Symphony
Arnold Schoenberg—composition for symphony orchestra, "Survivor from Warsaw"
Bass Galindo—composition for 'Cello with Piano
Earl George—Arioso for 'Cello and Piano
1948 Randall Thompson—Symphony (not completed)
Arthur Honegger—Composition for Orchestra (not completed)
1949 Arthur Lourie—Opera (not completed)
Tadeusz Kassern—Opera (not completed)
Virgil Thomson—Opera (not completed)
Peter Mennin—Chamber Music Work (not completed)
Irving Fine—Chamber Music Work (not completed)

Same Directors

The same directors who constituted the advisory board of the original Koussevitzky Foundation will function in the Serge Koussevitzky Foundation in the Library of Congress, with the single exception of the absence of the departed Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, who was the vice chairman. As it stands, Dr. Koussevitzky is chairman, with Aaron Copland, Howard Hanson, Gregor Piatigorsky, William Schuman, Richard Burgin and Leonard Bernstein. Harold Spivacke, head of the music division of the library, is ex officio also a board member.

It seems to us that there could not have been a more fortunate provision taken for the future operation of the Koussevitzky Foundation, or that the music division of the library could have more auspiciously extended its resources for the best purposes than by this means.

And this may have a more significant bearing upon the future of America's artistic development than we yet know, in these times when the trend is to be more and more in the direction of music fostered by learned institutions and foundations—rather than by private individuals. Percentages of public moneys have in a number of instances been devoted to artistic activities which neither generous individuals nor musical institutions of a commercial or semi-commercial sort could maintain. In the meantime, one salutes this very forward step taken through the wise and generous-minded chairman of the Koussevitzky Foundation for its security and effective functioning in years to come, and the enterprise and zeal shown by the Music Division of the Congressional Library in the foundation's acquisition.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
DEC 24 1947

The Koussevitsky Fund

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky's latest gift to music is one in which Washingtonians especially will be interested. It takes the form of an endowment of creative music in the guardianship of the Library of Congress. The donor wants to stimulate the writing of great melodies. Those associated with him in the foundation include the composers, Aaron Copland, Howard Hanson and William Schuman. With the help of these collaborators, the former conductor of the Boston Symphony will carry on the work he began many years ago when he first commissioned new efforts of composition. His investment of 1942 already has yielded 35 scores.

The Library of Congress obviously is an appropriate depository for such manuscripts, and Dr. Koussevitsky is following excellent precedent when he stipulates that the world's greatest bibliographic establishment shall be the custodian of the texts he sponsors. But it is not simply as a storehouse that the Library is to function in the foundation now being organized. Exactly what fecreasings and procedures of endowment are to be devised remains to be seen. The Library's recent experience with prizes for poetry will furnish guidance on what to avoid. It is plain that the music to be written for the Koussevitsky fund must be a product of the years and the conditions in which its authors live. They cannot be other than they are—modern men and women. It is useless to expect them to write as Palestrina did in the sixteenth century or Beethoven or Wagner in the nineteenth. They cannot be mere imitators of Bach or Mozart or Schumann or Schubert or Chopin or Debussy or anybody else.

But that does not mean that music is an art without canons or that experimentation is a proper end in itself. The composers who take advantage of Dr. Koussevitsky's offer must not be unfaithful to the high tradition of musical excellence which he himself has served all his active life. No one familiar with the history of his labors in Boston need be in any doubt about the soundness of his philosophy of art. The younger generations of writers and players will do well to adopt his example for their guidance. He has been neither reactionary nor radical. They too should be non-partisan, free from arbitrary dogma, faithful to nature, mindful of the essential humanity of their audiences. If this be their decision, the Koussevitsky fund should be a force and a power of unlimited value and worth.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch, conducting, gave the ninth program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall. Raya Garbousova, cellist, was the soloist. The program:
Suite from the Water Music ..... Handel
Concerto in D major for Cello ..... Haydn
Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74 ..... Tchaikovsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It is impossible to discuss this, the ninth (and one of the best) concert of the season, without invoking comparisons. For with Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony Charles Munch performed a work that was Koussevitzky's own speical province; nobody in our time ever made it more his own than Koussevitzky, and nobody in our time ever achieved a more spectacular incandescence with it.

Thus it is one of the miracles of the re-creative spirit that Mr. Munch could have achieved what he did yesterday afternoon: endow this immensely effective work with an entirely new sound, a new esthetic and a new meaning while at the same time conveying every familiar emotional component.

As John Burk pointed out in his brilliant essay on the Sixth Symphony in the program book, Tchaikovsky was not wholly personal, wholly subjective in the depiction of sorrow and personal anguish this symphony has come to mean to most listeners. It is certainly as "pathetic," as melancholy, and as heart-breaking as any music, but to Mr. Munch this despair is that of a man for the world he knows, as well as for himself.

The difference thus, outside the tonal nuances (which with Mr. Munch are lighter and clearer but still of the greatest radiance and power), is that of the universal as contrasted with the personal. Mr. Munch sets forth the melancholy of the world; Koussevitzky sets forth the melancholy of the individual. In Koussevitzky's performance one might weep for himself; in Mr. Munch's one might weep for all.

This is, of course, a fairly sentimental and certainly an over-simplified statement of the case that fails to discern the technical differences, which are many. But without going extensively into these differences, it is possible to say that Mr. Munch's orchestral technique is surer in that every voice, every balance, every aspect of the music itself is heard throughout. The significance of even the sound of the tam-tam in the climax of the finale, for example, is something I had never once heard before. Yet this is not to say that Koussevitzky did not, in an entirely different way, carry all before him in his recitation of the symphony.

Yesterday the audience broke into cheers and applause at the end of the third movement, a fact that clearly disturbed the conductor, who motioned for silence, but this movement builds up such tension that applause and cheering seems a necessary and indeed a reflective release.

Raya Garbousova, all in all, gave a splendid performance of Haydn's D major cello concerto. She did not always encompass the fierce technical difficulties this work supplies (only a supreme virtuoso can do so in any case), and occasionally her tone quality was not as resplendent as it might have been. But in the upper registers, particularly in the lyrical passages with which this work abounds, she played with beauty and poetry, and she was superbly accompanied by Mr. Munch and the orchestra.

The Handel "Water Music" proved extremely grateful in Mr. Munch's conception (for it is music of the utmost charm) and its difficult horn passages were superbly done by James Stagliano and the members of the horn section. Mr. Munch also singled out Manuel Valerio for his clarinet playing in the Tchaikovsky, but he could have singled out every member of the orchestra for its unbelievable playing throughout.

Next week we are to hear Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," with Vera Zorina, Frances Yeend, Edna Mayer, Marion Hawkes, David Lloyd, Edmund Hurshell and a chorus prepared by Arthur Fiedler as assisting artists.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24

MUSIC

Volcanic Performance of Tchaikovsky 'Pathetic' Symphony by Munch

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch gave a memorable performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday and thereby showed us another side of his many-faceted and unpredictable musical nature. This reading ended in brilliance and furore what up to that point had been a pleasant, but undistinguished concert, with a pre-holiday audience sitting in polite and coughing apathy.

But when the Friday audience filed out of Symphony Hall they knew—or ought to have known—that they had undergone a stunning experience. For this was a truly volcanic interpretation, the ultimate in passion, and a very personal reading because it brought out details that many people had not noticed before.

There had been much curiosity when Mr. Munch announced the work, his first Tchaikovsky since he became conductor, because Tchaikovsky had been a Koussevitzky specialty. Would the Alsatian play the febrile Slav perfunctorily? We got the answer in the first five minutes. Munch drove the orchestra, mostly at tempi faster than Koussevitzky's, and reached a peak of almost frightening intensity in the raging emotion of the march and the anguish of the finale.

This was an artistic expression as raw, naked and violent as only real life can be. Koussevitzky's "Pathetic" was also memorably passionate, but it was clothed over with a certain elegance, with the fabulous, purple richness of the Koussevitzky tone. Munch's brass and woodwinds are brighter, almost piercing, his strings thinner and more forceful. Certain inner details, notably that stroke of the tam-tam, near the end, which might be the stroke of death itself, were emphasized as I never have heard them before.

Where Koussevitzky made the Symphony a grand tonal tragedy, Munch makes it as biting as life itself. There lies the basic difference between the two approaches, and beyond that point the two cannot be compared. This is not music or performance for complacent souls. He who complains of exaggeration is merely whistling down the wind, for in the "Pathetic" are dark and even ugly intimations easily related to the personal life of the neurotic composer.

In his demoniac treatment, Munch brings these vividly alive. "Demoniac" is the word, because when ill-judged applause broke out after the march, and he turned in sudden indignant protest, his face was a mask, stern and rapt. Incidentally, Mr. Munch was justified in so doing, but so long as people react to loud, fast music, they will joyfully pound their palms.

The afternoon had begun amiably, in the brave flourishes and a delicate performance of six movements from the "Water Music" of Handel, in the scoring of the late Sir Hamilton Harty, a version hitherto unplayed by this orchestra. Then came Haydn's benign Cello Concerto with Raya Garbousova as an acceptable but hardly remarkable soloist. The evening concert of the week had been given on Thursday, to avoid Christmas Eve.

[64]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music ranging from the jubilant to the tragic was offered by Charles Munch at the ninth Friday afternoon concert yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. Beginning with six movements from Handel's "Water Music" (in an orchestral setting by Hamilton Harty), the concert started on the sprightly side.

This jovial mood continued in the Haydn D Major Violoncello Concerto, with Miss Raya Garbousova the admirable soloist.

Following the intermission came the Symphony in B Minor of Tchaikovsky and if the lugubrious ending seemed somewhat at odds with the joyous Christmas season, the unusually large number of college students in the audience evidently found it particularly stimulating.

Miss Garbousova's playing proved to be distinctive from both musical and technical viewpoints. Her tone was consistently buoyant and in the upper registers surprisingly mellow. The slow movement of the concerto was traversed with considerable depth of understanding and happily escaped being sentimental, while the concluding section was equally felicitous in adherence to style and mood.

Since the Tchaikovsky Symphony has long been established as a specialty of Mr. Munch's predecessor, some comparison between the two readings seemed unavoidable. Although the pace was generally more reasonable to my notion, the discourse, as a whole, seemed to lack cohesiveness. In spite of a masterly built-up third movement, the performance, to at least one listener, conveyed less eloquently than before the composer's moody reflections.

Or, possibly, we have become so used to the high-strung Koussevitsky version that anything else is bound to be somewhat of a let-down. At any rate, it was heartily applauded by the large audience which emerged from the final movement of Tchaikovskian gloom with spirited greetings to one another for a merry Christmas.

HARRY LAWTON.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 10th program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon. The program was devoted to Honegger's "Joan of Arc At the Stake." The principals were Vera Zorina, Arnold Moss, Frances Yeend, Edna Mayer and Robert Irwin, sopranos; Marion Hawkes, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; Edmond Hurshell, bass; a chorus prepared by Arthur Fiedler, and members of the boys' choir of the Mission Church, Rodolphe Pepin, director.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The first Boston performance of Arthur Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake" in Symphony Hall brings up a question that has considerable bearing on the proper appreciation of this noble work, and that is this: what is the role of the program book? Is it a proper means to the end (which is the complete communication of a musical experience between performers and audience), or is it a bar to that communication?

Yesterday afternoon, and I hope I am not alone in my peevishness, the program was a barrier that stood between me and what I know is a great musico-dramatic experience. My nose, like the noses of 2500 others was buried in the program throughout trying to follow the French words to this exalted drama. My thumb, and the thumbs of 2500 others, turned every page with a silly rustle . . . and always, like the person who always coughs during the only moment of silence, at the wrong time.

All this would indicate I feel "Joan" should be done in English (I do not, incidentally), but even in English works we all follow along in the program so that is no solution, either. There are only two solutions that occur to me, and one is to supply only the general narrative of the work in the program. The other is to read the program before or afterwards, but sit on it during the work. And since we all know the story of Joan is as familiar to us as the story of Abraham Lincoln, there is nothing to lose.

Indeed, in Honegger's great work there is everything to gain. For this is a work of the most nationalistic character that still, such is the wonder of music, conveys the drama of Joan's last agony in retrospect. One need only be apprised of the general outline of the work. The imagination, as inflamed by Honegger's inspired musical setting and the unbelievably fine traversal offered by Mr. Munch and the assisting artists, can do all the rest. Better and more completely, in fact, than any uncertain reading of a language few in the audience really perfectly command.

Honegger's treatment of Claudel's text finds Joan of Arc (superbly personified and recited by Vera Zorina, who captures all of the heroic purity and faith of the character without the slightest touch of theatricality) surrounded by the visions of her last torment. These, the evil ministers of the church, the corrupt monarchs, the violent throngs, are intermingled with the remembrance of her childhood, the voices of her saints, the sounds and sights of her own Lorraine.

And all these are personified by the orchestra (whose role is rather that of commentator and observer than that of participant), the chorus, individual members of the chorus who sometimes speak, a boys' choir, a speaker impersonating Father Dominic, and soloists representing the saints, the heralds, the nobles and various voices.

The music is often of the greatest beauty and radiance (what could be more marvelous than the concluding strains of the flute soaring above the orchestra?) and Honegger, rather than literally portraying the violence, suggests it only. This is music of sensation, of emotion, of passion, but it never descends to sensationalism or vulgar effect. It is, in fine, a very great work, perhaps one of the milestones of the first half of the century.

Its performance yesterday was a vast tribute both to Mr. Munch, who did it with immense conviction, and to Arthur Fiedler, who prepared the chorus. This chorus, indeed, is the finest I ever heard sing with an orchestra. It had first of all vocal quality, a rare occurrence in choruses, but it also had nuance, control and balance.

I hope it becomes the Boston Symphony Chorus; we've long needed one. Great credit is also due the soloists, Frances Yeend, Edna Mayer, Marian Hawkes, David Lloyd, the boy soprano Robert Irwin, and Edmond Hurshell, while sharing honors with Miss Zorina as speaker was Arnold Moss, whose Dominic was splendid.

The speakers of the chorus, too, were excellent. The concert opened with the Allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in memoriam of Mrs. Helen Dane. And once more, if you really want to live the experience of "Joan of Arc at the Stake," sit on your program.

MUSIC

Honegger's 'Joan of Arc at the Stake' in Boston Premiere at Symphony

"Jeanne d'Arc au Bucher" ("Joan of Arc at the Stake"), dramatic oratorio with text by Paul Claudel and music by Arthur Honegger, given first performance in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, speaking parts taken by Vera Zorina (Jeanne); Arnold Moss (Frere Dominque), and others; singing parts taken by Frances Yeend and Edna Mayer, sopranos; Marion Hawkes, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; Edmond Hurshell, bass, and Robert Irwin, boy soprano. Adult chorus, and members of the Boys' Choir of the Mission Church (Rodolphe Pepin, director); prepared by Arthur Fiedler. Ondes Martenot played by Ginette Martenot. Preceded by allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in memory of the late Mrs. Ernest B. Dane.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Arthur Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake" is a masterpiece of modern dramatic music, and its Boston premiere yesterday will stand out as one of the most important events of this season.

Extraordinary in its emotional effect, unusual in form and perhaps unique in its blending of orchestra with chorus and both singing and speaking solo voices, the work traces the short life and martyrdom of France's heroine, Joan of Arc.

It is done in what the movies call a "flash-back". Frere Dominique, speaking with the spirit of the executed Joan, opens to her a book of her life and death, and explains to her that the clerics who tried her were "no true ministers of God, but beasts in the trappings of divinity."

Sung and spoken in French, "Joan of Arc at the Stake" is no dry or cerebrally remote work of art, but something direct and living and infinitely touching. The form is fluid, and the chorus and voices weave in and out, the spoken words of accusation having an especially terrifying effect.

In the course of depicting Joan's career, and in symbolizing her judges as beasts, Honegger has worked in music of remarkable individuality, and sometimes of truly cynical quality—something rarely encountered. There is a card game among the sovereigns and nobility of England, France and Burgundy; the beasts sit in judgment; the people dance, and against this phantasmagoria sounds always the gentle and innocent voice of Joan, steadfast to her faith though in terror of the fire.

Toward the end she communicates with her beloved voices of Saints Catherine and Marguerite, and the Virgin counsels her.

The idiom is largely dissonant, but dissonance with expressive purpose, alternated with definitely "sweet" harmony. In an orchestra which contains three saxophones and the electronic ondes martenot, but no horns, are traces of ragtime rhythm in the more fantastic pages; snatches of what sounds like a very old carol; fragments of an old dance. Rhythmically this work is fascinating, marvelously varied and subtle.

This, the first big choral score to be presented here by Charles Munch, was rapturously applauded by the Friday subscribers. The conductor, whose reading was as supple as the music itself, was called back again and again. Miss Zorina, lovely in a white gown, spoke her part beautifully (so far as a Bostonian may judge French), and Mr. Moss read his lines poetically. Mmes. Yeend, Mayer and Hawkes; Messrs. Lloyd and Hurshell, and Master Robert Irwin (who deservedly had a bow all to himself) delivered their tricky roles admirably.

Arthur Fiedler, who organized and trained the chorus expressly for these performances (there will be another tonight) did a splendid job. He, too, was applauded warmly, when brought to the stage by Mr. Munch.

The concert opened with a memorial performance of the allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for the late Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, for many years a devoted supporter of the orchestra. By request of Mr. Munch, the audience received this tribute in silence.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
DEC 2

Washday Blues?

Special to the World-Telegram.

BOSTON, Dec. 27.—Whether or not it will be much solace to thirsty New Yorkers, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the famous "Water Music" suite by Handel when it appears at Carnegie Hall Jan. 11.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Charles Munch is evidently sold on Arthur Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake." He "produced" it in New York a year ago and at the Symphony concerts of this week is bringing to pass its first hearings in Boston. In order to do this he has put himself and other people to a deal of trouble. First it was the task of Arthur Fiedler to audition and select a chorus, and the results yesterday testified to his capability in this respect. The choral parts in this "dramatic oratorio" are exceedingly tricky and they were handled yesterday with sureness and confidence. In addition to this chorus there was a small boys' chorus drawn from the boys' choir of the Mission Church in Roxbury, Rodolphe Pepin, director, the group that performed so efficiently with the Metropolitan Opera Company a couple of seasons ago.

There are two important speaking parts, those of Jeanne and Frere Dominique, her wise counsellor, who at the end is enlightened by her. They are assigned in these performances to Vera Zorina and Arnold Moss who, as it seemed, could hardly have been bettered. The important singing parts were given to David Lloyd, tenor, and Edmund Hurshell, bass, both of whom were excellent. Smaller roles were in the competent hands of Frances Yeend and Edna Mayer, sopranos, and Marion Hawkes, contralto. Robert Irwin supplied the needed child's voice.

For more statistics, the main body of the work was finished in 1935, the prologue in 1934. It is difficult to tell whether the composer intended his setting of Paul Claudel's poem to be performed as a concert piece or staged as a sort of mystery play. It has been done both ways but would gain, I think, in the latter form. The job of the audience, as the work was heard yesterday, is to follow the French text, and if you do not know what is being said or sung you might as well not be there. The piece is extremely complicated textually, being part history and part allegory. For example, in one section Jeanne's accusers are represented as beasts. In another, the kings, whose pawn she was, are transformed into playing cards. But to describe the work any more fully would leave no room for comment.

We have long known that Honegger is a resourceful composer and this score bears impressive witness to his skill. The music is in many styles: To treat the beasts in the proper satirical fashion he borrows from the dance hall. When it is appropriate, the folk element is prominent. Mostly the music strikes you as a tour de force but there are eloquent moments as well as engaging ones. Conspicuous among the former are the sombre beginning and the serenely exalted close. Mr. Munch had his instrumental and other forces well in hand, and the performance seemed to leave nothing to be desired. It had been originally planned to devote the concert to this work alone but the recent death of Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, whose husband was long a treasurer and benefactor of the orchestra, caused Mr. Munch to perform in her memory the Allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. It was beautifully played.

Mrs. E. B. Dane Of Brookline Dead at 82

Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, 82, of 360 Heath street, Chestnut Hill, one of the best known residents of Brookline and noted for her philanthropic work, died yesterday at "Roughwood," her Brookline estate.

Born Helen Pratt in Brooklyn, N. Y., on July 9, 1867, she was the last member of the Pratt family which was prominently identified with the Standard Oil Company and the Pratt Institute at Brooklyn.

She was mother of Edward Dane, present chairman of the Brookline board of selectmen and president of the Brookline Trust Company, and Ernest B. Dane, Jr., of Belmont, a scientist at MIT.

Her husband, who died in 1942, was a Brookline selectman for 15 years and preceded his son as president of the bank. She was a resident of Brookline since her marriage to Mr. Dane in 1901. Together they carried out many philanthropic works including distribution of Thanksgiving baskets to the needy for more than 40 years.

Since her husband's death, Mrs. Dane continued to support many charities. She was greatly interested in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and won many prizes throughout the country for orchids which she grew in the greenhouse on her estate.

She also leaves nine grandchildren.

Funeral services will be Tuesday at 2 P. M. at the First Church in Chestnut Hill.

Boston Symphony to Bring Water Music to Arid New York

Water-short New York will hear water music the next time the Boston Symphony plays there.

The program for the Jan. 11 concert in Carnegie Hall, as announced today by Conductor Charles Munch, includes Handel's "Water Music" Suite.

Conductor Munch would not say whether the music was chosen by accident or design, but it is calculated to make listeners think how pleasant is the sound of music drifting across water.

According to legend Handel composed the Suite for King George I and it was played by barge-borne musicians as His Majesty was boating on the Thames.

AY, DECEMBER 27, 1949

New Yorkers to Get Water, Via Symphony

Even the Boston Symphony Orchestra is doing its bit to help New York City over its critical water shortage.

According to Charles Munch, the orchestra's conductor, Handel's "Water Music" Suite will be on the program at the orchestra's Carnegie Hall concert Jan. 11.

This suite is said to have been written for a group of musicians on a barge floating down the River Thames as King George I of England listened.

What effect it will have on parched New Yorkers is not known.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 30 1949

Poulenc Will Be Soloist For His Concerto Here

Francis Poulenc, French composer-pianist, will be the soloist in the first performances of his new piano concerto by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch in its Boston concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Jan. 6 and 7. He will also play the new work with this orchestra in its concerts in Washington on Thursday night, Jan. 12, and here at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 14. Pierre Bernac, French baritone, who gave joint recitals with Mr. Poulenc last season, will arrive next week for a tour with the composer, opening with a Town Hall recital on Sunday night, Jan. 22. Mr. Poulenc will also attend rehearsals for the first American performance of his cantata, "Figure Humaine," by the Schola Cantorum under Hugh Ross at Carnegie Hall on Friday night, Feb. 17.

According to his American managers, Francis C. Coppicus and Frederick C. Schang, Mr. Poulenc still hopes for an American production of his comic opera, "Les Mamelles de Tirésias," first staged in Paris two years ago. Plans for a New York production this season were announced by Lemonade Opera, but that group halted its projected fall and winter season last October.

— 'Jeanne d'Arc au Bûcher' at the Symphony

Honegger Oratorio, With Speakers and Soloists, Presented by Munch

By Rudolph Rogers

In 1935 two Frenchmen, Paul Claudel and Arthur Honegger, collaborated on a dramatic oratorio of monumental proportions, "Jeanne d'Arc au Bûcher." (Joan of Arc at the Stake.") Claudel wrote the text and Honegger the music, the basis of which was suggested by Ida Rubinstein, the dedicatee.

Yesterday afternoon Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a large aggregation of speakers, soloists, and choristers, gave the first Boston production of this work. He will repeat it at the concert tonight in Symphony Hall.

There are two main speaking roles, those of Jeanne and her counselor, Frère Dominique. These are carried by Vera Zorina (who was also seen as Jeanne in the first American performance two years ago in New York) and by Arnold Moss.

Since the role of Jeanne is naturally the focal point, Miss Zorina is required to set an exalted mood and to sustain it, even if the music should proceed contrary to the mood. This she achieves through intense concentration and simple gestures. Her long white gown, trimmed with silver at the collar and the waist, is suggestive of her purity and sublime faith.

Claudel's French was rendered in well-matched poetic style, inflection, and diction by Miss Zorina and Mr. Moss. From a celestial vantage point, Jeanne and Dominique are supposed to survey the events in Jeanne's career. The figures of her judges appear allegorically as animals, her persecutors as a deck of cards. All of the latter engage in a grotesque game with Jeanne as the pawn.

Honegger penned a descriptive score consisting of many satirical scherzos—passages representing a pig, an ass, the card game, the farcial trial. Yet through it all is an underlying theme of faith, of comfort provided by Jeanne's saints, Marguerite and Catherine. This undercurrent eventually wells up to flood away the forces of evil that culminated in Jeanne's martyrdom.

David Lloyd sang the tenor solos with bombast befitting the several characters he represented. The other solo parts, shorter but beautifully sung, were taken by Frances Yeend and Edna Mayer, sopranos, Marion Hawkes, contralto, and Edmond Hurshell, bass. Miss Mayer and Miss Hawkes are students in the New England Conservatory of Music.

Mr. Munch worked vigorously to tie up the various ingredients into one neat package. Even though there were a few loose strings left over, his work was unusually well done. Lack of focus, particularly in the choral parts, was the most obvious fault. But he didn't train the chorus.

Vera Zorina, who has the speaking role of Jeanne d'Arc in Honegger's dramatic oratorio, "Jeanne d'Arc au Bûcher," presented at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts this week end.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
COMPASS
DEC 29 1949

Poll Selects Ten 'Men of The Year'

Serge Koussevitzky, Arthur Miller, Milton Berle and Stanley Kramer were named "Outstanding Men of 1949" in the entertainment world by 1,500 newspapermen in a poll conducted by "Year News Annual."

The 1,500 newspaper writers chose 10 men for honors in various fields of accomplishment. They are:

Statesmanship: Dean Acheson.
Religion: Albert Schweitzer.
World Peace: Ralph J. Bunche.
Sports: Jackie Robinson.
Education: Charles Seymour, president of Yale University.
Labor: Walter Reuther.
Music: Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony.
Radio and Television: Milton Berle.
Drama: Arthur Miller, author of "Death of a Salesman."
Movies: Stanley Kramer, producer of "Home of the Brave" and "Champion."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

GUESS WHO? Through the efforts of Dr. K. L. Hirschmann of Pittsfield, a personal friend of the photographer, the Berkshire Museum has now placed on exhibit a group of candid photographs of famous people. The pictures are the work of Fred Plaut of New York, a recording engineer with Columbia Records who takes his 35mm miniature camera with him at recording sessions and captures intimate shots of personalities. The exhibit here will be shown through January. In case you had not guessed, this shot is of Conductor Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PAGE FOURTEEN

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 11th program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Francis Poulenc, pianist-composer was the soloist. The program:

Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys".....Lalo
Symphony in C.....Bizet
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra.....Poulenc
Valses Nobles et Sentimentales.....Ravel
La Valse.....Ravel

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Again a memorable concert, this one composed entirely of French music of a light character but filled with elegance, wit, charm, distinction and a good bit of excitement.

All these qualities save perhaps excitement are entirely applicable to Poulenc's new piano concerto, yesterday afternoon given its first performance with the composer himself at the piano. The work does not add stature to this distinguished original member of "Les Six," but, on the other hand, it doesn't diminish it either. His purpose, which was evidently to compose something for himself to take on tour, called for nothing in particular but an easily assimilable, entertaining, but at the same time well-wrought piece. And that's what this is, nothing more or less.

Its first movement offers two genial melodies, one of them slightly Prokofieffian, the other French folksongian. The slow movement is a very attractive melody set against a likable rhythmical pulse, while the finale is what he calls a "Rondeau a la Francaise," a happy-go-lucky sort of thing, chiefly memorable for quoting "Way Down Upon the Swanee River" almost verbatim. (The program discloses that the tune is traditional French, which would suggest that Stephen Foster was capable of a funny coincidence himself.)

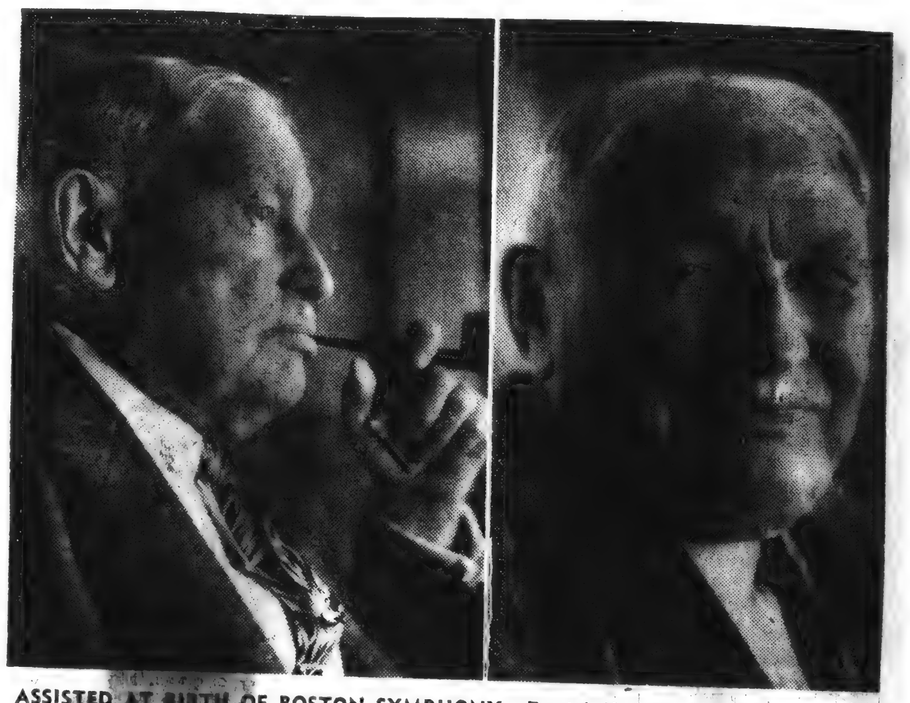
The concerto does not stress the role of the piano too much; indeed, it often seems decidedly obligato, and Mr. Poulenc does not even allow himself the luxury of a cadenza. Thus, though he certainly played the piece admirably, it is not possible to devote too much comment to his playing. It seemed all right to me, and Mr. Poulenc, looking half his years, got a very enthusiastic reception from the audience.

While Lalo's familiar Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" was notable both for Mr. Munch's exceedingly vivid conception and for some very beautiful solo playing by first clarinetist Manuel Valerio and first cellist Samuel Mayes, Bizet's little C major symphony was for me the high point of the concert. Though introduced in Boston 11 years ago by Arthur Fiedler and often heard on the air (via a recording by the New York Philharmonic) this was the first performance at these concerts, and it is not easy to convey the captivating quality of the work.

While the first movement of the symphony, composed by Bizet as a boy of 17, is completely Mozartean in mood and texture, you hear (or think you hear) the shadowy figures of the far-distant Carmen and the girl from Arles. At the end, in a finale of the utmost grace and lightness, it all disappears in a playful whirl of the violins. I wonder how long it'll be before some American boy of 17 ever manages to dash off a little thing so completely honest, so entirely unpretentious as this? Not, I suspect, until they get over the idea they either have to be geniuses writing for the 23rd century or nothing.

After all this, Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and "La Valse" (played without pause) came as just a little too much of a good thing. They were exquisitely and excitingly done by Mr. Munch, who never lets us forget they are waltzes even when, as in "La Valse," the composer symbolically destroys them, and they earned him an ovation (as well they might). For myself, I would have liked something of a different character, but far be it from me to quibble over a thing like that.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on Jan. 20 to do works of Bartok, Vaughan Williams (with Whittemore and Lowe) and Shostakovitch, Richard Burgin conducting. Incidentally, as the subscription series are sold out, those longing for a chance to hear Mr. Munch would be well advised to consider the Pension Fund concert tomorrow afternoon at which Yehudi Menuhin is the soloist in a very fine program.



ASSISTED AT BIRTH OF BOSTON SYMPHONY—Daniel Kuntz of the Hemenway Hotel, a retired musician, played in the Boston Symphony Orchestra the day it started, Oct. 22, 1881. He will be 90 years old in April.

Traveler Dec 6

[66]

—Munch, Poulenc, and French Music

Composer as Soloist in Symphony Première of Concerto

By Harold Rogers

If Charles Munch continues to turn out superb performances like the one he conducted yesterday afternoon, it may be that he will never read a newspaper account of his work—at least not one of mine. For Mr. Munch has instructed his colleagues to show him no reviews, except the bad ones.

It is a good thing when a man is not interested in the bouquets tossed his way. The humility of Mr. Munch's stage demeanor indicates that he places the music first, that his position here is to serve its cause.

His program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, to be heard again in Symphony Hall tonight, included four species of French music—works by Lalo, Bizet, Poulenc, and Ravel. A review could be written on Mr. Munch's interpretation of each. But since space does not permit, we shall get under way with Francis Poulenc, for a very good reason.

Last summer M. Poulenc wrote a Piano Concerto expressly for Mr. Munch and the Boston Symphony. Yesterday he was soloist in its première. It is an engaging work of much charm, slightly derivative, but true to the composer's personality. M. Poulenc has said that when he was younger, he was much impressed by Stravinsky's writing. Some of that impression remains.

But even so, it is Parisian music, sometimes saucy, sometimes sentimental, sometimes gay. The development of the Andante tended to bog a bit, but the restatements of its sweeping theme lifted it up and carried it through.

In the finale—Rondo à la Française—M. Poulenc quotes briefly from "A la claire fontaine," an old French song of striking resemblance to Stephen Foster's "Old Folks at Home." This, according to M. Poulenc, is symbolic of a handshake between France and America.

His performance at the keyboard was delicate, suave, entertaining. Afterward he bowed to enthusiastic applause and the stamping of feet.

Mr. Munch opened the program with a crystalline reading of Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." This he followed with Bizet's Symphony in C major, a first performance for the week-end concerts. Written when Bizet was 17 and unplayed until 1935, it is classical in form, yet it definitely points the way to the romantic Bizet we know so well. It was light and lively, graceful and ingratiating.

Mr. Munch's unusual programming of two Ravel compositions had an impact which neither work alone would carry. He first played the "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," composed in 1910. Then, without allowing applause, he followed it immediately with the Titanic "La Valse," written 10 years later.

Since much of the thematic material in the first is amplified and developed in the second, it is logical that the two works be performed as one suite. In the latter Mr. Munch tightened the tempo in a number of places, and to excellent effect. Generally "La Valse" tends to fall apart at the end when the mood becomes dark and the brasses threatening, but Mr. Munch gave it a pace that avoided anticlimax. He lifted Ravel to a new high.

ingly, with that composer's earlier "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales." Originally written for the piano and not infrequently heard in that form, they were subsequently orchestrated and were played by the Boston Symphony in that form in 1921. As is always the case with Ravel, the orchestration is interesting in its own right, but the best thing about the waltzes themselves is that they occasionally suggest "La Valse," and by it they were completely overshadowed yesterday.

For the rest, the current program lists in its first performance at these concerts Bizet's Symphony in C major and, in its first performance anywhere, the Concerto for piano and orchestra by Francis Poulenc, with the composer as a soloist. The symphony which Bizet wrote at the age of 17 came to light nearly 80 years later and was first performed in 1935, at Basel under Felix Weingartner. Four years later there was a performance at the Boston Pops. The symphony is charming, reminding you somewhat of Schubert, though in the pseudo-Orientalism of the adagio, there is a hint of Bizet himself. The gay finale is certainly French rather than Viennese, and it is quite plain that if Bizet had cared to, he could have made his mark as a symphonist. Instead, like so many 19th century Frenchmen, he was drawn to the theatre, and as a result we got "Carmen."

It took courage to write in 1949 a piece so completely untypical of the present spirit of music, as this concerto of Poulenc's. It also took invention and skill. Many modern composers take refuge in dissonant complexities because they couldn't write a tune if they tried. However, Mrs. Poulenc might have given us just a bit more modernity in this engaging piece, which, for all its charm and mastery of musical means, has a suspiciously old-fashioned sound. We had already taken Mr. Poulenc's measure as pianist when he appeared here with the baritone Pierre Bernac and it is good news that the two will return to Jordan Hall a week from Wednesday. The piano part in his concerto is hardly of a virtuoso order, but he played it most musically and was warmly acclaimed.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert began and ended with amazing performances of familiar compositions. In the case of the first of these, Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" the term "familiar" is used in a relative sense. Not since 1920 has this fine overture been heard at a Boston Symphony concert, though there have been subsequent performances at the Pops and by the now-defunct Peoples' Symphony.

It was difficult to see why Mr. Munch chose to preface Ravel's "La Valse," which he played so excit-

Amusements

MUSIC

Munch Conducts, Menuhin Soloist at Symphony Pension Fund Concert

BY CYRUS DURGIN

In prospect it was the 110th concert to benefit the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the first such to be conducted by Charles Munch. But, as it turned out, this was one of the memorable concerts of the year, with a classicism of performance that would not be common anywhere.

What made it so, was a thoroughly Brahmsian account of the Brahms Violin Concerto, with Yehudi Menuhin as soloist. Now, there are as many "versions," broadly speaking, of this work, as there are conductors and soloists.

But never in the years I have heard the Boston Symphony was that 19th century classic played at Symphony Hall with such thorough-going style and such a closely-jointed ensemble. The tempi were just right; nothing was exaggerated, nothing was overly dramatized. For once that much abused phrase, about "the music speaking for itself," was absolutely justified.

Mr. Menuhin's account of the solo part and the orchestral share under Mr. Munch was identical halves of a glorious whole. The phrasing was supple and full of grace; the dynamic emphasis was about the same one either side, and soloist and orchestra were smack together on the beat. Furthermore, orchestrally speaking, every measure was clear as sunlight, and there were a good many details that many in the audience must have forgotten about.

Next to Brahms, the secondary element of classicism was Schumann's Fourth Symphony, which ended the concert. Of this the same words applicable to Brahms were true. The Symphony went with grace and charm, and there was no strain to make the Symphony bigger or more emotional than it ought to be. In other words, this was impeccably accurate playing from a very great orchestra and a conductor who is a first-rate musician, with all that the word musician ought to imply.

Mr. Munch began with six movements from the "Water Music" of Handel, in the scoring of Sir Hamilton Harty, which the conductor had introduced here barely two weeks before. Through the afternoon the applause was generous from a near-capacity audience. Mr. Munch insisted upon Mr. Menuhin's accepting the principal share, after the Concerto, and it was evidently at his suggestion that Mr. Menuhin played a solo encore, the first movement from Bach's Suite in E major for unaccompanied violin. I think this was the first time that an encore had been heard at a Symphony concert since 1935, when, after playing the Rachmaninoff C minor Concerto, Walter Gieseking sat down and tossed off a solo piano version of Strauss' vocal Serenade.

All the performers yesterday, gave their services to a purpose which has no superior to those of

MUSIC

Munch Conducts French Program at Symphony; Poulenc Piano Soloist

BY CYRUS DURGIN

A choice selection of French music, lightweight and tuneful, elegant and charming, makes up the program in which Charles Munch conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. The result is concerts of sheer delight and endless fascination, because every one of the pieces is clever, inspired, or both.

The week's novelty is the Piano Concerto written last Summer by Francis Poulenc, and now given first performances with the composer an agile keyboard soloist. Concertino might be a better designation than Concerto, for here you have music brief and brilliant, sometimes witty, always vivacious. The first movement sparkles, the adagio is a quasi-romantic and very juicy interlude, and the "French Rondo" which is the last movement, is a combination of drollery and rhythmic piquancy.

The Concerto is the sort of piece into which it is easy to weave your own fancies, such as the impression that the themes—less themes than full-blown tunes—remind you of popular song melodies, as if Poulenc had set out to make a musical satire. The gentleman in O-29 said, the first theme sounds like "My Heart Belongs to Daddy." The rondo contains a fragment, supposedly of a French song, much like "Swanee River."

Only Poulenc can tell us what he had in mind. As a piano-symphonic work the Concerto is admirably made, the piano part is distinctive, and the whole has a pleasant air of urbanity and sophistication. Poulenc was very heartily applauded.

Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," the opening number, sounds wonderful when done so well as yesterday. It belongs to a large category of short pieces which have gone unheard here for many years. Now, let us hope, some of them will be welcomed back. As for the early C major Symphony of Bizet, new to these series, that has the youthful freshness and naivette of Schubert, of whom, to some extent, the music will remind you.

But most interesting, as a matter of interpretation, are the two Ravel scores in three-time which bring the concerts to an end: Valse Nobles et Sentimentales, and that apotheosis of the dance, "La Valse." The Valse Nobles et Sentimentales, composed a decade before "La Valse," are fanciful, relaxed, compared to the neurotic gayety and the submerged tensions of "La Valse." Yet the seeds of the second piece can be found in the first.

Munch's reading of "La Valse" is less sensuous than very sensual, to make a sharp distinction. He plays it fast, not lingering over the lush tunes. But every detail is clear as a landscape caught in a lightning flash, and the phantasmagoria of the conclusion is almost terrifyingly dramatic, as if the bursting tensions of a troubled world had blown the lid off civilized behavior. Koussevitzky's "La Valse" was orgiastic, but that of Munch is epic.

A word to those who do not subscribe to the Symphony series: the orchestra and its illustrious conductor may be heard next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 in their mid-season concert for the benefit of the pension fund. All concerned give their services. Yehudi Menuhin will be soloist in the Brahms Violin Concerto, and Munch will also conduct part of Handel's "Water Music" and the Fourth Symphony of Schumann.

MUSIC

Pension Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave its 110th Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, was the soloist. The program:

Water Music	Handel
Concerto in D, Op. 77	Brahms
Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120	Schumann

By RUDOLPH ELIE

A concert of sustained and noble beauty throughout, this one to benefit the pension fund of the orchestra, was especially noticeable for two things: the violin playing of Yehudi Menuhin and the masterly accompanimental art of Charles Munch.

Mr. Menuhin, who donated his services to the cause (and was rewarded with a handsome silver replica of the Paul Revere bowl presented and inscribed by the grateful orchestra as well as with one of the most prolonged demonstrations an artist with the orchestra has achieved), has come a long way since his last appearance here. Not technically, for his virtuosity has always been prodigious, but as a personality, as an interpretative artist.

Hitherto he always seemed a little remote, a little preoccupied. Yesterday there was a very becoming warmth about him, a sense of being at ease with himself, a sense of repose and of belonging. The communication was consequently immediate. He has probably played the Brahms Concerto 200 times, but yesterday's performance if not the most exciting I ever heard, was certainly one of the most human and one of the most illuminated.

Mr. Munch's part in all this cannot be overestimated. I have never heard a violinist so perfectly assisted in every detail by a conductor. Mr. Munch neither follows nor leads; he allows the soloist to express himself, yet constantly reminds the artist of his responsibility to the music. It is so perfect a musical thing it needs a good deal of discussion (which it will get at another time), for the role of the conductor in the perfect traversal of a concerto is little understood save by solo performers themselves. These poor devils are so much at the conductor's mercy the actual negotiating of the work is often the least of their worries. Be that as it may, the performance won, at the suggestion of Mr. Munch himself, a solo encore. This, the familiar violin arrangement from the E major Partita of Bach, seems to have been the third encore ever allowed at a concert of the Boston Symphony.

The concert opened with an ingratiating performance of Handel's delightful "Water Music" and came to a close with Schumann's Fourth Symphony, a work that emerged in Mr. Munch's hands as a romantic piece of the subtlest beauty filled with more lyrical sunlight than I ever happened to see in it before.

MENUHIN GIVES ENCORE IN HUB

Symphony Hall Audience Hails Violinist

Those people who were fortunate enough to purchase tickets for this year's pension fund concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon will long remember an inspired concert and a great performance by the soloist, Yehudi Menuhin. Conducted by Charles Munch, the orchestra and soloist even exceeded their usual top-form.

Mr. Munch and the orchestra opened the program with Handel's Water Music, arranged by Hamilton Harty, and played with such spark and zip that the listener was left gasping at the sheer incredulity of the amazing reading. The quartet of horns has a wickedly difficult part; yesterday they performed as effortlessly as if they were playing the C major scale in whole notes.

Not since Paderewski, Giesoking, and Sembrich were guest soloists with our orchestra have artists been allowed to play encores at a symphony concert. Yohudi Menuhin's name must now be added to this illustrious list! The violinist's playing of the Brahms Violin Concerto in D major was so powerful that the audience refused to allow him to leave the stage until he played an encore. This was the Bach Prelude in E major!

Unfortunately, the Schumann Fourth Symphony, which closed the concert, had a somewhat whooped-up quality. The tempi were much too fast causing the music to sound too melodramatic for the inner musical contents of the symphony. On the other hand, the audience loved every minute of the Schumann and cheered for minutes at its conclusion.

Not since Dr. Koussevitzky's farewell performance has your reviewer heard such tumultuous applause at any symphony concert.

TUCKER KEISER.

[67]

Menuhin as Pension Fund Soloist

Handel, Brahms, Schumann Conducted by Charles Munch

[illegible] Yehudi Menu- [illegible] the Boston Symphony [illegible]ned forces yester- [illegible] to produce the one- [illegible]nd-tenth Pension Fund [illegible] only a very few seats in [illegible] Hall went begging. [illegible] attended were reward- [illegible] an excellent program, [illegible] distinction.

Mr. Munch began with Sir Ham- [illegible]'s pristine arrangement [illegible] "Water Music," pris- [illegible] performance. Then we [illegible] Menuhin play the [illegible] Violin Concerto in D [illegible] For the concluding num- [illegible] Munch gave us Schu- [illegible] Fourth Symphony, the [illegible] Schumann he has pro- [illegible] since the beginning of [illegible]ctorship here.

* * *

Mr. Menuhin's extraordinary [illegible], of course, was the most compelling element of his per- [illegible]ce. Matters of bowing, a [illegible] tone, his agility with the [illegible]anifold stops—these things to [illegible] are second nature. Though one could wish for a freer com- [illegible]unication of the music's message, Mr. Menuhin was true to Brahms in style.

Mr. Munch cooperated by maintaining a sensitive balance between the orchestra and the solo fiddle. By the time they reached the Adagio movement, Mr. Menuhin had warmed up to a lyrical rendition of the singing melody. The finale came off with a great deal of gusto and called forth a prolonged ovation that won an extra for the listeners. It was Bach's Prelude to his Suite in E major for unaccompanied violin.

Mr. Menuhin surmounted the technical problems with astounding ease.

Mr. Munch is a good conductor for many reasons, but one of his special attributes is a love of clarity and the ability to get it even when the score tends to defeat it. Economy in instrumentation was something that Schumann never completely mastered, though the Romanza of his Fourth Symphony is an exception. Owing to the lushness of his writing, a Schumann symphony, badly conducted, can be a pretty muddy affair.

* * *

But Mr. Munch's Schumann yesterday was a delight from first to last. While the line of the symphony moved intact, the inner parts were all neatly in their places, subordinate to the whole yet giving their audible support. It is unfortunate that this symphony is not scheduled again for Boston this season.

There was prolonged applause at the close of the concert. The listeners were certainly not reluctant to show their positive approval.

H. R.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
JAN 9 - 1950

Munch Appears with Boston Symphony

By MAX DE SCHAUENSEE

Charles Munch is a thrilling conductor. One may agree or disagree with what he does, but the fact that he is a musical personality of the utmost vividness remains an undeniable truth.

These sentiments came into one's mind last night, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sponsored by the Philadelphia Forum, played to a capacity audience at the Academy of Music.

Mr. Munch succeeds, this year, the familiar figure of Serge Koussevitzky, who retired after 25 years of years of service with the famed Boston orchestra. The Bostonians are lucky to have replaced Dr. Koussevitzky with so compelling a musician.

The French conductor offered a program, that, on paper, looked pedantic and all too familiar. But there was nothing pedantic or familiar in the way in which it was presented. The Forum audience, not noted for especially demonstrative qualities, sat apparently fascinated and riveted by what it heard. It even broke into an unorthodox wave of applause after the thrillingly played third movement of Tschaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony.

Mr. Munch began his program with Hamilton Harty's arrangement of the Water Music by Handel. Immediately an electrical atmosphere was established by the conductor and orchestra.

It would be useless to maintain that the tone of the Bostonians compares, for sheer sensuousness of sound, with that of other orchestras that come to mind. Sometimes the tone is dry, thin, and angular; even so, it has a particular color of its own. But this is an orchestra which plays with wonderful precision, that obeys the impulses of a conductor in superb fashion.

There were times when the brass seemed over-prominent; there were times when the strings cut through with an edge. But all this seemed insignificant when one considered the music that was fashioned last night.

Mr. Munch's reading of the Tschaikovsky "Pathetique" was unusual, to say the least. Some of the tempi were incredibly crisp and fast. Nevertheless, the dignity of this symphonic drama emerged ever apparent.

Last night we heard Tschaikovsky shaking his clenched fist at the inexorable heavens, rather than wallowing in a dough of self-pity. And in the last movement, Mr. Munch conveyed with almost telepathic clearness the psychological point where the tragic Russian gave up his gallant fight against fate and sank into a final dark and helpless resignation.

Equally impressive was the conductor's account of Schumann's Symphony No. 4. Even the thematic recurrences seemed significant and thrilling in a performance which was projected along lines of almost classical force and clearness rather than romantic introspection.

Mr. Munch more than repeated the wonderful impression he made last year, when he appeared with the French National Orchestra at the Academy in an all-French program.

Last night's audience, which was said to include a great number of standees, was fully aware that Mr. Munch and the Bostonians had presented a memorable concert.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
JAN 11 19[illegible]

Phila. Acclaims Boston Symphony Under Munch

Boston visited Philadelphia Tuesday night, and despite the misleading balmy weather albeit some rain, it wasn't a baseball invasion. It was this season's only incursion of these environs by one of the nation's greatest musical organizations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A capacity audience's insatiable thirst for fine music was probably eclipsed by curiosity, for the orchestra was led by Charles Munch, who had taken over the directional reins from Serge Koussevitzky, who had been its distinguished conductor for a quarter century. Local music lovers attended to see and hear Munch, and were more than satisfied on both counts. He was roundly applauded and called back innumerable times.

Too much praise cannot be bestowed on the sensitive, artful and sometimes passionately moving performance of Munch and company. The program was well balanced and its execution was impeccable.

Sir Hamilton Harley's arrangement of Handel's Suite for Orchestra, from "Water Music," opened the program, which was played for the first time by the orchestra and dexterously so. Also on the agenda were Schumann's Symphony No. 4, and the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 6, the Pathetique. This had been among Koussevitsky's best-loved numbers, and Tuesday night's performance under Munch lived up to the Boston tradition in texture, understanding and majestic manner.—J. O'N.

LETTERS

Top Dogs

Sir:

I was sorry to find the Philadelphia Orchestra out of the money in TIME's Boston article [Dec. 19]. "De gustibus" and all that, but the ratings had the ring of a statement of fact.

[TIME called the Boston symphony—except for Arturo Toscanini's NBC Symphony—"the U.S.'s finest and one of the top four in the world. The others: Amsterdam's Concertgebouw, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Vienna Philharmonic."]

I disagree violently: the Philadelphia Orchestra sounds best to me in person, on records, and on the air.

PAUL BAKER

Upper Darby, Pa.

Sir:

In Philadelphia [illegible]ybody prefers the Philadelphi[illegible] Boston—and among TIME's [illegible] Symphony is top dog (ex[illegible] NBC Symphony, [illegible]y' itself).

We rather [illegible]ive expert opinion would [illegible]sanct judgment subject to question . . . It is very probable that the Boston is [illegible] "nation's finest" (except, of course, [illegible]BC Symphony, which is in a class [illegible]nor is the Philadelphia the "world's [illegible]—as it was hailed to be in Great B[illegible] last summer. More likely [illegible] neither is sufficiently superior to the other in all departments to warrant being called "THE BEST" . . .

MAHLON M. NEMEROW

ALVIN J. HOLLIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

Sir:

. . . The Virgil Thomson you quote as prophet (he prophesied that Munch would eventually lead the Boston Orchestra) apparently has no standing with you as a critic . . . Virgil Thomson says that the Philadelphia Orchestra is "certainly the finest orchestra, I think, now playing in America, which means anywhere."

BESSE HOWARD

Philadelphia, Pa.

¶ De gustibus, indeed.—ED.

Sir:

As is usual . . . I leafed thru page by page . . . On page 42 there was a picture of Madame Munch & Pompey. My thought was: "Ah, [illegible] newsworthy people who champion that finest of all dogs, the Airedale" . . .

Am I disgusted, or need I be? If after all these years I cannot tell an Airedale. Tell me, now, didn't your writer make a mistake? . . .

EDWARD B. TIRRELL

Kelseyville, Calif.

¶ Conductor Munch says that his dog is an Irish Airedale, sometimes also known as a Welsh terrier (which is what TIME called him). Madame Munch says that Pompey is a pedigreed Airedale. TIME's Boston correspondent says that the dog weighs a good 40 lbs., is mostly grey, and is unlike the Airedales he grew up with.—ED.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
JAN 11 1950

[68]

Boston Symphony Presents Concert Sponsored by Forum

By Marion Kelley

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch paid its annual visit to the Academy of Music last night under the sponsorship of the Forum, a division of the Philadelphia Inquirer Charities, Inc.

An audience of capacity proportions comprising Forum members and other music lovers were on hand to hear one of this country's greatest orchestras in its only appearance here this season.

HIGH LEVEL PERFORMANCE

Last night's performance was, in general, on the same high level associated with the art of the capable Munch and the orchestra he took over from the distinguished Serge Koussevitzky, who was its conductor for a quarter of a century.

The program opened with Handel's Suite for Orchestra taken from the "Water Music." Arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty, last night's version was delightfully played by the orchestra for the first time.

At all times, the ensemble exhibited fine texture and precision in the well-balanced program, which also included Schumann's Symphony No. 4 and the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 6, the Pathetique, a piece that Serge Koussevitzky had made his own.

It can hardly be considered overpraise to say that it was a highly sensitive, remarkably moving and skillful performance given by Munch and his men. The music seemed impeccably transparent and never lost its hold on the listener.

The performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 was led and played in magisterial manner. The portrayal of this work, considered the composer's greatest creative effort, and incidentally his swan song, was handled with a splendid realization of Tchaikovsky's intentions down to the slightest detail. Applause was loud and long and Conductor Munch was called back repeatedly.

Menuhin as Pension Fund Soloist

Handel, Brahms, Schumann Conducted by Charles Munch

[illegible] Yehudi Menuhin [illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] forces yesterday [illegible] produce the one-[illegible]'s Pension Fund [illegible] very few seats [illegible] went begging. [illegible]ded were rewarded [illegible] excellent program, [illegible]nstruction.

[illegible]gan with Sir Hamilton Harty's fine arrangement [illegible] "Water Music," [illegible]ssance. Then we [illegible] Menuhin play the [illegible]n Concerto in D [illegible]e concluding num-[illegible]n gave us Schu-[illegible] Symphony, the [illegible]on he has pro-[illegible]e the beginning of [illegible]son here.

* * *

[illegible]n's extraordinary [illegible] of course, was the most [illegible] element of his per-[illegible] Matters of bowing, a [illegible], his agility with the [illegible] stops—these things to [illegible]econd nature. Though [illegible]d wish for a freer com-[illegible]on of the music's message. [illegible]uhin was true to Brahms [illegible].

[illegible] Munch cooperated by main-[illegible]g a sensitive balance be-[illegible]en the orchestra and the solo [illegible]le. By the time they reached [illegible] Adagio movement, Mr. Menu-[illegible] had warmed up to a lyrical [illegible]dition of the singing melody. [illegible]e finale came off with a great [illegible] of gusto and called forth a [illegible]onged ovation that won an [illegible] for the listeners. It was [illegible]eludge to his Suite in E [illegible] accompanied violin.

Mr. Menuhin surmounted the technical problems with astounding ease.

Mr. Munch is a good conductor for many reasons, but one of his special attributes is a love of clarity and the ability to get it even when the score tends to defeat it. Economy in instrumentation was something that Schumann never completely mastered, though the Romanza of his Fourth Symphony is an exception. Owing to the lushness of his writing, a Schumann symphony, badly conducted, can be a pretty muddy affair.

* * *

But Mr. Munch's Schumann yesterday was a delight from first to last. While the line of the symphony moved intact, the inner parts were all neatly in their places, subordinate to the whole yet giving their audible support. It is unfortunate that this symphony is not scheduled again for Boston this season.

There was prolonged applause at the close of the concert. The listeners were certainly not reluctant to show their positive approval.

H. R.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
JAN 9 - 1950

THE EVENING BULLETIN, PHILADELPHIA, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY

Munch Appears with Boston Symphony

By MAX DE SCHAUENSEE

Charles Munch is a thrilling conductor. One may agree or disagree with what he does, but the fact that he is a musical personality of the utmost vividness remains an undeniable truth.

These sentiments came into one's mind last night, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sponsored by the Philadelphia Forum, played to a capacity audience at the Academy of Music.

Mr. Munch succeeds, this year, the familiar figure of Serge Koussevitzky, who retired after 25 years of years of service with the famed Boston orchestra. The Bostonians are lucky to have replaced Dr. Koussevitzky with so compelling a musician.

The French conductor offered a program, that, on paper, looked pedantic and all too familiar. But there was nothing pedantic or familiar in the way in which it was presented. The Forum audience, not noted for especially demonstrative qualities, sat apparently fascinated and riveted by what it heard. It even broke into an unorthodox wave of applause after the thrillingly played third movement of Tschaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony.

Mr. Munch began his program with Hamilton Harty's arrangement of the Water Music by Handel. Immediately an electrical atmosphere was established by the conductor and orchestra.

It would be useless to maintain that the tone of the Bostonians compares, for sheer sensuousness of sound, with that of other orchestras that come to mind. Sometimes the tone is dry, thin, and angular; even so, it has a particular color of its own. But this is an orchestra which plays with wonderful precision, that obeys the impulses of a conductor in superb fashion.

There were times when the brass seemed over-prominent; there were times when the strings cut through with an edge. But all this seemed insignificant when one considered the music that was fashioned last night.

Mr. Munch's reading of the Tschaikovsky "Pathetique" was unusual, to say the least. Some of the tempi were incredibly crisp and fast. Nevertheless, the dignity of this symphonic drama emerged ever apparent.

Last night we heard Tschaikovsky shaking his clenched fist at the inexorable heavens, rather than wallowing in a slough of self-pity. And in the last movement, Mr. Munch conveyed with almost telepathic clearness the psychological point where the tragic Russian gave up his gallant fight against fate and sank into a final dark and helpless resignation.

Equally impressive was the conductor's account of Schumann's Symphony No. 4. Even the thematic recurrences seemed significant and thrilling in a performance which was projected along lines of almost classical force and clearness rather than romantic introspection.

Mr. Munch more than repeated the wonderful impression he made last year, when he appeared with the French National Orchestra at the Academy in an all-French program.

Last night's audience, which was said to include a great number of standees, was fully aware that Mr. Munch and the Bostonians had presented a memorable concert.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

Phila. Acclaims Boston Symphony Under Munch

Boston visited Philadelphia Tuesday night, and despite the misleading balmy weather albeit some rain, it wasn't a baseball invasion. It was this season's only incursion of these environs by one of the nation's greatest musical organizations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A capacity audience's insatiable thirst for fine music was probably eclipsed by curiosity, for the orchestra was led by Charles Munch, who had taken over the directional reins from Serge Koussevitzky, who had been its distinguished conductor for a quarter century. Local music lovers attended to see and hear Munch, and were more than satisfied on both counts. He was roundly applauded and called back innumerable times.

So much praise cannot be bestowed on the sensitive, artful and sometimes passionately moving performance of Munch and his men. The program was well chosen, and its execution was superb.

Sir Hamilton Harley's arrangement of Handel's Suite for Orchestra, from "Water Music," opened the program, which was played for the first time by the orchestra, and dexterously so. Also on the agenda were Schumann's Symphony No. 4, and the Tschaikovsky Symphony No. 6, the Pathetique. This had been Koussevitsky's best-loved pieces, and Tuesday night's performance under Munch lived up to Boston tradition in textbook outstanding and majestic fashion.

J. O'N.

LETTERS

Top Dogs

Sir:

I was sorry to find the Philadelphia Orchestra out of the money in TIME's Boston article [Dec. 19]. "De gustibus" and all that, but the ratings had the ring of a statement of fact.

[TIME called the Boston symphony—except for Arturo Toscanini's NBC Symphony—"the U.S.'s finest and one of the top four in the world. The others: Amsterdam's Concertgebouw, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Vienna Philharmonic."]

I disagree violently: the Philadelphia Orchestra sounds best to me in person, on records, and on the air.

PAUL BAKER

Upper Darby, Pa.

Sir:

In Philadelphia, nearly everybody prefers the Philadelphia Orchestra. In Boston—and among TIME's [illegible] the Boston Symphony is top dog (except, of course, for the NBC Symphony, which is in a class by itself).

We rather imagine that collective expert opinion would render TIME's sacrosanct judgment subject to question . . . It is very probable that the Boston is "not the nation's finest" (except, of course, for the NBC Symphony, which is in a class by itself), nor is the Philadelphia the "world's greatest"—as it was hailed to be in Great Britain last summer. More likely . . . neither is sufficiently superior to the other in all departments to warrant being called "THE BEST."

MARLON M. NEMIROW
ALVIN J. HOLLIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

Sir:

. . . The Virgil Thomson you quote as prophet (he prophesied that Munch would eventually lead the Boston Orchestra) apparently has no standing with you as a critic . . . Virgil Thomson says that the Philadelphia Orchestra is "certainly the finest orchestra, I think, now playing in America, which means anywhere."

BESSE HOWARD

Philadelphia, Pa.

¶ De gustibus, indeed.—ED.

Sir:

As is usual . . . I leafed thru page by page . . . On page 42 there was a picture of Madame Munch & Pompey. My thought was: "Ah, here are newsworthy people who champion that finest of all dogs, the Airedale" . . .

Am I disgusted, or need I be? If after all these years I cannot tell an Airedale. Tell me, now, didn't your writer make a mistake? . . .

EDWARD B. TIRRELL

Kelseyville, Calif.

¶ Conductor Munch says that his dog is an Irish Airedale, sometimes also known as a Welsh terrier (which is what TIME called him). Madame Munch says that Pompey is a pedigreed Airedale. TIME's Boston correspondent says that the dog weighs a good 40 lbs., is mostly grey, and is unlike the Airedales he grew up with.—ED.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
JAN 11 1950

THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER, WED

Boston Symphony Presents Concert Sponsored by Forum

By Marion Kelley

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch paid its annual visit to the Academy of Music last night under the sponsorship of the Forum, a division of the Philadelphia Inquirer Charities, Inc.

An audience of capacity proportions comprising Forum members and other music lovers were on hand to hear one of this country's greatest orchestras in its only appearance here this season.

HIGH LEVEL PERFORMANCE

Last night's performance was, in general, on the same high level associated with the art of the capable Munch and the orchestra he took over from the distinguished Serge Koussevitzky, who was its conductor for a quarter of a century.

The program opened with Handel's Suite for Orchestra taken from the "Water Music." Arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty, last night's version was delightfully played by the orchestra for the first time.

At all times, the ensemble exhibted fine texture and precision in the well-balanced program, which also inciuded Schumann's Symphony No. 4 and the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 6, the Pathetique, a piece that Serge Koussevitzky had made his own.

It can hardly be considered overpraise to say that it was a highly sensitive, remarkably moving and skillful performance given by Munch and his men. The music seemed impeccably transparent and never lost its hold on the listener.

The performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 was led and played in magisterial manner. The portrayal of this work, considered the composer's greatest creative effort, and incidentally his swan song, was handled with a splendid realization of Tchaikovsky's intentions down to the slightest detail. Applause was loud and long and Conductor Munch was called back repeatedly.

[68]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST HOME NEWS
JAN 12 1950

WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

Menuhin With Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra left its bump of adventure home last night when it returned to Carnegie Hall for its third visit of the season. There was no electric Ondes Martenot to play new music for us. Maybe, the audience was pleased to welcome Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, instead, who performed the Brahms Concerto in D Major. The concert began with Handel's suite for orchestra from the "Water Music," arranged by Hamilton Harty. For after-the-intermission dessert there was Tschaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony. Charles Munch conducted the concert with brilliance and authority.

I, for one, was glad to welcome the "Water Music." Even if it was written for the out-of-doors, it's good indoor music too. And, for some abstruse reason, conductors do not favor it as a curtain-raiser. The Bostonians, for instance, have played no arrangement of the score, before this season, since 1927. The music's unrestrained joyousness is balm for the troubled spirit. Its having been composed for a barge party reminds us that in other eras slow-moving vehicles assumed an importance that has probably now forever departed.

In listening to Mr. Menuhin play the extended first movement of the Brahms Concerto, one was tempted to say, "What has happened to him?" With all of his great gifts—and they are numerous—he plays like a musician who is unhappy with himself and his time. His tone was neither free nor luscious and even his superb technical skill was not at its best. Musically, there was little penetration into the inner content of the score.

Journal-American
Jan 12, '50

Munch Sparks Concert Here

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Thoroughly conventional was the Boston Symphony program in Carnegie Hall last night. Handel's "Water Music" suite, the Brahms Violin Concerto with Yehudi Menuhin as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony provided solid fare. It remained for Charles Munch to spark it.

There was nothing conventional about the orchestra's performance. Responding to their rhythmically vital conductor, the players dug deep into their music and played. Their music-making was stirring indeed.

Each performance bore the imprint of authoritative leadership. The Handel had dignity, vigor, and sweep. The Brahms kindled warmth of feeling and sense of architecture. The Tchaikovky conveyed the profound sincerity of a deeply moving experience.

Artistic Triumph

I have not been so stirred by the Tchaikovsky in years. The performance blended throbbing life and throbbing sadness in perfect taste. In all humility Munch delivered its personal mesage with utmost simplicity and poignancy.

It was an artistic triumph technically. The climaxes were all right instead of being over-accented. The scale of dynamics had the right sense of proportion. The march of the third movement was played as a piece of music, not a bit of sensational writing. And the great lamentation of the finale became an outpouring of tragic import rather than an indulgence in emotion. Munch restored musical dignity to this great symphony last night.

Menuhin played the Brahms conventionally. The performance was well-executed without being either moving or impressive. There were moments of technical brilliance in what seemed busines-like procedure otherwise. Munch and the orchestra made the music glow.

Wkly Tm, Jan 13 '50

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

By Jerome D. Bohm

Boston Symphony

Three of the most familiar works in the repertory comprised Charles Munch's program with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Wednesday night: Hamilton's Harty's arrangement of Handel's "Water Music" Suite, Brahm's Violin Concerto, in which the soloist was Yehudi Menuhin, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony.

Of these the most arrestingly performed were the Handel and Tchaikovsky works, or at least the two movements of the "Pathetique" which the late hour permitted me to hear. In both compositions the playing of the orchestra was an unqualified pleasure. The perfection of balance, especially in the Tchaikovsky Symphony, the consistent transparency of texture obtained, the flawless adjustment of values in chord passages for the brasses were in themselves treasurable attributes. But added to these evidences of extraordinary aural sensibility were Mr. Munch's enkindling qualities as an interpreter. Very seldom in recent years have I regretted leaving a performance of the "Pathetique" before it was ended. But only too seldom has the first movement of Tchaikovsky's most abused symphony been discoursed with such truly incandescent intensity, yet without emotional exaggeration or cloying sentimentality, with such just pacing, such subtly adjusted dynamics. Captivating, too, was the movement in five-quarter time in its rhythmic plasticity and beauty of tonal investiture. To the "Water Music" of Hendel, Mr. Munch bought a blend of elan and tenderness which was stylistically apposite and musically compelling.

Mr. Menuhin's account of the solo part of the Brahms violin concerto was poised, technically adroit and for the most part, but not infallibly, pure in intonation. However, its realization of Brahms's ideas was incomplete. It scaled no heights and plumbed no depths, but pursued an unadventurous course with a carefully proportioned accompaniment by Mr. Munch and his fine musicians.

WASH. POST JAN 13, 1950

Postlude

Poulenc Solo 'New Music'. To Listeners

By Paul Hume

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony returned to Constitution Hall last night.

The second of their two local concerts for the season brought three pieces of music: Handel's Water Music, Brahms' fourth symphony, and a new piano concerto of Francis Poulenc. The composer appeared as soloist in his concerto.

Handel's music was heard in the exquisite version by the late great Irish composer-conductor, Sir Hamilton Harty. It was played in a way to stand the hair on end: brilliantly with perfect tone and taste.

Poulenc has written a thoroughly pleasant concerto. His gifts are those of a master craftsman, smoothly knit, with an easy style. Many listeners commented happily on that "new music." Poulenc's pianism is of the finest and the orchestra, with its clever scoring, was equally able.

Munch views Brahms' most imposing symphony as a work needing light and air. The first movement was almost casual, lacking the customary bombast. The scherzo went like a thunderbolt and the finale with its powerful variations, worked up to a violent close.

The Boston Orchestra does not yet play as one man for its new conductor. There were moments in the scherzo when the cellos were of more than one mind—the attacks of the strings sometimes came at two moments. But this was as true under Munch's predecessor.

HE NEW YORK TIMES, T

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

MENUHIN SOLOIST AT CONCERT HERE

Violinist Guest of the Boston Symphony In Brahms Work —Munch Leads Orchestra

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

There were no experiments or problems at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. Charles Munch, the ensemble's permanent conductor, directed a program of staples of the repertory that are unfailingly successful, and the guest artist was Yehudi Menuhin, who has had an immense following as a violinist since what was practically his infancy. The result was an evening of music-making that seemed to leave most of the customers satisfied.

The program began with Hamilton Harty's arrangement of a suite from Handel's "Water Music." Whether this was Mr. Munch's gentle animadversion on the concern of New Yorkers about their water shortages, the music was cheerful enough to take everybody's mind off the bathless and shaveless morrow. After all, water in the days of Handel and the King George he was serenading, according to the legend, was something one boated on.

Mr. Menuhin was the soloist in he Brahms Violin Concerto, and he played with a spiritual affinity or this music. He has not lost his apacity for virtuosity, but at east last night he did not seem to vorry about impeccably managed etail of tone and color. He sought o project the grand line of Brahms' thought and feeling, and one felt that he had achieved a deep identification with both. Other violinists might give you more sustained purity of tone and more glowing colors, but Mr. Menuhin let niceties take care of themselves while he took care of the music.

Mr. Munch, who was a violinist himself before he became a conductor, led the orchestra with care for the needs of the soloist. He could unleash the full power of the orchestra when it had the field to itself, but he took pains to give the soloist the right of way on every occasion. This does not mean that the orchestra's share was muted or distorted; it was simply handled with care and taste.

The evening ended with as rousing a performance of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony as one is likely to encounter in many seasons. Mr. Munch seems to have a special flair for dramatic, even theatrical, music, as his memorable reading of the Berlioz "Fantastique" will bear witness. Tchaikovsky's symphony last night was passion and despair incarnate. And every section of the orchestra, asked to put out, responded as if this were the only performance of a week or a month.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN 13 1950

News of Music

Boston Symphony Gets Ovation Here; Poulenc Brings His New Piano 'Concerto'

By Alice Eversman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing its final concert of the season here last night, was welcomed by an audience that left no vacant seats in Constitution Hall. The limelight of the evening, however, was focused on its leader, Charles Munch, and the program's soloist, Francis Poulenc. Mr. Poulenc brought his new piano "Concerto" for a first hearing in this city and, before going any further, let us thank the composer-pianist for such a pleasant work.

It has become almost the rule that a new composition is synonimous with difficult listening and strain in grasping it. Not so with Mr. Poulenc's work. True, at times, one regarded its melody and comparative simplicity with suspicion, feeling that, at any moment, some highly involved turn would be taken and we would be back at our old duty of figuring out what it was all about. There were no such traps in the French composer's work and at the end, the unaccustomed and delightfully surprising conviction that it was a thoroughly enjoyable affair was quite overwhelming.

Mr. Poulenc seems to have gathered the reduced orchestra he uses around the solo instrument so that they could all make music together. The piano part runs in and out of the orchestration except for the times when it is the first to state a charming melody. There is no pretense at depth, and, search as one will, no emotional problems to be solved. Many clever usages of the tricks of his trade give spice to the writing and there is sometimes a caustic turn in an elegant mask. The opening "Allegro commodo" holds most of these and is, perhaps, the most notable of the movements.

A simple, familiar melody forms the foundation of the "Andante" and while its embroidery is uncomplicated, it is never permitted to become banal. The basic tune of the "Rondeau a la Francaise" is earthy, but leads to some skillful elaboration that has a meaning all its own. Whether pianists will descend from the heights where they have struggled with works like Khachaturian's concerto, not to mention the famous classics, to include it in their repertoire will be a question.

They would have to acquire something of Mr. Poulenc's ease and suavity at the keyboard to equal his performance. The subtle effects that exist simply because of the way the solo passages are linked to the orchestra would need a sympathetic vision. As a pianist, Mr. Poulenc has a fine, mellow tone and a deft technique that responds to the fluent, light and charming intentions in his "Concerto." It was so unexpected in its unravelling that the audience was enchanted and insisted that its composer and interpreter return again and again for more applause.

Mr. Munch collaborated finely with the soloist and shared in the ovation. He led his expert musicians also through many effective nuances in the Handel "Water Music," arranged for orchestra by Harty. In this work there was no call for him to rouse the sound and fury he put into Brahms' "Symphony No. 4," which ended the program. According to Mr. Munch's conception of this "Symphony," he did a good job. But Brahms is a composer that lends himself to gentler treatment and whose dreams and tenderness are present in each of his compositions. Mr. Munch was very dramatic, the orchestra played very loud and very fast, there were shadings and individually compelling moments, but it was not the most satisfying Brahms to be heard from the Bostonians.

NEWS JAN 13, 1950
THE WASHINGTON DAI

Munch Slipped —Literally Not Musically

The musical powers that be must have finally decided that Washington has reached musical maturity. Tuesday night we heard the brand-new Samuel Barber piano sonata; Wednesday night, a new work by Hugo Weisgall with the composer conducting, and last night, the Poulenc Concerto with Francis Poulenc himself at the piano.

This doesn't mean that it was all great music, but it is refreshing for Washington to have a chance to make up its own mind about these things.

The Poulenc Concerto was one of three works performed at Constitution Hall by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their second annual appearance of the season here. The clue to it is found in the program notes which point out that Poulenc, one of the Paris upstarts of the 20s, has been writing film music. The concerto is highly episodic. Mr. Poulenc has merely created mood music for separate scenes rather than sustained large-scale musical ideas.

The concerto might do nicely in a movie house, but it is certainly too superficial for the concert hall. The audience called Mr. Poulenc back for bow after bow, whether for his music or for his piano playing must forever remain a mystery.

Mr. Munch's unfolding of the Handel Suite for Orchestra (from the Water Music) and the Brahms Fourth Symphony was sufficiently brilliant to compensate for the Poulenc.

The Handel was crisp and sparkling and joyful, like an expertly cut diamond, and the Brahms had tremendous power and sweep from beginning to end. It was clear that under Mr. Munch's leadership the rich resources of the Boston Symphony will not go to waste.

The one precarious moment came in the Brahms when the French conductor's right foot slipped off the podium as he leaned toward the viola. Fortunately, he didn't lose his balance, nor did he miss a beat.

MILTON BERLINER.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 15 1950

POULENC SOLOIST IN OWN CONCERTO

Composer Is Featured With Boston Symphony in Local Premiere of Piano Work

By OLIN DOWNES

The principal news feature, as it may properly be called, of the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was the appearance as composer and soloist of Francis Poulenc in the first New York performance of his piano concerto. It is a gay piece, at its best witty and epigrammatic, of a rather self-conscious simplicity. It has lots of arpeggios and things for the piano, which alternates back and forth with the orchestra, now announcing a theme, now accompanying the same in what turns out to be in the long run a rather repetitive manner.

When Mr. Poulenc writes a short piece, with one pretty tune here and another pretty one bobbing up with its tongue in its cheek there, he is amusing and artistic, and an adroit workman. But a piano concerto in three full movements requires a lot of ideas and even some real development to make it carry through. This concerto has paused, sagged and become platitudinous before it has come to an end. The finale is enlivened by half a dozen measures of "Old Folks at Home." There are avowedly suggestions of the musical idiom of the cabaret and the music hall in it. But we think they do the thing better. Mr. Poulenc played this concerto admirably, with all possible authority, precision and élan. He and it were warmly appreciated. All the same, we can't feel it to be a particularly significant concerto.

Munch Leads Schumann 4th

No! The big news of this concert, for ourselves, was Mr. Munch's exquisite performance of Schumann's Fourth Symphony. This was wholly exceptional. We thought we had a clear notion of the exact way in which this symphony had best be played, and are thankful to have found ourselves off the reckoning. The symphony was played yesterday afternoon with an intimacy, an introspective tenderness, an almost secret passion, most strikingly conveyed.

The sonorities of the orchestra were in a way slighter, more delicate, than we had heard them before. The tempi of the body of the first movement were slower than they often are, though the effect was not less emotional than it has been with the faster pace. The Romanza was sung by the first oboe and first 'cello like an improvisation, with the ensuing embroidery of the concertmaster's violin. The transition from the scherzo to the finale was something always to remember. The last measures of the Romanza movement echoed from farther and farther away, till they were barely audible, and from the hush which had descended upon the orchestra, the first stirrings and tremblings of the finale fell almost imperceptibly on the ear.

Conductor's Interpretation

We feel that Mr. Munch, as he gains familiarity and security in his position of authority with this orchestra, becomes more contained and free of a tendency he has sometimes shown to an undue nervous hastiness. The exuberance of this finale movement, following the anticipatory horn-calls, was only gradually released. There was the slightest pause for the announcement of the last joyous theme by the 'celli, and then vertiginous abandon, to the end. There is never but one way to interpret a masterpiece, and we have heard other great interpretations of this symphony. Nevertheless, one is sorely tempted to say "that is the way Schumann's Fourth Symphony should be played."

The concert ended with a virile and admirably proportioned reading of the Brahms Fourth Symphony, one that united lyricism and power. The tempo of the slow movement was not dragged; the music was treated simply with realization of the haunting beauty of the instrumental coloring, with movement and climax too, yet ever in the manner of a ballad—a most poetical and romantic tale told by the instruments. The grip of the big tingling chords, the rude energy, and not so polite laughter of the third part was old bear's-paws Brahms himself. And again the development of the final variations had to the full the poise, power held in reserve, unhurried and inevitable character that they require. These were the deeds of a most sincere, full-blooded and perceptive musician.

AT CARNEGIE HALL

Francis Poulenc Greenhaus

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
JAN 16 1950

Munch, Symphony Do an Electrifying Job

By MILES KASTENDIECK

What Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony did with the Fourth Symphonies of Schumann and Brahms electrified their Carnegie Hall audience on Saturday afternoon.

The performances were stupendous musical creations. The presence of Francis Poulenc as soloist in the first hearing here of his new piano concerto became quite secondary.

As a matter of fact, the concerto is hardly representative of Poulenc at his best. It sounds "secular." The melodies are commonplace and its pianistic devices conventional.

His ingratiating style shows up brightly in the last of three movements, but even here there is no special distinction. He himself played fluently ye tleft some of the stylistic niceties of his own writing understated.

Munch's way with Schumann eschewed conventional romanticism yet it was nevertheless personal. A vitalized interpretation with some real tenderness in the romance made absorbing listening.

The Brahms attained sheer magnificence in the final movement, having achieved a rare quality of music-making in the others. Munch certainly has the stuff of which great conductors are made.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 14 1950

MUSIC

by PAUL AFFELDER

Boston Symphony's Academy Performance Refreshing Under Munch's Vital Baton

There is only one word to characterize Charles Munch's interpretations with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. That word is "vitality." Whether he was conducting Handel, Schumann or Brahms M. Munch made something interesting and alive happen in every measure of the music, yet he never departed from the orthodox manner of performing the familiar works on the program.

The concert began with Handel's "Water Music" Suite, in the arrangement by the late Sir Hamilton Harty, which has accorded a crisp and refreshing performance. It was followed by the Schumann Fourth Symphony in D Minor. Here, more than at any other point on the program, the conducter showed us how he could revitalize a thrice-familiar piece of music, and yet keep within proper bounds.

The main body of the first movement was considerably slower than we are accustomed to hearing it played, yet the music never dragged for a moment; there was always something to hold the attention. The Romanze combined songfulness with subtlety, the Scherzo was full of vim and vigor, and the Finale moved along in gay, and often exciting, fashion. Ordinarily, we might have liked a trifle more lyricism in this romantic symphony, but we didn't mind the variation of treatment. And this is the only time we can remember when the performance of a Schumann symphony brought forth shouts of "Bravo!" from the audience.

Whatever lyricism may have been missing from the Schumann was, however, amply supplied in M. Munch's tender and warm-hearted reading of another Fourth Symphony—this one by Brahms. These were the qualities that were emphasized throughout the four movements, but the dynamic conductor always had his hand ready to point up a dramatic moment here and there. It was a sumptuous performance of a grand masterpiece.

There was only one disturbing factor in the whole concert. That was the constantly earsplitting tone emitted by the trumpets. The Boston Symphony uses narrow-bore instruments that produce an annoyingly strident, rasping sound, wholly incommensurate with the fine quality of tone from the remainder of the orchestra. The sooner something is done to remedy this defect, the happier we'll be.

Boston Symphony

Francis Poulenc Is Soloist for Own Concerto

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

Concert under the direction of Charles Munch with Francis Poulenc as piano soloist yesterday afternoon. The program:
Symphony No. 4, D minor.....Schumann
Piano Concert (first New York performance)
.....Poulenc
Symphony No. 4, E minor.....Brahms

By Jerome D. Bohm

Memorable discourses of the fourth symphoniés of Schumann and Brahms were provided by Mr. Munch and his wonderful orchestrat yesterday afternoon. I can recall no interpretations of these works which were, either in their imaginative realization of the composer's ideas or for sheer beauty of sound, more impressive.

Always on eof our finest aggregations of instrumentalists, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Munch's ministrations has become in a short time an even more sensitive medium of expression. The balances achieved between its various bodies, the strings, wood-winds and brasses, were nothing short of exquisite. No less remarkable is the extraordinarily wide and minutely-graded palette of dynamics at Mr. Munch's command.

With these indispensable attributes to aid him, Mr. Munch accorded Schumann's D minor Symphony a flawlessly integrated, yet plastically phrased, performance which conveyed tellingly the buoyant romanticism of its quick movements and the touching tenderness of the Romanza. Equally arresting was his traversal of Brahms's E minor Symphony in which lyricism, exuberant vitality and incandescent intensity were called upon in turn to convey the composer's message. The closing climax of the first movement and the tonal splendors of the final Passacaglia were quite magnificent and obtained without any hint of noise to mar their effectiveness.

The Poulenc Piano Concerto is the French composer's latest product, having been finished last summer. It was admirably played by both Poulenc and the orchestra, but it will hardly enhance his reputation as a composer. Its subject matter is for the most part trite, consisting of left-overs of romanticism, not overly choice tidbits culled from Schumann and Grieg, whose Piano Concerto is never far off. Nor has Mr. Poulenc been particularly adroit in his handling of this thin material. The writing for the piano is old-fashioned and commonplace and there are few touches in the harmonization to recall the subtle and poetic writer of songs for which he is justly celebrated.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD
JAN 15 1950

Capital to Hear Koussevitzky Tell of New Foundation Here

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will speak in the Coolidge auditorium, Library of Congress, Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Together with Dr. Luther H. Evans, librarian of Congress, he will discuss the purposes of the recently established Koussevitzky Foundation in the Library of Congress.

Following the remarks of Dr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Evans, an exhibit of scores and manuscripts already commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation will be opened to the public. There also will be documents and pictures relating to Koussevitzky's career.

The Juilliard String Quartet will preface the speeches with a performance of William Bergsma's Quartet No. 2, which was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation. They also will close the program with a performance of Beethoven's Quartet, opus 130.

The choir of the Chinese Community church will be presented in concert by the Western Presbyterian church and its choir today at 8 p.m. A cantata, "The Yellow River," by Hau-Hsing-hai will be a feature number on the program.

Lewis Atwater, assisted by Mary Apple, contralto, will present a program devoted to the music of Bach today at 5 p.m. in All Souls (Unitarian) church.

A program of contemporary music for wind instruments is announced by the Institute of Contemporary Arts for Tuesday at 8:40 p.m. The composers to be represented are Walter Piston, Antoni Szalowski, Robert Evatt, and Darius Milhaud. The artists participating are: George Spoonhaltz, flue; Rosa Risso, oboe; W. E. Grace, clarinet; Orrin Miller, bassoon; Robert Ferris, French horn. All are members of the Army Ground Forces band.

[70]

THE PHILA. FORUM
PHILA., PA
JAN. 1950

This Man Charles Munch

By RAYMOND MORIN

Music Critic, Worcester Telegram

Many believe that the critics can make or break a musician's career; in the case of a conductor the orchestra itself can deal the death blows. If there are grounds for this theory, Charles Munch, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, enjoys a position of enviable security.

We received two vivid impressions as we watched Munch conduct one of Richard Strauss' gargantuan orchestrations the other night in Symphony Hall. First, the comradeship between conductor and players was extraordinary. Second, the conductor had a completely clear picture of how he envisioned the music and how to communicate it.

For the past two and a half decades the Boston Symphony has been a conductor's orchestra. There was the same concentration upon its former leader that forever spotlights the elegant hands of Stokowski or the personal legends about Toscanini.

The Boston Symphony gave its conductor slave-like obedience, and one subconsciously felt that any mishap during a concert was bound to be dictatorially thrashed-out backstage. The music it made was predominantly the conductor's own interpretation.

Munch has a different approach. In effect it says, "let us make music together," rather than "you play as I say."

It cannot be denied that the Boston Symphony became the masterful organization that it is, during the past 25 years. But it was clearly time for a change. Perhaps it needed these years of intensive domination to attain full growth, and it now remains to be seen whether it maintains that growth in its new freedom.

In no sense of the word are we implying a comparison when we say that Munch is a "man's man." But he is the type of conductor who goes backstage to congratulate other conductors on their performances. When things go wrong at rehearsal, he is capable of enough personal humility to say to the men. "Help me!"

Nor can Munch be accused of the contemptible habit of capriciously firing men over alleged inefficiencies, or the crossing of personal paths. The thought of firing men is horrifying to him. He thinks as do most Europeans, that a symphony job should be a job for life.

He likes people and has the faculty of making them like him. He speaks with the same respect to the ushers at Symphony Hall as to the musical great with whom he deals. He used to call the usherettes at Carnegie Hall, "mes enfants."

Munch has proven to be a breath of fresh air at Symphony Hall, just as he was at Carnegie, where he guest-conducted. The New York Philharmonic had been for years the instrument that catered to the personal egos of a long parade of conductors.

HIS theory in this respect is simple: "You see," he says, "in the relation of conductor and orchestra there are two sides. To reconcile the two is the problem. You can lift the level of the orchestra, but you cannot demand the impossible."

The men of the New York Philharmonic sensed this deeply, and showed it by giving a cocktail party for Munch in the Green Room at Carnegie Hall—unprecedented for them. Other conductors are lucky if they get a "good morning." The guest returned the favor and the members gave him a cigarette case engraved with an expression of affection and esteem.

The Boston Symphony players probably have had to adapt themselves to a situation that to some is considered dangerous. Munch is not a slave driver. He doesn't believe in exhaustive rehearsals, but prefers to rely on his command over the men for his results.

The rehearsals may be as long, but he is largely content to go over the important and dangerous spots in a score, leaving the details to actual performance. Whereas the men were used to thorough preparation, they are now to a degree uncertain as to gradations of tempo and dynamics. And the fact is that Munch has been known to be carried away by the music and to deviate from tempos he established at rehearsals.

On the surface this may seem a treacherous procedure, but actually it has its compensations. There are two types of conductors. One works the men diligently, sometimes to a point of exhaustion. The result is that at the actual performance they may be too tired to do it, but they do know exactly what they are supposed to do.

The other type of conductor, of which Munch is an example, relies on spontaneity and inspiration of the moment. He may not achieve the same perfection of detail, but there will be an alertness and freshness in the results that creates a new form of excitement.

Proper Bostonians have become accustomed to perfection of detail; if and when they detect technical flaws, it remains to be seen what will be their reaction.

Of one thing you may be certain—many of them will welcome their release as foils for mediocre contemporary composers. There was much to command the ever-presence of new music on their programs, except that much of it was unworthy of their attention or time, and it is no secret that they resented it.

The other night we heard Munch conduct Walter Piston's Second Suite for Orchestra. It is a work of many fine qualities. It has balance, and in the rapid movements a high degree of ingenuity. The composer was in the audience, and from where we were seated it was possible to observe his reactions. He appeared absorbed during the entire performance and indicated no evidence of conflicting ideas between composer and conductor.

It is probable that the conductor studied this score with the composer, but although Munch is greatly interested in contemporary American music, he confesses to being puzzled by it. Since it is sometimes difficult to decide just where American music is headed, that isn't surprising.

At present he is studying modern scores to learn what he can do about them. The important question, of course, is whether he has or will have Koussevitzky's remarkable ability for analysis and evaluation of new music. Munch's forte is French music.

And now, something about Charles Munch, the man. He has been nicknamed "Le Beau Charles." If that implies that he is a "dandy" it is a misnomer. He has a fine, sensitive face, with blue-gray eyes and a well-shaped nose. When he conducts it doesn't matter that his large head of hair becomes unruly. The other night we heard one prim Bostonian lady say to another: "Doesn't it seem strange to see such a tall man on the podium?" Munch is six feet tall.

(Continued on page 13, column 1)

This Man Charles Munch

(Continued from page 8)

He is a simple man and lives a simple life. It is doubtful if he will succeed in remaining aloof of Boston society as he has in the past, because Boston is Boston.

If he does manage to live as he chooses, he will answer his own phone, write his own letters, buy his own tickets, and dress himself. There will be no massaging by a valet during intermissions. He will avoid having a press agent. He will write no manifestos, or turn lecturer between selections of his programs. One good reason may be that he speaks very little English.

THERE was quite a debate deciding just how his name was to be pronounced in Boston. The French "U" being a difficult sound to make, he agreed not only to change the spelling from Muench to Munch, but to a pronunciation as if spelled "Moonch."

You can even pronounce it as it looks and he won't mind, but if you say it with a sound similar to that of the German town, Muenchen, he will be annoyed. That, to an Alsatian, is distasteful.

Charles Munch comes to the Boston Symphony in the prime of his life, from Europe, with an illustrious career to commend him. He was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, September 26, 1891, of a French mother and an Alsatian father.

His first teacher was his father, Ernest Munch, who was director of the Choeur Saint-Guillaume in Strasbourg. He has two brothers, who have likewise distinguished themselves musically. Charles Munch's chosen instrument was the violin, which he studied with his father and later with Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin.

In 1919 he was made professor of the Strasbourg Conservatory and conductor of the orchestra there. Going to Leipzig in 1926, he served as concert master in the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwaengler. In 1932 he went to Paris and after conducting concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra, he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, becoming its regular conductor.

In 1938 he succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. Munch first came to this country in December, 1946, when he made his first American appearance conducting the Boston Symphony as guest.

Besides conducting America's foremost orchestras during the past two seasons, he took the Orchestre National de la Radiodiffusion Française on an Autumn tour of the United States in 1948, conducting this outstanding French orchestra in many cities from coast to coast.

And so the Boston Symphony has begun a new era under Charles Munch. What its trustees sought to avoid when they appointed him was a period of experimentation with guest conductors in an effort to find the one best suited to their needs.

The great Koussevitzky left enormous shoes to be filled, and although there was a genuine need for widening the spotlight to include the players as well as the conductor, it was equally important that virtuosity be maintained.

Some critics, notably in Boston, have described Munch's technique as excessively flamboyant. This may seem justified to the casual observer, but many orchestra musicians explain that the technique is an extremely illuminating one, and that it assists them greatly in performing complicated rhythms or melodies, especially those in modern works.

In any case, the players of the Boston Symphony have no doubt when Munch gives his downbeat . . . an advantage that they have not always enjoyed.

—(Courtesy of Worcester Telegram)

[71]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

SYMPHONY SEATS CHECKED

Hub Orchestra Head to Mail Tickets After Completion of Survey

As soon as seats in the new auditorium of the Veterans Memorial Building are in their places, tickets for the opening concert Jan. 31 of the Boston Symphony will be mailed to subscribers, George E. Judd, orchestra manager, said yesterday.

The management has delayed mailing out tickets so a double check of seats actually in the hall with those shown on diagrams of the auditorium can be made, Judd said.

Only 2300 persons, or about 1000 fewer than attended the Boston Symphony's concerts in past years in the Metropolitan Theater in Providence, can be accommodated in the new auditorium and that has necessitated a change in allotment of tickets, Judd said. The acoustical qualities and other features of the new hall make it an ideal auditorium for symphony presentation.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

Boston Symphony Tickets Held Up

PROVIDENCE—Tickets for the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 31 will be mailed to subscribers just as soon as seats are installed in the new auditorium of the Veterans' Memorial Building, George E. Judd, orchestra manager, said today.

Mr. Judd explained there had been a delay in mailing tickets because the management wants to double check seats to be put in the hall against those shown on diagrams of the auditorium.

The new auditorium will seat about 2300 persons, 1000 fewer than the Metropolitan Theatre, where Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts have been held in the past.

Mr. Judd said the acoustical qualities and other features of the new hall make it an ideal auditorium for symphonies.

Truman Too Modest, Conductor Declares

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky at the White House.
The New York Times (Washington Bureau)

By The United Press.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, director-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, asserted today that President Truman was "much too modest" about his piano-playing ability.

"We all know his playing is much better than he talks about it," the musician said after a visit with Mr. Truman.

Dr. Koussevitsky added that he suggested to the President that a Secretariat of Fine Arts be established in the Government to promote popular appreciation of all arts. He said Mr. Truman expressed great interest.

The conductor said he also talked about his long-standing desire to have the President's daughter, Margaret, at his Tanglewood (Mass.) music school. But he declined to say what Mr. Truman thought of that idea.

...ı—Two Novelties at Symphony

Burgin Conducts Four Works of Diverse Style

By Harold Rogers

There is intriguing fare in Symphony Hall this week end. Richard Burgin, spelling Charles Munch on the podium, has chosen four works for the Boston Symphony that are diverse in style, interesting to the ear.

Two of them—Vaughan Williams' Concerto in C major for Two Pianos and Orchestra, and Bartók's suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin"—were firsts for Boston. Mr. Burgin began with Darius Milhaud's arrangement of Couperin's Overture and Allegro from the Suite, "La Sultane." With the Shostakovitch First Symphony he added the final exclamation point.

The concerto is not a frame that displays the talents of Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe, the soloists, to their best advantage. It is not easy to divine why Vaughan Williams expanded the score to include two pianos, rather than one as in the original version, unless to provide a vehicle for two pianists.

The concerto gains little by the augmentation. Many of its harmonic devices, original as they may have sounded in 1933, have become clichés in 1950. Its best movement is the middle one—the Romanza—sweepingly conceived, songfully lyrical, a good example of late English impressionism. Here the pianos are not inundated by thick orchestration.

The Bartók suite is from a one-act pantomime, the story of which was somewhat questionable. But divorced from stage action, the music can hardly be considered offensive. Rhythmically and melodically it is bold and rugged, sometimes seductive in mood, sometimes dithyrambic. The orchestral colors are laid on in great splashy daubs. The score called forth Mr. Burgin's most spirited efforts yesterday afternoon.

It is not odd that the Couperin suite is similar in style to some of Bach's suites, since the two men were contemporaries. But Couperin's style is French and becomes even more so in Milhaud's transcription. The addition of Milhaud's colorism to Couperin's classicism produces a stimulating effect—a modernist reined in by an older master.

The Shostakovitch First, completed when the composer was only 19, is naturally filled to the brim with youthful aspirations and zest. It is as though he began it while yet a boy and finished it as a man. The music matures as it progresses.

While Mr. Burgin's reading was thoroughly competent and often compelling, it did not always have the youthful approach that this music requires. But after the engaging juvenilia of the first two movements, Mr. Burgin built up the last two into an impressive climax. On the whole it was a satisfying performance.

Not often do we have the pleasure of hearing Alfred Krips, the assistant concertmaster, except when Mr. Burgin leaves the first chair for the podium. The Shostakovitch gives Mr. Krips the opportunity to display the lucid tone of his violin in several solos. He is an excellent musician, a sensitive artist.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SAT

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 13th program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe, duo-pianists, were the solists. The program:
Overture and Allegro from "La Sultane" Couperin-Milhaud
Concerto in C for Two Pianos... Vaughan Williams
Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin," Op. 12 ..... Bartok
Symphony No. 1, Op. 10 ... Shostakovitch

By RUDOLPH ELIE

This concert didn't prove to be a very outstanding one. The music was interesting enough, the orchestra was in good form, there was a competent two-piano team on hand, and Richard Burgin demonstrated anew his masterly orchestral style. But it missed fire somewhere along the line; save for the Bartok you could take it all or leave it alone.

It started well (for the little Overture and Allegro from Couperin's "La Sultana" is a charming piece), but after about five minutes of Vaughan Williams' Concerto for Two Pianos it was apparent that here was a pretty routine piece of work, not really bad, but colorless, so-so, prosaic.

Of the three movements only the Romanza touched the imagination. It seemed to me to recall the English countryside in a quietly lyrical pastorale of towering clouds, blue sky and green distant hills. Of course it would have recalled it more if Burton Holmes had been along with some color slides to go with it (for it seemed to need something like that), but it was agreeable enough. The other two movements, the outer ones, had the proper academic bustle but I couldn't see that they got much of anywhere.

Nor could I, for that matter, quite make out why it required two pianos; save for a bit of thrashing about in the last section, the second piano had little to occupy its time. Whittemore and Lowe, duo-pianists, making their first appearance at these concerts, played very well, but a less bloodless piece would have certainly shown them off to greater advantage.

But if the Vaughan Williams was bloodless, Bartok's Suite from the "Miraculous Mandarin" was one of the most blood-curdling pieces ever to raise the eyebrows of the statues in their niches above. The music tells the story* of a mandarin who refuses to succumb to the smothering, stabbing and hanging visited upon him by a band of robbers and is killed by their female companion in her own interesting way. It outraged the Prague of 1926, both musically and dramatically, but its music today, though violent, is wonderfully exhilarating. It is at once vehement and expressive, ferocious and sensuous, and unfailingly illustrative withal. I thought it was great good fun; a very bright spot in an otherwise routine afternoon.

For the Shostakovitch First Symphony though it is, all said and done, a very remarkable work to have sprung from the head of a 20-year-old boy, failed to communicate. He has not—and for reasons doubtless not his own considering the political morass he is bogged down in—quite fulfilled the promise implicit in this symphony. And yesterday, though I still found it an admirable work with fine moments (the whole Scherzo, for instance), it just didn't affect me one way or another. Good, yes, but ho-hum.

Charles Munch returns next week to do Three Preludes from Pfitzner's "Palestrina," Stravinsky's "Jeux de Cartes," and Schubert's C major Symphony, the one of the "heavenly lengths."

*Censored

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Richard Burgin is adding three pieces to the repertory of the Symphony Orchestra this week, but in the opinion of this commentator only the first, and by far the oldest of them, deserves to become a fixture in it. And this was added to the list as an afterthought.

To get down to cases, yesterday's concert began with the Overture and Allegro from the Suite "La Sultane" of Couperin, as orchestrated by Milhaud. The two-piano team of Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe made their local debut playing Vaughan Williams' C major Concerto, first written for solo piano and orchestras, while another Boston novelty was the Suite from Bartok's pantomime, "The Miraculous Mandarin." The afternoon concluded with the First Symphony of Shostakovitch, which Mr. Burgin himself introduced here a little more than 13 years ago.

The Couperin of this Suite is very different from the composer of the little pieces for harpsichord. The music itself has a certain splendor and Milhaud has orchestrated in in a sumptuous fashion.

Vaughan Williams wrote this Concerto, in its original form, between 1926 and '30 and rearranged it not so long ago. The second movement, a Romanza, has the nostalgic quality of the "London" and "Pastoral" Symphonies and made pleasant listening. The initial Toccata and final Fugue are sterile and empty. The two young men played their portion competently.

Not before had we heard any of Bartok's stage music and the piece in question suggests that the theatre was not his metier. Admittedly, it is never a fair test of stage music to wrest it from its proper surroundings. With the action this score would have more point, but it appears to lack pictorial quality and appropriateness to its subject. The racy plot has to do with a girl who lures travelers into the clutches of a trio of thieves. Their third victim, the Mandarin, is robbed, but when they try to destroy him, he refuses to co-operate. Even hanging will not do the trick. He wants the girl. At her request, they cut him down, and in her embrace his wounds begin to bleed and he falls dead. The music registers a certain excitement but the necessary erotic quality is not there. Some composers would have gone to town with that setup.

Shostakovitch completed his First Symphony at 19. In it is found the germ and gist of everything he had to say later. Of his nine works in the form this seems to stand up the best. The ideas are fresh and attractive. There are also irritating mannerisms that become more pronounced in subsequent works. Mr. Burgin conducted it sympathetically, and with the Couperin it saved the day.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—

MU

Burgin Conducts Bartok Ballet Suite, Williams Concerto at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony Concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight are consistently interesting if, on the whole, no more than that. Richard Burgin conducts, and in his usual thorough, painstaking and capable way makes a good job of a mostly novel program.

To the originally announced list has been added, as starter, two movements of Couperin's "La Sultane," in the brassy, modern orchestration of Milhaud. The other pieces are Vaughan Williams' Concerto for Two Pianos, new to Boston, with Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe as soloists; the suite from Bela Bartoki Ballet, "The Miraculous Mandarin," also new here, and the First Symphony of Shostakovich.

Vaughn Williams' Concerto reminded me of Father Clarence Day's irritated breakfast question in "Life With Father": "How can anyone take coffee beans and water and arrive at this result?" How could Vauhgan Williams take so many notes and arrive at so little music? The Concerto, like "Job" and the Sixth Symphony, is an interminable and sleepy affair. It has little motion, except in the fugue, and less point, as I hear it. Whittemore and Lowe may have played it scrumptiously, but the total effect was of time lost. The duo-pianists received warm applause, which was nice because everyone knows they are an able pair. For the sake of the record, let it be added the score is a revision of an earlier Concerto for single piano, and that the movements are continuous. Requiescat in pace!

Bela Bartok, on the other hand, raised a terrific racket in "The Miraculous Mandarin," writing pages of shrieking instrumentation and thundering dissonance. But there is always something going on, and the rhythmic setup compels your intellectual admiration. It will take several more experiences with this score, which sounds like today though written 30 years ago, before I can make head or tail of it. But Bartok may have the last laugh on us, and prove to have been a major tonal prophet.

"The Miraculous Mandarin" is about three thieves, a girl they use as a lure, and a mandarin who becomes their and her victim. I am told that the original story is so scorching that it would have to be read in the comparative safety that that used to exist out behind the barn. Thank goodness music is an abstract art!

The First Symphony of Shostakovich, finished before he was 20, remains one of the finest things he ever wrote. When you consider his youth, it is a miraculously original and technically expert work. It may be episodic, for that is one of his traits, but it has tunes, solid structure, lively rhythms and colorful orchestration. It was again a joy to hear it yesterday.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JAN 24 1950

Koussevitzky Tells Truman U. S. Needs Arts' Secretariat

WASHINGTON, Tuesday (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky told President Tr[illegible] yesterday of his belief that the Government should establish a secretariat of fine arts.

The head of the music center at Tanglewood, Mass., and director emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a long visit with the President.

"We artists in all groups have a desire and a dream to have such a secretariat to develop the talents of the youngsters of this country in music, literature, drama, opera and the ballet," he said.

He said he found the President "modest" about his own piano playing, asserting he thought the President "plays much better than he talks about his playing."

[72]

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
JAN

Dramatic Action Sparks Rehearsals of Boston's New Symphony Conductor

In rehearsals Conductor Munch lifts his players to the heights by dramatic unrestrained gestures and appeals in three languages.

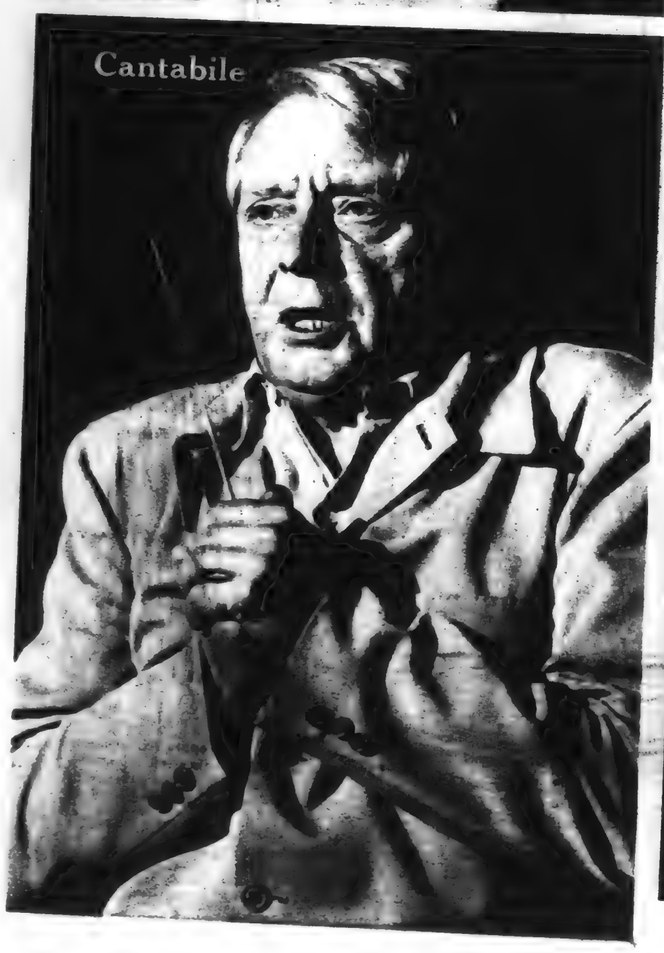
...radition of excellence ...intained without a break

By Russell McLauchlin
Music Critic, The Detroit N...

THE stately Boston Sym... probably the most elo... a on earth and its tradition, i... town which fathers it, is immes... Koussevitzky was its captain for... s and his predecessors were, among others, Arthur Nikisch, Karl Muck and Pi... Monteux.

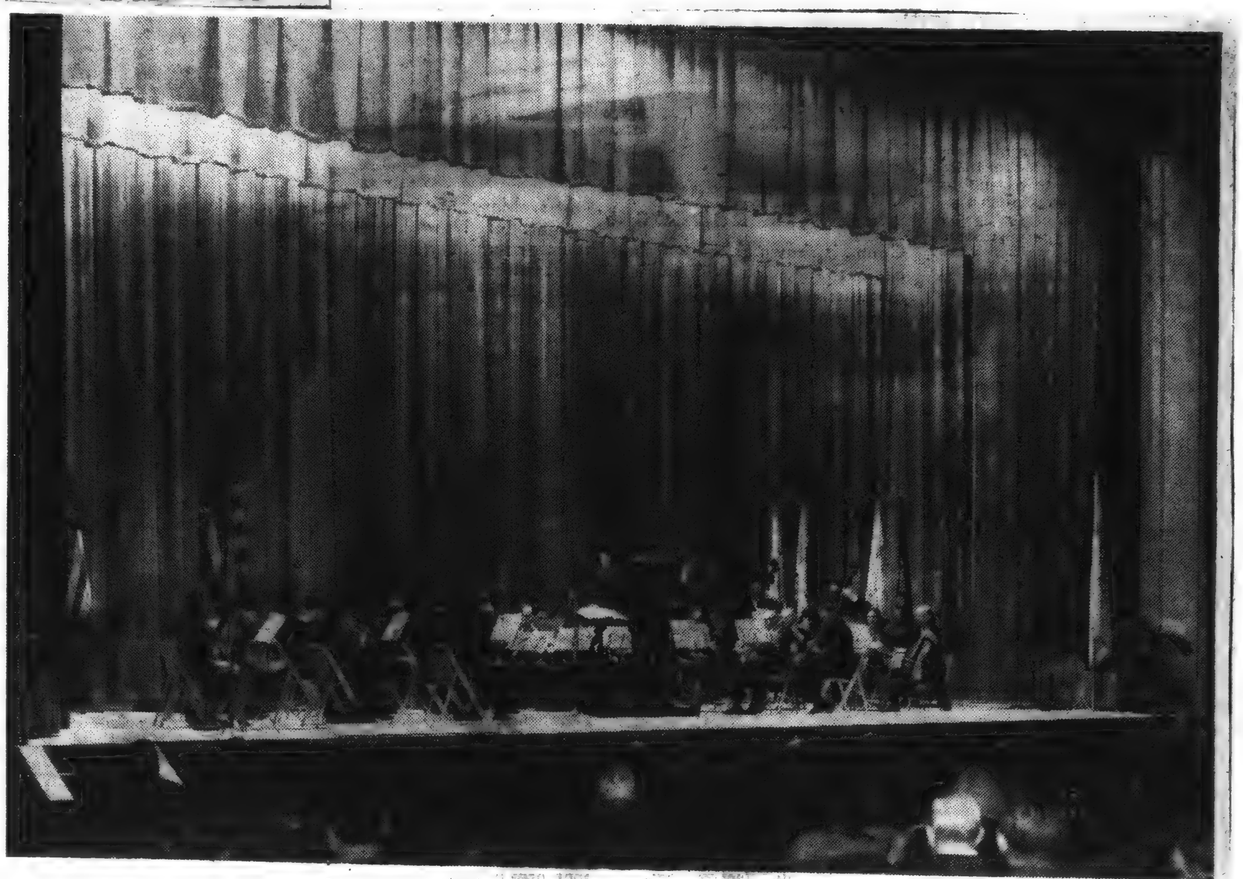
When Koussevitzky laid down his stick last year and a dynamic middle-aged Alsatian picked it up, it was immediately discovered that the tradition was to be spectacularly maintained.

Charles Munch, long a pillar of French music, had done some recent "guesting" in America and made one tour with the French National Orchestra. It was enough to convince Henry B. Cabot that Munch was the man. So Munch, 58 years old and a friendly, sincere fellow as well as a superb musician, settled into Koussevitzky's throne.



40-41

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 28 1950



Largest Stage in R.I.: The Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra under the direction of Francis Madeira plays during the dedication program yesterday of the Veterans Memorial Building. (Other pictures on Page 3.) —Staff Photo by Joseph W. Arsenault

State Veterans Memorial Is Dedicated by Governor

Pastore Calls Building Realization of Many Years' Dream; Ceremonies Are Held in 2203-Seat Auditorium of Former Masonic Temple

Gov. John O. Pastore, calling its opening "the realization of a dream of many years for our community," yesterday formally dedicated the new Veterans Memorial Building.

Speaking from the stage of the State Auditorium in the building the governor dedicated "this beautiful, wonderful auditorium" to the veterans of Rhode Island "who laid down their work and in some cases their lives."

The dedication ceremonies were held in the presence of members of the General Assembly and several hundred persons scattered through the big auditorium which seats 2203.

The governor told those present that he had opposed sending out special private invitations for the dedication, "for this building truly belongs to all the people of the state."

Veterans Represented

On stage were the flags of the various veterans' organizations, and in a reserved section on the right side of the auditorium, down front, were about 50 veterans representing the United Veterans Council and member organizations.

Dedication prayers were offered by the Most Rev. Russell J. McVinney, D.D., Bishop of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Providence; the Rt. Rev. Granville Gaylord Bennett, D.D., Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Rhode Island, and Rabbi Eli A. Bohnen, president of the Rabbinical Association of Rhode Island.

The governor and the religious leaders walked across Francis Street from the State House to the auditorium in a small procession, preceded by a contingent of state and local police. Earlier, members of the Senate marched into the auditorium. House members walked over informally beforehand.

The program was opened with the playing of the national anthem by the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of Francis Madeira. After the dedication prayers, the 36-piece orchestra played Mozart's "Haffner Symphony" and two movements of Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," and completed the program with Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever."

First Concert Tuesday

The first formal concert will be held in the auditorium next Tuesday, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play. Thursday, the Providence Community Concert Association will present its first formal concert in the new auditorium.

The old Masonic Temple became state property on June 1, 1945, when the state paid trustees of the Masonic Temple Fund $754,000 for the land and buildings. Oresto DiSaia, former state director of public works and now the architect for the renovation, said it would cost the state $3,800,000 to erect a similar new building. To complete the building and refurbish it after its purchase the state in 1948 ended its policy of insuring its own buildings against fire and used a $750,000 fund formerly devoted to that purpose on the newly acquired structure.

A picture-story on the new State Auditorium will appear tomorrow in The Rhode Islander.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 24 1950

Musician Truman Held Too Modest

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, director-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that President Truman is "much too modest" about his piano-playing ability.

"We all know his playing is much better than he talks about it," the noted musician said after a visit with Mr. Truman.

Koussevitsky said he suggested to the President that a secretariat of fine arts be established in the government to promote popular appreciation of all arts. He said Mr. Truman expressed great interest.

The conductor said he also talked about his long-standing desire to have the President's daughter, Margaret, at his Tanglewood, Mass., music school. But he declined to say what Mr. Truman thought of that idea.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 23 1950

Symphony Conductor

There have been recent communications in your letters column in reference to the abilities of Howard Mitchell as conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra.

During the important Sustaining Fund Campaign for the Orchestra, it seems to me essential that the fullest appreciation of Mr. Mitchell's gifts as a musician should be brought to the fore. The greater the confidence the community has in the leadership of its orchestra, the greater the response will be to the current appeal.

I speak with conviction when I say that I believe the National Symphony Orchestra has never sounded better than it does this year under the leadership of Mr. Mitchell. The greatest orchestras of the world are heard via their recordings every day on the radio station with which I am connected. It gives us a standard of comparison. We have made recordings of the broadcast concerts of the National Symphony Orchestra which can take their place proudly with recordings made by the highly publicized orchestras of other cities.

It is important that every Washington music lover understand this: musical organizations, like governments and other man-made enterprises, run through the cycle of rise and fall. There is evidence to support my belief that the sun is shining on Washington's orchestra and that under Mr. Mitchell's baton, with the support of the citizens of metropolitan Washington, this orchestra has an opportunity over the years to become one of the greatest in the world.

Certainly no other city is a more fertile ground for such a development and certainly nowhere in this country is there a more truly American development than that of Mr. Mitchell's appointment as regular conductor of the orchestra. Never before in the history of our country has a great metropolitan orchestra chosen its leader from its own ranks.

The story is perfected by the facts that Mr. Mitchell is American-born and American-educated. His years of experience as a perfomer and as associate conductor of this very orchestra and his acknowledged gifts for making music are ample reason for giving him and the National Symphony complete support.

Let us not be confused by the glamour associated with the long-built-up reputations of visiting orchestras. The Boston Symphony, under its new conductor, played to a full house last week in Constitution Hall. The previous night the National Symphony played to perhaps two thirds capacity, but the Boston Orchestra, bigger in numbers and more experienced, gave an unworthy performance. Our own orchestra distinguished itself.

Washington has an opportunity to make musical history—we have an opportunity to see the growth of this orchestra under its conductor, and the most stimulating thought of all is that, given our backing, Mr. Mitchell cannot but become a greater musician as the years go by. This has been true of every great conductor.

Let us not import our culture. Let us create it.

M. ROBERT ROGERS,
General Manager Radio Station WQQW.
Washington.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER
JAN 24 1950

★ ★ ★

Calls Truman "Modest"

Washington — (UP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, Director Emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that President Truman was "much too modest" about his piano-playing ability.

"We all know his playing is much better than he talks about it," the noted musician said after a visit with Mr. Truman.

Dr. Koussevitsky said he had suggested to the President that a secretariat of fine arts be established in the government to promote popular appreciation of all arts. He said Mr. Truman had expressed great interest.

BOSTON POST

KOUSSEVITZKY MEETS TRUMAN

Asks for Secretariat of Fine Arts

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky told President Truman today of his belief that the government should establish a secretariat of fine arts.

The head of the music centre at Tanglewood, Mass., and director emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a long visit with the President.

"We artists in all groups have a desire and a dream to have such a secretariat to develop the talents of the youngsters of this country in music, literature, drama, opera and the ballet," he said.

He said he told the President of his interest in the President's daughter, Margaret, and her singing career and said he would like to have her in his music centre.

He said he found the President "modest" about his own piano playing, asserting he thought the President "plays much better than he talks about his playing."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 24 1950

Washington Briefs

Koussevitsky Calls Truman Better Piano Player Than He Admits; $8 to $9 Census Pay

From the Herald Tribune Bureau

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23.—An expert on the subject is convinced that President Truman is a much better piano player than he admits he is. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, director-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, delivered this judgment after a call on Mr. Truman to discuss his proposal that a secretariat of fine arts be established in the government. He also mentioned his long-held desire to have the President's daughter, Margaret, at his Tanglewood, Mass., music school.

He said Mr. Truman expressed interest in the fine arts secretariat idea, but did not disclose his reaction to the proposal affecting his daughter.

"We all know," he commented on the President's own talent, "that he plays much better than he talks about it. He's much too modest."

[74]

—Schubert in the Hands of Munch

Great C-Major Symphony On the Week-End Program

By Harold Rogers

Adding proof to proof each time he mounts the podium, Charles Munch will soon amass enough evidence (if he has not done so already) to establish his position as one of the world's great conductors. From the very beginning of his tenure this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has chosen programs of distinction and compelling musical interest. His program for the concerts this week end in Symphony Hall is no less so.

Yesterday afternoon he played works by three composers—Hans Pfitzner, Igor Stravinsky, and Franz Schubert. Now—added to the Munch Beethoven, the Munch Brahms, the Munch Tchaikovsky, and the Munch Schumann—we have the Munch Schubert, and a glorious Schubert it is.

It is the mature Schubert of the great Symphony in C major, written in the composer's last year, a work of heavenly conception and, as some one once put it, of heavenly length. Under Mr. Munch's churning baton it took on brilliant accents, insistent drive, plasticity of form. But it seldom went so fast as to lose its clarity. Delicate moods were contrasted with those of power. Though there were several times when the counter-melodies were too retiring, Mr. Munch generally handled the inner voices well.

Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," subtitled a "Ballet in Three Deals," pictures a poker game. When produced as a ballet at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1937, the dancers represented cards, the stage a gigantic table. Each of the "deals," or movements, opens with the same introductory theme; the following brief episodes represent the humorous activities of the Joker, the four Queens, the Jack of Hearts, and the final combat between the Spades and Hearts, with the Hearts triumphant, of course.

Whatever heights M. Stravinsky should wish to achieve in the realm of absolute music, this ballet further discloses, even in his neo-classic period, that he does his best work in program music. The score is cleverly contrived, intellectual, abounding in witticisms, jogging with jollity throughout.

Stravinsky's elliptical phrases and limping rhythms posed no problem for Mr. Munch. The score was on the stand to one side, but he turned no pages.

Pfitzner's preludes to the three acts of his opera, "Palestrina," revealed many of the finer facets of late German romanticism. In the first prelude particularly, and again in the last, Pfitzner employed Palestrina's style of overlapping phrases, giving his writing a quasi-Renaissance flavor. The middle prelude forsakes this influence and speaks in the Sturm-und-Drang period pure and simple. It represents the finest type of musical expression of this style and era.

Symphony Programs Next Week

Charles Munch will conduct the third program of the Sunday Afternoon series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow at 3:30, the fourteenth pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 3 and 4, and the fifth concert of the Tuesday Evening series on Feb. 7.

The program tomorrow afternoon will consist of Handel's "Water Music," Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony. Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Munch will introduce to these concerts the only symphony composed by William Walton. A work by another English composer will open the program—Benjamin Britten's Variations for String Orchestra on a Theme by Frank Bridge. The concluding number will be Debussy's "La Mer."

For the concert Tuesday evening, Feb. 7, Mr. Munch announces Schubert's posthumous Symphony in C major, Stravinsky's ballet, "The Card Game," and Ravel's "La Valse."

Eddie Bracken will star in the film version of "The Sugar Plum Staircase," a novel by Richard English. He will have the role of an insurance agent.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SAT

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 14th program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
Three Preludes from "Palestrina" ..... Pfitzner
Jeu de Cartes ..... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 7 in C ..... Schubert

By RUDOLPH ELIE

In view of the fact that Pfitzner's Preludes to "Palestrina," Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes" and Schubert's C major Symphony offer no especial reason for filling a column with musical small talk, the question is, what to discuss this fine morning?

As it happens there is plenty to discuss, for, as the second half of his first season begins, Mr. Munch has made his second move in rearranging the musical forces before him. This move, which is merely that of removing the risers which have heretofore elevated by steps the musicians in their respective rows, is doubtless merely experimental. If this is not the case, it is, I think, a matter of some concern to all of us who sit on the floor of the Hall.

The first move, that of moving the double bass players from Koussevitzky's dispersal of them behind the violins to the opposite position re-mforcing the cellos, was admirable from the point of view of increased unanimity. The basses, after all, often double the cello parts and this proximity lessens the awkward contrapuntal effect occasionally encountered before.

Still, there is much to be said for Koussevitzky's [illegible], which was to frame or enclose, so to speak, the higher voices of the orchestra with the bass or foundation instruments. We shall certainly have the opportunity to compare if Koussevitzky returns next season as guest conductor; he will order the basses back where they were like a teacher returning to a class room to see her charges out of their seats.

Removing the risers, however, save when there is a chorus on hand (when it is often done), may or may not make the slightest difference in the orchestral tone. From my seat on the floor I fancied that it did, and I cite as a specific example the response of the woodwinds to the opening string flourish in the third movement of the Schubert. To me, being dismayed at the change anyway as I couldn't see anybody in the orchestra, it sounded muffled and covered. From a more objective point of view, however, it may be it made no difference at all.

And if this is the case, why bother making the change? From the balconies, perhaps, there is no visual diminution without the risers. From the floor it is visually highly unsatisfactory. There is very little pitch to the floor to begin with, and from where I sit—and I think from where everybody else sits on the floor—the orchestra looked like an untidy jungle of bows, bassoon tops and scrolls of double basses.

Well, perhaps I make a kettledrum out of a piccolo, but I found it hard to work up any enthusiasm in the whole affair. The Pfitzner Preludes seemed no great shakes to me; well-wrought late German romanticism with an individual sound but not much force of personality. The Stravinsky wasn't any too well played (and is only reasonably entertaining without the ballet in any case). The Schubert, a beautiful and always invigorating work, redeemed, in part, the otherwise excellent but somewhat less than notable doings.

The program next week lists Britten's Variations for String Orchestra on a Theme of Frank Bridge, Walton's First Symphony and Debussy's "La Mer."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The second half of the current Symphony season began yesterday; but less auspiciously than the first half. For one thing, Mr. Munch had decided to seat the orchestra, or nearly all of it, on a level. This has been tried before and without success. There are plenty of arguments against this arrangement, and none in favor of it, and intermission comment yesterday registered general dissatisfaction.

Not many American orchestras, if indeed any, save ours, have made note of the fact that Hans Pfitzner died last May in his 81st year. Mr. Munch was himself a Pfitzner pupil and he conducted yesterday for the first time in Boston the three Preludes to the respective acts of that composer's magnum opus, the opera "Palestrina." It so happens that this reviewer heard "Palestrina" in Munich in the summer of 1930, under the composer's direction, and found this "musical legend," with its partly ecclesiastical setting, its complete freedom from the conventionally operatic, decidedly impressive. Yesterday wrested from their context, the three Preludes failed to register. You could admire the composer's serious and elevated approach and his masterly craftsmanship, but the music seemed, to put it bluntly, uninspired. Has it aged that much in 20 years, or was I "taken in?" Writing about it to the New York Times, Herbert F. Peyser called the opera "an eternity of nothing." Certainly Mr. Munch conducted the music with devotion and apparent understanding and it was, on the whole, well received.

In sharpest contrast was the next item on the program, Stravinsky's ballet "Card Game," which he himself conducted here in 1939 and repeated five years later. This music, too, needs the background of the stage, the atmosphere of the theatre. It is not at all hard to take and at times skirts the obvious. You could call it a mixture of the amusing, the frivolous and the footling.

Mr. Munch showed abundant sympathy for Stravinsky, as he had for Pfitzner, but the Schubert of the C major Symphony eluded him as he did his two predecessors. In the course of many years we have heard two performances of the Symphony that were wholly in the vein, those of the guest conductors, Boult and Szell. Yesterday the introduction to the first movement was too fast and the main body of the Andante con moto much too fast. The trio of the Scherzo lacked the Viennese lilt and much of what was left was pepped up and tonally coarse. The less you do to Schubert the more he will do for himself. He is probably fundamentally much too simple for this complex age of ours.

HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN
JAN 30 1950

KOUSSEVITZKY TO CONDUCT IN HOLLYWOOD BOWL

Engagement of Serge Koussevitzky to conduct five concerts as the climax to the Hollywood Bowl's 29th season of Symphonies under the Stars next Summer was announced today by Karl Wecker, general manager.

Koussevitzky, who was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 years until his retirement last year, will conduct the final five events of the 1950 season, and will have world celebrated soloists featured with him.

Two of the concerts will be devoted to music of Beethoven, with the famed ninth symphony (with soloists and large chorus) closing the season. The summer concerts will start during the week of July 10.

At present the distinguished maestro is making a tour of Europe.

MUSIC

Munch Introduces Three "Palestrina" Preludes at Symphony Concerts

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch gives the first Boston performances of the three Preludes from the opera "Palestrina" by the late Hans Pfitzner at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall this week. They come first on a program which includes the "Card Game" of Stravinsky and the "Great" C major Symphony of Schubert.

Pfitzner, who died in Salzburg last May 22, just under 81, was a composer respected in Germany, but not too well known on this continent. In this city, he has been a name in the reference books and the musical magazines, not a composer familiar, admired or even disputed. Hence, although his opera "Palestrina" is more than 33 years old, these Preludes arrive as novelties. Mr. Munch had planned to do them earlier in the season, but a bout with influenza caused their postponement.

It is easy to see why Pfitzner was admired in Germany, assuming that these samples are typical of his work. The first and third Preludes are full of lush harmonies and brooding melodies, of that combination of sensuousness and high seriousness which are essentials of the German temperament. The second Prelude is a stormy depiction of the Council of Trent. All three are solidly-wrought, with symphonic weight, power and organization, more or less romantic, and heavily German.

This sort of music came out of Beethoven and Wagner by way of Bruckner and Strauss, and is fundamentally admirable work by a minor creative talent, good to hear but of no enduring importance. In concert performance they must be judged by themselves, although the function of a prelude is its effect in setting forth in miniature the spirit of all or part of an opera.

"Palestrina" was about the great 16th Century composer of churchly music, and evidently it was an exalted and far from conventional theatre piece. For one reason and another it lost public interest, even in Germany, long since, and thus it is not likely that performance over here will ever show us how effective are these Preludes in their natural surroundings.

Stravinsky's waggish ballet score a little less dry than most of the music he has produced in 15 years sounded much better as Mr. Munch conducted it than in Stravinsky's own performances. Munch gives it greater point, more delicacy and lightness; the rhythms are seen to be subtle and clever, not just thumping, and the tone and ensemble of the orchestra count for a good deal more. Another proof that a composer is seldom his own best interpreter.

Though Schubert's C major Symphony was the oldest of the numbers, it was the most interesting because it was a Munch reading of a standard masterpiece. It was done "straight," with no meddling with the tempos, no spurious nuances or personal touches of expression, but with that marvelous clarity and comprehension of style for which Munch has come to be admired. Thus the Symphony was the same Schubert it always has been, but bright and shining after certain interpretive excrescences had been cleaned away.

For the first time, Mr. Munch dispensed with platforms and seated the orchestra on a level stage. It is said he has desired this from the start. I think perhaps the orchestra sounded better, from out front, the other way, but it will be interesting to make comparisons in the weeks to come. The woodwind and brass seemed softer than usual, yesterday, but that may have been a matter of balance as the conductor desired it. Anyway, this was a concert of superlative conducting and performance.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
JAN 29 1950

Former Symphony Conductor Honored

CHICAGO, Jan. 28 (INS). — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been named a director of the National Arts Foundation of New York.

The foundation, in announcing the appointment in Chicago, said Dr. Koussevitzky will serve on its advisory committee on music.

It cited the retired Boston Symphony conductor for "encouraging and training young American conductors and giving hearing to contemporary composers."

[75]

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

AROUND THE STATE

Boston Symphony Seen Testing Auditorium, Parking Facilities

PROVIDENCE — The new state [illegible] Veterans Memorial Building will get its initial test next week, will get its initial public tryout tonight when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents its first Providence concert there at 8:15.

At the same time traffic handling and parking facilities around the building will get their first test. Police and representatives of the Providence Community Concert Association estimate on-street parking for about 600 cars within 1,100 feet of the auditorium should be available to concert-goers tonight. A detail consisting of a sergeant and three patrolmen have been assigned to handle the traffic.

Additional parking facilities for about 100 cars in the state employes' parking lot adjacent to the State Office Building on the north side of Smith Street are being provided by the State Division of Public Buildings.

The two parking lots to the east of the State House, used in the daytime by employes and legislators, are not being opened.

Major on-street parking areas will be Smith Street, between the State House and State Office Building where angle parking is permitted; Francis Street, where parallel parking on both sides is allowed; and the side streets near the Veterans Memorial Building which run east and west.

The main entrance to the building is on Brownell Street. Cars arriving to discharge passengers at the entrance will move down Francis Street, make a right turn onto Brownell, or Francis Street, turning left on Brownell.

The next street west, Park Street, will be used to move traffic away from the auditorium and no parking will be permitted on either side. On the next parallel road, Holden Street, parking is permitted on the east side.

Additional spaces are located on the short streets running at right angles to Park and Holden. Two-side parking is allowed on Jewett, parking on the south side only on West Park Street, on both sides along the extension of Brownell Street, on the north side of Woodland Street and Beach Street. Additional spaces exist on the north side of Hayes Street, behind the Veterans Memorial Building, and along Smith Street beyond the Francis Street intersection.

Urged to Leave Home Early

Community Concert Association representatives urge persons planning to go to the concert by bus to leave their homes early. The UER is planning to operate additional equipment on the Wilkstone Avenue and Smith Street lines which can be boarded on Francis Street in front of Union Station. Following the concert busses will load at Brownell and Francis Streets for transportation to the Main Line.

If traveling by cab, transportation after the concert can be found on Park Street on the west side of the building.

Persons driving cars were asked to bring other concert-goers with them to reduce traffic congestion as far as possible. It was also suggested if possible, that passengers be discharged where the car is parked rather than at the auditorium door.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 31 1950

CONCERT TO TEST TRAFFIC, PARKING

Boston Symphony Also to Give State Auditorium First Full-Scale Tryout Tonight

See map of area for Parking Plan on Page 12.

Traffic handling and parking facilities around the new Veterans Memorial Building will get their first major test tonight when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents its first Providence concert in the building at 8:15 p.m.

The state auditorium, seating 2203 persons, also will get its initial full-scale public tryout since completion. It was used for the first time last Friday when 700 persons attended exercises dedicating the building.

Police and representatives of the Providence Community Concert Association estimate on-street parking for about 600 cars within 1100 feet of the auditorium should be available to concert-goers tonight. A detail consisting of a sergeant and three patrolmen have been assigned to handle the traffic.

Additional parking facilities for about 100 cars in the state employes' parking lot adjacent to the State Office Building on the north side of Smith Street are being provided by the State Division of Public Buildings.

The two parking lots to the east of the State House, used in the daytime by employes and legislators, are not being opened.

Major on-street parking areas will be Smith Street, between the State House and State Office Building where angle parking is permitted; Francis Street, where parallel parking on both sides is allowed; and the side streets near the Veterans Memorial Building which run east and west.

The main entrance to the building is on Brownell Street. Cars arriving to discharge passengers at the entrance will move down Francis Street, make a right turn onto Brownell, or Francis Street, turning left on Brownell.

The next street west, Park Street, will be used to move traffic away from the auditorium and no parking will be permitted on either side. On the next parallel road, Holden Street, parking is permitted on the east side.

Additional spaces are located on the short streets running at right angles to Park and Holden. Two-side parking is allowed on Jewett, parking on the south side only on West Park Street, on both sides along the extension of Brownell Street, on the north side of Woodland Street and Beach Street. Additional spaces exist on the north side of Hayes Street, behind the Veterans Memorial Building, and along Smith Street beyond the Francis Street intersection.

Urged to Leave Home Early

Community Concert Association representatives urge persons planning to go to the concert by bus to leave their homes early. The UER is planning to operate additional equipment on the Wilkstone Avenue and Smith Street lines which can be boarded on Francis Street in front of Union Station. Following the concert busses will load at Brownell and Francis Streets for transportation to the Main Line.

If traveling by cab, transportation after the concert can be found on Park Street on the west side of the building.

Persons driving cars were asked to bring other concert-goers with them to reduce traffic congestion as far as possible. It was also suggested if possible, that passengers be discharged where the car is parked rather than at the auditorium door.

EVANSVILLE, IND.
PRESS
JAN 30 1950

Death Follows "Pathetique"? Bosh, Say Leading Conductors

NEW YORK, Jan. 28—(UP)—Most American musicians scoff at the idea death and tragedy always follow the playing of Tchaikovsky's "The Pathetique" symphony.

But a few believe the superstition.

"Two of my dearest friends died within two days after I first conducted 'Pathetique' more than 40 years ago in New York," Victor Kolar, now on the staff of the Detroit institute of arts, said. "It is a symphony of death and suicide and disaster."

Third Death

Kolar, who has led many of the nation's great orchestras during the past 45 years, said that on another occasion he played the selection "against my will." Within a few days a close friend died in a fall from a hotel window, he said.

"Every time I coinducted the sixth symphony, death and tragedy have followed," Kolar said. "I vowed in 1934 that I would never conduct it again.

Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians denied that they had any fear of "The Pathetique." But they recalled that the symphony made headlines there during the depression.

At that time Conductor Arthur Fiedler was advised by psychologists to play said music to cheer up his audiences. As a result he played "The Pathetique" as the feature of a program of less serious music. It was the hit of the program. "Fiedler plays sad music to make people happy," a newspaper headlined the next day.

The two major recording companies of symphony music, Columbia and RCA Victor, said they had recorded the symphony several times without mishap.

190 Times

Conductor Eugene Ormandy scoffed at the superstition. "The Philadelphia Orchestra has played the symphony 190 times," Ormandy said, "without a single death."

And Charles Munch, director of the Boston orchestra, said his group had played the symphony 209 times since 1894. He said he would play it again Sunday night in Boston and on Tuesday night in Providence, R. I.

Conductor Leopold Stokowski said in New York that he had no superstitions about the matter.

"Every individual responds differently to Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony because every individual is basically different," he said.

Welcome

For almost 70 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been Rhode Island's chief source of great performances of great orchestral music. Any evening that the Bostonians come here is a notable evening.

But the concert next Tuesday will combine certain features that have an interest and significance extraordinary beyond the extraordinary average. The concert will be the first to take place in the new State Auditorium, a hall likely to satisfy a need long apparent in Providence; and it will be the first concert in which Charles Munch will appear here as permanent conductor of the orchestra.

Mr. Munch, who has succeeded Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, is the tenth conductor the orchestra has had since it was founded, in 1881. His European reputation and the enthusiasm of musicians, audiences, and critics since his debut in this country give ground for expecting that he will keep the orchestra at the pitch of excellence it has achieved under his illustrious predecessors.

Providence has already welcomed Mr. Munch as a guest conductor. It is happy to welcome him anew in his new capacity, and to wish him the success that all the circumstances seem to ensure.

Jewish Advocate 13

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS Jan 26

BURGIN CONDUCTS NOVELTIES

The Boston Symphony's enterprising associate conductor, Richard Burgin, gave Symphony Hall audiences last Friday and Saturday two works played for the first time in Boston, another for a premier performance at these concerts and the Shostakovich First in a well-balanced program to round out the first half of this season's concerts.

Opening piece was Couperin's Overture and Allegro from the Suite "La Sultane" as orchestrated by Milhaud. In spite of overheavy, though undoubtedly skilful instrumentaiton, the quality of the music was such as to add further tacit consent to the composer's title—"Couperin Le Grand."

Not so grand, however, was Vaughan Williams' Concerto for Two Pianos and Orchestra, with Whittemore and Lowe the soloists. This is a rehash of a concerto written originally for one piano. Presumably the composer conveyed his wishes adequately with one solo instrument or he would not have written it in the first place. The only validity in two-piano work is when two pianos are really needed to carry out the composer's ideas. In this case it was obvious that the reworking was nothing more than a commercial vehicle. Further, whether for one or two pianos, the concerto has little worth the saying. And in so much of the English composer's work, the concerto is slanted so subjectively that while, no doubt, every note has a very special meaning to the creator, it lacks enough universality to speak to the hearer. On the credit side, the concerto is musicianly and done by a man who knows his business. Let it not be forgotten, incidentally, that Vaughan Williams has written many superior works. Of the duo-pianists' playing but little could be gathered from the music and that little was not wholly positive.

But if the Concerto went its pedestrian route, Bartok's Suite from the Pantomime, "The Miraculous Mandarin," had a fast enough pace. This is exciting and evocative music and Burgin's splendid interpretation of the artful, sly, tantalizing and suggestive pages made the program plain to hearers who might have been scandalized with the ballet from which the music is drawn.

A forceful and invigorating performance of Shostakovich's youthful masterpiece brought to an end a concert which added to the conviction that in Richard Burgin we possess an extremely able conductor and a very thoughtful musician.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
JAN 31 1950

Local Musicians Will Play That 'Deadly' 6th Symphony

Alexander Leslie Asks Springfield Orchestra's Clarinetists and They Reply, 'Sure'

Clarinetists and allied musicians of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra are stout fellows. Of course they're going to play Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony—now suspected of deaths in Stockholm and in Nottingham, Eng.

Symphony programs are planned a while ahead of time. So it happens the mail man recently brought to 49 Chestnut St. some music for the Feb. 28 concert of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra.

Alexander Leslie, musical director, took a look at the stack of mail, thought of a couple of newspaper stories he'd read within a day or two and decided to have a man-to-man chat with each of his clarinet players as soon as possible.

This he did Sunday afternoon. Notwithstanding the reports from Stockholm, Eng., about tragic consequences within orchestras playing Tschaikowsky's Sixth, it will remain on the Feb. 28 program at the Auditorium.

Tschaikowsky's No. 6 is what the mail man delivered.

Stockholm Report

The story from Stockholm is that halfway through the number following the "Pathetique" (as T's Sixth is called) a clarinetist collapsed and died. And the story from Nottingham is that the director there warned Johannes Norrby, Stockholm conductor, what would happen if the symphony were programmed.

Seems the Nottingham man had lost a horn player and a cellist over the years right after Pathetique performances.

Well, Mr. Leslie and his musicians generally—clarinetists particularly—aren't much impressed.

To the clarinet players, since they seem most jeopardized, Mr. Leslie said: "Are you willing to play Tschaikowsky's Sixth?"

To Mr. Leslie they replied jointly: "Sure, if you want to risk it."

Others Playing It, Too

Mr. Leslie thinks there's no risk at all. Especially with the wire services bringing reassuring tidings about Tschaikowsky's great symphony.

The Boston Symphony is playing it tonight in Providence. This will be that orchestra's 212th performance since 1894, without noticeable ill effects. Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia Orchestra says his outfit has gone through the music 190 times "without a single death."

And yesterday Basil Cameron of the London Philharmonic said he "felt fine" after a performance of the work.

Yes, when you go to the Auditorium the last night of next month you'll definitely hear Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony.

Our orchestra isn't afraid.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 29 1950

[76]

Munch, New Conductor, Brings Joy to the Boston Symphony

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

THE other day, I went to Boston to call on Charles Munch. Mr. Munch is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he will appear here for the first time in that capacity Tuesday night, when the orchestra gives the first concert in the new State Auditorium.

Mr. Munch was not yet at Symphony Hall when I arrived, but many members of the orchestra were on hand, as well as persons otherwise connected with it, and I spent some time gathering odds and ends of pertinent information:

In the original, to begin with, Mr. Munch's name is spelled with an umlauted "u," but, since that is difficult for Americans to pronounce, he has dropped the umlaut; he has not added the customary "e." The pronunciation has become "Moonsh," the "oo" pronounced about as in "look."

Whereas his predecessor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, is a man who arouses, predominantly, respect and fear among the strings and brasses, Mr. Munch arouses happiness.

"Now," as one musician has expressed it, "we can play without ulcers."

'Crazy About Him'

"They're crazy about him to a man," an informant said. "He is so relaxing. They feel very secure. One of them said to me, 'We're absolutely sure what he wants at all times. He never experiments at rehearsals.' He knows they're all artists. They feel as bad as he does when they make a mistake. He corrects them, and they understand that he must, but he corrects them in such a way that they don't resent it. He doesn't ride them.

"The men in the orchestra gave him a party the other night. That's virtually unprecedented."

Presently it was announced that Mr. Munch had come in, and I was taken to the Green Room to meet him. He was seated at a small, rectangular, glass-topped table near the windows and was glancing through a score. Arising, he took two hospitable steps forward and shook hands cordially. He was a man of about 60, slightly under six feet in height, with a sensitive, somewhat humorous mouth, eyes that might be grayish or greenish blue, depending on the light, and abundant but not excessive gray-black hair, parted on the right. He was wearing a light tan sport jacket. As he seemed to be busy and not to speak much English, I withdrew for the time among some other persons in the room and he returned to the table.

Threw Out Man and Picture

The Green Room has green walls, upon which are only two pictures, neither of them of Mr. Munch. (A publicity man once entered the Green Room with a huge photograph of Mr. Munch, who, thinking it was proposed to hang the photograph on a wall there, cast the man out—picture and all.) One of the pictures he has allowed is a reproduction of a Degas painting, the other of a Homer. There is a large mirror on another wall, perhaps so the conductor can look for threads on his uniform just before leaving for the podium. One door leads to a corridor, another to a dressing room. The rug is cerise, and the drapes are pale green and cerise. There is a small chest of drawers, a secretary (furniture), a leather couch, chairs, lamps, and a moderately grand piano with scores stacked on the lid.

I left and wandered around the stage entrance, waiting for the morning rehearsal to begin. There I encountered a man who spoke of Mr. Munch and batons.

"He uses batons of different sizes for different pieces," said this man. "When he gets one he likes very much, he doesn't want to let it out of his sight. He won't even let you clean the dirt off it."

The orchestra, like a thousand exotic birds on a promising morning, was proclaiming the sort of delightful anarchy that orchestras always proclaim before the boss arrives. All the chairs were at the stage level, none on risers; the double basses and French horns were to the right, the percussion, trumpets, and deep brass were to the left—all changes from the arrangement preferred by Dr. Koussevitsky.

A large, black curtain cut the hall in two just behind the eleventh row of seats. There were microphones here and there, for part of the rehearsal was to be recorded for radio. Many of the men were in shirtsleeves. One wore a checked shirt of double-forte color and pattern.

Mr. Munch now strode briskly through the orchestra, and the random polyphony stopped, but it didn't stop so quickly and completely as it used to stop when Dr. K. strode through the orchestra; it was the same, later, when Mr. Munch signaled for interruptions, wishing to repeat passages.

A prelude from "Palestrina" was rehearsed first. Mr. Munch played pages at a time, whereas his predecessor had been wont to dwell on short phrases. Dr. Koussevitsky, when he rehearses, seems to be mastering the music, Mr. Munch to be enjoying it; and the tone of the orchestra, I thought, reflected these approaches.

At times Mr. Munch sat passively on the long-legged kitchen chair on the podium. Then he would leap up, his right arm would saber the air, his hair would flop from side to side, he would motion to this section, then to that one, sing, scowl, grin with a placid, mischievous satisfaction, rock back and forth, spring straight up and down. His trim, graceful figure seemed completely under the influence of music.

Glasses Are Elusive

Between rounds, he searched here and there on the desk and in his pockets for his glasses, rimmed in dark shell. He put them on to inspect the score more closely, replaced them absently in his pocket or under the score, and had to search for them again next time. Occasionally he held them in his left hand while conducting.

Except for counting time in French, he spoke to the musicians in English. Though once, when a bassoonist complained in German that his part was poorly printed, Mr. Munch, in German, agreed. "Bad. Swinish."

When it came to Stravinksy's "Jeu de Cartes," he illustrated difficult rhythms by trotting lightly on the podium. "Puh-puh-puh," he sang, or "Bahm-bahm-bahm."

Once he inquired, "Where's that staccato?" The tone was the morning's first indication of temper.

"From the middle of the finger," he instructed the violinists, in regard to a pizzicato—meaning that they were to use the center of the tip, and calling to mind that he had been a violinist himself.

While talking to one viola player, he leaned casually on the shoulder of another.

"Pianissimo," he shouted once at the playing musicians.

He beat time heavily on the score with his left hand, and sprang up with an "Ah" and a strong gesture at a climax.

Forgot His Baton

After a short intermission, he returned and conducted cigarette in hand for a few measures, then extinguished the cigarette on the floor. He had forgotten to bring his baton back. Somebody fetched a sheaf of batons, from which he selected one.

This went on from about 10:30 to 1:30, at which time Mr. Munch went to his dressing room and prepared to return home. His chauffeur, Roger Toureau, was stuffing scores and other things into a large, flat, brown canvas bag with handles.

It was now that I hoped to have a few words with Mr. Munch. But he said he was too tired for an interview, which is what I should have said if I had been Mr. Munch. He also said something, though not to me, about "betises" (stupidities), so I assumed that he had been reading newspaper interviews and would be happy to avoid them.

Ride Request Granted

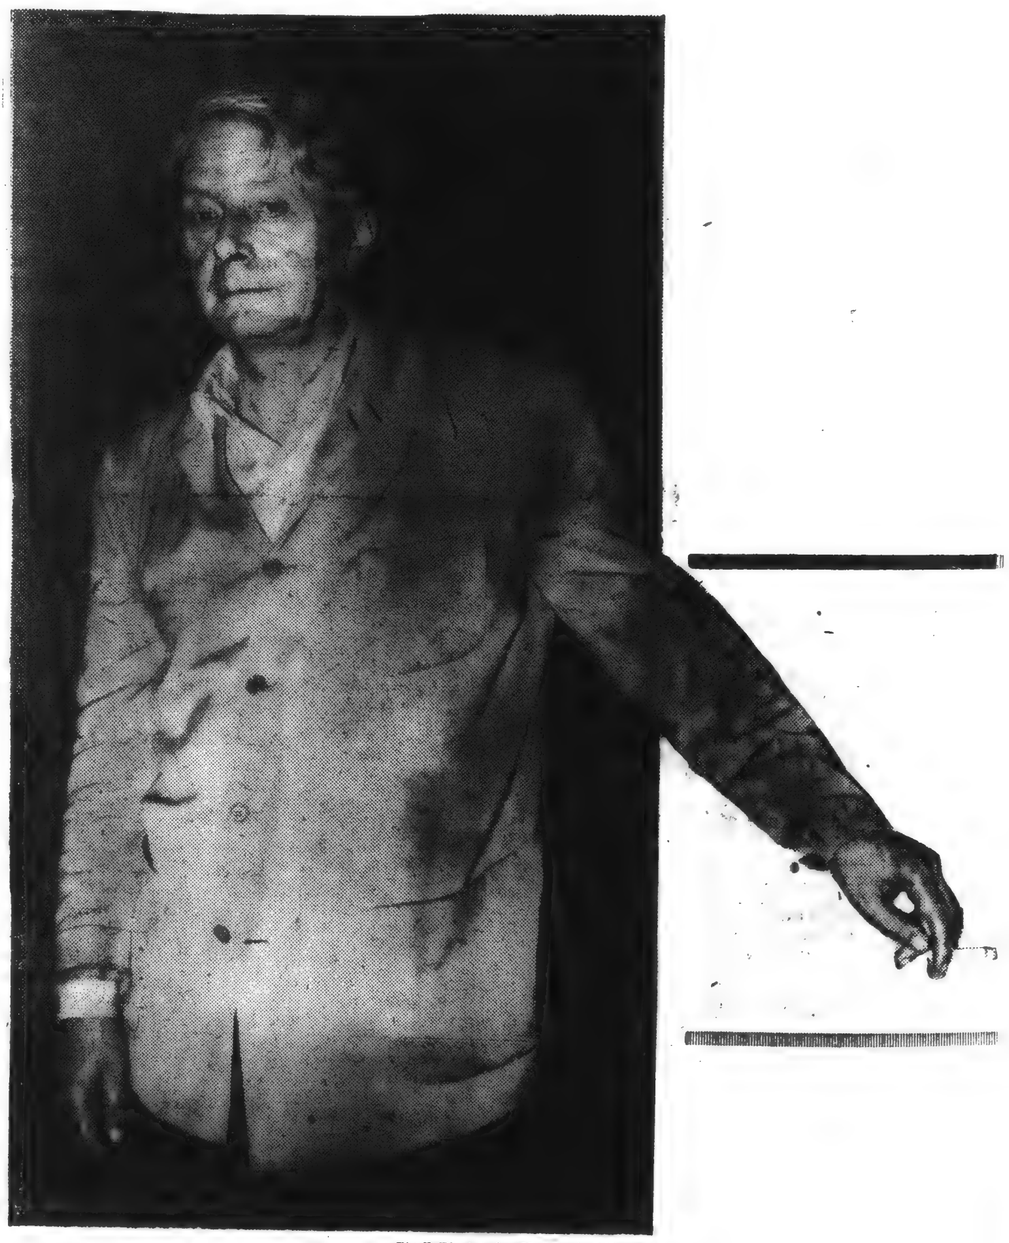
While he was standing in the door of the dressing room, stuffing his shirttails into his pants, I asked whether I might not ride back with him to his home in Milton. I promised not to bother him much and not to write "betises," at least, not on purpose. He grinned suddenly and took me by the arm in a deprecating manner, as though he did not want me to be offended. He said I might ride with him.

It was a small car. Roger drove, and Mr. Munch, Arthur Perkins (Mr. Munch's secretary), and I squeezed into the back seat. Mr. Perkins interpreted when Mr. Munch couldn't understand my English or I couldn't understand his French.

The poor man was indeed tired ("extenue," as he described it) but he was not simply courteous, he was good-natured. I asked what kind of books he liked, and he said all kinds. My favorite French book, I said, was Joseph Bedier's "Tristan et Iseut." By good luck, Bedier had been one of his friends.

"He sometimes visited me at my apartment," Mr. Munch said. He did not know what had become of him since the war. He praised the beautiful simple French of "Tristan."

Percussion! Brass!



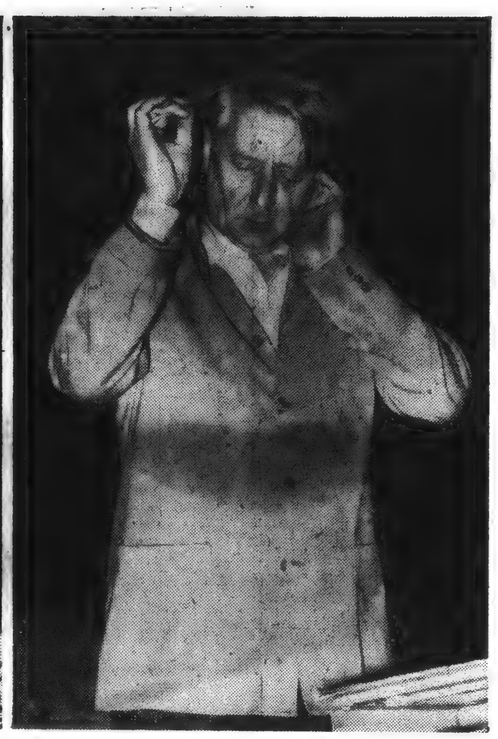
—Staff Photos by Harry A. Scheer

"YOU'D BE TIRED, TOO", is probably what Charles Munch is thinking as he poses for a portrait after a vigorous rehearsal with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will conduct the orchestra here Tuesday night.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 10 1960

Dig into it, men!

Fortissimo!



How's that?

Sing out, 'cellos.

Lovely, isn't it?

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 29 1950

LAST MINUTE RUSH to get the new State Auditorium ready for Tuesday's concert was in best theatrical tradition. As this Rhode Islander edition went to press, workmen's gear still cluttered the hall.

GRAND OPENING—Two Decades Late

Boston Symphony will inaugurate concert activities in abandoned Masonic building, now Veterans Memorial

STORY BY HENRY H. SMITH — PICTURES BY LEO P. REARDON

WHO would have guessed that the first concert in the new State Auditorium would take place 21 years behind schedule? Or that the State Auditorium would be the State Auditorium at all, and not the Masonic Auditorium?

But history has a way of circling about and then catching up with us—at an unexpected time, in the least expected guise. History is waiting in the wings right now for Tuesday evening at 8:30 p.m. in the new State Auditorium of the new Veterans Memorial Building at Francis and Brownell Streets. At the proper time, Charles Munch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will stride out to the center of the stage, address himself silently to the orchestra, await the audience hush, then lift his arm to signal the first note of the first formal concert in the new auditorium. In this way, a new era in the artistic life of Rhode Island will be born.

The bright star of this first of many first nights may not be the Boston Symphony (which will shine with the brilliance of an artistic group of the first order, however). It may be Mr. Munch, making his Providence debut as musical director of the orchestra. But most likely it will be the music hall itself.

Looking about him in the theater, the first nighter will feast his eyes upon dazzling opulence in the classic theatrical mold. Gold-leafed rococo highlights a color-scheme of buffs, light tans and pale brick tones. Murals, lest the enchantment of color make him dreamy and forgetful, remind him that this is a war memorial. There is the flag-raising at Iwo Jima, a naval battle, a tribute to the Rhode Island heroes who served and survived, another to those who did not survive.

Here is a theater which will hold 2203 persons—1202 in the orchestra and 1001 in the balcony-mezzanine. Not the largest in the state but a big theater. It has the largest stage in Rhode Island—85 feet wide and 42 feet deep. The proscenium opening is 48 feet wide and 28 feet high. Could a Barrymore ask for more?

A deep blue main curtain drapes the proscenium. Behind it are an asbestos curtain, a dark gray cyclorama, footlights, border lights and stage spots. Extra stage settings and equipment may be unloaded directly from Park Street backstage. Sixty-five feet above the stage is a steel grid with blocks for holding settings.

The accoustical board used by the Boston Symphony at its Metropolitan Theater concerts in past seasons will be set up for Tuesday's concert. The property of the Providence Community Concert Association, it has been modified to fit the new stage.

Behind the stage are dressing rooms, individual rooms and larger lounge rooms for chorus and musicians. There is a property room, too. A public address system reaches the audience through a main speaker over the proscenium and through eight smaller speakers concealed in the house, two of them in the foyers to recall patrons and make announcements.

A gigantic, oval dome dominates the theater, decoratively. Around the inside are the state seal and the seals of the 39 towns and cities of Rhode Island, beginning with Barrington and Bristol and ending with Woonsocket. A smaller dome, under the mezzanine, is decorated with symbols of the various armed forces that helped to win World War II. The big dome is 58 feet on its long axis and contains 312 100-watt electric lamps covered from view. Other lights, in wall panels, in the ceiling, on aisle seats, in halls and foyers are also recessed.

The orchestra pit will hold about 35 musicians comfortably. Chambers for an organ are located behind bronze grilles on either side of the proscenium arch. No organ is installed yet. The handsome grilles weigh 1600 pounds each.

Ventilation ducts enter and leave through the main dome, providing a method of air conditioning the theater, although air-conditioning equipment is not yet installed.

The theater has been finished, with minor modifications, according to plans furnished to Masonic officials back in the mid-twenties, when the theater was originally conceived. These plans called for a great deal more ornamental plaster work than it is the custom to use today. There are 30,000 linear feet or nearly six miles of plaster ornaments throughout the hall. Fifty tons of plaster were used to make the ornaments.

Oresto DiSaia, Providence architect and former director of the State Department of Public Works, has ORNAMENT. George Waldron, plasterer, places decorative piece in place. Pieces, like this near proscenium, were cast outside theater by artisans.

Continued on Next Page

HEAT comes from two gun-type oil burners in two of the four boilers, still good, which were put in more than 20 years ago. Frank D'Amore, right, superintended theater's completion.

WROUGHT IRON banisters on stairs betwee foyers were installed back in the 20's. State simpl scraped and painted them and put in stair treads ARTISTS Robert Haun and George De Felice (right) at work in the main dome. De Felice redecorated State House dome a couple of years ago. R.I. town and city seals were painted at De Felice's studio, then attached to dome.

Grand Opening

Continued from Preceding Page

been the architect in charge of the project. Money t complete the theater was furnished when the Gener Assembly voted to use the state's $800,000 fire insu ance fund, of which a free balance of about $670,0 was available for construction purposes. Other mon came from the governor's contingency fund. DiSa says that contracts totaling almost $975,000 were l out for the job.

The State Auditorium, to inform the young and r fresh the not so young, was begun on Nov. 12, 1926, part of a Masonic center. The whole was conceived a three-unit, $2,500,000 project—theater, temple a connecting wing. Work was stopped on June 27, 192 with the Masonic building fund drive stymied. The for 16 years the huge center, estimated by constructi experts to be 35 per cent complete, lay neglected. February, 1944, when U.S. Atty. Gen. J. Howa McGrath was governor of the state, Rhode Isla bought the building for $754,000. Plans were made i mediately to convert it to a state office building, v erans organization headquarters and theater. T theater is the first of the completed projects.

Generally, according to DiSaia, the state was able pick up about where the former work was stoppe Plastering had just been started in the main dome, l mentioned, "and we just continued over the entire ce ing and down the walls. A big theater switchboard h been installed. The wires were sticking out unco nected. But they had deteriorated. We had to put in new switchboard. Four big boilers, built by a Pro dence firm, had been installed. They were good so kept them and added new, gun-type oil burners to t of them. Plenty for present heating. Eventually, t scheme is to use all four and generate enough steam heat the State House. Boilers over there are old a inefficient. They eat up $5000 worth of coal every yea

SMALL DOME, held up by steel rods, is over section of orchestra beneath mezzanine. Holes are for ventilation ducts.

FOOTLIGHTS, 150 of them at 200 watts each, are lowered into trough. John Chellel, rule in hand, direc Lamps can be turned on red and blue, adding to white. Border lamps, to go above, are red, green and amb GOLD STAR tribute to Rhode Island's war dead will look down... WAR HEROES who survived are honored by mural in matching from pendant at left of proscenium upon spectators facing stage... pendant on opposite side of the theater. Note gold leaf highlights.

NISHING TOUCHES, shortly before dedication, are inspected by Gov. John O. Pastore. Ben Hall, State resident engineer, left.

ROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL . . JANUARY 29, 1950

A Dream Fulfilled: Spectators, above, at the dedication yesterday of the Veterans Memorial Building look at one of two large murals on the curving white walls of the stairwells leading to the balcony. Below, members of the General Assembly and guests arrive for the ceremony. In the bottom photo, Edward P. Turgeon, right, contractor, hands a key to the former Masonic Temple to Governor Pastore. —Staff Photos

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 1 - 1950

MUSIC

Charles Munch Makes First Appearance in Rhode Island as Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert at New State Auditorium

By RUTH TRIPP

Two great events in the musical world of Rhode Island coincided last evening. One was the initial appearance here, of Charles Munch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other was that this was the first formal concert in the new State Auditorium. The evening was a huge success from all angles, with the possible exception of the weather.

Charles Munch has appeared here twice before as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and then as conductor of the French National Orchestra. We had an idea of what to expect. What we heard so far exceeded our expectations that we are willing to make the extravagant statement that never here, in Boston or in Stockbridge has the orchestra sounded so magnificently to this listener. It played with the unity of a string quartet and whenever the reeds or brass were included, the effect was so skillfully integrated that one was scarcely aware of the entrances.

Some of this extraordinary effect is undoubtedly due to the excellent acoustic properties of the State Auditorium. We are profoundly grateful for this. It might have been different. The improvised box stage served very well. We are told that it will be much handsomer at the next concert.

National Anthem First

The orchestra fittingly opened the concert with the playing of the national anthem. It was stirring.

The program proper began with the playing of a Beethoven Overture, "The Consecration of the House," Op. 124, a work which is traditionally played by the Boston Symphony on such occasions. The program notes gave us the interesting information that this was the first music ever performed by this orchestra at its first concert, conducted by George Henschel, Oct. 22, 1881, in Music Hall, Boston. Last evening its chorale brought solemn dignity to the occasion.

The second offering was Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120. Dr. Munch gave it a poetic reading and it seemed that his practice of conducting without score permits him and his listeners alike to get nearer to the composer's message. The work is performed without pause and its succession of imaginative themes was delightful. The quality of tone produced in the second movement by the violas, 'celli and double basses was like a cushion of velvet. The song theme had a plaintive quality, like something beautiful beyond recall. The third movement was alive and vibrant and its Trio had the grace and exuberance of youthful dancers. The last movement was sparkling and carefree and with its close, the audience gave Dr. Munch a well merited ovation. He was recalled three times.

"Pathetique" Symphony

The last half of the concert was devoted to Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74. This is a work guaranteed to stir the listener emotionally. We listened up to the last movement with great admiration for the beauties of the writing, and for the extraordinary beauty of the interpretation by the musicians. The violas had luscious tones to offer. The clarinets entrance into the familiar theme of the opening movement was beyond description. The brass quartet at the end of the first movement was especially fine. The rhythmic play of the second movement was unusually graceful and the rapid figurations of the third movement, entrancing.

It was in the melancholy fourth movement, however, that the full significance of the occasion overcame us. We thought back to the early days of our concert-going when, with all our musical neighbors, we took the train from Pawtucket and walked from Union Station through the gusty Turks Head Canyon, to Infantry Hall to hear the Boston Symphony. Since those days we have endured four dislocations with the orchestra. In all those years of listening, from the last of Karl Muck's regime until tonight, we have missed only two Providence concerts by the orchestra and these unwillingly.

There was something about our wistful resume of all that has gone before that brought a sense of resignation to change. For no reason at all, some lines from a poem by Charles Malam came to us. From "Spring Plowing", we recalled, "and all my old thoughts died and were plowed under."

So the concert ended and we came out into the wintry weather, aware that there will always be a spring for plowing. It was very clearly stated in the Tschaikovsky.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 1 - 1950

Symphony Sounds Better But Fewer Can Hear It

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Providence's musical center of gravity shifted suddenly last night from the Metropolitan Theater, on Chestnut Street, to the New Veterans Memorial Building, on Brownell Street, near the State House. As is inevitable in such upheavals, there was some gain and some loss.

The occasion was the first of the season's four Providence concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was also [illegible]cert in the new auditorium and the first concert here in which Charles Munch has appeared as permanent director of the orchestra. The symphony was not, however, the first orchestra to play in the hall, the Rhode Island Philharmonic, as was only fitting and proper, having served up some Mendelssohn and other matters at the dedication ceremonies last Friday.

It was the fifth hall the orchestra has played in here, the others were the old Music Hall, Infantry Hall, the Albee Theater, and the Metropolitan.

Not only the Boston Symphony but the Providence Community Concert Association, beginning tomorrow night, will use the auditorium.

There are about 900 fewer seats in the State Auditorium, which holds 2203, than in the Metropolitan, which holds 3045; so the income to visiting artists is less. On the other hand, the Metropolitan exacted $1200 a night from the symphony, not counting extras, while the state is expected to charge about one-third as much.

Acoustically and visually, the customers seemed to feel last night

[illegible]e new hall is a long leap ahead of the old. There is no ceiling over the stage yet, and Mr. Munch was less happy about the sound than he had expected to be. The plain walls that have decorated the stage at the Metropolitan during concerts, and that are the property of the Community association, had been moved to the new building and were of some help. The ceiling, which may be ready for the next concert, ought to improve the resonance. The orchestra was heard to better advantage upstairs than down. In the upstairs landing, where there are, of course, no seats, the effect was uncommonly lively.

WPJB, the FM station of the Providence Journal Company, broadcast the concert and was able to do so with only one microphone, fastened to the center baluster of the balcony. Reception, according to reports that one trusts are unbiased, was excellent.

Seats Comfortable

The bright red seats are comfortable, but knee-room is a trifle scanty. The moderately ornate decorations are perhaps too plain for people accustomed to Victorian splendor and too gaudy for the stainless-steel-and-glass-brick crowd. Let them just listen to the music, then.

The orchestra arrived early for a brief rehearsal to enable Mr. Munch to judge the acoustical situation. When he returned to his dressing room, he was somewhat downcast, but he shrugged and hoped that it would be better next time. He smoked a cigarette and fell to glancing through a score on the small table that, with two chairs, was about the only furniture in the dressing room. There was no mirror and no running water.

At intermission, one lady was heard to say, "What a fine open-air concert."

She was referring to an open louver, through which healthful, but cold, fresh air was coming, at the base of the left-hand wall in the orchestra. Thereupon G. Raymond Williams, who has the handling of many concert tickets in Providence, appeared with an armful of tiles and plugged the leak in the dike, getting down on his hands and knees in his tuxedo to do so, and earning the gratitude of adjacent patrons. Mr. Williams, when questioned, said that he had no union card but that he hoped the nature of the emergency would be his excuse. A lawyer sitting close by gave an opinion, ex cathedra, that Mr. Williams was within his province.

Audience Reaction

An agent I had planted in the crowd makes the following report:

"I sat in the last, the very last row of the orchestra, dead center. Could hear perfectly. Much better than the Met, and I am deaf in my right ear. Pianissimos in both Schumann and Tchaikovsky were very clear. Parts of orchestra seemed to sound more intimate, not, as in the Met, as if I were in the next county.

"A lady who wears a hearing aid said music came across clearly but admitted she was pretty far down front. She thought the decorations were stinko. She described them with a couple of other words which we can't use.

"Victor Schwartz of Cushing Street, a Providence lawyer, said the acoustics were perfect. He sat in the orchestra. I would have liked more of the Radio City type design, modern, rather than all this heavy Victorian stuff," he said.

"Last two rows of the orchestra are bad because the vision is obscured by a set of heavy steel pipes which run across at eye level. Women and short men especially were affected. Unidentified man beside me said grumpily, "This is perfectly ridiculous. What are they for. They get in my way."

"A man who could be identified, but won't be, said: 'Maybe they're penalty boxes in case of hockey games.'"

Empty in 10 Minutes

After the concert, the hall emptied in less than 10 minutes, though only the rear exits were being used. The sidewalk emptied less quickly, because cars had to stop and pick up passengers. There were luxurious cars and ordinary ones, furs and silks, and also bargain dresses. And, while many rode, many others walked, finding the slope to the center of town neither too steep nor too slippery for reasonable passage. The snow, whatever trouble it may have given, served to hide the litter around the base of the building, and the darkness concealed the boarded windows that have been waiting more than 20 years for glass.

Another agent reports on traffic as follows:

"Traffic moved very smoothly. Streets in the vicinity had been sanded so there were no stalled cars. Parking was done without any mixup.

3 Patrolmen Needed

"Only three patrolmen were needed to handle traffic, one at Francis and Brownell, where cars turned in from both directions on Francis Street; one at Park and Brownell, and the third at Park and Smith.

"During the peak—between 8 and 8:15—the cars did move slowly up Francis Street and there was a line from Brownell Street to the bottom of the hill, but it did move. It was just a case of so many vehicles trying to get to the same place at the same time."

"Albert F. Curley, vice president of the Yellow Cab Co. said his company had 115 cabs in operation, and it was evident that many people parked their cars down town and used cabs to get to the auditorium.

"There was a slight delay for some busses when they got into the auditorium line of traffic coming DOWN Francis Street, but the right hand lane going up the hill was clear for all vehicles not turning into Brownell Street and they moved along o.k."

Attends Supper

Mr. Munch, after receiving the applause he had well earned, amiably greeted a few visitors outside the dressing room. Then he went to a supper being given in his honor by Mr. and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, at their residence on Benefit Street. It is reasonable to suppose that Mr. Munch appreciated the supper quite as much as his hosts had appreciated the concert. Delayed by the weather on his trip over the road from Boston, he had not had anything to eat since noon.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB

DOWNBEAT FOR BEETHOVEN OVERTURE: Director Charles Munch leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the playing of 'The Consecration of the House,' appropriate selection for the first concert in the new Veterans' Memorial Building auditorium.

—Photo by Lee R. Bro[illegible]

Music

Boston Symphony Under Munch Termed Better Here Than in Hub

By RUTH TRIPP

Two great events in the musical world of Rhode Island coincided last evening. One was the initial appearance here, of Charles Munch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other was that this was the first formal concert in the new State Auditorium. The evening was a huge success from all angles, with the possible exception of the weather.

Charles Munch has appeared here twice before as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and then as conductor of the French National Orchestra. We had an idea of what to expect. What we heard so far exceeded our expectations that we are willing to make the extravagant statement that never here, in Boston or in Stockbridge has the orchestra sounded so magnificently to this listener. It played with the unity of a string quartet and whenever the reeds or brass were included, the effect was so skillfully integrated that one was scarcely aware of the entrances.

Some of this extraordinary effect is undoubtedly due to the excellent acoustic properties of the State Auditorium. We are profoundly grateful for this. It might have been different. The improvised box stage served very well. We are told that it will be much handsomer at the next concert.

National Anthem First

The orchestra fittingly opened the concert with the playing of the national anthem. It was stirring.

The program proper began with the playing of a Beethoven Overture, "The Consecration of the House," Op. 124, a work which is traditionally played by the Boston Symphony on such occasions. The program notes gave us the interesting information that this was the first music ever performed by this orchestra at its first concert, conducted by George Henschel, Oct. 22, 1881, in Music Hall, Boston. Last evening its chorale brought solemn dignity to the occasion.

The second offering was Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120. Dr. Munch gave it a poetic reading and it seemed that his practice of conducting without score permits him and his listeners alike to get nearer to the composer's message. The work is performed without pause and its succession of imaginative themes was delightful. The quality of tone produced in the second movement by the violas, 'celli and double basses was like a cushion of velvet. The song theme had a plaintive quality like something beautiful beyond recall. The third movement was alive and vibrant and its Trio had the grace and exuberance of youthful dancers. The last movement was sparkling and carefree and with its close, the audience gave Dr. Munch a well merited ovation. He was recalled three times.

"Pathetique" Symphony

The last half of the concert was devoted to Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74. This is a work guaranteed to stir the listener emotionally. We listened up to the last movement with great admiration for the beauties of the writing, and for the extraordinary beauty of the interpretation by the musicians. The violas had luscious tones to offer. The clarinets entrance into the familiar theme of the opening movement was beyond description. The brass quartet at the end of the first movement was especially fine. The rhythmic play of the second movement was unusually graceful and the rapid figurations of the third movement, entrancing.

It was in the melancholy fourth movement, however, that the full significance of the occasion overcame us. We thought back to the early days of our concert-going when, with all our musical neighbors, we took the train from Pawtucket and walked from Union Station through the gusty Turks Head Canyon, to Infantry Hall to hear the Boston Symphony. Since those days we have endured four dislocations with the orchestra. In all those years of listening, from the last of Karl Muck's regime until tonight, we have missed only two Providence concerts by the orchestra and those, unwillingly.

There was something about our wistful resume of all that has gone before that brought a sense of resignation to change. For no reason at all, some lines from a poem by Charles Malam came to us. From "Spring Plowing", we recalled, "and all my old thoughts died and were plowed under."

So the concert ended and we came out into the wintry weather, aware that there will always be a spring for plowing. It was very clearly stated in the Tschaikovsky.

Journal Advocate Feb 2

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

It may or may not be true that Boston is an ultra-conservative city, but as far as the local Symphony Orchestra is concerned no lack of enterprise can be charged. Feature of the first half in the Symphony series has been a notable parade of premier performances and novelties. When Charles Munch opened the second half last Friday and Saturday, No. 13 of the list of twenty-four, he gave us another work new to these concerts — Three Preludes from "Palestrina" by the German composer Hans Pfitzner.

In a way, this performance was both belated recognition and memorial to Pfitzner who died last May at the age of 81. "Palestrina" had its vogue in its day but in the last thirty years its composer suffered almost complete neglect. Judging by the quality of the music as heard under the devoted ministrations of Mr. Munch, surely Pfitzner's eclipse was undeserved. Perhaps we would do well to cherish the last flowering of the romanticists as we face into the necessary but often bleak experimentalism of the new age in music.

"Jeu de Cartes" from the pen of the era-bestriding Stravinsky then came astringently to turn us towards the clever, neat, efficient, terse and withal inspired product of the master-craftsman of our time.

And for finale, a beautiful performance of the ageless Schubert's magnificent and vital Symphony in C, No. 7.

February 4, 1950

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

All of a sudden the symphony concerts are making a bow to Britain. The other day it was the Vaughan Williams of the Two Piano Concerto, and the current list contains numbers by two other contemporary Englishmen: Benjamin Britten's Variations for string orchestra on a theme by Frank Bridge, which Dr. Koussevitzky gave us nine years ago, and the Symphony of William Walton, which we had not encountered before. The remaining item is Debussy's "La Mer."

Since we first heard the Bridge variations we have come to know the true Britten, the Britten of "Peter Grimes" and "Albert Herring." These variations come under the head of tonal pleasantry, but they are exceedingly pleasant, and it is unfortunate that Mr. Munch saw fit to omit three other variations, as did Dr. Koussevitzky before him. Britten's musical fancies are enhanced by his remarkable command of the orchestrial strings, which yield him an amazing variety of colors and effects. The point is, of course, that Britten thinks orchestrally: the though itself and its instrumental dress and setting are inseparable. The performance was a brilliant one.

It also seemed that Mr. Munch was doing all that might be done for the 15-year-old Symphony of Walton. The piece has a certain compelling quality. Walton knows what he is about. However, though the movements are well contrasted among themselves, each one tends—or more particularly the first three—to prolong and intensify a mood stated at the very outset. We have not had any Sibelius this season but there are plentiful suggestions of that composer in this Symphony, notably in the Scherzo, though such hints are by no means confined to this movement. Mr. Walton has been in the public eye of late as composer of the scores for those two Shakespeare films, "Henry V" and "Hamlet." This Symphony indicates that such background music is right up his alley.

With commendable confidence in himself, Mr. Munch has gone right ahead and played the Koussevitzky war horses. He has even gone out of his way to play them, as at this week's concerts, when he is giving us "La Mer," which we heard only last April. I found this version distinctly less imaginative than Koussevitzky's and quite lacking in the tonal magic that so distinguished the latter. Instead of a painting in oils, here was an etching. Since Mr. Munch is French and Dr. Koussevitzky Russian, the Munch way with "The Sea" may be the correct one. All I can say is that I prefer the other.

MUSIC

Munch Conducts Britten Variations, Walton Symphony and 'La Mer'

By CYRUS DURGIN

English music and French, in the ratio of two-to-one, made up the program in which Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The precise order was Benjamin Britten's Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge, last heard here in 1941; William Walton's only Symphony, new to Boston, and "La Mer," by Debussy. This was in every respect an interesting concert and, in the case of Britten and Walton, something more than that.

The Variations on the theme of Frank Bridge, once Britten's teacher, are nicely made and, happily for those who dislike the academic implications of the word "variations," they do not sound like variations at all. They have a good deal of life and color, and in some of the string writing you almost hear the sea which beat against the rocks below Peter Grimes' fishing shack on the coast near Aldeborough. In addition, there is a sense of sophistication and also of variety which make these movements very attractive indeed. There is one further notable point about this score, and the Walton Symphony, too, for that matter: each has motion, consistent motion which does not seem either forced or mechanical, as in a good deal of present day music.

But where the Variations are consistently of our own day, Walton's Symphony oscillates between present and past. Walton wrote a very long Symphony, which might have been trimmed by a third before he let it out of his hands. It is very interesting, full of life and passion, of an oftentimes harsh idiom. The brass roar, and the percussion crash like thunder in the powerful first movement and the spirited finale. Yet, oddly enough, one page is typically modern, and the next carries you back 30 or 40 years to people like Vaughan Williams of the "Pastoral" and "London" symphonies. All the same, it is a likeable work, and I hope Mr. Munch will play it again.

The conductor, to my way of thinking, failed to triumph with "La Mer" as he has done with "La Valse," "Daphnis and Chloe," and other familiar scores this season. Debussy's sea was a painted one, precisely detailed, full of color, but not the living, surging, fascinating water it ought to be. Here is one score, I think, which needs the crafty hand of the interpreter, and which does not—or at least did not yesterday—respond to Mr. Munch's "straight" manner of conducting it. "La Mer" needs the subtle variations of tempo, expression, nuance which bring it alive; without them it remains a sea upon a canvas, rigid and still.

It was good to note that Mr. Munch has restored the platform to the stage of Symphony Hall. The orchestra sounds better with them.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATU

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, gave the 15th program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program: Variations for String Orchestra on a Theme by Frank Bridge, Op. 10 ..... Britten
Symphony No. 1 ..... Walton
"La Mer" ..... Debussy

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It must be the mid-winter mopes or something, but yesterday's concert failed to stir too responsive a note in this listener. I wasn't exactly bored by the program but on the other hand there wasn't much in it to sustain interest; it passed the time pleasantly but that was about all.

The chief reason for this neutral reaction, I think, was the character of William Walton's First Symphony, receiving its first performance in Boston. This is what you might call head-in-hands music springing more from the conscious desire of the composer to manufacture something really big and stunning than from any inner creative urge. One can hear Mr. Walton practically saying to himself, "now here I shall use two sets of tympani instead of one, and will that ever wow them!" and "let me see, where shall I put the fugue?"

That this conscious intellectual process is part of all creative effort is clear enough; undisciplined improvisational frenzy alone is not sufficient. But Mr. Walton's symphony, skilfully wrought though it is, never gets off the ground. Its thematic material is quite without distinction; the listener finds it very hard indeed to even recall what it all sounded like once the last note ceases echoing.

In contrast to this Benjamin Britten's Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge (who was this gifted composer's teacher) makes a very decided impression. Here, though in a small frame, is music at once alive, virile and urgent. I never did get the theme firmly fixed in mind, but it didn't matter at all, for what really counted was what the composer did with it in the seven ensuing variations.

Set for strings alone, the variations called for striking colorations, for many widely divided voices, for dramatic effects, and all in straightforward idiom suggesting the composer's present more mature style. It was handsomely performed by the string section of the orchestra in a broadly conceived reading by Mr. Munch.

Debussy's "La Mer," one of Koussevitzky's great warhorses, and a work that never fails to bring down the house, brought it down on schedule again yesterday. Mr. Munch's conception of the three sections differed widely from the one we are familiar with. His is more poetic, more sensitive, even more mystical. His sea is a little bluer, a little calmer. It reflects the sunlight more delicately and when it kicks up, even its fury is more controlled. Thus it may be a little less exciting but it is still a very rich and gratifying musical experience.

Isaac Stern is the soloist in next week's program, performing concertos of William Schuman and Mendelssohn. Other works on the program are Barber's Overture "The School for Scandal" and Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony.

JRDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 15th concert of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Isaac Stern, violinist, was the soloist in the following program:
Overture "The School for Scandal" ..... Barber
Concerto for Violin ..... Schuman
Symphony No. 5, Op. 107 ..... Mendelssohn
Concerto for Violin, Op. 64 ..... Mendelssohn

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It would be interesting and certainly illuminating to know what William Schuman had in mind in composing this, his first violin concerto, which yesterday afternoon provided the only water jump in an otherwise easy course, and a water jump, come to think of it, into which most of us toppled headfirst.

For myself, I could not down the impression that his basic motivation was to get in line with every other first line composer by composing at least one violin concerto; no composer should be without one. This is not to say that Mr. Schuman, surely one of our most prominent contemporary composers, is anything but sincere, or that he is at all wanting in ideas. On the contrary, this concerto is easily one of the most earnest and determined efforts I ever heard, and it contains enough ideas to keep the violinist (in this case Isaac Stern and a magnificent violinist from any point of view) at a frantic pitch of activity most of the time.

As it happens these ideas are far more interesting to the eye than the ear. It is exhilarating indeed to watch Mr. Stern rage up and down the finger board, solving violinistic problems of immense difficulty with ease and relish. It is also a continued source of astonishment during the performance to consider the monumental effort that must have gone into memorizing this music. But the music itself, though obviously of superior scholarship and of formidable craftsmanship, simply fails to touch a responsive chord.

Actually its vocabulary is not terribly advanced. That is to say anybody who enjoys contemporary music at all can follow both the general plan of the work and hear its textures. Nor is it unimpressive. It is simply that it seems entirely wanting in likability, in musicality, in emotional quality, in what might be called heart. And music for the violin without heart somewhere along the line is no music at all. I would have got a great deal more out of it, indeed, had the solo violin remained tacet throughout, for I have always liked Mr. Schuman's way with the orchestra, and this was no exception.

A very decided exception during the afternoon, however, was what happened to Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony as it emerged in Mr. Munch's stimulating conception. I had hitherto found this symphony one of the weaker in the repertoire; yesterday it revealed itself a work of very telling effect. The way the conductor introduced the Dresden amen in the first movement made it seem as if it had drifted in from on high. He gave the scherzo life that it never seemed to have before, imbued the andante with unbelievable radiance, and actually achieved, in the fugue-chorale, much of the grandeur and not a little of the sound of Bach in the B minor Mass. It was a revelation.

And so, too, was the same composer's E minor Violin Concerto, a work so hackneyed it has all but lost its identification. Yesterday it was played by Mr. Stern in a way to flabbergast the most seasoned listener. His tone was marvelous, his technique irreproachable, his style impeccable. And he did it with just the right sense of ease, of joy in performance. It may also be said that Mr. Munch, of whose accompanimental art I have often spoken so warmly, again found things in the orchestra we simply never heard before, little nuances and voices and elegances that are usually overlooked entirely.

It might be added that the concert got off to a fine, bright start with Samuel Barber's wholly entertaining "School for Scandal" Overture, and that next week the orchestra is out of town. When it returns on Feb. 24 Robert Casadesus will be the soloist in Mozart's C minor Concerto and d'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Song. Schumann's Fourth Symphony and d'Indy's Introduction to "Fervaal" round out the program.

Walton's First Symphony

Boston Première in Program With Britten and Debussy

By Harold Rogers

William Walton's first and only symphony, completed in 1935, was heard for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon. It is the kind of music that lends itself to spectacular performance. Mr. Munch accordingly put the Boston Symphony Orchestra through a few spectacular paces.

One is impressed by the excellence of Walton's craftsmanship, his ability to cut a pathway far enough from the beaten track to be interesting but not too rough. The frenzied first movement (Allegro assai) is emotionally supercharged, filled with brassy blasts that take a relentless grip upon the listener.

* * *

This dynamic tension continues in the Scherzo (Presto con malizia), and it's not until the third movement (Adagio con melancolia) that the music relaxes into a lyrical mood. A prevailing undercurrent of melancholy points the way to an urgent finale—majestic, noisy, compelling, right up to the massive chords of the conclusion.

Mr. Munch played the music for all it was worth and played it well. In this symphony Walton forsook Anglo-Saxon reserve for an approach that is now Teutonic, now Gallic, yet always English in its over-all effect. It is something of a novelty to hear an English symphony of strong emotional content. In this sense it was perfect fuel for Mr. Munch's fire.

* * *

Mr. Munch opened the program with Benjamin Britten's Variations for String Orchestra on a Theme by Frank Bridge. After the Walton Symphony he played Debussy's tone poem, "La Mer."

The Britten Variations were written in 1937 when the composer was 24. Frank Bridge was one of Britten's early teachers. After the introduction and statement of Bridge's theme, Britten makes free use of the material to construct several sprightly little pieces, each in a different metier.

In this performance Mr. Munch omits the three variations called "Romance," "Wiener Walz," and "Chant." Those he plays are the March, "Aria Italiana," "Bourrée Classique," "Moto Perpetuo," Marcia Funebre, and the final Fugue. These musical clichés, as handled by Britten, are never trite. They bear the stamp of the composer's individuality. They are jaunty lampoons, charming, witty, and always polite.

* * *

The subtle, undulant moods of Debussy's "La Mer" emerge in panoramic clarity under Mr. Munch's sensitive treatment. Those who have studied the poetry of the sea will find the facets they know so well—the zephyrs, the gales, the white-caps or breakers, the sea becalmed at noonday, scintillating under moonlight, ruddy at sunset. Here we have both Debussy and Mr. Munch at the peak of their powers.

Symphony Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, will be heard in Symphony Hall next week on Tuesday evening and on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

For the Tuesday program Mr. Munch will play Schubert's posthumous Symphony in C major, Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," and two selections by Ravel—"Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and "La Valse."

For the week-end concerts the program will consist of a new violin concerto by William Schuman; Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal"; and two compositions by Mendelssohn—his Violin Concerto and the "Reformation" Symphony.

Isaac Stern will be the violin soloist.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—

MUSIC

Isaac Stern Performs Mendelssohn, Schuman Concertos at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Isaac Stern, the sorcerer of the fiddle who is also a first-rate musician, is soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts this week. He plays two Concertos, the new one, receiving first performances by William Schuman, and the E minor of Mendelssohn. Conductor Charles Munch begins the program with that admirable Overture, "The School for Scandal," by Samuel Barber, and includes in it the "Reformation" Symphony of Mendelssohn.

Mr. Schuman's work, completed about two years and one-half ago, is not going to win friends and influence people in a hurry. Lobby conversation about it at intermission, yesterday, was probably a good deal more severe than any criticism of it that appears in the morning papers. The plain truth is that apart from the slow movement, the idiom is crabbed and harshly dissonant, and the public just doesn't like dissonance. This, of course, is a quick and superficial judgment, for the people who buy tickets hear a new piece once, remember mostly what they don't like rather than what they like, and condemn the music offhand.

A more patient and reasoned estimate would take into account the singing slow movement, which to my ears is quite pleasant; the unusual formal structure of the first and third movements, which are subdivided into several sections; the individual and often times powerful scoring of the first movement, and the ingenuity of the long cadenza in that movement.

Such an estimate would also consider the unusual effect of the out-of-key harmonics (and I hope the typesetter makes this word harmonics and not harmonies) of the solo fiddle against the orchestra; the rich variety of rhythmic invention and the manner in which the solo instrument stands out all the way. It takes a skilled hand to write in this fashion.

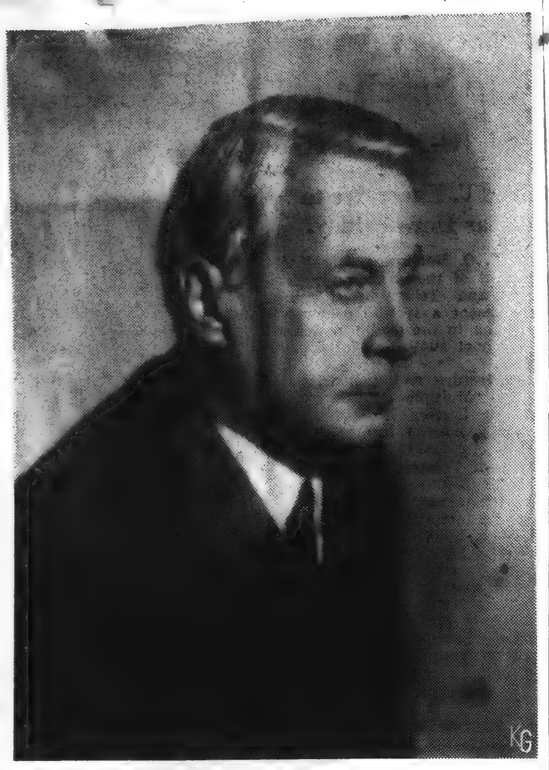
Yet as pure sound, some pages are ugly, and some freakish, while there are those of much beauty. I can't say I was enthralled by a first hearing, but I would like to hear the score again. Mr. Schumann must have had his reasons (not clearly expressed in the description he supplied for the program books) for writing as he did, and I find it hard to believe he is deliberately cultivating ugliness. Let us hear it again, meanwhile categorizing the Concerto as strongly individual and somewhat baffling.

Mr. Stern, remembered for his brilliant performance of Prokofieff's First Concerto here two years ago, played with great effect and technical aplomb what must be a fiendishly difficult part. It was a labor of love, and he expended upon Schuman as much virtuosity, musical comprehension and richness of tone as he did upon the wonderful old masterpiece by Mendelssohn. Mr. Stern was rapturously applauded after both performances. Mr. Schuman, bowing from the stage, also received his share of applause.

In prospect the "Reformation" Symphony was not exciting, for it can be an old-fashioned and rather pompous affair. But that was reckoning without the vitalizing effect of Mr. Munch's conducting, which restored a vigor, almost a brilliance, to these faded pages.

[85]

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE
B1



CHARLES MUNCH, CONDUCTOR
Will Direct Boston Symphony Here Next Season

the history of the world."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky's policy of encouraging the American composer has been continued by his successor. Already this year Mr. Munch has premiered a Symphony by Bernard Wagenaar, besides playing pieces by Copland and Piston, both of which were new to Boston. At this week's concerts he is bringing to pass the first performance of William Schuman's Violin Concerto, while the program starts off with a standard American number, Barber's Overture "The School for Scandal."

Mr. Schuman told an interviewer that it was his intention to write a concerto of symphonic proportions. What he seems to have accomplished is an orchestral piece and, on the whole, an interesting one, with a prominent and exceedingly difficult part for solo violin. Isaac Stern was the violinist yesterday, and he acquitted himself nobly in his Herculean task.

Writing concertos is a dangerous business. If soloists are not attracted to them it is no go. And I venture to suggest that the fiddlers will not tumble all over each other in their eagerness to be the next to play the Schuman work. There just isn't enough in it for them.

This is not to say that Mr. Schuman has not written effectively for the violin but to suggest that the violinist does not occupy the spotlight to the extent that a soloist would wish to. The music is typically Schumanesque, it is forceful and energetic, at times a little brutal. The piece runs in three movements; but the first and last have many subdivisions, giving the work a rhapsodic quality. There are places where the violin sings and soars and Mr. Stern made the most of them. The applause after the Concerto was mostly for the composer but Mr. Stern had his innings at the end of the concert after a beautiful performance of the Concerto of Mendelssohn, which, served up in such shape, was good to hear.

Mr. Munch missed the point in Barber's Overture. That which should have been gay was transformed into an unnecessary racket. The lyric portions came off better, but they didn't seem to fit with the rest. Otherwise, the conductor was on his best behavior yesterday, and he accomplished wonders with the remaining item on the program, Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony. Evidently, this is one of his specialities; he conducted it from memory and succeeded in getting himself, the orchestra and the audience quite worked up over it. It isn't safe to dismiss any piece as dull, some conductor or performer may come along and prove it to be just the opposite.

THE JEWISH ADVOCATE, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 16

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

SYMPHONY—NEOT—RECITALS

This is one of those occasions when all is sweetness and light. Of the week's chief musical events nothing but praise is indicated — the few minor reservations one might make are, to use a stock phrase, inconsiderable in the light of the whole. Actually, I did not attend a single event during the week, but my informants were of such quality as to make my absence a matter of no concern, or shall we say, even desirable.

Hearing first from H.W. we find that Isaac Stern was altogether remarkable at the 15th program of the Boston Symphony Series. The violinist started with an excellent exposition of the first performance of William Schuman's Concerto. The work appears to be fiendishly difficult but Stern conquered all. Yet not even the soloist's superb fiddling nor the first-class accompaniment of Charles Munch sufficed to make this first hearing a grateful one. H.W. doubts that the concerto will earn a place for itself on the permanent repertoire. After this strange fruit the violinist appeared later to leave a more accustomed taste with the audience through marvelous work in the ever-fresh Mendelssohn Concerto. Both as executant and musician, Stern is near-perfection, with just enough slight fault from time to time serving to humanize artist and playing. The orchestra opened with Barber's Overture to "The School for Scandal," and the conductor's reading of Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony was perhaps the best given here in memory. I add that H.W. is an unusually severe critic — two levels only: the best or it stinks.

NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY
FEB 15 1950

Boston Symphony Accorded Rousing Ovation in Concert At Connecticut College

By EUGEN GUERSTER

Yesterday, New London music-lovers got their chance to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of its new conductor, Alsatian-born Charles Munch. The first half of this remarkable concert was devoted to Franz Schubert's great Symphony in C Major. We have long been used to hearing this work without "cuts,"—this unique work which the composer never heard played and which slumbered in oblivion until its discovery by Robert Schumann. The latter's opinion about "the heavenly length" of this symphony has meanwhile become the common opinion of concert-goers all over the world. This symphony belongs to that rather limited group of musical works which one never tires of hearing. New beautiful vistas seem to open before us at each performance. Yesterday, I had the feeling, for instance, that the pianissimo trombones in the first movement (with their thrilling reference to the introductory theme) have never sounded so mysteriously entrancing. Under Charles Munch's leadership this symphony took on brilliant accents and sometimes a certain violence it never had under the baton of the late Felix Weingartner, one of the great conductors of the Viennese school. In the allegro movement and in the Finale it seemed more rushed, more energetic, less "Austrian," than in all the performances I have heard so far. As far as the briskness of tempo is concerned, Mr. Munch reached the limit; but very seldom did it go so fast as to lose its inner clarity. This relentlessly energetic conductor always knew how to contrast delicate moods with those of power.

French Ballet Music

The second half of the concert was dedicated to French ballet music. Stravinsky's Jeu de Cartes (with the subtitle a Ballet in three Deals) is undiluted program music of which the composer himself gives a detailed summary. The piece, a witty ballet-bouffe, opens at every "Deal" with the same introductory theme a la Rossini. It is full of strident counter-points, displays a kind of nonchalant melancholy and shows, of course, every evidence of the Stravinsky vitality. The musical coherence of this piece, however, seems to be provided mainly by the events and movements on the stage. Performed without the choreography, it cannot conceal a certain incoherence and dry casualness which even a brilliant orchestration cannot fully conceal. Charles Munch was the very soul and center of his performance. One could easily imagine the whole piece collapsing at any moment without his dynamic drive, his perfect mastery of the intricacies of a score which by the way, he conducted by heart.

As Maurice Ravel has indicated on the score, the Valses nobles et sentimentales (the next number on the program) are dedicated to "the delicious pleasure of useless occupation." However, the piece is musically and humanly much more important than this remark would suggest. Thanks to an extremely refined and variegated orchestration, this sequence of valse moves in an emotional borderland where joy is strangely undistinguishable from melancholy. Thus, the general mood is that of a fasicnating "ambivalence." One never knows for sure whether it is an exuberant glorification of the Viennese Waltz or just a nostalgic yearning for its innocent cheerfulness. In relation to these valses, somebody has quite appropriately spoken of "Baudelarian delights."

Pervasive 'Bittersweet'

The first waltz plunges at once into harsh chords, but these pungent dissonances sound perfectly legitimate. There is a bewildering variety in the atmosphere of these fantastic, unrealistic dances. The exuberant clangor of the first waltz is soon relieved by the plaintive and melancholy mood of the second. (In the first waltz we hear, by the way, unmistakable anticipations of La Valse, composed some 12 years later.) The Epilogue has quite characteristically an all-pervasive "bittersweet" quality, it is full of reminiscences of the waltzes heard before. The sequence which began with so much noise and exuberance ends in a mood of hushed quietness. These valses, originally written for piano, call for an elaborate battery of percussion. The performance of the piece under Charles Munch was the acme of perfection. It conveyed the subdued atmosphere of the second and third valse as convincingly as the crashing liveliness of the first. Everything was so much sheer delight that one regrets that Munch was obliged to skip the sixth valse.

La Valse, the last number on this exciting program, like Ravel's "Bolero" appropriately called a "Study in Crescendo" was written after the composer's trying and disappointing experiences in the First World war. If in "Les Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" a certain vague anxiety seems to hover over the exuberant rhythms, "La Valse," strangely starting with "cloudy" rumblings, reveals to the full the inner crisis of modern man, who has undergone the anguish of war and feels no longer capable of the innocent joyfullness a la Schubert and a la Strauss. Here, too, Munch and his splendid orchestra rose to the occasion; there was a wide gamut of shades of expression and a plasticity of form so that in the very turmoil of the unleashed orchestra no important detail was ever lost. The audience responded with a rousing ovation to a glorious musical evening.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 16 1950

MUNCH CONDUCTS ORCHESTRA HERE

Boston Symphony Is Heard at Carnegie Hall In Works by Schubert and Ravel

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra covered familiar territory, for the most part, in their Carnegie Hall concert hall last night, and what was relatively unfamiliar was scarcely worth that part of the journey. Schubert's big C major Symphony and Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and his "La Valse" were the well-established pieces, and Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes" was the reasonably unfamiliar one.

Mr. Munch's conception of the grandly lyrical symphony of Schubert was his own, and if one could not admire it throughout, one had to grant at least that it was distinctive. For this was a performance that sought to make the music more rugged and dramatic than it is inherently. Mr. Munch took tempi that were somewhat faster than usual; he made the contrasts between loud and soft more marked. Somehow neither Schubert nor his loveliest symphony would yield to this treatment.

It should be said in Mr. Munch's favor that he followed his ideas with consistency. To those who like their Schubert done in this way—and it is a way that may be justified—it was an exciting performance. A certain coarseness in the normally shimmering Boston Symphony tone could also be condoned in the interests of such an approach. And whatever one thought of the interpretation, one was struck anew by the responsiveness of the orchestra to its conductor's wishes. Especially impressive were the effective colors of the strings when other voices in the orchestra had the burden of the song.

The Stravinsky score, written for a ballet in 1936, is clever in design and brilliant in its instrumental effects. But it says almost nothing. It has the air, if one may dare to guess the composer's motivation, of a crowd pleaser. And yet it does not please because its heart basically seems not to be in the task. It may be argued that the piece was written for dancing and is fine for that purpose. It has limited pleasures to offer to the ear alone.

Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave it a mettlesome performance. The playing had crispness and brilliance. But it was not until Mr. Munch got into the Ravel that music and performance were joined with felicity.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 16 1950

Music

Munch Does A Musical Poker Game

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

A fast and breezy poker game, with Igor Stravinsky supplying the deck of cards and Charles Munch dealing, featured the visit of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night.

When first heard here, the Russian master's "Jeu de Cartes" was accompanying score for a Balanchine ballet in which the ballerinas and their male escorts were the shifting pasteboards in a game of draw poker.

Possibly, the ballet action is needed to round out the picture of a deck of animated cards taking rapid formations as straight flushes and full houses. I found Mr. Munch's symphonic reading just as absorbing, and maybe more so.

Good Card-Playing.

There are three deals to Mr. Stravinsky's game, preluded by a flourish of shuffling. Each deal is complicated by the antics of a Joker who outsmarts everybody. He finally outsmarts himself by strutting at the head of a sequence of spades and running into a royal flush in hearts.

Now, I don't suppose anybody really "heard" the straights and flushes being dealt out among the bassoons and piccolos last night, but Mr. Munch certainly was playing his cards deftly, and the men seemed to know their way around the green baize table.

My only objection to the suite is its episodic character; each "hand" is played crisply and wittily, but over a long span the hands never clasp. The only link is the Joker, and Stravinsky has him shuffling all over the symphonic deck.

Makes Every Note Count.

Mr. Munch made every note count in the bristling score, and practically every member of the celebrated orchestra had at least one lone moment of pride in the orchestra sun.

There was also brilliant playing in a Ravel group including the "Valse et Sentimentales" and "La Valse." The Frenchman in Mr. Munch gave native subtlety to every phase, while the world musician in him turned every phase into great music.

Noblest of all last night's readings was that of Schubert's C Major Symphony. The secret of that vast score is its rythmic heartbeat. Mr. Munch applied his stethoscope and proceeded to give all four movements the reality of living motion.

Schubert never wrote greater music, and it is possible that no composer after him ever quite built up such a cosmos of rhythm as in the finale. There was such an illusion of mounting speed last night, that you half expected to see the orchestra itself in motion.

[86]

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 18 1950

MUSIC

by PAUL AFFELDER

Munch, Boston Symphony Bring Out New Beauties of Music in Concert at Academy

One thing that can be said about the concerts that Charles Munch has been presenting this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra: there's never a dull moment. This certainly applied last evening at the Academy of Music, where the orchestra presented its fourth Brooklyn concert of the season. For some of the music on the program did not represent the composers at their best; but conductor and orchestra did their utmost to make us believe that it was all the greatest music ever written.

The word "best" can be applied to the opening work, however, which was Samuel Barber's witty overture to "The School for Scandal." In our opinion, it is among the best overtures ever written by an American. This joyous and highly melodic score was given a brilliant and vigorous performance.

Then came Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony in D Major, so named because it makes considerable use of the "Dresden Amen" and the Lutheran chorale, "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God." Somehow, this symphony seems to lack some of the inspirational spark that can be found in some of Mendelssohn's other orchestral music. But by the time M. Munch had finished with it last night, we were beginning to wonder if we hadn't underestimated the nobility and emotional impact of this work. For his thoughtful interpretation brought out new beauties in the score. The opening movement had a great deal of dignity; the scherzo, taken at a tempo that was slightly slower than usual, thus assumed more stateliness; there was a fine singing tone in the andante, and the development of the final chorale was built up to deeply moving climax.

Poker Game Ballet

It has been some time since we've heard Stravinsky's music for his ballet, "Jeu de Cartes"—a danced poker game in three deals. In the crisp performance accorded it last evening, this music, with its sly quotations from Ravel's "La Valse" and Rossini's Overture to "The Barber of Seville," sounded mildly humorous and a bit less sterile than most of Stravinsky's recent works. Nevertheless, we had the feeling that this music belongs in the ballet theater and not in the concert hall.

There can be little question about the musical value of Debussy's "La Mer," with which the concert concluded. Yet this was the one point at which we disagreed with M. Munch's reading. He adopted rather rapid tempi throughout the three sections, glossed over many interesting details in the inner voices and kept the dynamics at a relatively low level. The result was a tone painting of the sea as heard from a distance instead of on the beach, where the waves could pound on the ear with more exciting effect.

NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY
FEB 17 1950

CHASTISES MUSIC CRITICS

Says So-Called 'Music Masters' Ignored Concert Program Advice

To the Editor of The Day:

The recent Boston Symphony concert at Palmer Auditorium provided ample proof that the old preaching "do as I tell you but not as I do" is still being consistently adhered to. When the program was first announced it was stated that the purpose of the advance announcement was to permit those unfamiliar with the compositions to be performed to avail themselves of the recorded versions.

It seems that not only the general audience but our local "music-masters" as well failed to heed the suggestion. A perfectly beautiful rendition of Ravel's Noble and Sentimental Waltzes went completely unapplauded (except for me). Not that the audience did not like the work, but simply because no one realized that it had come to an end. Several people in front of me turned their heads to take a good look at the musically uninitiated jackass audacious enough to defy the general silence. Whereupon my wife asked me to stop applauding. With this unexpected and unprecedented silence Mr. Munch gave the signal to his men to go into the last number, La Valse. Lest someone should be contemplating a dissenting opinion, let me reassure him that the Noble and Sentimental Waltzes and La Valse are entirely separate and unrelated works, a fact which was clearly designated on the program.

My words are not intended to offend the general public which faithfully attends these grand musical events irrespective of adverse weather conditions, but they are meant to be an indictment of the local musical savants who seem to derive their greatest pleasure from standing at the front door or in the lobby accepting homage from the less musically educated.

Of particular embarrassment to the person responsible for it was the announcement in Monday's Day that the Boston orchestra was to open the program with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony. Perhaps the evening's experience proved to this gentleman that the great C-Major Symphony and the Unfinished are not the same work.

I would like to direct my final comment to the erudite critic who reviewed the concert in Wednesday's Day. Mr. Guerster made particular mention that Mr. Munch conducted the very difficult and intricate Jeu de Cartes of Stravinsky without a score. It is a little difficult to believe that Mr. Guerster was even present at the concert, for, if he were, he certainly would have noted that the Stravinsky work was the only composition in which Mr. Munch made use of the conductor's score.

ALBERT C. AMATO.
48 Blinman street,
New London, Conn.,
Feb. 17, 1950.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 18 1950

MUNCH CONDUCTS BARBER OVERTURE

Leads Bostonians in 'School for Scandal' — Wagenaar Directs Own Symphony

By OLIN DOWNES

Charles Munch opened the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with Samuel Barber's brilliant and genial overture, "The School for Scandal." The overture was not intended by the composer as a curtain-raiser in the theatre. It is conceived rather as an evocation of the spirit of Sheridan's play. This spirited overture never made a stronger impression than it did yesterday, not only because of its inherent worth, but because of Mr. Munch's exhilarating performance.

Bernard Wagenaar conducted personally the performance of his Fourth Symphony, heard for the first time in this city. It is a compact work, though the composer subdivides it in five short movements, which to a certain extent possess thematic relationship. The movement which is the most expressive is the fourth, the Adagio, because of the charm of its melodic line and the simple but artistic instrumentation.

Modern in Idiom

The liveliest movement, and one, naturally, with more contrast, is the third, which would correspond to a scherzo. The symphony is, of course, modern in idiom, by a modern-minded composer. To our mind it has little substance and much of it, despite the pleasing workmanship, is inconsequential. It is, however, to be said that this composition, which Mr. Wagenaar conducted with dignity and authority, was well received by the audience. The composer was repeatedly recalled.

There followed what one might call a Stravinsky cocktail, in the form of the score composed for performance by the American Ballet in 1937—the "Jeu de Cartes." In the ballet the dancers are cards in a poker game. The Joker is the plotter who believes he can turn into any card at will. He is at length outwitted and defeated by a royal straight flush in hearts.

The music is in three parts, which are not separated. It is witty and amusing, up to a certain point, after which there is too much of it for performance with- ous repetitions of sections and ous repetitions of selections and figures. Five minutes less of it would be, we believe, the ideal proportion for a slight, not particularly original but amusing score.

Concludes With "La Mer"

Mr. Munch finished this concert with Debussy's "La Mer." With his conception of the work we do not agree. He holds the first two movements way down, perhaps to make more impressive the brilliant last part. But the earlier movements have more color and juice in them than that.

Both of the two last movements were hurried, and this is a particular disadvantage to the finale, which under these circumstances loses the significance and proper proportion of certain pages, fails to co-relate itself as closely as it should to the thematic material of the first part, and ends with excitement but not with grandeur. The score, of course, is such a masterpiece, and Debussy's instrumentation so magical, that it is certain to be successful with an audience, and became inevitably the climax of this concert.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 16 1950

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

Charles Munch, conductor; fourth evening concert of the season. The program:
Symphony in C major, No. 7.....Schubert
Jeu de Cartes.....Stravinsky
Valses Nobles et Sentimentales; La Valse.Ravel

With Stravinsky's ballet score, "Jeu de Cartes," and a set of waltzes and a waltz-inspired choreographic poem by Ravel, the second half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program last night under Charles Munch at Carnegie Hall had a certain unity of subject, along with diversity of mood. These works followed Schubert's last symphony in C major; its interpretation under Mr. Munch was memorable both for its general expressiveness and its straightforwardness; it realized the musical stature and the underlying momentum of the work with a persuasive directness, an absence of extraneous nuance.

Mr. Munch and his musicians were also understanding and sympathetic interpreters of the Stravinsky and Ravel works. Stravinsky's "Card Game," further described as a ballet in three deals, has had few concert performances here—the ballet itself was staged at the Metropolitan thirteen years ago. As a concert work, it is a series of generally engaging episodes, not marked by expressive profundity, but varied in mood and style, with some probably conscious retrospective glances towards earlier decades.

Much of its attraction lies in the scoring; this has an essential lucidity and subtle as well as pronounced range of hues which was well revealed in the playing of Mr. Munch's musicians; the musical medium was transparently clear throughout. Similar clarity characterized the playing of the "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," with noteworthy finesse as well as contrast in a work which, while ingratiating in its details, has a certain lengthiness in relation to its musical content. Here there was admirable rhythmic nuance in addition to fine distinctions of mood and dynamics. The reviewer, unfortunately, could not await the close of "La Valse," which followed without a pause for applause. What he had opportunity to hear was strikingly dramatic, marked by memorable sweep and momentum besides the disclosure of the darker and ominous vein which underlies the tunes of Viennese savor.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
FEB 17 1950

Boston Symphony

Orchestra Under New Conductor, Charles Munch, Gives Brilliant Performance at Mosque

BY CHARLES HAUFLER

Though it must have been said countless times that the Boston Symphony Orchestra sounds better every time it's heard, we must say it again and we believe it was never truer. Under its new conductor, Charles Munch, seen here for the first time at the Mosque last night in a Griffith Music Foundation concert, the orchestra was richer and more brilliant in its performing than ever.

Silver-thatched and otherwise not unlike the eminent Serge Koussevitzky, whom he succeeds, in appearance, Munch inspired his men to new miracles of tone. More so than most directors, he seems to merge with the orchestra and impart his strength to its efforts. His gestures are not mannered but blend naturally with the music he is conducting, and the effect is one of deep sincerity and understanding.

Delightful

The program was one of the best given here recently, every measure of it gratifying. It had a delightful start in the Water Music Suite by Handel. The sweet, old-fashioned airs were played with a charming lilt and gracefulness and the audience was fairly carried away by the vigorous bounce of the closing Allegro. The brasses and other winds did themselves proud and when the horns rose for a bow the plaudits were lusty.

The program then took a dramatic turn in Schumann's Fourth Symphony, in D Minor, one of that composer's finest efforts, frequently given to sad and intense effects. It was presented with such eloquence and power that the audience was profoundly stirred.

Throughout this work as well as the Handel, the orchestra gave evidences of its expressiveness and technical competence, tonal luster and fluency of rhythm that kept the listener in a constant state of admiration. But for sheer virtuosity, Newark has seldom heard anything to compare with its performance of the closing offering the Tschaikowsky Sixth Symphony.

It was really spectacular, with the orchestra executing tonal blasts you'd never think within its range exulting wildly in the militant Allegro and sinking to such a realistic note of despair in the final Lamentoso passage that the audience was too spellbound for immediate response. But when the applause got going it was a tremendous tribute to Munch and his musicians.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
FEB 18

Boner

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Apparently your columnist does not "Happel" in at a harness racing meet often, else he is most unobservant. His reference to a "harness race horse in full gallop" on Wheaties advertising matter compares with Koussevitzky off key at your more famous festival.

For Mr. Happel's information, the Great Barrington edition of the Wheaties' horse is a pacer, in gait. Hope this isn't a fair sample of The Eagle's general knowledge of harness racing, concerning the merits of which columns have been printed.

FRANK N. WRIGHT.
Great Barrington.

[87]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Boston Orchestra

Wagenaar Symphony Heard: Composer on Podium

By Jerome D. Bohm

Charles Munch's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was given over entirely to modern music. Three works by contemporary composers, including Bernard Wagenaar's Fourth Symphony, which was given its first New York performance under the composer's direction, and Samuel Barber's Overture "The School for Scandal" and Stravinsky's "Jeux de Cartes," preceded Debussy's "La Mer." The Stravinsky work had been played at last Wednesday's concert.

Mr. Wagenaar's Fourth Symphony is, like his other products in this form, expertly constructed, although the return to the material of the slow introduction at the close of the first movement was rather abrupt and made for an ineffectual ending to this section of the work. The symphony's subject matter derives largely from French sources, with Ravel as probably the chief influence; but Roussel and Honegger, too, are heard from in this eclectic score. Of its five short movements, the second, bucolic in atmosphere, was the most successfully realized. There was a touch of the commonplace in the third movement and the final allegro owed much to Ravel's "La Valse."

For me the most exciting interpretation of the afternoon was that accorded Debussy's "La Mer." Here Mr. Munch's remarkable control of his wonderful orchestra led to truly stirring results. The conductor's extraordinarily fine aural sensibilities enabled him to elicit truly magical sounds from his musicians. An ever-shifting web of irridescent hues ending in a splendidly luminous climax to the third sketch, "Dialogue du vent et de la mer," animated by the plastic, subtly controlled rhythmic flow of the music throughout its course made this one of the most compelling traversals of Debussy's fanciful creation imaginable.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1950

Boston Orchestra

By Jerome D. Bohm

Charles Munch's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was given over entirely to modern music. Three works by contemporary composers, including Bernard Wagenaar's Fourth Symphony, which was given its first New York performance under the composer's direction, and Samuel Barber's Overture "The School for Scandal" and Stravinsky's "Jeux de Cartes," preceded Debussy's "La Mer." The Stravinsky work had been played at last Wednesday's concert.

Mr. Wagenaar's Fourth Symphony is, like his other products in this form, expertly constructed, although the return to the material of the slow introduction at the close of the first movement was rather abrupt and made for an ineffectual ending to this section of the work. The symphony's subject matter derives largely from French sources, with Ravel as probably the chief influence; but Roussel and Honegger, too, are heard from in this eclectic score. Of its five short movements, the second, bucolic in atmosphere, was the most successfully realized. There was a touch of the commonplace in the third movement and the final allegro owed much to Ravel's "La Valse."

For me the most exciting interpretation of the afternoon was that accorded Debussy's "La Mer." Here Mr. Munch's remarkable control of his wonderful orchestra led to truly stirring results. The conductor's extraordinarily fine aural sensibilities enabled him to elicit truly magical sounds from his musicians. An ever-shifting web of irridescent hues ending in a splendidly luminous climax to the third sketch, "Dialogue du vent et de la mer," animated by the plastic, subtly controlled rhythmic flow of the music throughout its course made this one of the most compelling traversals of Debussy's fanciful creation imaginable.

LIVINGTON, N.J
HERALD
2/22/50

Master Munch—This Is The Story Of The Starry Eyed

By JERRY KRUPNICK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came back to Newark last Thursday night sounding fresh and different from its previous appearances. It left with its reputation as this country's finest symphony orchestra still very much in hand.

The difference was in the person of Charles Munch, new permanent conductor for the Boston group, who has replaced Serge Koussevitsky with a seemingly minimum of effort and has opened a new phase in the orchestra's long history.

Concertgoers at the Mosque sat enraptured over Munch's mellow and bright conducting as he led his orchestra through Handel's "Water Music Suite", Schumann's "Symphony No. 4 in D Minor" and Tchaikovsky's famous death-bed "Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, Pathetic."

Unlike Koussevitsky and Leonard Bernstein, previous conductors of the famed orchestra, Munch received more love than respect from his musicians. He literally lived the music being played through a combination of hand and body movements that were more feeling than pyrotechnical. His men responded with the affection of children with parent complexes, striving mightily to please the maestro and smoothly succeeding in drawing tender little smiles of approval for their efforts.

The results were an effusion of supreme musicianship and a warmth never bordering on the artificial that made for a brilliant musical evening.

The old-fashioned, sweet, "Water Music" was a fit introduction into this neo-dynamic era of Munch mastery. An aid that has lightness and warmth, it was given a kid glove treatment that soothed and completely succumbed the audience. When he had reached the final allegro movement, they were wholeheartedly willing to join the orchestra as it shouted its tonal voice of triumph and listeners joined with Munch in saluting the woodwind and brass sections with fond praise.

Following the leader through the twists and turns of the Schuman symphony, the orchestra proved that all of its sharpness and coordination was very much intact as it gave a brilliant rendition of a tricky, lovely work that should be played more often, especially by the Boston orchestra. Here, Munch really involved himself with the music and his control of the tempo and dramatic pace was an inspired performance.

But, as Al Jolson has been given to saying, the audience ain't heard nothin' yet. It was in the tragic 'Pathetic" that the fire and sadness and mellow beauty that Munch has succeeded in benighnly evoking from his cohorts came to the fore. Probably better known for the theme of its first movement which was popularly known as "The story of a Starry Night", the symphony is unusual in its melodic contrasts and requires masterful changes in mood in order to succeed.

By the end of the fiercely spirited third movement when the audience spontaneously broke out into applause though the performance was not over, it was obvious that the stuff was there and it was mellow. And as Munch lovingly brought the finale somberly in, the enraptured listeners sat for a moment, lost in the music, before they let the maestro know how thrilling a performance he had just given by surrounding him with six resounding encores.

For Munch and the Boston Symphony, it was a major triumph, accomplished smoothly and efficiently. His entire performance was so evenly magnificent that it is easy to see why he has taken chage of the stiff Boston audiences and, if not making them forget Koussevitsky, at least has made them grateful that they can still maintain their reputation with the brilliancy of

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
FEB 20 1950

Bread & Butter

To the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Conductor Charles Munch, the new concerto was "horribly difficult," but it had its good features; it "exploited the orchestra very adroitly, used the modern language" effectively and, altogether, it was "très intéressant." Pudgy Violinist Isaac Stern agreed. He had "worked and worked until the music was part of me." When his fiddling was finished, he grinned up into the balcony of Symphony Hall, then hammed his exit offstage, staggering as if brutally exhausted. Up in the balcony, smiling Composer William Schuman seemed satisfied with the rehearsal for the world première of his first concerto for violin and orchestra.

Schuman, who still finds time to compose despite his duties as president of Manhattan's Juilliard School of Music and director of publications for music publishers G. Schirmer, Inc., did not quite want to say his latest work was his best: "I have no stepchildren; if I favorited one work, it would feel hurt." But he had tried to compose his work "on the highest musical plane, exploiting the virtuosity of the violin and not just showing it off." The concerto had he said, a good deal of melody—and melody is the bread and butter of music.

Last week Boston symphony-goers got to hear the concerto too. What they heard was quite different from the somewhat eclectic Symphony No. 3 of Schuman they had first heard twelve years ago—and rewarded with "practically silence," as Schuman remembers it. A man who used to compose with one ear to Hindemith and Roy Harris (his teacher), the other sometimes to Atonalist Alban Berg, Schuman seemed to have found a little more of a style of his own at 39.

The first movement, full of vigor, speed and spirit, gave listeners a slice of "bread & butter"; there was a broad theme to hold on to, although in periods of paraphrase and pyrotechnics it sometimes slithered out of the average listener's grasp. In the second movement, an andantino "interlude," the violin sang a beautifully simple song. Composer Schuman split the furious pace of the last movement with a long brassy chorale.

To one listener the concerto seemed "somewhat like a surrealistic painting—

James F. Coyne

SCHUMAN & STERN
A search for the id.

with familiar and beautiful forms in unfamiliar relationships and in a dreamlike atmosphere." Another subtitled it "The id in search of itself." One Boston critic found it "crabbed and harshly dissonant"; another "wanting likability" and "without heart." But beaming Conductor Munch thought that "with Bartok, Berg and Bloch, it is one of the most important concerti." Bill Schuman himself, remembering the "practically silence" he once got in Boston, was mighty pleased with 2½ minutes of applause.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
~~RECORD~~
Inquirer
FEB 28 1950

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BEGAN NEW ERA
Summoned at 58 to succeed aging taskmaster Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch won his musicians at their first meeting by urging them to "relax." Founder of the Paris Philharmonic, Munch was spectacularly successful as guest conductor in U. S. cities before taking his post.

Boston Herald
Feb. 19, 1950

L. S. B. Jefferds, 86, Former Symphony Official, Is Dead

Lewis S. B. Jefferds, 86, advertising manager for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 35 years prior to his retirement in 1936, died yesterday at his home, 71 Arlington street, Hyde Park.

Funeral services will be held tomorrow at 2 P. M. at the First Congregational Church, Webster street, Hyde Park. Burial will be in Fairview cemetery, Hyde Park.

Mr. Jefferds, a native of South Boston, was a member of Euclid lodge of Masons, and the Hyde Park lodge of the Odd Fellows.

He leaves no immediate survivors.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Boston Orchestra

Wagenaar Symphony Heard; Composer on Podium

By Jerome D. Bohm

Charles Munch's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was given over entirely to modern music. Three works by contemporary composers, including Bernard Wagenaar's Fourth Symphony, which was given its first New York performance under the composer's direction, and Samuel Barber's Overture "The School for Scandal" and Stravinsky's "Jeux de Cartes," preceded Debussy's "La Mer." The Stravinsky work had been played at last Wednesday's concert.

Mr. Wagenaar's Fourth Symphony is, like his other products in this form, expertly constructed, although the return to the material of the slow introduction at the close of the first movement was rather abrupt and made for an ineffectual ending to this section of the work. The symphony's subject matter derives largely from French sources, with Ravel as probably the chief influence; but Roussel and Honegger, too, are heard from in this eclectic score. Of its five short movements, the second, bucolic in atmosphere, was the most successfully realized. There was a touch of the commonplace in the third movement and the final allegro owed much to Ravel's "La Valse."

For me the most exciting interpretation of the afternoon was that accorded Debussy's "La Mer." Here Mr. Munch's remarkable control of his wonderful orchestra led to truly stirring results. The conductor's extraordinarily fine aural sensibilities enabled him to elicit truly magical sounds from his musicians. An ever-shifting web of irridescent hues ending in a splendidly luminous climax to the third sketch, "Dialogue du vent et de la mer," animated by the plastic, subtly controlled rhythmic flow of the music throughout its course made this one of the most compelling traversals of Debussy's fanciful creation imaginable.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1950

Boston Orchestra

By Jerome D. Bohm

Charles Munch's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was given over entirely to modern music. Three works by contemporary composers, including Bernard Wagenaar's Fourth Symphony, which was given its first New York performance under the composer's direction, and Samuel Barber's Overture "The School for Scandal" and Stravinsky's "Jeux de Cartes," preceded Debussy's "La Mer." The Stravinsky work had been played at last Wednesday's concert.

Mr. Wagenaar's Fourth Symphony is, like his other products in this form, expertly constructed, although the return to the material of the slow introduction at the close of the first movement was rather abrupt and made for an ineffectual ending to this section of the work. The symphony's subject matter derives largely from French sources, with Ravel as probably the chief influence; but Roussel and Honegger, too, are heard from in this eclectic score. Of its five short movements, the second, bucolic in atmosphere, was the most successfully realized. There was a touch of the commonplace in the third movement and the final allegro owed much to Ravel's "La Valse."

For me the most exciting interpretation of the afternoon was that accorded Debussy's "La Mer." Here Mr. Munch's remarkable control of his wonderful orchestra led to truly stirring results. The conductor's extraordinarily fine aural sensibilities enabled him to elicit truly magical sounds from his musicians. An ever-shifting web of irridescent hues ending in a splendidly luminous climax to the third sketch, "Dialogue du vent et de la mer," animated by the plastic, subtly controlled rhythmic flow of the music throughout its course made this one of the most compelling traversals of Debussy's fanciful creation imaginable.

IRVINGTON, N.J.
HERALD
2/23/50

Master Munch—This Is The Story Of The Starry Eyed

By JERRY KRUPNICK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came back to Newark last Thursday night sounding fresh and different from its previous appearances. It left with its reputation as this country's finest symphony orchestra still very much in hand.

The difference was in the person of Charles Munch, new permanent conductor for the Boston group, who has replaced Serge Koussevitsky with a seemingly minimum of effort and has opened a new phase in the orchestra's long history.

Concertgoers at the Mosque sat enraptured over Munch's mellow and bright conducting as he led his orchestra through Handel's "Water Music Suite", Schumann's "Symphony No. 4 in D Minor" and Tchaikovsky's famous death-bed "Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, Pathetic."

Unlike Koussevitsky and Leonard Bernstein, previous conductors of the famed orchestra, Munch received more love than respect from his musicians. He literally lived the music being played through a combination of hand and body movements that were more feeling than pyrotechnical. His men responded with the affection of children with parent complexes, striving mightily to please the maestro and smoothly succeeding in drawing tender little smiles of approval for their efforts.

The results were an effusion of supreme musicianship and a warmth never bordering on the artificial that made for a brilliant musical evening.

The old-fashioned, sweet, "Water Music" was a fit introduction into this neo-dynamic era of Munch mastery. An aid that has lightness and warmth, it was given a kid glove treatment that soothed and completely succumbed the audience. When he had reached the final allegro movement; they were wholeheartedly willing to join the orchestra as it shouted its tonal voice of triumph and listeners joined with Munch in saluting the woodwind and brass sections with fond praise.

Following the leader through the twists and turns of the Schuman symphony, the orchestra proved that all of its sharpness and coordination was very much intact as it gave a brilliant rendition of a tricky, lovely work that should be played more often, especially by the Boston orchestra. Here, Munch really involved himself with the music and his control of the tempo and dramatic pace was an inspired performance.

But, as Al Jolson has been given to saying, the audience ain't heard nothin' yet. It was in the tragic 'Pathetic' that the fire and sadness and mellow beauty that Munch has succeeded in benighnly evoking from his cohorts came to the fore. Probably better known for the theme of its first movement which was popularly known as "The story of a Starry Night", the symphony is unusual in its melodic contrasts and requires masterful changes in mood in order to succeed.

By the end of the fiercely spirited third movement when the audience spontaneously broke out into applause though the performance was not over, it was obvious that the stuff was there and it was mellow. And as Munch lovingly brought the finale somberly in, the enraptured listeners sat for a moment, lost in the music, before they let the maestro know how thrilling a performance he had just given by surrounding him with six resounding encores.

For Munch and the Boston Symphony, it was a major triumph, accomplished smoothly and efficiently. His entire performance was so evenly magnificent that it is easy to see why he has taken chage of the stiff Boston audiences and, if not making them forget Koussevitsky, at least has made them grateful that they can still maintain their reputation with the brilliancy of

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
FEB 20 1950

Bread & Butter

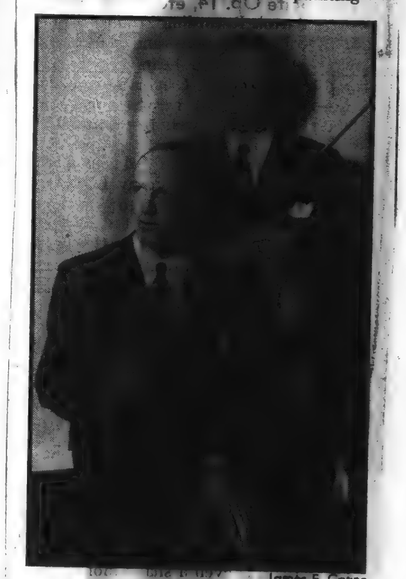
To the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Conductor Charles Munch, the new concerto was "horribly difficult," but it had its good features; it "exploited the orchestra very adroitly, used the modern language" effectively and, altogether, it was "très intéressant." Pudgy Violinist Isaac Stern agreed. He had "worked and worked until the music was part of me." When his fiddling was finished, he [illegible] up into the balcony of Symphony Hall, then hammered [illegible] offstage, staggering as if brutally exhausted. Up in the balcony, smiling Composer William Schuman seemed satisfied with the rehearsal for the world première of his first [illegible]rto for violin and orchestra.

Schuman [illegible] finds time to compose despite his duties as president of Manhattan's Juilliard School of Music and director of publications for music publishers G. Schirmer, Inc., [illegible] quite want to say his latest work [illegible]s best: "I have no stepchildren; if [illegible]ted one work, it would feel hurt. [illegible] he had tried to compose [illegible] highest musical plane, exploiting [illegible]uosity of the violin and not just [illegible] it off." The concerto had [illegible] good deal of melody—and melody [illegible] bread and butter of music.

Last week Boston symphony-goers got to hear the concerto too. What they heard was quite different from the somewhat eclectic Symphony No. 3 of Schuman they had first heard twelve years ago—and rewarded with "practically silence," as Schuman remembers it. A man who used to compose [illegible]e ear to Hindemith and Roy Harris (his teacher), the other sometimes to Atonalist Alban Berg, Schuman seemed to have found a little more of a style of his own at 39.

The first movement, full of vigor, speed and spirit, gave listeners a slice of "bread & butter"; there was a broad theme to hold on to, although in periods of paraphrase and pyrotechnics it sometimes slithered out of the average listener's grasp. In the second movement, an andantino "interlude," the violin sang a beautifully simple song. Composer Schuman split the furious pace of the last movement with a long brassy chorale.

To one listener the concerto seemed "somewhat like a surrealistic painting—



James F. Coyne
SCHUMAN & STERN
A search for the id.

with familiar and beautiful forms in unfamiliar relationships and in a dream-like atmosphere. Another subtitled it "The id in search of itself." One Boston critic found it "crabbed and harshly dissonant"; another "wanting in stability" and "without heart." But beaming Conductor Munch thought that "with Bartok, Berg and Bloch, it is one of the most important concerti." Bill Schuman himself, remembering the "practically silence" he once got in Boston, was mighty pleased with 2½ minutes of applause.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
~~RECORD~~
Inquirer
FEB 28 1950

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BEGAN NEW ERA
Summoned at 58 to succeed aging taskmaster Koussevitsky as conductor of the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch won his musicians at their first meeting by urging them to "relax." Founder of the Paris Philharmonic, Munch was spectacularly successful as guest conductor in U. S. cities before taking his post.

Boston Herald
Feb. 19, 1950

L. S. B. Jefferds, 86, Former Symphony Official, Is Dead

Lewis S. B. Jefferds, 86, advertising manager for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 35 years prior to his retirement in 1936, died yesterday at his home, 71 Arlington street, Hyde Park.

Funeral services will be held tomorrow at 2 P. M. at the First Congregational Church, Webster street, Hyde Park. Burial will be in Fairview cemetery, Hyde Park.

Mr. Jefferds, a native of South Boston, was a member of Euclid lodge of Masons, and the Hyde Park lodge of the Odd Fellows.

He leaves no immediate survivors.

[88]

MUSIC

Casadesus Piano Soloist in Mozart and D'Indy Works at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of the most satisfying thus far this season. The music performed was good and some of it had the added virtue of relative familiarity. (It's nice, every so often, to listen in comfort and ease, with nothing new to absorb!) And in the matter of performance, the whole afternoon was a triumphant blend of musicianship and virtuosity.

Robert Casadesus, one of my favorite pianists, was the soloist for Mozart's C major Concerto (K. 467), and the keyboard artist for Vincent D'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air. Conductor Charles Munch began the program with Schumann's Fourth Symphony, and included on it the Introduction to D'Indy's opera "Fervaal."

Mozart's spirited little Concerto was rather badly placed. Played by a considerably reduced orchestra, and coming after the full-bodied romanticism of the Schumann Symphony, it sounded anemic. It also sounded out of tune, where the woodwind instruments were involved, because they could not get down to the pitch of the piano.

But Mr. Casadesus, an ideal Mozart player, brought to the solo part his marvelous technique, which makes every note evenly articulated, and his wonderful sense of style, which makes every phrase graceful and stand in relation to its context. Just as fine was his performance of the demanding if not so exposed solo part in D'Indy's fresh air music. Here again style and technique and a superb sense of rhythm combined to make the most of what the composer had written. No wonder Mr. Casadesus was received with tumultuous enthusiasm. He well deserved it.

Schumann and D'Indy found Mr. Munch at his vivid best as interpreter. It all sounded rich and warm, and at the same time beautifully clear. Nothing was forced, nothing submerged, nothing twisted out of shape. The music was there as each composer had set it down, but sounding with the luminous tone and the expressive passion peculiar to this orchestra and conductor.

The Symphony on a French Mountain Air must be underrated, for it is played less frequently than it deserves. Actually this is a score of major size and importance, splendidly wrought, fresh in what it has to say and of a gloriously poetic, rhapsodic nature. Now that Mr. Munch has revived it for us, perhaps he will tackle D'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain" next season.

In polyandrous Tibet, it is reported that a girl marries all of her mate's brothers as well as her mate.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert was one of the most satisfying and gratifying of the season. The orchestra enjoyed the distinguished assistance of Robert Casadesus, pianist, who was heard both in Mozart's C Major Concerto (K. 467) and in d'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Song, a performance of which at the regular concerts was long overdue. The introduction to d'Indy's opera "Fervaal" preceded the latter in what was apparently its first Symphony Hall performance, and the Fourth Symphony of Schumann began the concert.

Mr. Munch's remarkable re-creation of the Schumann has been commented upon in these columns. Though this was the first performance at a Friday-Saturday pair this season, it had been heard on two other occasions. Mr. Munch's revitalizing of this work is on a par with his treatment of the Mendelssohn "Reformation" Symphony two weeks ago. Even though Schumann's Symphony is vastly superior as a composition, it eludes the average conductor, both because of the awkwardness of the instrumentation and the highly personal character of the music. Mr. Munch possesses the key to unlock its eloquence, and what might easily be a doubtful work becomes a commanding one.

It had been announced that Mr. Casadesus would play the C Minor Concerto of Mozart, a truly remarkable piece that we seldom get a chance to hear. But the C major has its special charm and beauty and the performance was a delight—save for one thing: once more a soloist's piano was not quite high enough in pitch to meet the orchestra on its own ground. This discrepancy was even more glaring in the d'Indy. Something must and should be done about this. It happens all too often.

The introduction to "Fervaal" is mystical and one can understand why the opera has been compared to "Parsifal," it is anything but operatic in the conventional sense. The performance was of an appropriately elevated character. The "Symphnie Cevenole," as it is sometimes called, is one of the masterpieces of French music. Superb in its construction and craftsmanship, it abounds in felicitous musical ideas and runs the gamut of musical effects, from quiet poetry to frenzied excitement, a little too frenzied in yesterday's performance, which bordered here and there on the raucous. In this one respect d'Indy deserved better of his interpreters, but, in the main, everything was quite as it should be. And now that Mr. Munch has made a beginning with d'Indy, let us hope that he will give us more. He is an unjustly neglected composer.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, gave the 16th program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Robert Casadesus, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120 — Schumann
Concerto No. 21 in C major (K.467) — Mozart
Introduction to "Fervaal." — d'Indy
Symphony on a French Mountain Air — d'Indy

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It seems to me a remarkably pleasant custom this, of having our symphony soloists do two concerti on the same program. Yesterday's concert would have been memorable for the Mozart alone, but d'Indy's fine "Symphony on a French Mountain Air" for orchestra and piano gave it additional impact and fulfullment.

Doing two works for soloist and orchestra on the same program, indeed, seems the only proper way to solve two problems that have long wanted the solution. These are 1, bringing out new works of dubious audience success yet making it all worth the effort for the soloist by letting him follow up with a standard repertoire favorite (as in the case of Isaac Stern a fortnight ago), and 2, reviving the smaller, choicer works of the repertoire that may enchant but do not bring down the house, again allowing the soloist to follow up with something that will (as was the case yesterday).

In any event, it is impossible to convey how much extraordinary concerted music lies fallow today. Yesterday's Mozart Concerto—not heard here for 13 years!—is but one of a score or more of surpassing beauty, and there are, besides, dozens of others of infinite charm from the baroque, classical and early romantic eras. Pairing them with familiar works seems the only feasible way to hear them; no virtuoso can be blamed for hesitating to do, for instance, a Hummel concerto when he knows it's not going to really put him over, nor can symphony management afford today's big fees for some engaging trifle.

Mozart's C major Concerto is under no circumstances an engaging trifle; on the contrary, of them all, it seems to me to have one of the most exalted of all the Mozart slow movements. It must be said that Robert Casadesus (who has recently recorded this week on LP) is an absolute master of the Mozart style. His performance yesterday was of crystalline clarity, of grace, finish, elan and communicative power. He plays as if he were at once a part of the instrument and of the music itself; a performer, in short, of great stature. But—there goes that old "but" again—it is my regrettable duty to complain once again about that bogey that has plagued us hereabouts for years, the bogey of one pitch for the orchestra, another for the piano.

Unless my ears deceived me terribly, the piano was a good eighth of a tone flat. If you don't hear these things it is a small matter; if you do it is as irritating as a fingernail on a blackboard. And it is an old story in Symphony Hall, far too old, and it does seem the time has come either to use only those pianos that can be tuned to 444 (or whatever it is nowadays) or get the woodwind players a new set of instruments that can be tuned down to 440. Those missing four degrees have damaged so many symphony concerts I have lost count.

It didn't seem so bad in the "Symphony on a French Mountain Air," which is a particularly excellent and profitable work by a much underestimated composer. Here the piano keeps on a generally high dynamic plane and is so vigorously integrated with the orchestral fabric (in contrast to the solos and tuttis of the Mozart) that the tonal discrepancies are not so painful.

This, too, is a neglected work—12 years since last done here—and though its roots in Wagner and Franck are easily perceived it is a thoroughly entertaining and stimulating piece. It is notable, too, in its closing movement, as the source of Irving Berlin's "This Is the Army Mr. Jones," which may or may not be useful information.

The concert opened with Schumann's Fourth Symphony, which I have had previous occasion to discuss (and I was again impressed yesterday with it), and as a quietly beautiful interlude there was d'Indy's Introduction to "Fervaal," exquisitely played. The program next week offers Haydn's D major Symphony No. 104, Milhaud's Fourth Piano Concerto in a first performance by Zadel Skolovsky, and Saint-Saens' Third Symphony, with E. Power Biggs as organist.

Post Mar BO

SYMPHONY DEFICIT AT $139,000

Increase Blamed on Reduction in Royalties

BY ROSE WALSH

Good music is a costly pleasure these days, for although legacies to the amount of $80,000, the largest sum in any one year, were left to the Boston Symphony Orchestra this past year (Miss Fanny P. Mason's bequest was $50,000), there still remains a deficit of $139,000, just $38,000 more than the previous year.

ROYALTIES DROP

Such was the information revealed at yesterday's annual meeting of the Society of Friends of Boston Symphony by Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the substantial organization, at a delightful afternoon program in Symphony Hall. A big drop in record royalties accounts for part of the loss but Henry B. Cabot, head of the trustees took the optimistic view that their financial problem is not as serious as that of other orchestras adding, "our great assets are people such as yourselves and people who take tickets regularly."

The meeting held a pleasant surprise for the more than 800 "Friends," many of them on the elderly side in the form of a State Department educational program sound film showing picturesque Tanglewood, Symphony's spacious, summer Music Centre at Stockbridge. Excellent pictures of the orchestra in rehearsal, Dr. Koussevitsky directing; glimpses of the students at work and at play, and interesting views of the gardens and surrounding countryside particularly pleased the patrons who have been unable to make the trip to the Berkshires.

Before joining the guests at tea, Dr. Charles Muench conducted the orchestra in a brief concert.

Symphony Friends

Reports Given By Trustees Of Orchestra

Three important events took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall at the sixteenth annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A new motion picture of activities at the Berkshire Music Center, produced last summer at Tanglewood by the Department of State's Office of International Information, was given its first Boston showing.

Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Society of Friends, was reelected to this position for the ensuing year.

Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a short program consisting of Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," and Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and "La Valse."

Prior to the showing of the Tanglewood film, Hamilton MacFadden, its producer, told of some of the difficulties involved in its production. He had planned to make it in 1947, but his plans were interrupted when Congress decided to discontinue "The Voice of America" cultural program. When this program was reinstated, he was able to carry his plans through. The film will be exhibited extensively abroad. Its spoken commentary will be translated into 30 languages.

Mr. Wolcott gave a brief outline of the orchestra's financial situation. While the outlook is considerably brighter for the Boston Symphony than it is for other American orchestras, a deficit of $180,000 is expected this year. Radio and phonograph royalties have temporarily fallen off.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees, told the meeting that the orchestra had benefited by several bequests during the past year that amounted to $80,000.

[89]

OPENING RED CROSS CAMPAIGN last night were Annamary Dickey, Metropolitan Opera Company soprano, and Arthur Fiedler, who conducted a concert by 65 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Concert, Film Stars Thrill 3000 In 'Kickoff' Rally for Red Cross

By JOHN O'CONNOR

Headliners of the stage, screen and concert world pitched in on a completely "for free" basis at Symphony Hall last night to thrill an audience of close to 3000 frontliners who will carry the Red Cross' "Mercy in Action" message to 31 Greater Boston communities, beginning today, in a campaign for $1,244,746.

The program had its serious moments, with the need for success being pressed home by Gov. Dever, Mayor Hynes and other speakers.

Business Basis

But in its less serious moments, the "kickoff" rally could not help but be a tremendous success, with such performers as Arthur Fiedler and 65 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Annamary Dickey, the beauteous soprano of the Metropolitan; Audrey Totter, the dark-haired Hollywood star, and Moaning Vic Damone, the bobby-soxers' current candidate for President.

Gov. Dever, while acknowledging the human values represented by the Red Cross organization, placed success of the appeal on a strictly business basis.

"We should remember," he said, "that it is wise as well as good to contribute generously to the helping hand whose assistance we may need very sorely in the future."

(Continued on Page Eleven)

Stars Aid Rally For Red Cross

(Continued from First Page)

The governor warned that "tomorrow may be our turn. It may be our community which is ravaged by a great fire, immersed in a great flood or damaged and destroyed by a great storm."

NEED "INEVITABLE"

Mayor Hynes warned that if the campaign should fail and the Red Cross were forced to curtail some of its activities, "it would mean the weakening of one of our necessary safeguards against trouble in almost any form."

Presiding was O. A. Schlaikjer, general chairman of the drive, who declared: "The need for the services of the Red Cross is inevitable. We must heed that need. We must provide the funds, because without such funds those in need cannot be helped. Lives which should and can be saved may be lost. The victims of inevitable disaster will be left to suffer, and they may die. We shall support that faithful group of Red Cross trained men and women who form the nucleus of a vast army of volunteers also imbued with the spirit of the Red Cross."

The program closed with a dramatic presentation, "The Light," directed by Eliot Duvey of the Tribune Theater and epitomizing Red Cross services.

Col. Joseph G. Gavin was chairman of the rally committee, assisted by Louis J. Brems, Arthur T. Boyle, Ernest W. Gross, Ray D. Schofield and George W. Steffy.

The drive will continue throughout the month.

Symphony Meeting Party-Like

By BARBARA TIBBETTS Traveler Society Assistant

MINKS AND MARY-JANES were trotted out for yesterday afternoon's annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall. On the agenda was a motion picture of life at Tanglewood, showing activities of the Berkshire Festival and Music Center; a discussion of the orchestra's deficit; and a short concert by the B.S.O. under the baton of Charles Munch. Guest speakers included Hamilton MacFadden, assistant chief of the international motion picture division of the office of international information; George Judd, manager of the B.S.O.; Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees; and Oliver Wolcott, president of the Friends.

Definitely shown up in a new light at the meeting was culture, described by Mr. MacFadden as one of Washington, D. C.'s leading stepchildren in legislative thinking — which was new light enough except that he shed further original rays on the matter by asking one and all to write their congressmen to remedy the situation!

FOLLOWING THE PROGRAM, members of the Friends braced themselves with a cup of coffee in the gallery prior to departing for their respective homes and any prospective writing of letters to Washington, D. C. Pourers were Mrs. Lewis Perry and Mrs. Oliver Wolcott. Among those glimpsed in the gallery were Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird; Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs chatting with Arthur Fiedler; Mrs. William Stanley Parker, quietly attired in a gray suit; Mrs. Robert Montgomery; Mrs. George Hawley with Miss Mabel Daniels; Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, Boston's most inveterate backer of things musical; Mrs. Allan Forbes, distinguished in a brown ensemble and wearing a hat fashioned of beige wool and taffeta; and Mrs. John Teele.

Others noted were Mrs. F. Hartwell Greeneff Mrs. Henry C. Endicott with her daughter-

(Bachrach Photo)
MRS. LEWIS PERRY

in-law, Mrs. Henry Endicott; Mrs. Alexander Steinert, topping her beige crepe dress with sables; Mrs. William Dana Orcutt; and Mrs. Jasper Whiting—not on the trail of Hamilton MacFadden and ready, if need be, to storm the portals of national government with him in defense of culture!

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
MAR 2- 1950

BSO Deficit May Reach $180,000

Tanglewood Film Given First Showing In Boston

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra expects a deficit of $180,000 this season.

Oliver Walcott, chairman of the Society of Friends of the Orchestra reported at the group's 16th annual meeting yesterday that the deficit would be above that of the 1948-49 season partly because revenues from radio and phonograph record sales have decreased.

Prior to the formal meeting in Symphony Hall Manager George E. Judd introduced Hamilton McFadden of the State Department Office of International Information motion picture department who gave an unofficial first showing of the 20-minute film made at Tanglewood last summer.

Mr. Walcott, who was unanimously re-elected chairman, reported on the brighter side of the deficit that ticket sales are increasing and several bequests have been received including one of $50,000.

Boston Symphony Friends Hold 16th Annual Meeting

The Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held their 16th annual meeting at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Henry B. Cabot presided, and a report of the orchestra's financial situation was delivered by Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the society.

This season the deficit is expected to be about $180,000, according to Mr. Wolcott, who unanimously was reelected chairman. This figure will be higher than that for the season of 1948-49 due partly to the facts that revenues from radio and the sales of phonograph records have decreased. The brighter side of the picture is found in the fact that ticket sales are up, and several bequests have been made to the orchestra, including one of $50,000 by the late Miss Fannie Mason.

Before the business meeting, Manager George Judd introduced Hamilton McFadden, associate chief of the motion picture department of the State Department's Office of International Information. Mr. McFadden described the documentary film made at Tanglewood in the Berkshires last Summer, which then had an unofficial showing.

This film is one in the annual series presented in foreign countries by the OII, not in theatres but before miscellaneous gatherings of people. These films have spoken commentaries which are translated into 30 languages.

Following the meeting, Charles Munch conducted the orchestra in Samuel Barber's Overture "The School for Scandal" and, by Ravel, the Valses Nobles et Sentimentales and "La Valse." Tea was served in the Huntington av. upper foyer.

Then came the great event of the day, the great election. Henry B. Cabot, president of the Friends, first announced that despite the financial situation the Friends were still a happy family; no changes of policy were in the making; the subscription list remained the highest in the country; the trustees, unlike those in some other cities, never had to think of popularizing or interfering in any way with the programs. And then he said that nominations were in order for a treasurer. A great hush fell over the audience, as Mr. Wolcott, for years our beloved treasurer, sat on tenterhooks on the stage.

Somebody popped up. "I re-nominate Mr. Oliver Wolcott," he cried. "Second the motion!" chanted the audience in unison. "Any brave man care to nominate another?" inquired the chairman. Silence. "The motion has been made and seconded that Mr. Wolcott be elected treasurer," said the chairman. "All in favor say 'aye.'" "Aye," thundered the audience. "Those opposed?" Utter silence. "It is a vote," said the chairman. Five and 11/16th seconds had elapsed to lower last year's world's record by a full second.

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The Great Election Sets a New Record

Heavens, said I to myself, the very thought of it appalling me, what if he should lose? What if somebody should propose a new candidate from the floor? What if that new candidate got in? Would the organization, hitherto so well knit, so bound by a common purpose, so dedicated to a common goal, fall apart? Would there be schisms?

I hastened up to Symphony Hall brooding on the matter, for a Friend of the Boston Symphony orchestra no more fails to attend the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra than he fails to lay aside as substantial a sum as he can for its maintenance. And it developed immediately that this year there was to be an added attraction in addition to the great election, the little speeches, the music and the tea and cakes.

War Films Favorite

For, on the stage of the hall, was suspended a large movie screen. It seemed we were to see the American premiere of the movie made last summer at Tanglewood by the State Department's Office of International Information. A brief encounter before the preview with Hamilton MacFadden, assistant chief of the International Motion Picture division of the OII, turned up the fact that this 20-minute film was one of a score or more made each year by the State Department for free distribution all over the world.

Between 100 and 180 million people see these films every year, said Mr. MacFadden, who began his career hereabouts as manager of the Harvard Glee Club and was busy producing plays and movies until he joined the government in 1945. They're not in competition with the commercial movie interests, he explained, but are shown in little halls, open air meetings and anywhere at all to peoples of other lands. They eat them up, too, Mr. MacFadden added, some of them attracting audiences in the thousands. "The war documentaries are by all means the greatest favorites," he said, "with 'The Fighting Lady' by far the biggest draw."

He, however, favors more films of a cultural nature, and stated in his little pre-preview speech to the audience that while other peoples are well aware of our mechanical ingenuity, our mass production, our power and so forth, they sneer at our culture. But trying to convince Congress of the need for setting forth our culture, he said, is a hard nut to crack.

The film, in any case, turned out to be a neat if not remarkable bird's eye view of the doings at Tanglewood, with excellent rehearsal shots of the orchestra in its shirt sleeves, of student activities, of the various departments in action and, at the end, a full-blown concert with chorus and all. And overall was the presiding personality of Serge Koussevitzky, who proved himself as photogenic a trouper as Sir Cedric Hardwicke.

Receipts Down

After this came the financial statement by Oliver Wolcott, treasurer of the Friends. Things weren't so good, he said. The deficit this year would be $139,000; the record war, now fortunately ended, had cut into their royalties by $50,000, and things were difficult. They had had, however, legacies of $80,000, $50,000 of it from the late Fanny Mason, and a bit of horizon blue might develop when and if the government relaxes its taxes on symphony orchestras, which is a possibility of the future. Radio receipts were also down, and the fact that the Pops wouldn't be broadcasting this year would cut into the orchestra's income.

YONKERS, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 7 - 1950

Boston Symphony At Center Mar. 16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third appearance in Westchester County on Thursday evening, March 16 at the County Center. The conductor will be Charles Munch who assumed his new duties as conductor just last fall. Since the Boston Symphony was founded in 1881, it has had nine conductors, three of them natives of France and Mr. Munch follows in the steps of a great predecessor, Serge Koussevitsky, who held the post for 25 years.

Charles Munch, first coming to the United States in December, 1946, when he made his intitial American appearance conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest, is a native of Strasborg Alsace, where he was born in 1891. Mr. Munch has made his remarkable reputation as conductor for the most part in France where he has led the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureux Orchestra, and the Straram Orchestra. He was the founder of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. Last tautumn he took the Orchestra Nationale de la Radiodiffusion Francaise on a goodwill tour of America.

The program will include: Haydn, Symphony No. 104, 3 excerpts from Romeo and Juliet by Berlioz, Beethoven VII, Symphony.

The concert is thefifth in the Mrs. Julian Olney Series at the County Center.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 8 - 1950

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Gives 2nd Concert at State Auditorium

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the second concert of the current series last night at the State Auditorium in Providence under the baton of Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the orchestra.

Experiments with staging improved the sound of this concert as compared with the first concert, cutting down a feed-back through the ventilators and helping in some other ways. The orchestra was seated entirely on one level.

The program:

Haydn ..... Symphony in G major, No. 88
I. Adagio; Allegro
II. Largo
III. Menuetto; Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito
Brahms. Variations on a Theme by Haydn. Op. 56a
Bach . Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor (Orchestra by Ottorino Respighi)
INTERMISSION
Shostakovitch .... Symphony No. 1, Op. 10
I. Allegretto; Allegro non troppo
II. Allegro
III. Lento
IV. Allegro molto

This was the 303rd Providence concert and our guess is that the Boston Symphony will remember it for a long time to come. It had a mystical sense of the unheard-of heard about it.

In the Shostakovitch the piano turned out to be out of tune both with itself and with the orchestra in the Scherzo, truly a wry joke, and the pianist played very, very quietly in the fourth movement. In the fourth movement the upper tympani was off tune somehow, and with a solo pattern to repeat three times.

And at the end something happened which I have never seen before. The audience startèd to applaud as Mr. Burgin closed the book on Shostakovitch, became self-conscious and stopped, leaving everything in neutral. Truly an evening to remember!

The Respighi setting of the Bach "Passacaglia" is still controversial. There were those in the audience who expressed violent sentiments about it, which is a good sign. It is truly a virtuoso setting in the grand manner, and it is equally true that it shows Respighi knew practically nothing about the instrument for which it was originally written. As far as this corner is concerned, there the matter rests. Except for one curious confusion which developed at the very end of the Passacaglia. Mr. Burgin and the orchestra made the most of the material and the setting at hand.

There were certain variations in the Brahams opus which seemed a bit hurried and angular to pianists in the audience, who always consider this their property, but the over-all effect given by Mr. Burgin was of sincere conviction and a desire to keep the classical image of Haydn in mind.

Haydn really appeared in all his glory in the opening symphony. The tone was magnificent, the tempos relaxed and gracious, and Mr. Burgin conducted in a straightforward manner which was eloquent in its restraint.

There was some small thing hovering over this 303rd concert in Providence. Mr. Burgin deserved better treatment all around!

Col. Mar. 4

MUSIC

Skolovsky Soloist in New Milhaud Concerto at Symphony Concerts

By CYRUS DURGIN

The novelty this week at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts is the new Fourth Piano Concerto of Darius Milhaud, which the French composer finished last August in California. The soloist is Zadel Skolovsky, a young artist of Russian parentage and Canadian birth, who makes his Boston debut on these occasions. Charles Munch begins the program with two items of Haydn: the unimportant Overture to the forgotten opera "The Uninhabited Island," and the last and great Symphony in D Major No 104. For finale there is Saint-Saens' spavined old warhorse, the Third Symphony, whose organ part is performed by E. Power Biggs.

It would be pleasant to report that Milhaud, one of the finest of the middle-aged generation of French creative musicians, has produced a fine and solid or even a great work in his Fourth Piano Concerto. The truth, however, seems to be in the other direction. It is a busy, busy piece, rhythmatically alive all the way, and at beginning and end having the jiggling jocularity of Milhaud's "Scaramouche" Suite, which these sections in a way resemble. But I found my attention wandering in the course of the slow movement, which doesn't say much or get anywhere except into a cul de sac of somewhat tortured dissonance.

The best things about the Concerto are its lively and sustained rhythmic buoyancy and the bright, sparkling colors of the orchestration. Also the fact that the piano part has a certain grotesque life of its own that compels attention except, as aforesaid, in the slow movement.

This solo part must be very tricky, and Mr. Skolovsky, who has what seemed to be a big, resourceful technic, was equal to its demands. It would be nice to hear this gifted pianist again in a better piece that would show off more of his talent. For the present one can only compliment him on his navigation of an exacting duty, and to add that he was cordially received by the Friday audience.

Mr. Munch gave both Overture and Symphony brisk performances that were nicely within the Haydn style, clear, balanced, and at the same time having a subtle interpretive distinction that came from the special qualities of Charles Munch. As for Saint-Saens' Symphony, he worked wonders upon it, making that perfumed slow movement sound fresh nad passionate, and the knock-'em-dead finale, bursting with its imposing organ chords, its booming drums and crashing cymbals, sound like really important music. As a matter of record it was with this work, which he conducted here as guest in 1946, that Mr. Munch showed us what a superb conductor he is.

The organ blended well with the orchestra, and Mr. Biggs treated his part impeccably. Incidentally, it was said that the piano which Mr. Skolovsky used would be brought up to the Boston Symphony's unusually high pitch of 444 vibrations per second. Perhaps some improvement was made, but this was difficult to tell, owing to the dissonant character of Milhaud's Concerto.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 3 - 1950

Pianist To Present NewMilhaudWork

Skolovsky Pays Cash For Right To Play It With Boston Symphony

BOSTON (UP) — A new piano concerto by famed modern composer Darius Milhaud gets its world premiere today by a young pianist who paid in cash for the privilege.

Pianist Zadel Skolovsky, who plays the new concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, commissioned the work from Milhaud last March.

"I have the greatest personal satisfaction in bringing new music before the public," Skolovsky said.

The idea of an individual performer financing a composition for himself is somewhat unusual, though various orchestras and foundations have made commissioning a common practice.

"There's a great mutual advantage in this sort of arrangement," Skolovsky said. "There is financial gain to the composer and also to the artist who gets exclusive rights to perform the composition for a stipulated time.

"The bonus is that the public is getting a new work of art it might not otherwise have had. There is a definite added incentive to the composer.

Skolovsky declined to say how much he paid Milhaud, now teaching at Mills College in Oakland, Cal. Fees on similar commissions have ranged from $1000 to $2000.

However, he said he felt it was a good investment.

"I believe in it very much," he said. "Milhaud feels it's his best

Mar 4

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 19th program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. E. Power Biggs, organist, was the assisting artist in the following program:

Overture to "L'Isola Disabitata": Haydn
Symphony No. 104 in D.....Haydn
Concerto No 4 for Piano and orchestra Milhaud
Symphony No. 3 in C minor Saint Saens

By RUDOLPH ELIE

An abundance of musical riches for every taste marked this fine concert, the whole set forth with vigor, elan and authority.

The only new thing on the program was Darius Milhaud's Fourth Piano Concerto, being given its first performance by a splendid pianist also making his first appearance here. It must be said that the new work is a rather curious affair that for all its attractiveness, its liveliness and overall spirit, nonetheless conveys more than a little of the atmosphere of contrivance.

It is not, of course, too easy to get to the bottom of the matter in one hearing, yet the Concerto doesn't seem too reluctant to give up its secrets the first time out. The first movement alone offers real problems to the listener for here Milhaud, rather than treating the piano as a solo instrument, integrates it almost wholly with the orchestra in a swiftly paced, rhythmically urgent and generally polytonal improvisation that never quite establishes any mood at all.

Its idiom doesn't seem too difficult, which is to say it is not harmonically obscure to ears educated to a reasonable degree of contemporary alertness, nor is its melodic material, fragentary although it is, any more angular or spare than is seemly. It is merely that the composer, setting up a tension, maintains it inexorably to the end, offering little contrast either in material or dynamic level. The first movement, in short, seems like the perpetual motion of a vast cluster of insects whirling but remaining fixed in relation to the ground.

The second movement is a vast improvement. Here the composer creates mood; a slightly ominous mood in a fantastic vein, but one at once effective and evocative in the interplay of imaginative orchestral textures with the piano. And the finale, again a swife movement in an improvisational style, has humor and good healthy abullience. Oddly enough, though the whole does not represent a new departure for this most talented composer, it somehow doesn't "sound" like him; had his name not been on it I am sure I never should have guessed whose it was. Be that as it may, Zadel Skolovsky played it with confidence, with security and style; it would be a pleasure to hear him in a work that would offer more opportunity for appraisal. And it may be added, with much blowing of the trumpets, that the piano was in tune with the orchestra, at last. How this miracle was achieved I am at a loss to explain.

I cannot remember ever having heard Haydn realized so perfectly as Mr. Munch realized him yesterday in the great D major Symphony. I thought at first, with his treatment of the adagio introduction, that it might be mannered and, if I may use the expression, whooped up. On the contrary, as the work progressed through the andante, the graceful menuetto (with its miraculous trio) and the whirling finale, it was little short of a revelation. The orchestra, achieving a light, utterly crystalline tone, never played better in all its life.

There are few symphonies in the repertoire that are quite so hilariously inflated, so grandiloquent and so filled with rodomontade as Saint Saens' organ symphony. Yet there are few that, if taken as unseriously as this one should be, are so completely entertaining. The organ thunders, the tympani beat out ferocious tattoos, trombones assault the heavens, four hands on a piano do grand arpeggios and violin players rush their fingers up and down the fingerboards in lightning figurations, pausing only, in the slow movement, to play an offertory. It is all spectacle, all melodrama, and all fun, and Mr. Munch gives it what are known as the works.

Next week we are to hear Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and the G minor Symphony, Lukas Foss' "Song of Anguish" and excerpts from Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" detective in "He Walked by Night."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The piece which first sold Charles Munch to some of us was the C minor Symphony of Saint-Saens (with organ), which he conducted here as guest four years ago. Here was a piece that had come to seem distinctly "old hat," a sort of relic, and Mr. Munch brought it back to life. Since he has become the regular conductor we have seen him perform a similar feat with the "Reformation" Symphony of Mendelssohn. Nor are these achievements merely a matter of pepping up; it is a more complicated process than that.

Anyway, Mr. Munch is repeating the Saint-Saens at this week's Symphony Concerts, with E. Power Biggs at the remodeled Symphony Hall organ. No more than before could he rid the slow division of its hint of smugness or the final movement of its Lisztian bombast. Nevertheless, the piece made good, even absorbing and exciting listening and brought down the house. Whatever you may say of Saint-Saens, he knew his business and this Symphony is a masterly piece of musical construction, with salient musical ideas and the whole attractively served up for orchestra.

The current program begins with Haydn, both unfamiliar and familiar, and continues with the Fourth Piano Concerto of Milhaud in its first performances. Zadel Skolovsky, a pianist new to Boston, was the soloist. The Haydn items are the Overture to the opera "L'Isola Disabitata," hitherto unheard at the Symphony Concerts, and the last and finest of the Symphonies, No. 104, which we had not heard for eight years and which was doubly welcome in Mr. Munch's splendid reading. The operatic Haydn, long an unknown quantity in this part of the world, is beginning to get a little recognition. If the whole of this one-act opera is as good as the Overture, it should be worth our while to hear it. We can credit Mr. Munch with yet another valuable addition to the orchestra's repertory.

Modern composers who write concertos take a considerable chance. The first performance can always be arranged and possibly a few others by the same artist. But how about subsequent ones? In this particular case Mr. Milhaud may not fare too badly. His concerto is definitely on the attractive side. The first movement is full of life and good spirits, there is a striking slow movement, slightly on the macabre side, and a finale that is a sort of perpetual motion for the pianist with the orchestra playing a very minor role. How difficult the work is technically would be hard to say merely from listening to it, but it seemed to give Mr. Skolovsky no particular trouble. He played the Concerto as though he enjoyed doing it and it is safe to say that most of the audience enjoyed hearing him. He was well received.

Lukas Foss Cantata at the Symphony

'Song of Anguish' Première With Composer on Podium

By Harold Rogers

Lukas Foss yesterday afternoon conducted the Boston Symphony in the première of his own work, "Song of Anguish," a Biblical cantata for baritone and orchestra. Marko Rothmüller was the soloist.

A composer is generally too realistic to expect immediate and worldwide approval of his work. All he asks is that his listeners give him an unbiased hearing. Without an open mind the concertgoer does an injustice both to the composer and to himself.

Compared to the music turned out by our contemporary extremists, Lukas Foss has created a rather conservative score, emphatically expressed, set to a text selected from the Book of Isaiah. The verses are chosen mainly from the fifth and sixth chapters, opening, "Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness," and closing, "Then said I, Lord, how long? And He answered, Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate."

* * *

Foss chose these verses, he said, because they are descriptive of our present-day problems. So it is natural that his score would have an Old Testament flavor with modern-age overtones. Chaotic conditions which Isaiah prophesied were depicted musically as already taking place.

Foss gave us more of a lamenting Jeremiah than an Isaiah. The moods were sometimes melancholic, often turbulent, but with doom pervading throughout. Though Isaiah has these characteristics, he is also one of the greatest optimists of the Old Testament. But there is no optimism in Foss's score. It is probable that in the allotted time he could do no more than paint a one-sided portrait.

What he did paint, however, was done with good, economical craftsmanship. There is no doubt that he said exactly what he intended to say. Mr. Rothmüller's interpretation was vocally fitting, pontifical in pose, dramatic in tone. His enunciation was not always clear.

Charles Munch opened the concert with a scintillant reading of Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro." The Mozart Symphony in G minor, No. 40, which came next, had a few negligible troubles in tempo (the Andante began a bit too fast), but was otherwise crisply done, eminently satisfying.

* * *

Last of all we heard three excerpts from Berlioz' Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"—the love scene in the Capulet garden, the Queen Mab scherzo, and the Capulet ball. Mr. Munch, who has so ably championed Berlioz this season, is giving us brilliant readings that impress us with the genius of this controversial figure, "the father of the modern orchestra."

In these excerpts particularly can one clearly see how Berlioz was paving the way for Wagner's harmonies and Tchaikovsky's sentiment. It is hard to believe that this music is now 111 years old. Berlioz was at least half a century ahead of his time.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current Symphony program begins with Mozart (the "Figaro" overture and G minor Symphony) and ends with Berlioz (excerpts from the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.) Between these extremes, and they are extremes in more senses than one, comes Lukas Foss' "Song of Anguish," for baritone and orchestra in its first performances, with Marko Rothmueller as the soloist.

Mr. Foss has reverted to the practice of an early day: The writing of solo cantatas, as opposed to choral ones. His specialty, however, is Biblical cantatas. His second, the "Song of Songs," was introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky three years ago. The piece heard yesterday, and to be repeated tonight, was composed a year earlier, or when Mr. Foss was 23. The two works are completely different, and it seems to me that Mr. Foss has been more successful in finding suitable musical expression for the dire prophecies of Isaiah than for the raptures of Solomon.

The excerpt from the Book of Isaiah that he has chosen is a long one and he has reordered the words to suit his purpose. The text begins "Woe unto them that call evil good and good evil" and ends "And the land be utterly desolate," and all that lies between is in the same vein, as are the long orchestral prelude, the interludes and postlude. Mr. Foss set out to write a gloomy peice and he has done so with results that are, in the main, impressive.

The conducting of the new work fell to the composer, who is no tyro at the business, and his fellow-members of the orchestra gave him all that he asked for. Mr. Rothmueller, a singer of Yugoslavian origin and Central European training, who has been in this country a little over a year, proved to be the ideal interpreter for Mr. Foss' music. His voice is powerful enough to be heard against Mr. Foss' elaborate (and resourceful) orchestration; he caught the mood of the music, while the clarity of his diction was nothing short of extraordinary.

Mr. Munch did well by Mozart, if not quite as well as he had done by Haydn the week before. Berlioz's Love Scene might have been a shade more romantic, but the other excerpts came off splendidly. The "Queen Mab" Scherzo was gossamer-light and the ball at the Capulets' house turned out to be a very orilliant affair, the tumult on the stage provoking answering one in the auditorium.

MUSIC

Memorable Conducting by Munch at Symphony; New Cantata by Lukas Foss

By CYRUS DURGIN

Yesterday's Boston Symphony concert was memorable at beginning and end, and had its points of interest in the middle. To start, Charles Munch conducted two Mozart scores in performances of absolute beauty. They were the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and the "great" G minor Symphony (K. 550). To end, there were the purely symphonic excerpts from Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, wherein, to my mind, Mr. Munch achieved a triumph exceeding any he has so far enjoyed here. In the middle there was Lukas Foss' Biblical Cantata No. 1, "Song of Anguish," receiving first performance, with the composer conducting and baritone Marko Rothmueller making his Boston debut as soloist.

The "Romeo and Juliet" excerpts probably have not been done here so often as Berlioz' Fantastic" Symphony, "Harold in Italy," or perhaps even "The Damnation of Faust." More's the pity, for it is an even finer score than the "Fantastic" or "Harold in Italy," less obvious and musically more remarkable. Certainly it is on a par with "The Damnation of Faust."

With the love scene, the jewelled "Queen Mab" scherzo and the scene of Romeo alone, Berlioz excelled himself, not alone in the fineness of writing, but in his relatively controlled and certainly noble evocation of moods of passion, tenderness, melancholy. Elsewhere there is the familiar Berlioz genius for brilliant tone painting, such as the Capulets' Ball, but done with less strain than in either the "Fantastic" Symphony or "Harold in Italy."

Precisely these qualities were ever-present in Mr. Munch's spectacular performance, along with excitement that never became fury. Mr. Munch has not sought for what we used to call the "Koussevitzkyan" richness of tone, but yesterday the orchestra sounded just like that. The scherzo was fleet and light, and there were some species of antique cymbals for the effect that Berlioz desired. (In 1942, as I remember, there were no such instruments, for what reasons I cannot remember). And the Capulets' Ball had a blaze and radiance of passion and color that brought a great whoop of applause.

Mozart, played with a somewhat reduced orchestra, had fared quite as well, with the essential differences of style. Everything was clear, and the peculiar blend of sadness and intensity which breathes out of this masterpiece was neither understated nor exaggerated. But the real secret is that Mr. Munch finds just the right tempo.

"Song of Anguish," dating from 1945, I believe to be an experimental work of Lukas Foss. It is a setting of verses from Isaiah, and the general intention seems to be a dramatic proclamation, in the thundering moral indignation of the prophet. The score misses that, however, for while the orchestral writing has its merits, the voice part is colorless, a bit dull and it often is written in a curiously strained manner. Mr. Rothmueller semed to have a big voice, and he stood on a little platform, but from where I sat he could not always be heard above the instruments. The audience was cordial to both composer and soloist.

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y
HERALD
3/10/50

Boston Symphony Will Play In Hub

M[illegible]
Wi[illegible]
Or[illegible] under
M[illegible] will play
[illegible] evening

CHARLES MUNCH

[illegible]certt, wh[illegible]
[illegible] Julian O[illegible] will Hayden [illegible] No.
[illegible] excerpts fro[illegible] Romeo a[illegible]
Berlioz, and Beethoven's
[illegible]mphony.

[illegible]ssumed his [illegible] duties as [illegible]st Fall. When he first
[illegible] United States from France
[illegible] made his initial appear-
[illegible]e helm of the Boston Sym-
[illegible]Orchestra as a guest conductor.
[illegible]ed the Paris Symphony
[illegible] the Lamoureux Or-
[illegible]d the Straram Orchestra.

Munch founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra and in 1938 became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. Last Autumn he took the Orchestra Nationale de la Radiodiffusion Francaise on a good-will tour of America.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 18th concert of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Marko Rothmueller, baritone, was the soloist. The program: Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" . . . Mozart Symphony in G minor (K. 550) . . . Mozart "Song of Anguish" . . . Lukas Foss Excerpts from "Romeo and Juliet". Berlioz

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It is getting a little monotonous, this reporting week after week that we've had another memorable symphony concert, but it seems to be clearer and clearer that Charles Munch, following the precept of Grecian, allows himself no careless days either in program or performance.

Yesterday it was Mozart and Berlioz with a new work by Lukas Foss for good measure, and on the whole I should say that it was a good measure. For it is becoming increasingly evident that this 28-year-old composer, who as the pianist of the Boston Symphony has both a security and a working atmosphere few composers have ever enjoyed, is capable of bigger things once he finds the proper creative credo.

Like so many American composers, whose musical vocabulary is enormous but whose ideology is written word. Where other Americans composers have turned to Sandburg or Lincoln or Jefferson or any number of other grass roots philosophers, Mr. Foss—who has also found inspiration in Sandburg—here leans heavily on a Biblical subject, and a desperately gloomy subject at that. The result was pretty much a bore muddled (and this seems to be the generation of muddled ideologies in every field), he seems overly preoccupied in the stimulation of the if not exactly a failure. This beating of breast, tearing of hair and pouring of ashes upon the head with all its attendant wailing is unseemly for a man of his age.

The result as music, however, was a brilliant success, and it is the music that here really concerns us For Mr. Foss has found a means of orchestral expression that is remarkably right and appropriate for this day and age. He is entirely uninfluenced by the Boulanger style of wrung-dry counterpoint in the dissonantly linear fashion. He has found an essentially melodic style that is tonal but explorative. It evokes an original musical world of its own that seems a natural extension of the world created by Mahler. It has movement, which is to say it has powerful rhythmic impulse without the motorical fussiness of, say Milhaud. It is uniform in character and individual without any eccentricity. It creates atmosphere and is always expressive, exploiting the instruments of the orchestra but never over-exploiting them idiosyncratically. It is, in fine, music of imagination and real creative urgency.

Until the voice enters in this particular piece, it is on its way; the voice and the words destroy it, for here it enters a more competitive world. When somebody is shouting "woe—woe—woe!" at you—and Mr. Rothmueller's style is more declamatory than musical—it makes no difference how fine the music below it is, it just doesn't come over.

I thought for a while that a tenor voice might have been more effective, for the orchestral line in this work nearly always doubles the voice and covers it to some extent, but it seems more likely that it is the subject matter itself that throws this otherwise beautiful work out of gear. Henceforth I hope Mr. Foss will seek a purely musical inspiration for orchestral works; his gift is too great to want collaboration, even Isaiah's.

I find Mr. Munch's touch with Mozart something extraordinary. His differentiation of the poles-apart character of the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and the great G minor Symphony was masterly; for the one it was all wit, verve and sparkle; for the other it was of the heart, never lugubrious or despairing, never labored or sententious. Tragedy is read into this work by musical commentators, but Mr. Munch understands that it is not tragic at all in a personal sense, but in a world sense; and more in sorrow than in anger at that.

The Berlioz, containing as it does in the Queen Mab scene perhaps the greatest orchestral scherzo ever composed, simply cannot fail to bring down the house, even when it is less sensitively done than the conductor did it yesterday, and it brought to a close another satisfying concert. The orchestra is out of town next week but returns on March 24 to do an Overture by Pi-ket, Strauss' "Don Quixote" with Samuel Mayes as cello soloist, and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. Richard Burgin will conduct. I forgot to mention above that Lukas Foss conducted his "Song of Anguish" and again revealed himself a conductor with authority, skill and finesse.

Lukas Foss Cantata at the Symphony

'Song of Anguish' Première With Composer on Podium

By Harold Rogers

Lukas Foss yesterday afternoon conducted the Boston Symphony in the première of his own work, "Song of Anguish," a Biblical cantata for baritone and orchestra. Marko Rothmüller was the soloist.

A composer is generally too realistic to expect immediate and worldwide approval of his work. All he asks is that his listeners give him an unbiased hearing. Without an open mind the concertgoer does an injustice both to the composer and to himself.

Compared to the music turned out by our contemporary extremists, Lukas Foss has created a rather conservative score, emphatically expressed, set to a text selected from the Book of Isaiah. The verses are chosen mainly from the fifth and sixth chapters, opening, "Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness," and closing, "Then said I, Lord, how long? And He answered, Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate."

Foss chose these verses, he said, because they are descriptive of our present-day problems. So it is natural that his [illegible] have an Old Testament flavor with modern-day [illegible] Chaotic conditions [illegible] prophesied were depicted [illegible] ally as already taking place.

Foss gave us more of a lamenting Jeremiah than an Isaiah. The moods were sometimes melancholic, often turbulent, but with doom pervading throughout. Though Isaiah has these characteristics, he is also one of the greatest optimists of the Old Testament. But there is no optimism in Foss's score. It is probable that in the allotted time he could do no more than paint a one-sided portrait.

What he did paint, however, was done with good, economical craftsmanship. There is no doubt that he said exactly what he intended to say. Mr. Rothmüller's interpretation was vocally fitting, pontifical in pose, dramatic in tone. His enunciation was not always clear.

Charles Munch opened the concert with a scintillant reading of Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro." The Mozart Symphony in G minor, No. 40, which came next, had a few negligible troubles in tempo (the Andante began a bit too fast), but was otherwise crisply done, eminently satisfying.

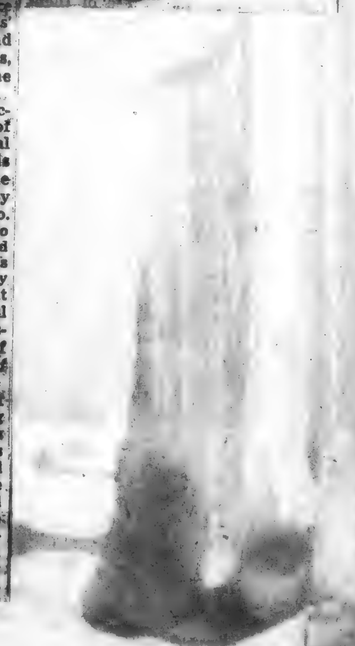
Last of all we heard three excerpts from Berlioz' Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"—the love scene in the Capulet garden, the Queen Mab scherzo, and the Capulet ball. Mr. Munch, who has so ably championed Berlioz this season, is giving us brilliant readings that impress us with the genius of this controversial figure, "the father of the modern orchestra."

In these excerpts particularly can one clearly see how Berlioz was paving the way for Wagner's harmonies and Tchaikovsky's sentiment. It is hard to believe that this music is now 111 years old. Berlioz was at least half a century ahead of his time.

results that are, in the main, impressive.

The conducting of the new work fell to the composer, who is no tyro at the business, and his fellow-members of the orchestra gave him all that [illegible]. Rothmuellen, a singer of [illegible] Slavian origin and Central European training, who has been in this country a little over a year, proved to be the ideal interpreter for Mr. Foss' music. His voice is powerful enough to be heard against Mr. Foss' elaborate (and resourceful) orchestration, yet caught the mood of the music, while the clarity of his diction was nothing short of extraordinary.

Mr. Munch did well by Mozart, if not quite as well as he had done by Haydn the week before. Berlioz's Love Scene might have been a shade more romantic, but the other excerpts came off splendidly. The "Queen Mab" Scherzo was gossamer-light and the ball at the Capulets' house turned out to be a very brilliant affair, the tumult on the stage provoking answering one in the auditorium.



MUSIC

Memorable Conducting by Munch at Symphony; New Cantata by Lukas Foss

By CYRUS DURGIN

Yesterday's Boston Symphony concert was memorable at beginning and end, and had its points of interest in the middle. To start, Charles Munch conducted two Mozart scores in performances of absolute beauty. They were the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and the "great" G minor Symphony (K. 550). To end, there were the purely symphonic excerpts from Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, wherein, to my mind, Mr. Munch achieved a triumph exceeding any he has so far enjoyed here. In the middle there was Lukas Foss' Biblical Cantata No. 1, "Song of Anguish," receiving first performance, with the composer conducting and baritone Marko Rothmueller making his Boston debut as soloist.

The "Romeo and Juliet" excerpts probably have not been done here so often as Berlioz' Fantastic" Symphony, "Harold in Italy," or perhaps even "The Damnation of Faust." More's the pity, for it is an even finer score than the "Fantastic" or "Harold in Italy," less obvious and musically more remarkable. Certainly it is on a par with "The Damnation of Faust."

With the love scene, the jewelled "Queen Mab" scherzo and the scene of Romeo alone, Berlioz excelled himself, not alone in the fineness of writing, but in his relatively controlled and certainly noble evocation of moods of passion, tenderness, melancholy. Elsewhere there is the familiar Berlioz genius for brilliant tone painting, such as the Capulets' Ball, but done with less strain than in either the "Fantastic" Symphony or "Harold in Italy."

Precisely these qualities were ever-present in Mr. Munch's spectacular performance, along with excitement that never became fury. Mr. Munch has not sought for what we used to call the "Koussevitzkyan" richness of tone, but yesterday the orchestra sounded just like that. The scherzo was fleet and light, and there were some species of antique cymbals for the effect that Berlioz desired. (In 1942, as I remember, there were no such instruments, for what reasons I cannot remember). And the Capulets' Ball had a blaze and radiance of passion and color that brought a great whoop of applause.

Mozart played with a somewhat reduced orchestra, and fared quite as well, with the essential differences of style. Everything was clear, and the peculiar blend of sadness and intensity which breathes out of the masterpiece was neither understated nor exaggerated. But the real point is that Mr. Munch finds just the right tempo.

"Song of Anguish," dating from 1945, I believe to be an experimental work of Lukas Foss. It is a setting of verses from Isaiah, and the general intention seems to be a dramatic proclamation, in the thundering moral indignation of the prophet. The score misses that, however, for while the orchestral writing has its merits, the voice part is colorless, a bit dull and it often is written in a curiously strained manner. Mr. Rothmueller semed to have a big voice, and he stood on a little platform, but from where I sat he could not always be heard above the instruments. The audience was cordial to both composer and soloist.

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y HERALD 3/10/50

Boston Symphony Will Play In Hub

Making its third appearance in Westchester, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Charles Munch, will play in the County Center Thursday evening.

CHARLES MUNCH

The concert, which is the fifth in the Mrs. Julian Olney Series, will include: Haydn — Symphony No. 104; three excerpts from Romeo and Juliet By Berlioz, and Beethoven's No. II — Symphony.

Munch assumed his new duties as conductor last Fall. When he first came to the United States from France in 1946, he made his initial appearance at the helm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a guest conductor. He has led the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra.

Munch founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra and in 1938 became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. Last Autumn he took the Orchestra Nationale de la Radiodiffusion Francaise on a good-will tour of America.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current Symphony program begins with Mozart (the "Figaro" overture and G minor Symphony) and ends with Berlioz (excerpts from the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony). Between these extremes, and they are extremes in more senses than one, comes Lukas Foss' "Song of Anguish," for baritone and orchestra in its first performances, with Marko Rothmueller as the soloist.

Mr. Foss has reverted to the practice of an early day. The writing of solo cantatas, as opposed to choral ones. His specialty, however, is Biblical cantatas. His second, the "Song of Songs," was introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky three years ago. The piece heard yesterday, and to be repeated tonight, was composed a year earlier, or when Mr. Foss was 23. The two works are completely different, and it seems to me that Mr. Foss has been more successful in finding suitable musical expression for the dire prophecies of Isaiah than for the raptures of Solomon.

The excerpt from the Book of Isaiah that he has chosen is a long one and he has reordered the words to suit his purpose. The text begins "Woe unto them that call evil good and good evil" and ends "And the land be utterly desolate," and all that lies between is in the same vein, as are the long orchestral prelude, the interludes and postlude. Mr. Foss set out to write a gloomy piece and he has done so with re-

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 15th concert of the 69th season of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. [illegible] Rothmueller, baritone, was the soloist. The program: Overture to "The [illegible] of Figaro" . . . Symphony in G minor [illegible] 550) . . . Mozart; "Song of Anguish" . . . Lukas Foss; excerpts from "Romeo and Juliet", Berlioz.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It is getting a little monotonous this reporting week after week that we've had another memorable symphony concert, but it seems to be clearer and clearer that Charles Munch, following the precept of Goethe, allows himself no careless days either in program or performance.

Yesterday it was Mozart and Berlioz with a new work by Lukas Foss for good measure, and on the whole I should say that it was a good measure. For it is becoming increasingly evident that this 28-year-old composer, who as the pianist of the Boston Symphony has both a security and a working atmosphere few composers have ever enjoyed, is capable of bigger things once he finds the proper creative credo.

Like so many American composers, whose musical vocabulary is enormous but whose theology is written word. Where [illegible] American composers have [illegible] to Sandburg or Lincoln or Jefferson or any number of other grass roots philosophers, Mr. Foss—who has also found inspiration in Sandburg—here leans heavily on a Biblical subject, and a desperately gloomy subject at that. The result was pretty much a bore, muddled (and this seems to be the generation of muddled ideologies in every field), he seems overly preoccupied in the stimulation of the if not exactly a failure. This beating of breast, tearing of hair and pouring of ashes upon the head with all its attendant wailing is unseemly for a man of his age.

The result as music, however, was a brilliant success, and it is the music that here really concerns us. For Mr. Foss has found a means of orchestral expression that is remarkably right and appropriate for this day and age. He is entirely uninfluenced by the Boulanger style of wrung-dry counterpoint in the dissonantly linear fashion. He has found an essentially melodic style that is tonal but explorative. It evokes an original musical world of its own that seems a natural extension of the world created by Mahler. It has movement, which is to say it has powerful rhythmic impulse without the motorical fussiness of, say Milhaud. It is uniform in character and individual without any eccentricity. It creates atmosphere and is always expressive, exploiting the instruments of the orchestra but never over-exploiting them idiosyncratically. It is, in fine, music of imagination and real creative urgency.

Until the voice enters in this particular piece, it is on its way; the voice and the words destroy it, for here it enters a more competitive world. When somebody is shouting "woe—woe—woe!" at you, and Mr. Rothmueller's style is more declamatory than musical—it makes no difference how fine the music before it is, it just doesn't come over.

I thought for a while that a tenor voice might have been more effective, for the orchestral line in this work nearly always doubles the voice and covers it to some extent, but it seems more likely that it is the subject matter itself that throws this otherwise beautiful work out of gear. Henceforth I hope Mr. Foss will seek a purely musical inspiration for orchestral works as his gift is too great to want collaboration, even Isaiah's.

I find Mr. Munch's touch with Mozart something extraordinary. His differentiation of the poles apart character of the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and the great G minor Symphony was masterly; for the one it was all wit, verve and sparkle; for the other it was of the heart, never lugubrious or despairing, never labored or sententious. Tragedy is read into this work by musical commentators, but Mr. Munch understands that it is not tragic at all in a personal sense, but in a world sense; and more in sorrow than in anger at that.

The Berlioz, containing as it does in the Queen Mab scene perhaps the greatest orchestral scherzo ever composed, simply cannot fail to bring down the house, even when it is less sensitively done than the conductor did it yesterday, and it brought to a close another satisfying concert. The orchestra is out of town next week but returns on March 24 to do an Overture by Pick, Strauss' "Don Quixote" with Samuel Mayes as cello soloist, and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. Richard Burgin will conduct. I forgot to mention above that Lukas Foss conducted his "Song of Anguish" and again revealed himself a conductor with authority, skill and finesse.

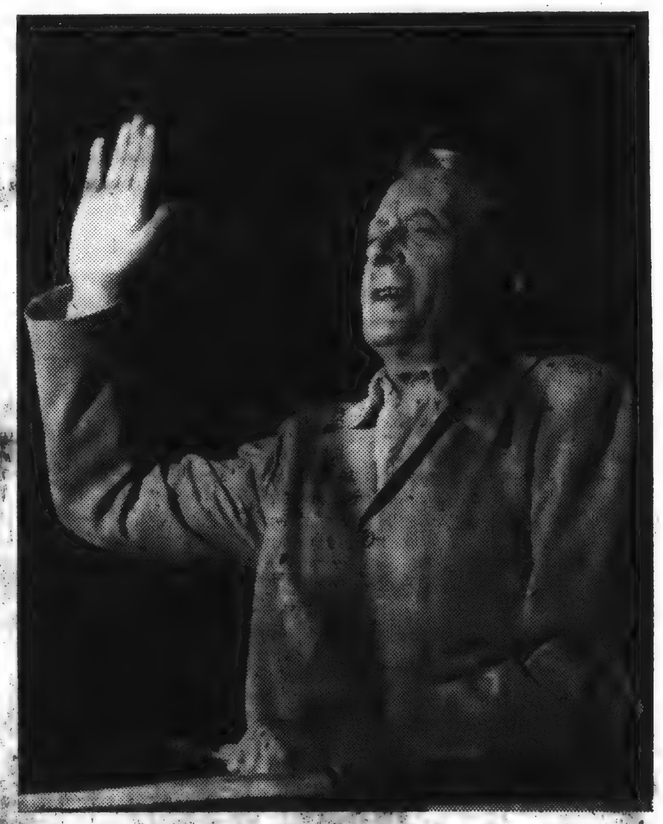
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 12 1950

'CANDID CONDUCTOR

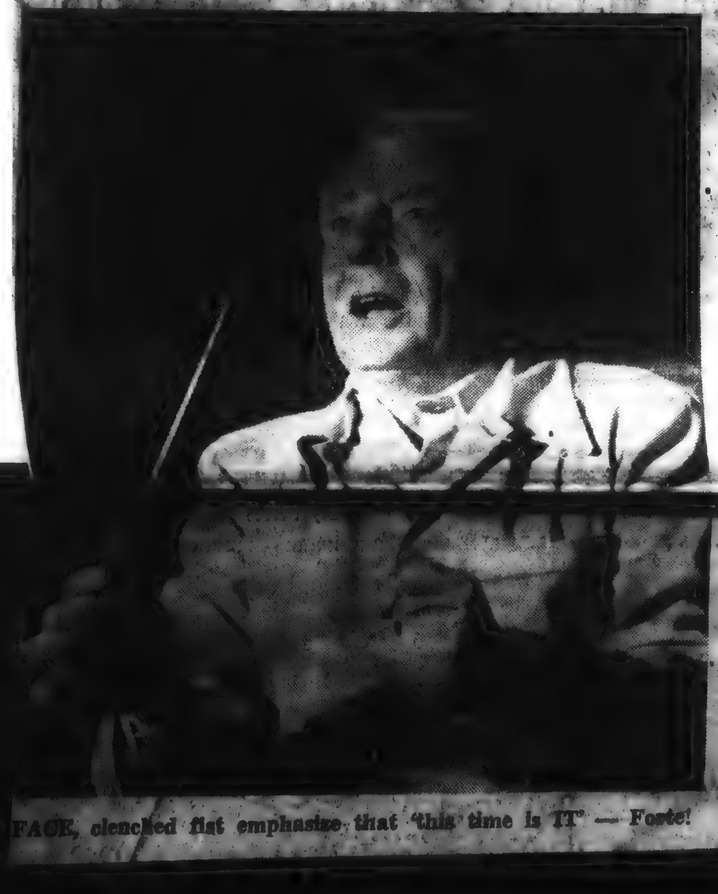
Charles Munch's Aversion To Be Photographed Led To These Remarkable, Unposed Stroblight Pictures Taken By Gilbert Friedberg At Rehearsal Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra Which Will Perform At Woolsey Hall On Tuesday

MUNCH is genial as he signals for "attention" prior to the downbeat.

SMILE gives way to concentration; left arm is commanding.

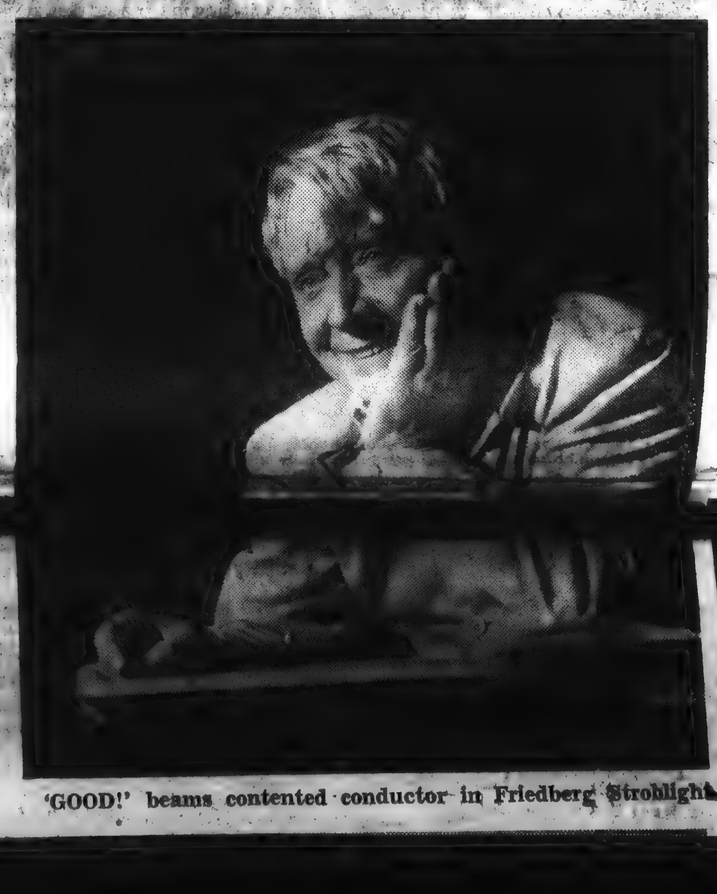


'NO', he growls, halting orchestra with traffic cop wave.



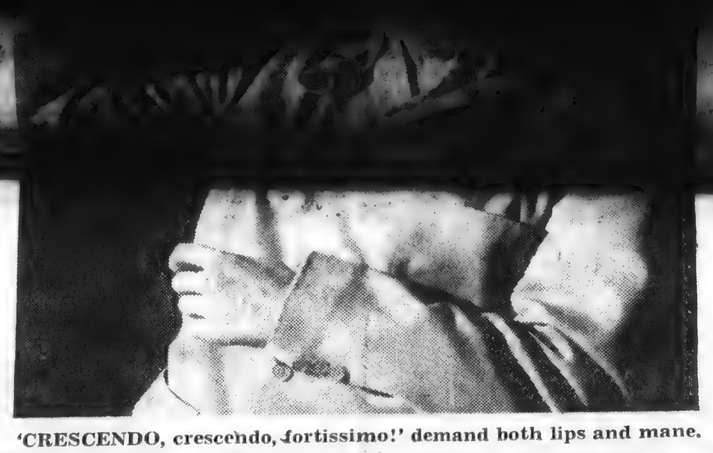
FACE, clenched fist emphasize that 'this time is IT' — Forte!

'CRESCENDO, crescendo, fortissimo!' demand both lips and mane.

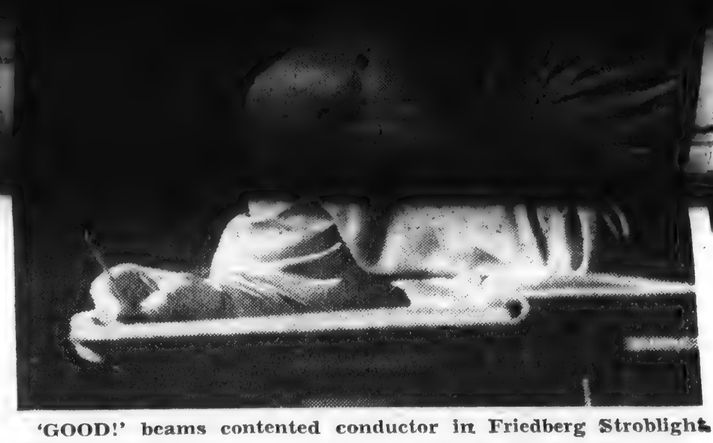


'GOOD!' beams contented conductor in Friedberg Stroblight

FACE, clenched fist emphasize that 'this time is IT' — Forte!



'CRESCENDO, crescendo, fortissimo!' demand both lips and mane.



'GOOD!' beams contented conductor in Friedberg Stroblight.

OFFSTAGE, in a John Brook photo, Mr. Munch thoughtfully reconsiders a score.

IN Woolsey Hall, leading Boston Symphony, Charles Munch is capable of looking as restrained as this—sometimes.

Music, Theater — Novelties Fron

Odd Concerto

The Ondes Martenot is an electronic instrument invented 22 years ago by Maurice Martenot. It has captivated the imagination of France's leading composers. Oliver Messiaen, Darius Milhaud, Arthur Honegger, Florent Schmitt, Jacques Ibert, and Charles Koechlin have written for it.

The Martenot has a clavier seven octaves long. Slightly below and to the left of the clavier are a dozen buttons, similar to organ stops, which control the various timbres of the instrument. This panel also accommodates a lever which, in effect, serves the Martenot as a bow serves a violin—that is, it controls the attack, release, phrasing, and dynamics.

The instrument is capable of a wide range of timbres. Besides those to which the western ear is cultivated, the Ondes Martenot can produce Tibetan, Indian, Cambodian, and Japanese effects, some of which are percussive in nature.

By Emile Vuillermoz

PARIS

AMONG RECENT musical events of varying quality, we have been favored with an experience which stands out from the usual run: a Concerto for Ondes Martenot and orchestra by André Jolivet. It was an event of some importance.

Progress in the musical art has always been conditioned by progress in instruments. It is not the composers who create new musical tools so as to express themselves with more eloquence; it is the manufacturers of instruments who imagine and produce more and more ingenious sound machines.

Primitive man, in the cave age, must quickly have discovered the pleasure of percussion, either clapping his hands in time, or beating out a rhythm with his foot on the ground, or knocking two pieces of flint or of hollow wood together. This is the drummer's equipment which historically must have preceded all other orchestral instruments.

Later the murmurs of breezes, or the whistling of a storm through a narrow orifice, must have made curious seekers turn toward wood instruments. A hollow bone, a hollow reed, enabled an ingenious artisan to obtain all sorts of harmonious sighs by taming human breath and compressing it through a tube. The wind instrument section was thus born.

Finally, one fine day, a hunter, listening to the odd moan of his bowstring when an arrow was loosed, discovered what could be done with this nervous vibration. And so string instruments found their originator.

Since then, from century to century, these three families have been perfected, and have remained the essential elements of our great orchestral formations, and the history of composition has followed step by step that of the production of the machine tools that have hollowed out and made use of sound phenomena and revealed the secrets of a more and more knowledgeable sound architecture. Thus the different methods of using a metallic string in the lute, the harp, the spinet, the harpsichord, and the grand piano created, between the sixteenth and twentieth centuries, harmonic styles that became more and more subtle.

The invention of a new instrument is a factor the consequences of which may have capital meaning. This is why we must salute the official entry of "wave" instruments into our symphonic concerts. Here they are, represented by their first concerto. This is not a masterpiece of composition. Mr. Jolivet has not found immediately the style and accent that suit this strange voice, made up of caresses and sobs, whose possibilities have yet to be fully exploited.

John Brook

Ginette Martenot and Her Brother, Maurice Martenot, Inventor of the Ondes Martenot, Electronic Musical Instrument. A Concerto for Martenot and Orchestra by Andre Jolivet Has Recently Been Performed in Paris

Arthur Honegger, in his "Jeanne d'Arc au Bûcher," was able to use waves with much skill, but his example was not followed. This great supernatural cry that comes from everywhere and from nowhere seems to emanate from a natural force and not from a man-made instrument. It is a sort of tamed whirlwind. It is therefore not easy to find a style adapted to its function.

Here we see how the instrument guides creative thought. "Musical waves" await the man who will make them speak their real language.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
MAR 15 1950

Last Night's Concert

By E. C. R.

Boston Symphony Ends Season In Woolsey Hall

The seventh and final concert in the Woolsey Hall Concert Series was heard last night in Woolsey Hall. The second appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, this season was a memorable one. Never has there been a director who has put himself more completely into his work than this man so reminiscent of his predecessor, Serge Koussevitsky. Evidence of his prodigious memory was manifest in that he used no score for either of the Haydn works presented before the intermission, or for the Brahms Symphony later in the program. And so intent did he become in this latter presentation that he at one time stepped right off the podium, while later he caught himself on a music stand just in the nick of time.

The Overture of "L'Isola Disabitata" was the opening selection by Haydn, a score rich in musical treatment. Haydn's "Symphony in D Major, No. 104" was the last of his compositions, beautiful, with its gaiety expressing love of life. This symphony was influenced by church music, reflecting Haydn's peasant religious background.

Guest artist was petite, blond, and beautiful Nicole Henriot, piano soloist. Looking exceptionally frail in her white chiffon dress, featuring a high neck and long sleeves, with a huge pleated skirt, this young lady proved to be pleasing to the eye as well as to the ear. Her animation and vigor combined with speed and brilliance to give a dramatic and expressive presentation. Her performance had a big dynamic framework suited to the French character of the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, written by Ravel.

This work exemplified Ravel's concept of the Concerto as an entertaining display piece. It is a gay and brilliant work, with the piano well in the foreground, and its virtuoso gymnastics of the most tasteful variety. It is filled with delicate grace, ironic verve and a secret tenderness. At times it seemed almost weird, with harp, percussion and woodwinds all displaying themselves with florid coloratura runs. The French horn offered a gay and gracious solo, with a finale borrowed from jazz in moderation. This talented artist was called back six times to take her justly deserved acclaim and approval.

After intermission the Orchestra presented Symphony in E Minor, Op. 98, containing more of pure scholarship and austere intellectual spirit than Brahms' other symphonies. It opened in a naive childlike spirit, with voices of different pitch calling to each other. This was followed by a more triumphant character, with an agumentative stram. The slow movement was most beautiful, with horns and woodwind offering romantic mood. A broad chorale was played by the cellos through a soft tracery of orchestral pattern, with repetitions beautifully decorated with instrumental coloring making a most effective ending.

The audience was most reluctant to permit this final concert to come to an end, and called the popular conductor back again and again to receive his just acclaim.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 12 1950

KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTS IN ISRAEL

By PETER GRADENWITZ

TEL-AVIV

WHEN Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, on the second night of his first visit to Israel, entered the concert hall of the Israel Philharmonic to listen to a subscription concert, the men of the orchestra and the audience sprang to their feet and gave the long-awaited maestro a rousing, minute-long ovation.

Moreover, the orchestra played Beethoven's "Eroica," which had been given a good workaday rendering on previous nights, with so spirited a performance that the sympathetic, youthful guest conductor from France, M. Charles Bruck, was astonished.

Top Form

A week later, Mr. Koussevitzky stepped on the platform to take over. To most listeners it seemed as if a completely different orchestra was playing under him. The strings had regained their beautiful warmth and sensuousness of tone for which the orchestra was rightly famous in former years, and the winds were on the top of their form.

The incredible youthfulness of the maestro and the enthusiastic response the men gave him were soon transmitted to the audience. Only Toscanini had had such an ovation as Koussevitzky got, with Leonard Bernstein a close follower in the favor of the Israeli public.

Mr. Koussevitzky had chosen two Russian symphonies for his first appearance, the Prokofieff Fifth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth; his following concert, which culminated in Debussy's "La Mer," included Bach's Third Suite, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Mussorgsky's "Khovanchina" prelude.

The Koussevitzky concerts began the second half of a hitherto none-too-eventful season, in which Paul Paray led stirring performances of virtuoso pieces of hackneyed music and mediocre renderings of classical works, and George Singer, Tel-Aviv batonist, excelled in a program of unfamiliar music including Janacek's Sinfonietta, Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony and two concert arias splendidly sung by soprano Josefa Schocken.

Two major Israeli works received their world premières in the frame of these concerts: Oedoen Partos' "Song of Praise" for viola and orchestra, superbly played by the composer himself, and P. Ben-Haim's Piano Concerto, with Frank Pelleg first-rate in the solo part.

"Song of Praise" is surely the most impressive symphonic composition to come thus far from an Israeli composer. It consists of a solemn and meditative prelude and a variation movement in sonata form, all based on one theme.

Concerto

Ben-Haim's Piano Concerto consists of three movements, entitled "Voices in the Night," "Vision" and "Dance." The somewhat long first movement is followed by a beautifully poetic slow movement, while the finale has a typical oriental, Eastern Mediterranean character.

Other local works played in the Philharmonic concerts were Yizhaq Edel's Capriccio and Dance and Marc Lavry's Israeli Dances.

There is much activity in the local I. M. C. M. groups, particularly after the rebirth of the Jerusalem branch, which opened with a combined orchestral-and-chamber program with music by Honegger, Bartók and the Jerusalem conductor-composer Arthur Gelbrun.

The Tel-Aviv Museum concerts presented ordinary fare, with only Frank Pelleg's Bach offerings and Klari Szarvas-Weissgerber's harp chamber music evenings as outstanding events.

Soloists

A visiting soloist, who appeared in recital and symphony, was Ida Haendel. Paul Loyonnet, the fine French pianist, payed a return visit, and the Italian pianist, Sangiorgi, gave some recitals. But hardly any event in the recital field gave so much pleasure as the evenings offered by the duo-pianists Vitya Vronsky and Victor Babin.

The opera, which had reached an acceptable standard some years ago, has deteriorated so much lately that its management has decided not to admit the local and foreign press to its performances any more, since the writers had been unanimous in their condemnation of its standard and repertoire.

The Israel Ministry of Education and Culture has appointed Mr. Pelleg, pianist, harpsichordist and educator, to serve as head of its music department. Mr. Pelleg is to form an advisory council, which will consist of the leading figures among composers, educators and musicologists.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 1

Munch Wins Great Ovation at Bushnell

Charles Munch and a changed Boston Symphony Orchestra took Hartford by storm last night.

It was a performance the Bushnell audience will long remember, for there were historic aspects to this debut of the French conductor who has taken over a musical organization Serge Koussevitsky had built into an almost perfect machine.

From the time Mr. Munch lifted his baton and converted what usually is played as a Haydn museum piece into a fresh, vibrant composition, there was no doubt the evening would produce excitement, dramatics and showmanship.

* * *

THAT'S WHAT Mr. Munch gave to a stirred audience with such vigor, intensity and theatricality as to earn him one of the heartiest ovations ever given to a new conductor here.

One performance is inadequate for a final impression either of the scope of the conductor's talents or of his effect on the orchestra. But, it was clear last night that a new and striking musical personality now ruled the famous Boston orchestra and that it had taken on something of the characteristics of the leader.

Gone was the stylization that comes to all orchestras once they reach their peak under discipline of a conductor whose methods and readings through the years had become theirs. Heard last night was a more sprightly and at times, bouncy orchestra, responding with a verve and enthusiasm to every gesture of the leader.

* * *

MUSICIANS may disagree as to whether this readjusted orchestra has been altered for the best. But, it gave a performance unsurpassed in virtuosity, both of the players and the conductor.

Haydn's Symphony in D Major, No. 104, became a lively, invigorated and refreshing work. Berlioz's Excerpts from Romeo and Juliet brought Shakespeare to the podium, with Mr. Munch making the most of the theatrical themes.

The Queen Mab movement's haunting eeriness showed the orchestra at its best. And the histrionics of the Great Feast of the Capulets pulled the audience out of its collective seat.

* * *

MR. MUNCH'S showmanship reached its heights in Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 3, in C Minor, with Edouard Nies-Berger, organist of the New York Philharmonic, at the organ.

The trombone at times matched the peals of the organ in this thundering piece which, like its predecessors, tingled the spine and climaxed a thoroughly exciting evening.

The Boston orchestra has always given as nearly perfect a performance as possible. Hartford never failed to enjoy its achievements.

* * *

LAST NIGHT the audience knew this famous musical organization had adjusted itself and liked what was happening to it. It played with a dash, a gusto and an esprit that could mean only that it had attuned itself to this tall, graying European who was bringing romanticism and showmanship to it.

The players and the conductor were enjoying themselves as they romped over the entire field of musical patterns, from soft, delicate motifs to the blaring crescendo of organ and trombone.

M. B.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
MAR 16 1950

Boston Gives Final Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Shades of a waning season came with the Boston Symphony's final Wednesday concert in Carnegie Hall last night. For it Charles Munch provided the first New York performance of William Schuman's concerto for violin and orchestra with Isaac Stern as soloist. Haydn opened and Saint-Saens closed the program.

A new Schuman shone through the concerto. Though he hit the old sawdust trail at the start, he followed it into Green Pastures. The arid measures of the first movement gave way finally in the long violin cadenza to more persuasive music. The "interlude" became a personal utterance. The finale reflected definite inspiration.

This is a violinist's piece. Schuman gives play to every facet of the instrument. His rhythmic melodies do not appeal quite so much as the more sustained lines, but the singing quality of the violin is nicely juxtaposed to the virtuoso element in violin playing.

Only a first-class violinist could cope with all demands. Stern achieved some distinguished playing, especially in catching the rhapsodic quality of the music.

The introspective character of the slow movement came as a surprise. Something must have moved the composer deeply, for this interlude is quite communicative. It is sad music with a melancholic tinge, rather beautifully spun out of the violin and the wood winds.

The program opened with an unfamiliar Haydn overture "L'Isola Disalitata" and the Symphony in D, No. 104. Munch drew some lovely textured sound from the orchestra especially in the andante of the symphony and gave a stately performance of the minuet. The finale fell a bit short of full realization of the "spirit" of Haydn.

Saint-Saens' Third Symphony fell happily on the ear. Not only did its easy-flowing melodies brighten up the atmosphere of the concert but they toned up the playing of the orchestra.

Munch conducted with loving care, ably assisted by Edward Nies-Berger at the organ. If one missed a certain sharp urgency and pointing up here and there during some of the concert, the performance of the Saint-Saens transformed everything in the brilliance of its coda.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAR 16 1950

Music

Stern Excels In New U. S. Violin Score

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Young Isaac Stern gave a brilliant send-off to William Schuman's new violin concerto with the visiting Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night.

With Charles Munch pacing the performance as if every note of the concerto throbbed with life, the gifted fiddler rose to new heights of technical and expressive power in one of the snaggiest scores ever composed on either side of the Atlantic.

This is a kind of Isaac Stern week(for the 29-year-old virtuoso will have been featured soloist in and out of New York every day through Sunday. After four days of his bowing marathon, Mr. Stern was still going at his strongest last night.

Has Tricky Hurdles.

Mr. Schuman certainly gave him a job to do. The concerto bristles with tricky hurdles all the way; there are intervallic leaps that call for trapeze-jumping fingers. A fast sequence towards the end would crack anybody's knuckles but young Stern's.

The crowd didn't take very kindly to the score last night, which was understandable. It isn't the kind of music that can be gulped down at will. It makes few compromises in melodic style, and on the score of harmony and rhythm it gives no quarter at all.

It is strong music, however, tightly put together, and varicolored in orchestration. There are tough places where the violin tries to unroll a carpet of melody under a mass of weighty furniture. That Mr. Stern succeeded is to his credit, rather than to Mr. Schuman's. I'd like to hear this score again.

Confident Conducting.

Mr. Munch conducted the novelty as if there was no doubt in his mind that here at last was an American violin concerto worth pitting against anything of the kind Europe had to offer today. Mr. Stern didn't exactly remove that doubt.

Other listings included Haydn's "L'Isola Disabitata" overture and D Major Symphony (No. 104), and Saint-Saens' C Minor Symphony —with Edouard Nies-Berger joining the orchestra as solo organist in what amounted to a new lease on life for the underrated French classic.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
MAR 14 1950

Conductor Hailed For Performance

Muench Is Warmly Applauded for Work In Bushnell Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Muench, was presented in the Bushnell Symphonic Series at the Memorial auditorium Monday night. The program:

Symphony In D Major, No. 104 Haydn
Excerpts, "Romeo and Juliet" Berlioz
Symphony No. 3, in C Minor Saint-Saens
Edouard Nies-Berger, Organist

When Charles Muench finally left the stage of the Bushnell last night, there could not possibly have been any doubt in his mind but that Hartford concertgoers had accepted him as a worthy successor to the great and good doctor, Serge Koussevitzky.

In a city where the coming of the former conductor of the Boston Symphony was annually regarded as an Olympian visitation, the first appearance of the orchestra's new head had long been looked forward to with curiosity. The enormous applause bestowed on Mr. Muench at the end of last evening's concert made quite plain that his musicmaking, as the Boston's latest imperator, will be received here as legal tender as long as he gives such enormous performances as this his first.

Mr. Muench is a man of moderate tallness, solid and with graying hair. His large hands cut loose figures in the air with a tremendous, galvanic vigor that jerks him continually to his toes and causes his hair to rise like an agitated crest. He watches every section of his orchestra like a hawk, pointing a long arm and finger at any individual player whose services he needs, and rewarding good playing with a warm and ready smile.

Flair For the Showy.

Easily the most marked characteristic of Mr. Muench's musicmaking, both in the reading and the performance, is its intensity. This was apparent in the burning tone, the drive, the great rhythmic vitality all across last night's program. And there was no better evidence that the program itself. No conductor would pile the ornateness of Saint-Saens on the gaudiness of Berlioz, if he did not have a love for flamboyant music. Perhaps Mr. Muench was only trying to knock our hats off with such perfervid, high-Romantic fare, because it was his first appearance here. But the huge zeal with which he played the two works certainly also bespoke a conductor who has a predilection for rich, dramatic, showy concertizing, as well as a great flair for it.

This was also indicated, in a less happy way and a negative one, in Mr. Muench's unrewarding excursion into Haydn, with which the evening opened. The conductor gave Haydn two left feet, both with wooden shoes on. It was dull, stomping Haydn, made tasteless by the very intensity and zeal which were to be employed by Mr. Muench so effectively and so properly, in the "Romeo and Juliet" excerpts and the "Organ" Symphony.

Vivid, Not Refined.

Of a piece with the picturesqueness which Mr. Muench draws from a score is the vehement rather than refined performance which he solicits. For while Dr. Koussevitzky was a great hand at showy musicmaking himself, the former Boston conductor exacted far greater precision of playing than Mr. Muench accepted last evening. Certainly the latter does not have to tolerate a nightful of such coarse performance. The Boston Symphony always has played fine as silk. So it seems plain that what Mr. Muench wants first and foremost is the vivid, rather than the polished effect. Well, the Boston players can give him that too. But it came as a jolt last night to those who all their musical life had heard the orchestra in its former, vast refinement.

This lack of refinement, both of playing and of spirit, was what made the Haydn graceless and tedious. But the gusty grandeurs of the big moments in the Saint-Saens, and in so handsomely reinforced by Edouard Nies-Berger, the Berlioz, the caressing subduction of the tenderer sections of each, and the great vividness of Mr. Muench's skills as a whole, are going a long way, in fact already went a long way last night, to make the Boston's new leader a tremendously stimulating and effective conductor.

—T.H.P.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST HOME NEWS
MAR 16 1950

Music...

Isaac Stern Plays Schuman Concerto

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The perplexities of the modern world are constantly finding an outlet in musical expression and William Schuman's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, performed for the first time in New York last night, is a good example. There are portions of tranquility in this music, too, and the "Interlude" (andantino) remains serene for a considerable time. But for the most part the work expresses a disturbed, unresolved anxiety.

Isaac Stern, who, besides being one of our greatest fiddlers, is probably the most energetic of them all, performed the work in collaboration with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Charles Munch conducted the concert which represented the fifth Wednesday night visit of the Bostonians to New York this season.

Mr. Stern gave the work a beautifully modulated performance, tonally rich and suave, and replete with sensitivity and nuance. Mr. Munch and his ensemble supplied the utmost in support. Actually the orchestral fabric is of prime importance and the solo instrument sings as a part of it, never as a virtuoso voice going off on its own tangent.

Schuman's concerto, like a jet-propelled plane, has plenty of impact. Where it drives is hard to tell on first hearing. Its content appears to be more pure energy than inspired thought. But what the composer says provoked my intellectual curiosity to the point of being eager for another hearing. An involved composition of this kind needs to be heard more than once in order to really sink in.

Saint-Saens Symphony No. 3 in C Minor for orchestra and organ completed the program which opened with a Haydn overture and the composer's Symphony in D Major, No. 104.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 16 1950

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

Fifth concert of the New York evening series; conductor, Charles Munch; soloist, Isaac Stern, violinist. The program:

Overture to "L'Isola Disabitata".....Haydn
Symphony No. 104, in D major.....Haydn
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra
William Schuman
First New York performance
Symphony No. 3, in C minor, Op. 78
Saint-Saens
Organist, Edouard Nies-Berger

Bostonian's Finale

William Schuman's violin concerto was the novelty in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert of its 1949-'50 evening series in Carnegie Hall, where Charles Munch began the program with two works of Haydn and closed it with the third symphony of Camille Saint-Saens. The soloist yesterday for the first performance of the new concerto in the composer's native city was Isaac Stern, who had played it for the first time in public with Mr. Munch's orchestra in Boston on Feb. 10.

In this concerto, Mr. Schuman has been particularly successful in producing an idiom which is lyric and contemporary; the long-breathed theme which occupied a considerable part of the first movement has a generous melodic line, but does not suggest romantic retrospectiveness. He is unusually discerning in his scoring and his general treatment of the solo instrument; the orchestra is not only an accompanist, but the violin is usually in the foreground; the violinist is not called upon to strive against odds.

Up to the cadenza, the first movement gives a sense of saliency and continuity, as well as of variety of mood. This sense of continuity is dispelled to some extent in the cadenza which, while an effective vehicle for technical virtuosity, seems to mark a halt in the unfolding of Mr. Schuman's musical ideas. The lightly scored second movement is consistently melodic in character, and effectively contrasted with the scherzo-like character of the opening of the finale; here the delicacy of the scoring for the violin is strikingly combined with unusual and imaginative use of wind timbres. The rest is generally brusquer, more episodic and, at a first hearing, less communicative, but the work as a whole, despite some unevenness, is a ponderable contribution to modern concerto literature. Mr. Stern's playing was admirable both on technical and interpretative grounds, and especially in its impression of entire comprehension of the composer's style and intentions. The tone had consistent volume, clarity and color.

Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave the unfamiliar Haydn operatic overture a reading that was both forthright and clearly wrought, with due expressive contrast between the agitated mood of the allegro and the serenity of the intervening allegretto near the close. The performance of the Haydn symphony in D major, No. 104, known as the "London" symphony, was full toned and spirited, but not lacking in lucidity and nuance. For reasons of time, the reviewer had to miss the latter half of the Saint-Saens symphony; the interpretation of the first movement, with Edouard Nies-Berger playing the organ, emphasized the best points of the often eloquent while variable score in a brilliant and well integrated performance which also told of the virtuosity of the orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 16 1950

STERN THE SOLOIST IN SCHUMAN WORK

Violinist Appears With Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall Playing New Concerto

William Schuman's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, a sincere, moving, original work, received its first New York performance last night at Carnegie Hall at the hands of those who offered its première recently in Boston—the soloist Isaac Stern and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch.

It cannot be said that the audience was especially enthusiastic, but it listened to the half-hour work with intense interest, and the concerto won enough adherents to sustain the applause while the composer, the conductor and the soloist came out for three bows.

Whether the work is a complete artistic success, or whether it will win its way into the repertoire are matters that remain to be seen. But there can be no questioning that it is an honest attempt to give expression to the perceptions of an intensely musical man who is sensitive both in the susceptibility of his feelings and in his external responses to his environment.

One of the factors that may have troubled some listeners was that there were many passages when there seemed to be little relationship between the music the soloist was playing and what was going on in the orchestra behind him. But it seemed the very point of the concerto that there should be disparity between the opposed forces.

Pretty clearly the concerto was a study of the individual, as represented by the solo violin, to maintain his integrity and balance—his personal music, so to speak—in the face of a harsh and often overbearing surrounding milieu.

That milieu seemed to be the large, twentieth-century city. Mr. Schuman is too sophisticated a musician, and too individual an auditor, to be interested in reproducing the common noises of the city. But surely some of the sounds of the second movement must have been suggested by tugboat whistles and one got the impression of factory whistles in the finale.

It was in the more lyrical second movement that the violin part and the accompaniment seemed most in sympathy. But there were passages elsewhere of union, for while the individual may often be in opposition to his environment he is also molded by the same forces that create it.

Mr. Stern played t. work with complete conviction and intense personal feeling. Its technical difficulties and the difficulties of coordination with so original an orchestral setting did not seem to trouble him. He had the skill to surmount them as an accepted part of his interpretation. Even those who were cool about the work itself stepped up the applause when Mr. Munch and Mr. Schuman insisted that the violinist stand out alone for the third bow.

The other selections on the program were more conventional. To start with there were two Haydn works, the overture to his opera "L'Isola Disabitata" and the London Symphony in D major, No. 104. Neither were given especially distinguished readings. But Mr. Munch and the orchestra, assisted by Edouard Nies-Berger at the organ really gave a rousing performance of Saint-Saens' Third Symphony, which may not be great music, but which at least is seldom heard and which makes a fine show-piece for a virtuoso orchestra.

R. P.

OSSINING, N. Y.
CITIZEN-REGISTER
MAR 17 1950

3,500 Hear Boston Symphony Orchestra In White Plains

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, presented a thrilling concert before an audience of 3,500 in White Plains last night. The program was the fifth event in the Mrs. Julian Olney concert series.

Mr. Munch opened his program with a delightful reading of the Haydn Symphony in D Major, No. 104. All of the spontaneity and gayety of this music was emphasized, without losing sight of its gracefully lyric vein. The lucid orchestration was evident in every note. At times there was a soft tenderness to his interpretations-almost a wistful quality, and in contrast, a wonderfully virile statement of dramatic material. While the symphony as a whole was played gently, and with rather a lilting quality, Mr. Munch never failed to make the most of harmonic and contrapintal richness in the score.

The most exciting interpretation of the evening was that accorded excerpts from "Romeo and Juliet" by Berlioz. Mr. Munch included the "Love Scene," which Berlioz himself described as the best piece of writing he had ever done. Certainly it is enchanted music, with soft sensuous melodies and a delicacy and purity of expression. Mr. Munch's quiet control of his orchestra had breathtaking results.

The "Queen Mab" scherzo which followed, revealed Berlioz's orchestration at its very best. Mr. Munch demonstrated with the greatest skill the composer's wizardry in this field. It was a sensitive and magical interpretation, in which Mr. Munch was able to spin a dazzling gossamer web of irridescent hues which resulted in complete enchantment.

The program also included the sections "Romeo Alone," "Melancholy," "Concert and Ball," and "Great Feast at the Capulets." The sparkling gaiety of the dance themes and the festive quality of this music, provided interesting contrast to the pensive mood which had preceded it. It was a remarkable performance.

Mr. Munch closed his program with the Beethoven Symphony No. 7 in A Major. It was a captivating reading which highlighted the rhythmic contrasts, melodic beauty, and dramatic harmonic treatment. Under Mr. Munch's baton, the music fairly danced along—capricious or solemn, as the case might be. He is quick to realize the utmost potentialities of the score, and there is not a note which escaped his careful scrutiny and evaluation. He performs this task with a sensitive understanding of the inner meaning of the music and the results he achieves are wonderful testimonies to his love and devotion to his art.

PORTCHESTER, N. Y.
ITEM
MAR 17 1950

Boston Symphony Heard By 3,500 At County Center

By RUTH K. NOLAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, presented a thrilling concert before an audience of 3500 in White Plains last night. The program was the fifth event in the Mrs. Julian Olney concert series.

Mr. Munch opened his program with a delightful reading of the Haydn Symphony in D Major, No. 104. All of the spontaneity and gayety of this music was emphasized, without losing sight of its gracefully lyric vein. The lucid orchestration was evident in every note. At times there was a soft tenderness to his interpretations-almost a wistful quality, and in contrast, a wonderfully virile statement of dramatic material. While the symphony as a whole was played gently, and with rather a lilting quality, Mr. Munch never failed to make the most of harmonic and contrapintal richness in the score.

The most exciting interpretation of the evening was that accorded exeerpts from "Romeo and Juliet" by Berlioz. Mr. Munch included the "Love Scene," which Berlioz himself described as the best piece of writing he had ever done. Certainly it is enchanted music, with soft sensuous melodies and a delicacy and purity of expression. Mr. Munch's quiet control of his orchestra had breathtaking results.

The "Queen Mab" scherzo which followed, revealed Berlioz's orchestration at its very best. Mr. Munch demonstrated with the greatest skill the composer's wizardry in this field. It was a sensitive and magical interpretation, in which Mr. Munch was able to spin a dazzling gossamer web of irridescent hues which resulted in complete enchantment.

The program also included the sections "Romeo Alone," "Melancholy,'3' "Conert and Ball," and "Great Feast at the Capulets." The sparkling gaiety of the dance themes and the festive quality of this music, provided interesting contrast to the pensive mood which had preceded it. It was a remarkable performance.

Mr. Munch closed his program with the Beethoven Symphony N 7 in A Major. It was a captivating reading which highlighted the rhythmic contrasts, melodic beauty, and dramatic harmonic treatment. Under Mr. Munh's baton, the musi fcairly danced along—capricious or solemn, as the case might be. He is quick to realize the utmost potentialities of the score, and there is not a note which escaped his careful scrutiny and evaluation. He performs this task with a sensitive understanding of the inner meaning of the music and the results he achieves are wonderful testimonies to his love and devotion to his art.

[97]

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
REPORTER-DISPATCH

Berlioz' Wizardry Shown By Boston Symphony Orchestra

By RUTH K. NOLAN

[illegible] program was [illegible] Mrs. Julian Olney [illegible] opened his program [illegible] reading of the [illegible] in D Major, [illegible] of the spontaneity [illegible] music was em[illegible] losing sight of [illegible] The lucid [illegible] was evident [illegible] Mr. Munch [illegible] soft tenderness [illegible] almost [illegible] quality, and in contrast, [illegible] statement of [illegible] drama. While the sym[illegible] a whole was played [illegible] with a rather lilting [illegible] Mr. Munch never failed [illegible] the most of harmonic [illegible] contrapintal richness in the [illegible]

[illegible] most exciting interpreta[illegible]n was that accorded the "Ex[illegible]s from Romeo and Juliet," [illegible] Symphony, Opus 17 by [illegible]. Mr. Munch included the [illegible] Scene," which Berlioz him[illegible] described as the best piece [illegible] he had ever done. Cer[illegible] is enchanting music, with [illegible] sensuous melodies and a [illegible] and purity of expression [illegible] symbolic of young love. Mr. [illegible]'s quiet control of his or[illegible]stra resulted in breathtaking results.

The "Queen Mab" scherzo which followed revealed Berlioz's orchestration at its very best. Mr. Munch demonstrated with the greatest skill the composer's wizardry in this field.

The program also included the sections depicting Romeo alone; Melancholy; Concert and Ball; and the Great Feast at the Capulets. The sparkling gaiety of the dance themes and the festive quality of this music provided interesting contrast to the pensive mood which preceded it. It was a remarkable performance.

Mr. Munch closed his program with the Beethoven "Symphony No. 7 in A Major, Op. 92." It was a captivating reading which highlighted the rhythmic contrasts, melodic beauty, and dramatic harmonic treatment. Under Mr. Munch's baton, the music fairly danced along — capricious or solemn, as the case might be. He is quick to realize the utmost potentialities of the score, and there is not a note which escapes his careful scrutiny and evaluation. He performs this task with a sensitive understanding of the inner meaning of the music he plays, and the results he achieves are wonderful testimonies to his art.

The final concert in the Olney series this season will be presented on May 10 by Ljuba Welitch, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Association.

Mrs. Olney announced plans for her 18th season next year. For the first time, the concert series will be devoted entirely to instrumental concerts, with four out of the five programs featuring outstanding pianists.

The series will open with a program by the Concertgebouw Orchestra from Amsterdam. It will also include a joint program by the Little Orchestra, and Casadesus, the French pianist. Solo concerts by pianists will include those by Alexander Brailowsky, Clifford Curzon, and Arthur Rubinstein.

In addition to the regular series, Mrs. Olney will present three special attractions. These will be concerts by Kirstin Flagstad, Ezio Pinza, and a performance by the Sadler's Wells Ballet.

MOUNT VERNON, N. Y.
ARGUS

Boston Symphony Plays Before 3,500 At The County Center

By RUTH K. NOLAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, presented a thrilling concert before an audience of 3500 in White Plains last night. The program was the fifth event in the Mrs. Julian Olney concert series.

Mr. Munch opened his program with a delightful reading of the Haydn Symphony in D Major, No. 104. All of the spontaneity and gayety of this music was emphasized, without losing sight of its gracefully lyric vein. The lucid orchestration was evident in every note. At times there was a soft tenderness to his interpretations-almost a wistful quality, and in contrast, a wonderfully virile statement of dramatic material. While the symphony as a whole was played gently, and with rather a lilting quality, Mr. Munch never failed to make the most of harmonic and contrapintal richness in the score.

The most exciting interpretation of the evening was that accorded exeerpts from 'Romeo and Juliet" by Berlioz. Mr. Munch included the "Love Scene," which Berlioz himself described as the best piece of writing he had ever done. Certainly it is enchanted music, with soft sensuous melodies and a delicacy and purity of expression. Mr. Munch's quiet control of his orchestra had breathtaking results.

The "Queen Mab" scherzo which followed, revealed Berlioz's orchestration at its very best. Mr. Munch demonstrated with the greatest skill the composer's wizardry in this field. It was a sensitive and magical interpretation, in which Mr. Munch was able to spin a dazzling gossamer web of irridescent hues which resulted in complete enchantment.

The program also included the sections "Romeo Alone," "Melancholy," "Concert and Ball," and "Great Feast at the Capulets." The sparkling gaiety of the dance themes and the festive quality of this music, provided interesting contrast to the pensive mood which had preceded it. It was a remarkable performance.

Mr. Munch closed his program with the Beethoven Symphony No. 7 in A Major. It was a captivating reading which highlighted the rhythmic contrasts, melodic beauty, and dramatic harmonic treatment. Under Mr. Munch's baton, the music fairly danced along—capricious or solemn, as the case might be. He is quick to realize the utmost potentialities of the score, and there is not a note which escaped his careful scrutiny and evaluation. He performs this task with a sensitive understanding of the inner meaning of the music and the results he achieves are wonderful testimonies to his love and devotion to his art.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 16 1950

New Criterion Fixed For Hartford Symphony

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

ONE of the most experienced founders of the presently constituted Hartford Symphony Orchestra once gave voice to the dictum: We defeat ourselves if we think in terms of rivaling the symphony orchestras which are regular visitors here.

A week or so ago I asked him whether he was of the same opinion still. He smiled and said No, he had come over to my way of thinking.

My way of thinking has always been a bit hard-headed due to the observation that when people buy tickets they want their money's worth. Altruism, civic pride or impulse may implement a musical cause temporarily, but for the long pull, music cannot escape being in competition for people's time as well as money.

It costs you an evening to attend a concert and sometimes that is a higher price than the amount on a passively written check. A poorly filled concert hall, even if the deficit is underwritten, does nothing to promote musical art.

Symphonic music cannot exist in Hartford if quality appeals to your purse and mediocrity to your charitable instincts.

The critic must learn to walk the tight-rope where local effort is concerned. He must be in favor of music; the more of it the better. If it is a home town product, it has every right to look to him for a reasonable degree of protection—not coddling, mind you, but encouragement, at the very least.

* * *

THE VERY FIRST concert of the re-established orchestra drew a favorable press. It was no strain on me to write my review; it never is, when you enjoy the concert. The next review was favorable and also easy; and the third, too. I hereby affirm that in spite of the fact that each succeeding concert has been reported in these columns as an improvement over its predecessor they have all been easy to write. However, if a scientist combining the attributes of mathematician and grammarian were to total up the adjectives which have been piled up one on top of the other, the sum might be somewhere up there in the stratosphere where dwell the superlatives usually reserved for the Boston Symphony. Please destroy any extant clippings.

The thing is here now and it's good. It is a fine orchestra and getting better rapidly. Its growth in musicianship has been far beyond any comparable projects.

There can be but one criterion and the time has come to recognize it. The Hartford Symphony Orchestra's public has already recognized it. That fine civic enthusiasm apparent at the beginning is no longer the sole motivation of the orchestra. People go to these concerts because they take home a return on the investment on their time and money.

Each concert turns out new devotees. Those who have heard both (let's leave critics out of it) declare that it is far superior to Springfield's longer-established orchestra. Responses on the nation-wide broadcast were spontaneous and enthusiastic. There is no sense of frustration here about the orchestras of Indianapolis, Dallas, Cleveland or Detroit.

* * *

A NATIONWIDE survey shows, according to Willard B. Rogers, president of the Symphony Society, that only 2 per cent of the population ordinarily manifests an interest in symphonic music. But where, as an experiment, it has been brought within reach of a wider public the response has been emphatic and enduring. "There is still a great mass of people unfamiliar with the symphonic classics and the field is almost unlimited."

Mr. Rogers feels that with a cultural project, one must look ahead. "An audience once established must be renewed. That is why we are working with the children—bringing to the schools demonstrations of the various instruments and an interpreter to explain their function in the orchestra.

"The Symphony Society is keenly aware of the splendid objective of the musical instruments campaign in behalf of the public schools," he said. "It is really of a piece with the orchestral program. Similarly, we cannot forget the tremendous importance of the work being carried on in our music schools.

"The time has come when we must keep our young musical talents at home in Hartford instead of sending them out to build up the orchestras of other cities. There should be no greater pasture than the one right here at home."

He pointed out that a symphony orchestra is essential to a city with pride. "Hartford has more and bigger parks than any other city its size but this alone does not make it great. Neither will thriving industries alone, nor fine educational institutions by themselves make a great city. The cultural element must be there or you have something considerably less than a fine and complete city."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 19 1950

Munch at Carnegie

He Gives All-French Program With Boston Symphony

By Jerome D. Bohm

Charles Munch offered an all-French program at his final concert of the season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The works performed were Berlioz's Overture to "Beatrice and Benedick" and three excerpts from the dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"; Ravel's Piano Concerto with Nicole Henriot as soloist, and Saint-Saens's Third Symphony in C minor, which had also formed part of Wednesday night's program.

Most conductors enjoy conducting Berlioz's music for the opportunities it provides for the display of virtuosity. But only a very few bring to it the profound musical discernment essential to a convincing realization of the French master's ideas. Mr. Munch is one of the two most perceptive interpreters of Berlioz now before the American public, the other being Arturo Toscanini, and his discourses of the "Beatrice and Benedick" Overture and especially of the more important excerpts from "Romeo and Juliet" provided some of the season's most pleasurable listening.

The amalgam of poetic insight and intensity in the Love Scene, the gossamer-like texture and rhythmic delicacy achieved in the "Queen Mab" scherzo and the incandescence with which the concluding episode, "The Great Feast at the Capulets," was unfolded were the accomplishments of a truly imaginative musician, one whose technical resources are the peer of his interpretative gifts. Only ears as sensitive as Mr. Munch's could obtain such exquisitely balanced sounds as he achieved in this music.

Highly impressive, too, was the performance of Ravel's Piano Concerto both by the soloist, Miss Henriot, and the orchestra. The Parisian pianist's technical equipment is a first-rate one, and she brought the essential brilliancy and elan to the corner movements as well as the required poetry to her traversal of the slow movement. Her touch is persuasive, and her tonal palette is a widely variegated one; these attributes were of great value applied in a work which makes many demands on the player in these respects. Mr. Munch and his excellent musicians supplied a flawlessly adjusted, stylistically impeccable accompaniment.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 19 1950

MUNCH CONDUCTS FRENCH PROGRAM

Directs Boston Symphony in Berlioz, Saint-Saens, Ravel Works at Carnegie Hall

By OLIN DOWNES

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra held forth yesterday afternoon with a program of French music and presented it superlatively well: Berlioz, Saint-Saëns, Ravel, in the instance of this composer's piano concerto with Miss Nicole Henriot as soloist. If one recalls Mr. Munch's volcanic performance of the "Symphonie fantastique," by which he first made his quality known in this city, and joins to that impression his treatment of the overture to the Beatrice et Benedick and three of the "scenes" from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony heard on this occasion, it is logical to conclude that Mr. Munch has a particular sympathy for the music of Berlioz.

We had not heard the overture so wittily and admirably interpreted before. And what a joy to hear the Romeo et Juliet music again! One can speak of the two last operas of Verdi, or of haunting and poignant pages in the "Romeo and Juliet" overture of Tchaikovsky, as inspired by Shakespeare, and the operas as masterpieces. But here, with Berlioz, one seems to hear the very accents of Shakespeare's enamoured pair.

When you listen to the love music, in the "Scene d'amour," you remember what was once said of Bernard Shaw's "Candida," that in writing of Marchbank's calf-love for Candida, Shaw had made us realize that perhaps this calf-love can be the purest and noblest passion a man can know. And so with the music that Berlioz wrote, after he had heard Henrietta Smithson act Ophelia and Juliet, after the glory of Shakespeare, though he still understood English imperfectly, had overwhelmed him.

Textual Accuracy Denied

According to a story that has been widely accepted, Berlioz said, "I shall make that woman my wife, and on the subject of that drama I shall write my greatest symphony," or words to that effect. Mr. Burke in the Boston Symphony program book reminds us that Berlioz himself denied the textual accuracy of the story. He did both things, he said, but he was too intoxicated with the beauty of the woman and the poignancy of the drama to be articulate or fully aware of his own subconcious reactions at the time.

Six years later he completed the score. His intoxication is in the "Scene d'amour", the pure passion of the young lovers, the ecstacy of the silent night. The Queen Mab scherzo is better known, and is a virtuoso feat for a modern orchestra. Mr. Munch did not attempt to astonish his listeners by the pace at which a modern American orchestra of the first rank can play this piece. He relied upon imagination, sincerity, and permitting the music with its enchanting fantasy and exquisite instrumentations to speak for itself. In the movement of Romeo's solitiude, followed by the crashing brilliant music of the ball in the home of the Capulets, he made use of the utmost brilliancies of the orchestra.

Miss Henriot played Ravel's piano concerto with superb bravura, exciting rythmical precision, and, especially, in the slow movement, with much beauty of tone color and eloquence of instrumental song. She has wonderful fingers, youth, aplomb, and the virtuoso spirit. The concerto is astonishingly clever and amusing in its parody of jazz, but there is poetry in it as well as humor and bravura, and its moods were captured in its performance. Miss Henriot was heartily applauded and recalled.

Saint-Saens Symphony

The concert ended with the old Saint-Saëns Symphony No. 3 for organ and orchestra. We had regarded it as a museum piece and were astonished, as Mr. Munch played it, by its feeling as well as form, its vitality, as well as organic strength. We can say, without exaggeration, that having heard the symphony many times—once in Saint-Saëns' presence, after he in his last years had superintended its rehearsal—yesterday we heard this historic symphony for the first at its full value. There was reason to feel as well as to admire the music. The first part is drama, instead of formulas. The development is remarkably cogent from beginning to end since the symphony is almost monothematic, stemming from a principle germinal theme.

As for the fake ecclesiasticism of the end, we have to accept it for what it is, a Liszt flamboyancy of the period. As a whole the symphony is much better than that. This performance reminded us again how terribly the composer is at the mercy of the interpreter. Only Mr. Munch, of such interpreters as we have heard, acquainted us with what it really is. We and the composers are and never can help being more or less at the interpreter's mercy.

Harrison, N.Y.
Citizen
3/24/50

Boston Symphony Heard By 3,500 At County Center

By RUTH K. NOLAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, presented a thrilling concert before an audience of 3500 in White Plains last week. The program was the fifth event in the Mrs. Julian Olney concert series.

Mr. Munch opened his program with a delightful reading of the Haydn Symphony in D Major, No. 104. All of the spontaneity and gayety of this music was emphasized, without losing sight of its gracefully lyric vein. The lucid orchestration was evident in every note. At times there was a soft tenderness to his interpretations-almost a wistful quality, and in contrast, a wonderfully virile statement of dramatic material. While the symphony as a whole was played gently, and with rather a lilting quality, Mr. Munch never failed to make the most of harmonic and contrapintal richness in the score.

The most exciting interpretation of the evening was that accorded exeerpts from "Romeo and Juliet" by Berlioz. Mr. Munch included the "Love Scene," which Berlioz himself described as the best piece of writing he had ever done. Certainly it is enchanted music, with soft sensuous melodies and a delicacy and purity of expression. Mr. Munch's quiet control of his orchestra had breathtaking results.

The "Queen Mab" scherzo which followed, revealed Berlioz's orchestration at its very best. Mr. Munch demonstrated with the greatest skill the composer's wizardry in this field. It was a sensitive and magical interpretation, in which Mr. Munch was able to spin a dazzling gossamer web of irridescent hues which resulted in complete enchantment.

sections "Romeo Alone," "Melan-

The program also included the holy,'3' "Conert and Ball," and "Great Feast at the Capulets." The sparkling gaiety of the dance themes and the festive quality of this music, provided interesting contrast to the pensive mood which had preceded it. It was a remarkable performance.

Mr. Munch closed his program with the Beethoven Symphony N 7 in A Major. It was a captivating reading which highlighted the rhythmic contrasts, melodic beauty, and dramatic harmonic treatment. Under Mr. Munh's baton, the musi fcairly danced along—capricious or solemn, as the case might be. He is quick to realize the utmost potentialities of the score, and there is not a note which escaped his careful scrutiny and evaluation. He performs this task with a sensitive understanding of the inner meaning of the music and the results he achieves are wonderful testimonies to his love and devotion to his art.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 23 1950

MUSIC

Third Veterans' Memorial Concert Is Given by Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, played the third concert of the season last evening at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Nicole Henriot, pianist, was the guest soloist, and the entire performance was brilliant.

The program included Mozart's Symphony in G minor, No. 40 (K550), Ravel's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra and Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98.

The usual capacity audience was present with the pleasant anticipation which goes along with having a soloist on the program. What we heard in the Ravel Concerto far exceeded our expectations.

Nicole Henriot is a slight young lady of 20. She played with the poise of a veteran and the technique of a virtuoso. In the rapid toccata passages, she exemplified the precision of a perfectly functioning machine, but without the slightest suggestion of mechanical playing. She caught the humor of the Ravel score and the perfectly proportioned phrases were tossed back and forth between soloist and orchestra with the exhilaration of a fast tennis game. There was a freshness about the deliberate, singing phrases of the Adagio which was thoroughly delightful. Here she displayed a maturity far beyond her years.

The orchestra did a splendid piece of accompanying and never were we more completely aware of the brilliance of Ravel's great gift of orchestration. This performance was a memorable one. The soloist and orchestra were given an ovation.

The orchestra played the Mozart Symphony in G minor with extreme delicacy in the phrasing and perfect proportions in the pace and style. If we were to choose our favorite portion it would be the little Allegretto of the Menuetto. This was a gem. The brisk opening movement was refreshing and the playful themes of the last movement were gay and diverting.

Charles Munch, in the Brahms, subtracted himself so successfully from the scene of action that the listener was completely engulfed in the depth of the music. It is deep. As the orchestra responded to Dr. Munch's intellectual interpretation, it brought forth phrases we had not been aware of. It seemed almost a new work, in sections, and this because the tone color was so beautifully graded and the phrases so perfectly contrasted.

The orchestra played with its usual skill. The reeds seemed to have a special quality about their playing and the strings sang melodiously. It is a great organization at work under a great conductor.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 18 1950

MUSIC

by PAUL AFFELDER

Boston Symphony, Munch Conducting, In Season Farewell Concert at Academy

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra bade a seasonal farewell to Brooklyn before a capacity audience at the Academy of Music last evening. Their program comprised Haydn's Symphony No. 104 in D Major—the so-called "London" Symphony — the overture to "Beatrice and Benedict" and three excerpts from the dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," by Berlioz, and the Beethoven Seventh Symphony.

Perhaps it was the mood we were in, but M. Munch, whom we admire greatly, seemed to lack a certain spark last night. All of his interpretations were correct and well played, but they were not performed with either the high polish or the dramatic tension that we are accustomed to hearing from this orchestra.

Some of the brightest moments were those in the light, witty "Beatrice and Benedict" overture, which is the curtain-raiser to Berlioz' operatic version of Shakespeare's "Much Ado About Nothing." Here the orchestra fairly sparkled with life and color. There was also considerable spirit in the fairy-like "Queen Mab" scherzo from Berlioz' other Shakespearean work, "Romeo and Juliet," but the other two movements—the Love Scene and the Ball Scene—sounded flabby and uninteresting.

French Treatment

The Beethoven symphony was subjected to some other unusual treatment. Most of it reflected the Gallic background of the conductor, which did not help this essentially Teutonic music. The first movement was entirely too fast and light-textured from beginning to end; besides, the rapid tempo adopted prevented the orchestra from playing the characteristic rhythmic pattern correctly and evenly. Things definitely changed for the better with the allegretto, which was performed with breadth and nobility. When we came to the scherzo, however, we again found ourselves being carried along on a fast current. Here is was not so detrimental, but for some unknown reason, M. Munch made a large cut in the score, omitting the second statement of the trio section and the final recapitulation of the main section of the scherzo. We've heard of cuts in many symphonies, but never in one by Beethoven. Once again, we returned to normal in the finale, which had ample briskness and energy without being rushed.

M. Munch and the orchestra will return for the customary five Friday evening concerts

NEW REPUBLIC
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 20 1950

Charles Munch. There is a provocative parallel between Bernstein and the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Munch lacks Serge Koussevitzky's cool ability to know where he is and what the orchestra is doing every moment of the time. He lets himself be swept away by the orgiastic excitement of conducting, enticing his men into uncontrolled, rough playing that bears little resemblance to the suave, exquisitely balanced sounds they used to make for Koussevitzky. Yet on occasion, as in a recent performance of Schumann's Fourth Symphony, he is capable of a sane, essentially serene interpretation that is quite moving. Perhaps he is still ill at ease, and will relax later on. After all, it is no easy assignment to carry on after Koussevitzky's princely quarter-century.

CECIL SMITH

Mar 25 THE

MUSIC

Mayes Fine Symphony Soloist in "Quixote"; Burgin Is Conductor

By CYRUS DURGIN

Samuel Mayes, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first cellist, is a fine soloist this week in the "Don Quixote" by Richard Strauss. Richard Burgin conducts these concerts which otherwise consist of Rossini's Overture "L'Italiana in Algeri" and the late Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

The performances yesterday afternoon were remarkably satisfying. Mr. Burgin has never conducted better, and he gave an eloquent account of a program that is notably tricky and demanding. Mr. Mayes' playing of the cello part in Strauss' ever-fresh set of variations was both expert and musically technically poised and deeply expressive. This was not a "virtuoso" performance in the sense that it was merely spectacular. It was spectacular but only in the degree that Strauss thus had written the part. Most importantly it "sang" with grace and deep feeling and it was very sensitively adjusted to the ensemble.

Joseph De Pasquale, taking the viola portion that characterizes Sancho Panza, was an admirable partner for Mr. Mayes, for his work, too, was authentic in style, rich of tone and ingratiatingly phrased. As for Mr. Burgin's conducting of this favorite and familiar masterpiece, it was at once objective and personal, which is to say it was personal because it was Mr. Burgin's one way of doing it, and objective because it was free from mannerisms. All hands were justly and generously applauded at the end.

Bartok's Concerto, introduced in this December of 1944, and repeated late in the same month, had gone unheard since then—so often the fate of new music. Let us thank Mr. Burgin for restoring a score which may outlive us all. This Concerto—so-called rather than termed a Symphony because of the concerted treatment of sections of the orchestra — is a remarkably well-made piece, and for the later Bartok, unusually appealing.

The intellectual preoccupation and the rigorous dissonance that typified the later Bartok are here all but gone. The Concerto has tunes, and a progressively light mood; a folk-song character and a rhythmic liveliness almost of dancing. For my taste the work is one movement too long; the intermezzo-allegretto might be dropped out without harm to the whole.

Lest this sound Philistine, one hastens to add that the fourth movement seems to be superfluous. The Concerto aspect is served by the treatment of the instruments, while the surviving sense of symphonic structure is established by the first, second, third and fifth movements. That intermezzo is a sort of dalliance—though pleasant dalliance—along the way.

Bartok's work was brilliantly done. The orchestra was glittering of color, super-sensitively responsive and the whole texture was clear and the rhythmic patterns taut and energetic. As for Rossini's Overture—well it is simply a Rossini overture, light, bright, gay and tasty. And, of course, quite harmless—even at a formal symphony concert.

dragged unmercifully. Without rising to great interpretative heights, Mr. Mayes gave an admirable account of Don Quixote's music. It was always graphic and when need be, as in the finale, truly eloquent. If you consider its rich and deep humanity and take into account what a stupendous feat of musical imagination this tone poem is, you will immediately hail it as Strauss' greatest symphonic achievement. But if we are to believe that the best program music is that which requires the least explanation, "Don Quixote" falls short. Almost every measure has to be "understood" in an extra-musical sense.

As of 1897 "Don Quixote" was modern music. Today, the intricate program aside, it is plain sailing, and it is Bartok to which we have to adapt our ears. Actually, this Concerto, which Dr. Koussevitzky commissioned, and has proved a work of some celebrity, is not all of it taxing to the listener. There are portions that have almost a popular appeal, and you get the notion that Bartok could, if he had so desired, have made a piece that was frankly entertaining throughout. At least, it is always interesting and much of it has a sound, speaking now of orchestral tone, that is completely distinctive. Nor should we wait another [illegible] years before hearing it again.

assigned to the area to prevent traffic tieups.

Mar 25

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate to have so able an associate conductor as concert-master Richard Burgin. Whether he is replacing his chief at a moment's notice or preparing his own program, which is the case this week, Mr. Burgin delivers the goods. You do not have the feeling of being obliged to put up with something a little less than the best. Mr. Burgin had planned to introduce to us the Austrian, Frederick Piket, but his "Curtain Raiser to an American Play" required too much preparation and for it was substituted, and to the audience's great delight, Rossini's Overture to 'L'Italiana in Algeri," unheard at the Symphony concerts since 1921. Rossini makes a good appetizer.

To continue the matphor, the rest of the current program runs to solid fare, Strauss' "Don Quixote" and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. In the Strauss the orchestra's present first cellist, Samuel Mayes, is making his initial appearances here in this important role, while Joseph DePasquale, the first viola, plays Sancho Panza to Mr. Mayes' Don.

By this performance the late Richard Strauss is more suitably memorialized than he was by the "Symphonia Domestica" earlier in the season. On that occasion Mr. Munch did not prove himself a Strauss man, while Mr. Burgin long ago established himself as such. If this was not a truly inspired performance of "Don Quixote," it was an extremely good one, much better than its predecessor under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, which was

Nicole Henriot Plays Ravel Piano Concerto at Sunday Symphony

Nicole Henriot, that young French comet of the keyboard, returned to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to play the Ravel Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This concert, the fifth in the Sunday series, was conducted by Charles Munch. It began with Haydn's D major Symphony, No. 104, and ended with the C minor Symphony, No. 3, by Saint-Saens. E. Power Biggs was the organist for the last-named.

Miss Henriot, who made her debut here with the same orchestra more than a year ago, and then followed with a notably successful Jordan Hall concert last January, continues to be an amazing pianist. She is the sort of artist whose powers are spectacular, and whose musicianship is fabulous, especially when considered in terms of her age, which is 25.

The Ravel Concerto is one of those bright, jewelled pieces full of dash and color, that can sound like fireworks and no more, or, as yesterday, like musical fireworks. Miss Henriot tackled its intricacies —which often are of jet-propelled speed—as if they were nothing extraordinary for her, and perhaps they are not.

The greatest test in this Concerto is the song-like slow movement, which goes on at length without the orchestra. Here, too, Miss Henriot triumphed, playing the gracefully exfoliating section with a rich, elegant style and a native sense of expression which hardly could be bettered. No wonder, at the end, she was cheered as well as applauded, and recalled to the stage many times.

Mr. Munch again was in his best vein, and the afternoon was one of brilliance and high emotional temperature. The Haydn and Saint-Saens he had performed in the "regular" series within a few weeks. Yesterday's program will be repeated tomorrow night, except for the Haydn, which will give way to Mozart's G minor Symphony (K. 550).

C. W. D.

Numéro du 26 mars 1950

LA MUSIQUE

LA Société Philharmonique a présenté son soliste hebdomandaire en la personne de M. Nathan Milstein, le violoniste-virtuose bien connu. M. Milstein a fort bien joué le Concerto de Brahms, ce qui n'a surpris personne.

L'orchestre était dirigé par le bouillant maestro italien Victor de Sabata qui, avec des gestes évoquant Valentin le Désossé ou la Danse de Saint Guy, obtient souvent des effets intéressants. Son interprétation de la Suite de "Daphnis et Chloé" de Ravel a remporté un vif succès, grâce à un excellent travail de détail.

Le public, mis en appétit par une exécution brillante de l'ouverture à l'opéra "La fiancée vendue" de Smetana a vigoureusement manifesté pendant et après le concert son approbation du programme et des interprètes.

* * *

A l'affiche du concert donné semedi en matinée par l'orchestre de Boston, on pouvait lire six grands noms de la musique française: côté compositeurs, Berlioz, Ravel et Saint-Saëns; côté interprètes, Charles Munch, Nicole Henriot, Edouard Nies-Berger.

M. Munch est un des rarissimes interprètes qui puisse se permettre de donner des oeuvres d'une valeur relativement inférieure, sachant bien qu'il les transformera en chefs-d'oeuvre! Ainsi, par exemple, qui aurait pu croire que la Symphonie avec orgue de Saint-Saëns allait brusquement devenir une oeuvre d'une grande noblesse, inspirée, riche en idées mélodiques, rythmiques, harmoniques, impeccable dans sa structure? Brandissant sa baguette magique, Munch-Merlin a accompli cette métamorphose. M. Nies-Berger, tenant la partie d'orgue, s'est associé au triomphe de son chef.

Ce fut une joie d'entendre la ravissante Nicole Henriot dans le Concerto pour piano de Ravel. Jouant avec une technique vigoureuse, presque masculine, et une sûreté rythmique étonnante, Mlle Henriot sait également ponctuer ses phrases d'accents lyriques émouvants. Le tout constitue un ensemble de grâce et de beauté musicales en présence duquel on n'a ni le désir ni le pouvoir de rester insensible—ce qui fut amplement prouvé par la véhémence des applaudissements.

Edgar FEDER

Mar 25 THE BOSTON HERALD, SAT

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 19th program of the 68th season in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Samuel Mayes, cello, and Joseph De Pasquale, viola. The program.

Overture to "L'Italiana in Alegri" Rossini
"Don Quixote," Op. ..... Strauss
Concerto for Orchestra ..... Bartok

By RICHARD ELIE

Yesterday was what might very appropriately be termed Richard Burgin day at the symphony. It was also Samuel Mayes' day and Bartok's day, too, but for the first time Mr. Burgin, in his capacity as associate conductor, clearly brought home to all concerned the fact that he is what his associates have always known: one of the most musicianly conductors in the field today.

The reason he is so hard to warm to is that he is not by any stretch of the imagination what might be called the glamorous conductor. He does not have the eloquent back possessed, for example by Koussevitzky, whose back is incredibly expressive. He does not have the handsomely proportioned back possessed by Munch, whose back is strikingly esthetic to the view. Nor does he have hands that gracefully or forcefully choreograph the music, or movements that of themselves convey meaning and significance.

On the contrary, he seems to conduct principally with his fists, and flails about with his jacket flopping every which way. But the fact of the matter is that he gets extraordinary results nonetheless. And these results are those of the composer and of no one else. Mr. Burgin is not creating or even recreating. He is setting forth, with devotion and certainly with a technical mastery entirely understood by the musicians before him, the specific directions of the man who created the music. He does not intrude himself; he neither exhorts nor "emotes" (if I may employ this barbarous term). He simply does his work with such utter conviction that even though he is not box office in a visual sense he still carries all before him.

As it happened yesterday, so did Samuel Mayes, the youthful first cellist of the orchestra, whose realization of the solo role in Strauss' "Don Quixote" was one of the most beautiful in my experience with this work. What Mr. Mayes has in such abundance is the capacity for producing tone—and without tone a cello is nothing. In every register his is so resplendent as to be improbable. How he manages to achieve such uniformity in color and timbre from string to string I cannot imagine, but it is as if he had but one. Yet his bowing is not all, for he has exactitude of intonation, great speed and fluency on the fingerboard and real taste in producing vibrato.

That he might have characterized the role more colorfully a la Piatigorsky may have occurred to some listeners, but his conception seemed to me entirely proper. It is hard enough to play the cello without making it look even harder for the benefit of the grandstand.

It may be said that Joseph De Pasquale's playing of the viola characterization of Sancho was in every way as beautiful as Mr. Mayes' characterization of the Don, but we shall, I hope, soon have an opportunity to hear him in a principal role and so give him his due.

I find, in looking over my remarks on Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra on the occasion of its first performance, with the composer in the audience, that I ventured the opinion that it was his masterpiece and "one of the musical masterpieces of recent years." There seems no reason to modify that opinion. On the contrary, I am more and more convinced that it is a truly great work for all time. I thought then it was autobiographical; now I can see that it was prophetic also. For despite the exquisite charm of the intermezzo the pseudo gayety of the beginning of the finale, the little jokes and humorous conceits of the scherzando, this is a deeply tragic work, filled with a nobility of purpose and a purity of thought of the most elevated nature.

It is true enough—again as I pointed out six years ago—that there are reminiscences of other schools, fragments of other styles and passages quite un-Bartokian in character, but now the reason for this is clearer. Bartok was here reliving his career, here reaffirming his faith in his own artistic integrity. That he died ten months later may be pure coincidence, and that to mention that he did die ten months later may be pure romance. Something tells me, however, that it isn't.

Charles Munch returns to conduct tomorrow afternoon's and the Tuesday night's concerts, and next week offers Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, Randall Thompson's Third Symphony, Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Bach's A minor and Saint-Saens' B minor violin concertos with Zino Francescatti as soloist.

Amusement-

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Symphony

Yesterday afternoon Charles Munch conducted the fifth in the current series of Sunday afternoon symphony concerts at Symphony Hall; the soloist was Nicole Henriot and the program was as follows: Haydn . . . Symphony in D major, No. 104 Ravel . . . Concerto for Piano and Orchestra Saint-Saens . . . Symphony No. 3 in C minor, Op. 78, with E. Power Biggs at the organ.

By ELINOR HUGHES

The main excitement at yesterday afternoon's very excellent concert was the performance of Nicole Henriot in the Ravel Piano Concerto, which has not been heard here for two and a half years, when Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist. Miss Henriot's brilliant technique and first rate musicianship are certainly not news by this time, but I'll wager that she startled even her most ardent admirers by the skill and authority which she brought to this complex and fascinating work.

Ravel must have been in a mischievous mood when he opened this concerto with the crack of a whip—startling the uninitiated into thinking that someone's violin string had just broken! The Gershwinesque flavor of the first and third movements, with their intricate cross rhythms and percussive effects, is extremely exciting and alive, while the lovely second movement, with its melodious piano solo at the opening and oboe solo at the end, provides a serene and unexpected contrast. Miss Henriot interpreted the varying moods with as perfect understanding as her inspired fingers carried out the composer's intricate technical demands. No wonder she received an ovation, including bravos, from the audience and the orchestra, who were as appreciative of her skill as they were amused by her scurrying on and off the platform.

Mr. Munch began the concert with an eloquent and moving performance of Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104, last in the set of six symphonies he wrote during his final visit to London. Like all Haydn's best work, it has a way of making other composers seem a bit redundant, for he always says what he wants to say, clearly and beautifully, and then stops. Concluding the afternoon's pleasures was Saint-Saen's Symphony No. 3 in C minor, with E. Powers Biggs at the organ. This massive work, unashamedly lush and romantic in the Victorian tradition, was conducted by Mr. Munch on the occasion of his first visit to Boston. At that time it was praised more for the nobility of the conductor's interpretation than for its contents, and the same verdict will be brought in here. The orchestra, with Mr. Biggs rendering eloquent assistance, gave it a rich, full-bodied performance, and the audience was most enthusiastic.

The final concert in this series takes place on April 16.

[100]

Mar 25 THE

MUSIC

Mayes Fine Symphony Soloist in "Quixote"; Burgin Is Conductor

By CYRUS DURGIN

Samuel Mayes, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first cellist, is a fine soloist this week in the "Don Quixote" by Richard Strauss. Richard Burgin conducts these concerts, which otherwise consist of Rossini's Overture "L'Italiana in Algeri" and the late Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

The performances yesterday afternoon were remarkably satisfying. Mr. Burgin has never conducted better, and he gave an eloquent account of a program that was notably tricky and demanding. Mr. Mayes' playing of the cello part in Strauss' ever-fresh set of variations was both expert and musianly, technically poised and deeply expressive. This was not a "virtuoso" performance in the sense that it was merely spectacular. It was spectacular but only in the degree that Strauss thus had written the part. Most importantly it "sang" with grace and deep feeling, and it was very sensitively adjusted to the ensemble.

Joseph De Pasquale, taking the viola portion that characterizes Sancho Panza, was an admirable partner for Mr. Mayes, for his work, too, was authentic in style, rich of tone and ingratiatingly phrased. As for Mr. Burgin's conducting of this favorite and familiar masterpiece, it was at once objective and personal, which is to say it was personal because it was Mr. Burgin's one way of doing it, and objective because it was free from mannerisms. All hands were justly and generously applauded at the end.

Bartok's Concerto, introduced in early December of 1944, and repeated late in the same month, had gone unheard since then—so often the fate of new music. Let us thank Mr. Burgin for restoring a score which may outlive us all. This Concerto—so-called rather than termed a Symphony because of the concerted treatment of sections of the orchestra — is a remarkably well-made piece, and for the later Bartok, unusually appealing.

The intellectual preoccupation and the rigorous dissonance that typified the later Bartok are here all but gone. The Concerto has tunes, and a progressively light mood; a folk-song character and a rhythmic liveliness almost of dancing. For my taste the work is one movement too long; the intermezzo-allegretto might be dropped out without harm to the whole.

Lest this sound Philistine, one hastens to add that the fourth movement seems to be superfluous. The Concerto aspect is served by the treatment of the instruments, while the surviving sense of symphonic structure is established by the first, second, third and fifth movements. That intermezzo is a sort of dalliance—though pleasant dalliance—along the way.

Bartok's work was brilliantly done. The orchestra was glittering of color, super-sensitively responsive and the whole texture was clear and the rhythmic patterns taut and energetic. As for Rossini's Overture—well it is simply a Rossini overture, light, bright, gay and tasty. And, of course, quite harmless—even at a formal symphony concert.

dragged unmercifully. Without rising to great interpretative heights, Mr. Mayes gave an admirable account of Don Quixote's music. It was always graphic and when need be, as in the finale, truly eloquent. If you consider its rich and deep humanity and take into account what a stupendous feat of musical imagination this tone poem is, you will immediately hail it as Strauss' greatest symphonic achievement. But if we are to believe that the best program music is that which requires the least explanation, "Don Quixote" falls short. Almost every measure has to be "understood" in an extra-musical sense.

As of 1897 "Don Quixote" was modern music. Today, the intricate program aside, it is plain sailing, and it is Bartok to which we have to adapt our ears. Actually, this Concerto, which Dr. Koussevitzky commissioned, and has proved a work of some celebrity, is not all of it taxing to the listener. There are portions that have almost a popular appeal, and you get the notion that Bartok could, if he had so desired, have made a piece that was frankly entertaining throughout. At least, it is always interesting and much of it has a sound, speaking now of orchestral tone, that is completely distinctive. Nor should we wait another [illegible] years before hearing it again.

assigned to the area to prevent traffic tieups.

Post Mar 25

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate to have so able an associate conductor as concert-master Richard Burgin. Whether he is replacing his chief at a moment's notice or preparing his own program, which is the case this week, Mr. Burgin delivers the goods. You do not have the feeling of being obliged to put up with something a little less than the best. Mr. Burgin had planned to introduce to us the Austrian, Frederick Piket, but his "Curtain Raiser to an American Play" required too much preparation and for it was substituted, and to the audience's great delight, Rossini's Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri," unheard at the Symphony concerts since 1921. Rossini makes a good appetizer.

To continue the matphor, the rest of the current program runs to solid fare, Strauss' "Don Quixote" and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. In the Strauss the orchestra's present first cellist, Samuel Mayes, is making his initial appearances here in this important role, while Joseph DePasquale, the first viola, plays Sancho Panza to Mr. Mayes' Don.

By this performance the late Richard Strauss is more suitably memorialized than he was by the "Symphonia Domestica" earlier in the season. On that occasion Mr. Munch did not prove himself a Strauss man, while Mr. Burgin long ago established himself as such. If this was not a truly inspired performance of "Don Quixote," it was an extremely good one, much better than its predecessor under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, which was

Nicole Henriot Plays Ravel Piano Concerto at Sunday Symphony

Nicole Henriot, that young French comet of the keyboard, returned to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to play the Ravel Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This concert, the fifth in the Sunday series, was conducted by Charles Munch. It began with Haydn's D major Symphony, No. 104, and ended with the C minor Symphony, No. 3, by Saint-Saens. E. Power Biggs was the organist for the last-named.

Miss Henriot, who made her debut here with the same orchestra more than a year ago, and then followed with a notably successful Jordan Hall concert last January, continues to be an amazing pianist. She is the sort of artist whose powers are spectacular, and whose musicianship is fabulous, especially when considered in terms of her age, which is 25.

The Ravel Concerto is one of those bright, jewelled pieces full of dash and color, that can sound like fireworks and no more, or, as yesterday, like musical fireworks. Miss Henriot tackled its intricacies —which often are of jet-propelled speed—as if they were nothing extraordinary for her, and perhaps they are not.

The greatest test in this Concerto is the song-like slow movement, which goes on at length without the orchestra. Here, too, Miss Henriot triumphed, playing the gracefully exfoliating section with a rich, elegant style and a native sense of expression which hardly could be bettered. No wonder, at the end, she was cheered as well as applauded, and recalled to the stage many times.

Mr. Munch again was in his best vein, and the afternoon was one of brilliance and high emotional temperature. The Haydn and Saint-Saens he had performed in the "regular" series within a few weeks. Yesterday's program will be repeated tomorrow night, except for the Haydn, which will give way to Mozart's G minor Symphony (K. 550).

C. W. D.

THE BOSTON HERALD, "SA"

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 19th program of the [illegible] season in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Samuel Mayes, cello, and Joseph De Pasquale, viola. The program:

Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" ..... Rossini
"Don Quixote," Op. ..... Strauss
Concerto for Orchestra ..... Bartok

By RICHARD ELIE

Yesterday was what might very appropriately be termed Richard Burgin day at the symphony. It was also Samuel Mayes' day and Bartok's day, too, but for the first time Mr. Burgin, in his capacity as associate conductor, clearly brought home to all concerned the fact that he is what his associates have always known: one of the most musicianly conductors in the field today.

The reason he is so hard to warm to is that he is not by any stretch of the imagination what might be called the glamorous conductor. He does not have the eloquent back possessed, for example by Koussevitzky, whose back is incredibly expressive. He does not have the handsomely proportioned back possessed by Munch, whose back is strikingly esthetic to the view. Nor does he have hands that gracefully or forcefully choreograph the music, or movements that of themselves convey meaning and significance.

On the contrary, he seems to conduct principally with his fists, and flails about with his jacket flopping every which way. But the fact of the matter is that he gets extraordinary results nonetheless. And these results are those of the composer and of no one else. Mr. Burgin is not creating or even recreating. He is setting forth, with devotion and certainly with a technical mastery entirely understood by the musicians before him, the specific directions of the man who created the music. He does not intrude himself; he neither exhorts nor "emotes" (if I may employ this barbarous term). He simply does his work with such utter conviction that even though he is not box office in a visual sense he still carries all before him.

As it happened yesterday, so did Samuel Mayes, the youthful first cellist of the orchestra, whose realization of the solo role in Strauss' "Don Quixote" was one of the most beautiful in my experience with this work. What Mr. Mayes has in such abundance is the capacity for producing tone—and without tone a cello is nothing. In every register his is so resplendent as to be improbable. How he manages to achieve such uniformity in color and timbre from string to string I cannot imagine, but it is as if he had but one. Yet his bowing is not all, for he has exactitude of intonation, great speed and fluency on the fingerboard and real taste in producing vibrato.

That he might have characterized the role more colorfully a la Piatigorsky may have occurred to some listeners, but his conception seemed to me entirely proper. It is hard enough to play the cello without making it look even harder for the benefit of the grandstand.

It may be said that Joseph De Pasquale's playing of the viola characterization of Sancho was in every way as beautiful as Mr. Mayes' characterization of the Don, but we shall, I hope, soon have an opportunity to hear him in a principal role and so give him his due.

I find, in looking over my remarks on Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra on the occasion of its first performance, with the composer in the audience, that I ventured the opinion that it was his masterpiece and "one of the musical masterpieces of recent years." There seems no reason to modify that opinion. On the contrary, I am more and more convinced that it is a truly great work for all time. I thought then it was autobiographical; now I can see that it was prophetic also. For despite the exquisite charm of the intermezzo the pseudo gayety of the beginning of the finale, the little jokes and humorous conceits of the scherzando, this is a deeply tragic work, filled with a nobility of purpose and a purity of thought of the most elevated nature.

It is true enough—again as I pointed out six years ago—that there are reminiscences of other schools, fragments of other styles and passages quite un-Bartokian in character, but now the reason for this is clearer. Bartok was here reliving his career, here reaffirming his faith in his own artistic integrity. That he died ten months later may be pure coincidence, and that to mention that he did die ten months later may be pure romance. Something tells me, however, that it isn't.

Charles Munch returns to conduct tomorrow afternoon's and the Tuesday night's concerts, and next week offers Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, Randall Thompson's Third Symphony, Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Bach's A minor and Saint-Saens' B minor violin concertos with Zino Francescatti as soloist.

Amusements

Numéro du 26 mars 1950

LA Société Philharmonique a présenté son soliste hebdomandaire en la personne de M. Nathan Milstein, le violoniste-virtuose bien connu. M. Milstein a fort bien joué le Concerto de Brahms, ce qui n'a surpris personne.

L'orchestre était dirigé par le bouillant maestro italien Victor de Sabata qui, avec des gestes évoquant Valentin le Désossé ou la Danse de Saint Guy, obtient souvent des effets intéressants. Son interprétation de la Suite de "Daphnis et Chloé" de Ravel a remporté un vif succès, grâce à un excellent travail de détail.

Le public, mis en appétit par une exécution brillante de l'ouverture à l'opéra "La fiancée vendue" de Smetana a vigoureusement manifesté pendant et après le concert son approbation du programme et des interprètes.

* * *

A l'affiche du concert donné samedi en matinée par l'orchestre de Boston, on pouvait lire six grands noms de la musique française: côté compositeurs, Berlioz, Ravel et Saint-Saëns; côté interprètes, Charles Munch, Nicole Henriot, Edouard Nies-Berger.

M. Munch est un des rarissimes interprètes qui puisse se permettre de donner des oeuvres d'une valeur relativement inférieure, sachant bien qu'il les transformera en chefs-d'oeuvre! Ainsi, par exemple, qui aurait pu croire que la Symphonie avec orgue de Saint-Saëns allait brusquement devenir une oeuvre d'une grande noblesse, inspirée, riche en idées mélodiques, rythmiques, harmoniques, impeccable dans sa structure? Brandissant sa baguette magique, Munch-Merlin a accompli cette métamorphose. M. Nies-Berger, tenant la partie d'orgue, s'est associé au triomphe de son chef.

Ce fut une joie d'entendre la ravissante Nicole Henriot dans le Concerto pour piano de Ravel. Jouant avec une technique vigoureuse, presque masculine, et une sûreté rythmique étonnante, Mlle Henriot sait également ponctuer ses phrases d'accents lyriques émouvants. Le tout constitue un ensemble de grâce et de beauté musicales en présence duquel on n'a ni le désir ni le pouvoir de rester insensible—ce qui fut amplement prouvé par la véhémence des applaudissements.

Edgar FEDER

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Symphony

Yesterday afternoon Charles Munch conducted the fifth in the current series of Sunday afternoon symphony concerts at Symphony Hall; the soloist was Nicole Henriot and the program was as follows: Haydn... Symphony in D major, No. 104. Ravel... Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Saint-Saens... Symphony No. 3 in C minor, Op. 78, with E. Power Biggs at the organ.

By ELINOR HUGHES

The main excitement at yesterday afternoon's very excellent concert was the performance of Nicole Henriot in the Ravel Piano Concerto, which has not been heard here for two and a half years, when Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist. Miss Henriot's brilliant technique and first rate musicianship are certainly not news by this time, but I'll wager that she startled even her most ardent admirers by the skill and authority which she brought to this complex and fascinating work.

Ravel must have been in a mischievous mood when he opened this concerto with the crack of a whip—startling the uninitiated into thinking that someone's violin string had just broken! The Gershwinesque flavor of the first and third movements, with their intricate cross rhythms and percussive effects, is extremely exciting and alive, while the lovely second movement, with its melodious piano solo at the opening and oboe solo at the end, provides a serene and unexpected contrast. Miss Henriot interpreted the varying moods with as perfect understanding as her inspired fingers carried out the composer's intricate technical demands. No wonder she received an ovation, including bravos, from the audience and the orchestra, who were as appreciative of her skill as they were amused by her scurrying on and off the platform.

Mr. Munch began the concert with an eloquent and moving performance of Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104, last in the set of six symphonies he wrote during his final visit to London. Like all Haydn's best work, it has a way of making other composers seem a bit redundant, for he always says what he wants to say, clearly and beautifully, and then stops. Concluding the afternoon's pleasures was Saint-Saen's Symphony No. 3 in C minor, with E. Powers Biggs at the organ. This massive work, unfortunately lush and romantic in the French tradition, was conducted by Mr. Munch on the occasion of its first visit to Boston. At that time it was praised more for the nobility of the conductor's interpretation than for its contents, and the same verdict will be brought in here. The orchestra, with Mr. Biggs rendering eloquent assistance, gave it a rich, full-bodied performance, and the audience was most enthusiastic.

The final concert in this series takes place on April 16.

mphony Preview

Thompson's Third For Week End

Randall Thompson, whose Third Symphony will be heard here for the first time when played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its week-end concerts in Symphony Hall.

"It is a commentary on modern music," said Randall Thompson, whose third symphony is being given its first Boston performance this week end by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "that it often becomes so involved that only the virtuoso can play it. We don't lose in quality by writing clearly and simply. We gain."

"Simplicity," he continued in an interview at Symphony Hall, "is for me a foremost principle in art."

Mr. Thompson, commissioned to write his third symphony by the Alice M. Ditson fund of Columbia University in 1945 when he was teaching at Princeton, found time to do no more than sketch in the first movement. Last year he completed the work between January and April while teaching at Harvard.

"I often worked as late as 3 a.m.," Mr. Thompson said. "After midnight I did little composing. But I found the early morning hours good for orchestrating."

* * *

Mr. Thompson's Third Symphony was first performed at Columbia University on May 15, 1949 by the CBS Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Thor Johnson. It was played in Rochester in December, 1949. Last week it was heard in Cleveland, played by the Cleveland Symphony under the direction of George Szell. The Boston performance under Charles Munch will be its fourth.

Mr. Thompson describes the symphony as "emotional progress from the mood of elegiac reflection through action and repose to exuberance and gaiety."

The first of the four movements is entitled largo elegiaco. "It is an elegy," he explained, "written at the close of the war for the pain and suffering that was ours in spite of victory." Unlike the usual first movement, it has the texture of a prelude. In sonata form, it has only one principal theme and one principal rhythm pattern.

"The second movement—allegro appassionato; calmato ma tristo—has been called a scherzo," remarks Mr. Thompson. "I had not thought of it as such, myself."

* * *

Lento tranquillo provides the tempo of the third movement. Written in the Greek mixolydian mode, it has folk melody flavor. "I am especially fond of Appalachian mountain and early English folk music," he says. "However, this movement is not based on any specific folk song."

Strong rhythmic figures and dynamic contrasts characterize the last movement, gay and scherzo-like in mood. The entire symphony takes a half hour to perform.

Randall Thompson feels strongly the responsibility of the artist to uplift. "An artist should be above his time, not of it," he said. "The multitudinous unresolved problems which face us today are no excuse for drenching the artistic message in pessimism. Anybody can groan and sigh. But the turmoil should no more drag down the artist than it should the preacher or the writer.

"This does not imply shallow optimism. It is right to recognize evil conditions and to have one's music reflect feelings about them That is only half the picture. We must also remember that man is a creature endowed with endless capacity to rise above these difficulties. If an artist is going to deal in truth, the overcoming is as important as the turmoil."

M. H.

MUSIC

Francescatti Violin Soloist; Munch Plays New Thompson Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Zino Francescatti was violin soloist yesterday afternoon at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was heard in the Bach A minor Concerto, No. 1, and the Saint-Saens Concerto in B minor, No. 3, neither of which had been played at these concerts for more than 20 years. Charles Munch opened the program with Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto; gave first local performance of Randall Thompson's Third Symphony, and finished the afternoon with a glittering and plangent reading of Dukas' "The Apprentice Sorcerer."

Mr. Francescatti is one of those violinists, not too numerous, who are both fiddling virtuosi and excellent ensemble musicians. His technic is poised and secure; his tone ample and clear but not big or oily; his sense of style is irreproachable, and he never attempts to run away from the orchestra.

Furthermore his manner of playing is unaffected and easeful. Now you might think that these qualities would make his work pallid or unobtrusive. Quite the reverse is true, for this manner lends his playing authority and the beauty of simplicity. I can imagine how a straining prima donna of the instrument would try to blow up the thin, quaint old Concerto of Saint-Saens. Not Mr. Francescatti. He played it "straight" —and so did Mr. Munch and the orchestra, making a few small cuts in the finale—and it sounded very nice. As for Bach, that is a masterwork, and such is how it was performed. Mr. Francescatti was applauded with remarkable enthusiasm by the Friday audience.

Randall Thompson received the same sort of reception when his Symphony had been concluded, and for the first time in memory this reviewer was certain he heard some cheers. Imagine! Cheers for an American composer!

This Third Symphony, finished about a year ago, is well made, scored for orchestra with a sense of color that is attractive but not dazzling; compactly conceived, and set in a largely diatonic idiom — with some overlaid dissonance—that is pleasant by its plainness. Yet Mr. Thompson seems to share a weakness of many composers of the day, in the fact that, apart from the second movement, and parts of the fourth, the Symphony does not seem to have consistent inner motion. Patterns begin and are ended; the rhythms become animated and die out, leaving no impression of sustained line.

All the same, this work is decidedly easy to absorb, and while it may not prove to be "big," it is neither dry nor trivial. The opening largo elegiaco, the slower part of the second movement and all of the lento tranquillo are emotional, and the finale ends with a satisfying explosion of volume. All hats must be off to the brass players, who achieved some incredibly refined execution of a long passage for their muted instruments, pianissimo.

The Brandenburg Concerto, played in its original form of two movements with intervening chords (and not with the Sinfonia of "Christ Lag in Todesbandon" added as slow movement) was a joy from start to finish. So was the entire concert, for that matter.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 20th program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Zino Francescatti, violinist, was the soloist. The program: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G; Concerto No. 1 in A minor ..... Bach
Symphony No. 3 in A minor ..... Randall Thompson
Concerto No. 3 in B minor, Op. 61 ..... Saint-Saens
"The Sorcerer's Apprentice" ..... Dukas

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The thing that stands out in the music of Randall Thompson is absolute honesty. His Third Symphony, given its first Boston performance yesterday on a program featuring the exceedingly brilliant violin playing of Zino Francescatti, is an excellent case in point.

Mr. Thompson, now teaching at Harvard, is quoted in the program notes as having said "a composer's first responsibility is, and always will be, to write music that will reach and move the hearts of his listeners in his own day." I have been harping away at this very point myself so long that to find it in the mind of a working composer of Mr. Thompson's distinction and in a day when composers exhaust every brutal technical device to escape this responsibility, comes as a very grateful surprise.

It is more than likely the more progressive listeners will find this Third Symphony a little old fashioned, and in fact it is. Moreover, it is not a work informed with what might be termed transcendent creative vigor. Nor does it contain the richness of invention or the expressive power to sustain it through the conventional length of time it occupies. It is always a little suggestive of its influences, now Brahms, now Dvorak, now you don't quite know who. It is monophonic rather than fashionably contrapuntal, which is to say its emphasis is on accompanied melody, and is of extended texture rather than fashionably jagged or busy.

After his honesty, Mr. Thompson's melodic inspiration is by far his longest suit. Few of his contemporaries reveal so natural and so expressive a gift. This melos, too, is for the most part characteristically American, if there is such a thing. The slow movement is a splendid example of it; here, if anywhere, seems an indigenously American melodic conception, but the melodic ideas throughout are warm and charming. His next longest suit is craftsmanship; he uses his materials with impeccable taste. The result is a very well made symphonic work that, if it does not demonstrate great creative force, does actually reach and move the hearts of listeners of his own day. The composer was in the audience to see for himself that it did.

Zino Francescatti's violin playing is that of a consummate master. He appeared yesterday in two concertos (a delightful custom), the A minor Concerto of Bach and the B minor Concerto of Saint-Saens. In the Bach he achieved just the right quality of vigor and drive, doing the prolonged slow movement in a truly beautiful and reposed tone; in the Saint-Saens he achieved just the right combination of lushness and virtuosity, of romantic tenderness and high good spirits. He is, of course, one of the most technically accomplished violinists of the day—as witness the matchless set of harmonics in unison with the clarinet at the close of the andantino—but he is first of all a musical artist of immense sensibility.

A vigorous performance of Bach's Third Brandenburg concerto, marred at first by a rather heavy downbeat on Mr. Munch's part, and a most vivid traversal of Dukas' orchestral scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," lent additional joy to this fine concert. A complete reading of Bach's "St. John" Passion fills next week's program.

Third Symphony

Zino Francescatti Soloist In Bach, Saint-Saëns Works

By Harold Rogers

The older standards of criticism—that a work of art embody an idea, that this idea be beautiful, and that the work represent sound craftsmanship—may be open to attack by contemporary composers.

It is noteworthy that at least one composer is writing music that will measure up to these standards. Randall Thompson's Third Symphony, given its first Boston performance yesterday afternoon by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a work that embodies an idea—several ideas, since each of the four movements has at least one.

These ideas, beautiful in various degree, are expressed consecutively as the noble sadness of an elegy, an exuberant defiance, a plaintive folk-style melody, and a cheerful dancing finale.

* * *

Before criticizing Mr. Thompson for not employing a style that is purely contemporary, it is well to recall that even Bach was considered 100 years behind the times by some of his contemporaries. In a recent interview, Mr. Thompson said that a composer should not be of his time—he should be above his time. It makes little difference whether Bach was 100 years behind or ahead; his work transcends all time.

Mr. Thompson's craftsmanship is sound because it is based solidly on principles that have been proved through the centuries. They are naturally conservative. It is logical to assume that if these principles were acceptable in the past and are still so in the present, then it is possible that they will continue to be acceptable and successful in the future.

While Mr. Thompson's symphony places no strain on the modern ear, it cannot be considered old fashioned. There are contemporary touches, threaded all the way through, especially in the close harmonies given the brass, that add interest and life. The audience yesterday accorded Mr. Thompson an enthusiastic reception. Time will tell whether he has written of his time, or above his time.

* * *

Mr. Munch's program, to be repeated this evening in Symphony Hall, is something of a potpourri. Employing the full string orchestra, he opened with a crystalline reading of Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto.

Then the soloist, Zino Francescatti, appeared in Bach's Violin Concerto No. 1 in A minor, and displayed what may be called a phosphorescent tone, emitting light without heat. But it is an attractive light of many colors.

After the Thompson symphony Mr. Francescatti returned to the stage to play Saint-Saëns' Concerto No. 3 in B minor. This he tossed off with great ease, delightfully scaling the florid passages to dizzy heights. His handling of the arpeggios in harmonics was unusually accurate and impressive, as was his superb work on the upper reaches of the fiddle's G string. The audience recalled him again and again to the stage for applause.

Mr. Munch closed with a frenzied reading of Dukas' "L'Aprenti Sorcier." With his baton arm spinning, whether to the right or to the left, he churned the players to a frantic pitch. Sound poured out by the bucketloads. Symphony Hall was drenched in a flood.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall will be long remembered for three exciting events—the excellent violin playing of Zino Francescatti, a beautiful new symphony by Randall Thompson, and a new facet in the personality of Charles Munch, revealed for the first time.

The soloist, Zino Francescatti, was heard in two concerti, Bach's Concerto No. 1, in A minor and Saint-Saens' Concerto No. 3, in B minor, op. 61. At this date one can find little left to praise in this great violinist. He has everything that a great artist has and more. His clean, clear, bright tone is perfect for Bach and his musical taste almost made the run-of-the-mill Saint-Saens sound like brilliant music.

Randall Thompson's Symphony No. 3, in A minor, had its first local hearing yesterday. This work reveals anew a composer who is a superior craftsman, a true creative genius, and—heaven be praised—a contemporary composer who is not afraid of a good melody. The first three movements, sad in character, are not of the cloyingly sentimental variety but are of a lofty, noble and tragic sadness. Since the symphony was first sketched in 1944, when the fury of the second World war was at its height, it is easy to understand why the composer is so successful in conveying quiet sorrow in music so beautiful. However, the final movement ends on a high note of triumph and jubilation (inhibited one feels at times, perhaps) but lively and happy, nevertheless.

After the Saint-Saens' Concerto, Mr. Munch led the orchestra through Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" in which was possibly the most rollicking performance of the piece ever heard in Symphony Hall.

Amusements

MUSIC

Munch Leads Glorious Performance of Bach's "St. John" Passion

By CYRUS DURGIN

[illegible] soundly moving occasion as the Good Friday performance of Bach's "St. John Passion" leaves one searching for the words adequately to describe it. For this dramatic narrative of the Christian condemnation, masterpiece [illegible] expressive, inventive resource and [illegible] beauty of expression. Furthermore, it was given a truly glorious performance and one that was reverential in manner.

This first season of Charles Munch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be remembered for many fine achievements, and high among them will be this revival of a score unheard here in these dimensions since the orchestra's Bach-Handel Festival of 1935. Mr. Munch's reading was at once intensely dramatic and devotional, a dazzling blend of poetic eloquence and devotional humility. In sum, it was an artistic revelation of [illegible] power, the magnitude of the Christian tragedy, the mastery of a superb musical equipment and the triumphant genius of Bach, the greatest creative musician who ever lived.

The first of Bach's five Passions, this according to the text of St. John, is smaller in scope than the vast "St. Matthew" Passion, but it is no less great in its musical quality and no less incandescent in the force of its expression. The soaring contrapuntal choruses, the intensity of the Evangelist's recitative, the awesome, other-wordly nature of Jesus' speech, the grace of the solo arias and above all, the overwhelming dedication and humility of those noble chorale, leave one humbled and silent.

Bach accomplished all this with the most modest of resources, his orchestra limited to strings and woodwinds. But with the overwhelming mastery of genius he was able, among other things, to make even the simple chords for harpsichord and organ devices of high eloquence.

The Harvard and Radcliffe singers, a small but well-selected chorus, had been superbly trained by Mr. Woodworth. They responded to Mr. Munch's demands with sensitivity and tonal beauty, although as in most choruses today, the tenors and basses were less resonant than one could have desired.

Mr. Lloyd covered himself with credit as he sang beautifully a long and very difficult role, and projected the German text with admirable clarity. Mr. Rothmueller, obviously a good musician, sang the utterances of Jesus with a peculiarly veiled tone that was absolutely right, but which was less suited, perhaps, not a defect, to his aria. It was a joy to hear not only the sterling voice but the meticulous phrasing of Miss Addison's rhythm and phrasing.

Miss Elias was a little broad of tone now and again, but in the main she sang well indeed. Mr. Hurshell voiced the lines of Peter and Pilate sonorously. Equally [illegible] were the nuances of Mr. Pinkham's work at the harpsichord and those of Mr. Zighera's playing of the viola da gamba. Mr. Biggs at the organ was another outstanding member of the ensemble. The reduced numbers of the Boston Symphony were impeccable.

Mr. Munch made a number of changes within the various numbers, and these included certain of the chorales. They did not do violence to the whole, however. It was requested in the program that there be no applause, and, thank Heaven, this was observed except for a little and quickly hushed handclapping at the very end. The "St. John" Passion will be repeated tonight.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 21st program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was devoted to Bach's "St. John Passion," in which the following were the guest artists: David Lloyd, tenor; Marko Rothmueller, bass; Adele Addison, soprano; Rosalind Elias, contralto; Edmond Hurshell, bass; Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba; E. Power Biggs, organ; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It would be hard to think of an observance of Good Friday more elevated in spirit, more truly devotional and more sublimely beautiful than the performance at this 21st pair of symphony concerts of Sebastian Bach's "St. John Passion." There is no way of conveying the impact, musical and spiritual, this momumental work of art develops in the minds and hearts of its hearers during its two-hour traversal.

The pattern is familiar enough: the story of the Passion of Christ told by the Evangelist in recitative over instrumental cadences while surrounded by all the characters of the drama — the tumultuous, implacable crowds, the soldiers, the high priests, the dismayed Peter, the perplexed Pontius Pilate and Jesus himself, alone a symbol of infinite calm. Contrasted with the violent outbursts and emotional tensions of the narrative itself, as told in the recitative and in the great choral fantasies, are the incomparably beautiful lyric meditations interspersed throughout for solo voices and the reverent comments, as from a distant world, of the chorales.

It is how Bach orders this material, as well as how he illuminates it in the music itself, that remains an unceasing wonder. For although the St. John Passion is one of the weakest of the Gospels in its treatment of the Passion, Bach seized on the most striking aspect of it in its acute repertorial emphasis on the trial of Jesus, and in doing so made this a far more vivid experience than that of the more contemplative — and certainly greater — "St. Matthew Passion." Its characters are more impersonated, its crowds unrulier and more ruthless, its movement swifter and more contained.

Though the narrative itself contains musical beauties of indescribable effect, as witness the pictorial writhings of the melodic line on the word "scourge," and of the anguished adagio on the phrase "he went out and wept bitterly," the major miracles are contained in the choral effects and in the solo arias. I know of no more extraordinary a moment in all music than that of the bass aria "Betrachte, meine Seele" with its accompaniment for lute (harpsichord, here): no more sublime a moment than "Es ist vollbracht" with its viola da gamba obligato: no more exciting a moment than the chorus "Lasset uns den nicht zertheilen" with its syncopated off-beats: no more evocative a moment than the bass aria with the chorus whispering "wohin?"

This was, unquestionably, a very great performance of the work: perhaps the best one possible to English-speaking performers. Mr. Munch, with an extraordinary ear for the subtleties of the word—which we discovered so forcibly in Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake"—conceives the work at once as a religious rite of extreme devotion and a musico-dramatic experience to be lived vividly. He never allowed theatricality, however; on the contrary, he sought always to keep his forces at a generally low dynamic level. The soloists, thus, never had a chance to display their voices as such, which, under the circumstances, was entirely appropriate.

They did beautifully nonetheless, David Lloyd, covering himself with honor in his brilliant conception of the Evangelist. His voice is remarkably expressive of poignancy and conviction, and is of the finest musical quality moreover. Marko Rothmueller's performance of the role of Jesus was not less than extraordinary, while his solo arias, though occasionally taking him out of his best range, were fine. Adele Addison, Rosalind Elias and Edmond Hurshell, all exceedingly accomplished, lent additional authority and beauty to the performance.

The chorus of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, meantime, much reduced for the occasion, never sang better in all its career. It fulfilled Mr. Munch's exceptionally exacting demands with utter unanimity, achieving exactitude of attack, perfect balance and, above all, a most beautiful tone quality in pianissimo. Alfred Zighera must be singled out, also, for his playing of the viola da gamba; such a tone can be heard rarely in a lifetime. It may be added that Mr. Munch made a few cuts in the score, dropping a few arias, chorales and some recitative, but in doing so adding to the overall impact of the work.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 5 - 1950

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Heard in Season's Final R.I. Concert

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, presented its fourth and final concert of the current season in Providence last evening at the state Auditorium. The 305th concert in Providence ended a season of getting acquainted with Charles Munch and with the new auditorium. The verdict on both has been most favorable.

This concert marked the first time that a policy of making latecomers wait outside until the end of the number has been successfully applied at these concerts. The effect of unbroken continuity was most refreshing and it is hoped that the policy will be maintained vigilantly in coming seasons.

The program consisted of Handel's "Water Music" suite arranged by Hamilton Harty, and the Beethoven Symphony No. 7, Opus 92 before Intermission, with two Ravel works, "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and the "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet suit no. 2, ending the program.

The opening Allegro of the Handel set a brilliant tone for the evening which Mr. Munch maintained through the lovely "Air" and a really poetic interpretation of the "Hornpipe" to the final "Allegro" where the brasses showed to magnificent advantage. The brasses had a solo bow for it, too, which was certainly deserved.

Mr. Munch gave a spirited reading of the Beethoven Symphony No. 7. His tempo in the slow movement was more rapidly paced than some, emphasizing the dance quality of the work as a whole rather than using that movement as a rather somber contrast. Mr. Munch kept the rhythm emphasis of the work uniformly apparent, giving a sparkle to the third movement and making the fourth movement very exciting.

The French works which ended the concert and the season were presumably chosen to show Mr. Munch at his Gallic best. In the "Valse" series, however, Ravel apparently let the conductor down. The audience let it pass almost without applause, with considerable reason. It would seem that this work has not yet attained the status of a real classic, which leaves it in a twilight zone where the circumstances for which it was written no longer obtained and the gentle irony and disillusion running through it seem incredibly pale. The world of 1910 seemed somehow unreal as mirrored in this work in spite of Mr. Munch's efforts, which were heroic.

The "Daphnis et Chloe", written earlier, on the other hand, seems secure as a classic in the symphonic repertoire and it was given a brilliant reading and received an enthusiastic response, ending the concert and the season on a fine height. Mr. Munch received practically an ovation.

The concert was broadcast by station WPJB, the fm station of the Providence Journal Company.

Passion at Symphony

Harvard-Radcliffe Chorus Sings Bach Work Under Munch

By Harold Rogers

To mark the Easter season, Charles Munch has come forward with a superlative production of Bach's Passion According to St. John. Yesterday's performance in Symphony Hall was more than a superb concert; it was an exalting occasion. Mr. Munch prohibited applause, thus maintaining a religious atmosphere.

For this great work the Boston Symphony Orchestra is assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, under the direction of G. Wallace Woodworth. The orchestra is supported instrumentally by Daniel Pinkham at the harpsichord; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba; and E. Power Biggs at the organ.

Though composed circa 1723 and patterned after traditions long established, the St. John Passion is not limited to any epoch. It is one of the most inspired musical utterances of our western civilization.

* * *

Bach establishes a mood of dramatic intensity at the outset with a strongly accented melisma over a sustained pedal point. The singers, responding to Mr. Munch's baton, performed this chorus, as well as those that followed, with an incisive attack, clean enunciation, balanced phrasing, and neat release. Enough cannot be said for the excellent quality of the choral singing.

The recitatives, generally accompanied by a continuo of harpsichord and cello, were carried mainly by David Lloyd, tenor, and Marko Rothmüller, bass, heard respectively as the Evangelist and as Jesus.

Mr. Lloyd was in fine voice, displaying his usual limpid and ringing tone. When singing Mahler, Beethoven, or Bach, his German penetrates with difficulty the thickness of the orchestral fabric. In opera, however, his English or Italian is more successful.

Mr. Rothmüller's lowest notes have a way of dropping almost out of sight. But otherwise his voice is rich and well-controlled. His presentation of Jesus' words was humble and dignified, giving the correct air of strength, gentleness, and nobility.

Rosalind Elias, in her contralto aria, "Chains of bondage," displayed a tone unusual for its lushness and warmth. The woodwinds gave her excellent support. Adele Addison's lyric soprano held beautiful discourse with Georges Laurent's flute in her aria, "I follow in gladness." Edmond Hurshell as Pilate made impressive use of his booming basso.

* * *

One does not usually think of Bach as a dramatist; yet in several of his choruses he achieves strong effects of tension and suspense. There are the hysterical cries of the mob in the chorus, "Away with him, crucify him!" There are the soft, querulous cries of "Where? Where?" coming in unexpectedly while the bass soloist sings, "Haste, haste, poor souls ensnared in treason." There is the frenetic jabbering of the soldiers as they cast lots for Jesus' robe.

Though Mr. Munch deleted a few of the chorales, there were six magnificent ones included. He achieved dramatic pauses in two of them—"O mighty love" and "Thy name is shining on me." The a cappella chorale, "Ah! whence this hatred shown thee?" was set forth in poignant pianissimo. The manifold modulations of the final, "Ah! Lord, when my last end is come" resounded in an exultant tutti.

Oct 1950

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The performance of Bach's Passion According to St. John by the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, Boston Symphony Orchestra and assisting soloists in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was more than just another week end concert in the symphony series. It was a devout observance of Good Friday, sung with sincerity, and listened to solemnly by an audience which, for once, refrained from any applause either at the intermission or at the end of the program.

There were many people who contributed to the inspiring rendition of this seldom heard masterwork. Charles Munch was the obvious source of much of the inspiration on the part of the chorus, and he also held singers and orchestra together by an exact, and at times, a meticulous beat. There were five young soloists who sang with understanding and first-rate musicianship. David Lloyd sang the taxing part of the Evangelist, while the role of Jesus was interpreted by Marko Rothmuller. Edmond Hurshell took the parts of both Peter and Pilate. Adele Addison and Rosalind Elias were the soprano and contralto soloists.

Particularly praiseworthy was Mr. Lloyd's following of the dramatic lines of the narration, with an effective climax in the description of the severed veil of the temple. Mr. Rothmuller sang the words of Jesus with quiet dignity and an admirable sense of devotion. Miss Addison was particularly appealing in her final aria while Miss Elias and Mr. Hurshell each offered moments of telling interpretation of the text.

Also adding much to the beauty of the performance were the accompaniments on the harpsichord by Daniel Pinkham, on the organ by E. Power Biggs, and on the viola da gamba by Alfred Zighera. The final chorale, with the organ coming in full-voiced, provided a finale not likely to be forgotten soon.

The most impressive part of the afternoon, however, was the beauty of the choral singing. I have never heard the young members of the Radcliffe Society achieve such beautiful buoyancy of tone. In both the softer chorales and in the more dramatic passages the chorus was a tonal delight and it was equally capable in such precise matters as attacks, releases, and in German diction. The members of both organizations reflected the excellent preparation for this event by their director, G. Wallace Woodworth. With such intensive training, and with such dynamic leadership provided by Mr. Munch, it is no wonder that the inspired writings of the old Cantor of Leipsic were done with such full justice yesterday.

HARRY LAWTON.

[102]

Apr 15 Her

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 22d program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Jennie Tourel, contralto, and David Garen, tenor. The program:

Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor ..... Bach-Respighi
Kentucky Spring ..... Roy Harris
"Das Lied von der Erde" ..... Mahler

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Whatever else may be said about Roy Harris' "Kentucky Spring," yesterday receiving its first Boston performance as conducted by the composer himself, it is anything but pretentious.

Mr. Harris has evidently here sought what might be called musical entertainment of mood, the mood being an evocation of the sights and sounds of a southern springtime, the entertainment being the skill and wit employed in the contriving. On the whole I would say there is more skill than wit in the piece, and this skill is itself quite individual, which is to say that Mr. Harris' musical language is nothing if not personal.

"Kentucky Spring" takes the form of an orchestral scherzo with a long middle section of sustained nature (that begins to sag in interest somewhere along the line) and a series of dance-like episodes culminating in a pompous peroration consisting of a slightly disguised "My Old Kentucky Home." The melodic material, which also includes a few allusions to Stephen Foster, jumps about from instrument to instrument to give the whole a slightly patchy but not uninteresting character as these melodic fragments are engagingly hill billy. It is, in short, a lesser work that is frankly light in tone, and in a day when composers feel compelled to wrestle with mighty concepts, this is all to the good. I got the impression that the homespun Mr. Harris, appearing in what looked like a homespun tweed as blue as Kentucky fescue, didn't get anywhere near as much out of his piece as conductor as he put into it as composer, but it was a good, honest performance of an unimportant but not unattractive piece.

Richard Burgin, who has made Mahler's towering "Song of the Earth" his own, could hardly have had a more impressive pair of soloists than Jennie Tourel and David Garen. I find it hard, in listening to this immensely affecting work, to obscure the memory of the up-to-now ultimate performance of Bruno Walter with the Vienna Philharmonic as recorded for Columbia with Kerstin Thorborg and Charles Kullman the soloists. It is not that Mr. Burgin does not understand the work; it is simply that for all the compassion, the warmth and conviction of his reading, it fails to strike with the heart-rending impact that is in this meditation on the transitory joys of the world.

Miss Tourel herself, one of the greater vocalists of the day and perhaps the greatest interpretatively, soared over the whole in spirit. She characterized every subtlety, every luminous moment, every melancholy reflection of the poetry, doing so meanwhile in her most expressively beautiful contralto voice. David Garen, though often covered by the orchestral tone, was especially fine in the sections "Of Youth" and "The Drunkard in Springtime." His enunciation was also splendid, his tone quality excellent and his artistic comprehension very effective. Thus, despite the high order of the orchestral performance, this was largely a soloist's day.

It is so seldom we hear one of the Bach transcriptions that are so routine in other cities (and far be it from me to urge the custom here!) that Respighi's orchestration of the C minor Passacaglia and Fugue sounded pretty good. It is, granted, inflated and of dubious taste, but the thematic material is so grand it hardly matters. Mr. Munch returns next week with a program that includes Weber's Overture to Oberon, Honegger's Concerto da Camera for flute, English horn and strings, Thomson's "Louisiana Story" (the composer conducting), and three Wagnerian pieces.

'Kentucky Spring' Preview—Foss With

Harris to Conduct Own Music At Symphony Hall This Week

By Harold Rogers

Only a handful of American composers are writing in what may be called—at long last—a pure American idiom. Roy Harris is one of them and one of the best. Since a man's music is the expression of his individuality, pure American music will naturally proceed from the indigenous American.

Roy Harris is to contemporary American music what Carl Sandburg is to contemporary American letters. The two men, as a matter of fact, have much in common. Both are homespun characters, products of the West, speakers for the people. Both are genial, genuine, and unpretentious. They know what they want to say, and they say it simply, honestly, and with conviction.

* * *

Yesterday noon in Symphony Hall Mr. Harris took the Boston Symphony Orchestra through a rehearsal of his "Kentucky Spring," a composition equal in length to Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony. He will conduct the first Boston performance of this work at the concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Mr. Harris wrote "Kentucky Spring" on commission by the Louisville Symphony Orchestra. A year ago he conducted this group in the première. He enjoys writing on commission—so much so that he has written nothing that wasn't on commission since 1933.

"'Kentucky Spring' is not programmatic," Mr. Harris explained. "It is a pastoral—a large scherzo in four sections, though the word scherzo is somewhat misleading. The second and third sections would correspond to the first and second trios in a scherzo.

"In the first two sections I have tried to capture the mood of pantheistic spring—full of fantasy—not related to mankind in the sense of being related to the dance. I have tried to capture the nostalgia of spring, to get a clear quality from nature itself."

In the third section Mr. Harris tried to get the color of southern society. His grandfather was a Kentuckian. Twice in this work he quotes briefly from Stephen Foster's "Old Folks at Home," but the quotations are not literal melodically or harmonically. The casual listener may not even recognize them as quotations.

"The last section is of a dance nature," he said. "It begins with a long, puckish fugato. As it gathers momentum, it gets teeth in it, becoming saltier and saltier."

* * *

Mr. Harris's scores hold unusual interest from a visual standpoint. They are impeccably neat and accurate. The great amount of white space on the page indicates the economical nature of his instrumentation.

"I have tried to gain clear and precise colors instead of thickness of texture. In matters of orchestration, my first great lesson was gained from a study of Debussy's 'Afternoon of a Faun.' While studying in France I went through the works of the German romanticists, including Mahler and Bruckner. Then I got a score of the 'Faun' and was amazed by Debussy's simplicity. From then on I have tried to work for clarity."

But even though Mr. Harris's scores resemble Debussy's for economy and Beethoven's for architecture, his music is original, reminiscent of no other composer, no other school. It is an embodiment of American vitality.

John Brook

Roy Harris rehearsing the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his "Kentucky Spring," which he will conduct at the Symphony Hall concerts this week end.

950 Prog Apr 15

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Spring was wooed by the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon, but that vernal season remained a bit coy, both within and without. On the program stood Roy Harris' "Kentucky Spring," which received its first Boston performance under the composer's direction. After intermission Richard Burgin, conductor of the current pair of concerts, offered Mahler's symphonic song cycle, "Das Lied von der Erde," last done at Symphony Hall, and also under Mr. Burgin's direction in 1943.

At that time, however, he substituted for Dr. Koussevitzky at short notice. This was his own show. Anyway, while not primarily concerned with spring save in one of its six sections, "The Song of the Earth" makes more than one reference to it. It is the beauty of the earth in spring that makes poet and composer so reluctant to part company with it.

Mr. Harris' tone poem, if that is the proper name for it, was commissioned by the Louisville Symphony and first performed by it just a year ago. There are two brief quotations from Stephen Foster, otherwise the composer was on his own. And when we judge him by the standards of Schumann, Wagner, Mahler and even Goldmark, his response to spring seems a bit cold and calculated. The spring we heard in his measures yesterday was closer to the Boston than the Kentucky variety.

We should be grateful to Mr. Burgin for giving us "The Song of the Earth," that we had heard only three times before, although it is one of the acknowledged masterpieces of the 20th century. Mr. Burgin is a devoted Mahlerite, he undoubtedly loves and feels this music. To transmit this affection and emotion is another matter, and there was the rub. The performance was a bit on the tepid side and I am afraid that the lion's share of the blame must fall not upon Mr. Burgin and the orchestra but on the solo singers. They were, to put it bluntly, not quite up to snuff.

In the previous performance here the exacting contralto part fell to Jennie Tourel, who has returned to it this week. Neither then nor yesterday did she seem the ideal singer for the music, which takes both greatness of voice and greatness of soul and imagination. On both counts Miss Tourel fell short. Equally demanding, and from a purely vocal standpoint, more demanding, is the tenor part. It was assigned yesterday to a well-intentioned young man of Czechoslovakian birth, Darid Garen, who had appeared in Tanglewood but not in Boston. This music requires a tenor who is also a poet, endowed with a voice of round and luscious quality. In this particular assignment the vocal organ of Mr. Garen seemed dry and unresonant. Moreover, with these small calibre singers Mr. Burgin must perforce keep Mahler's orchestra down. The afternoon began, by the way, with Respighi's inflated version of Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor. It was sonorously set forth.

RETAILING DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 13 1950

Cites RCA's Gains in LP Record Field

Barkmeier Restates Firm's Policy on 45 and 33 1-3 RPM Discs

RCA Victor is in the 45 rpm and 33⅓ long-playing record business to stay, Paul A. Barkmeier, vice-president and general manager of the record department, emphasized yesterday in a re-statement of the firm's policy.

Speaking at a press luncheon in the Hotel Warwick, New York, Mr. Barkmeier said that since the introduction of the 45 record a year ago the firm has built its manufacture and sales of the discs to a going rate of 30 million annually. He also said that more than 1 million 45 rpm turntables have been sold.

At the present time, Mr. Barkmeier declared, all major recording companies except two, and a large number of smaller manufacturers are now making the 45 rpm record, while more than 70 instrument manufacturers have incorporated the 45 rpm speed in their instruments.

Announcing RCA Victor's second list of 25 long play records, which will be available in retail stores by the end of April, George R. Marek, assistant to Mr. Barkmeier, stated that by July or shortly thereafter, RCA Victor plans to initiate simultaneous release of classical music on all three speeds.

Included in RCA Victor's second list of 25 long play releases are nine symphonies, 10 symphonic suites, four concertos, four sonatas, one instrumental quartet, two overtures, two symphonic poems, and one choral work, supplemented by a special release of six symphonic works recorded by Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra especially for the nationwide tour commencing tomorrow with a concert in Carnegie Hall, New York, and the debut recording for RCA Victor of Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MUSIC

Mahler's "Song of the Earth" at Symphony; Harris Leads Own Work

By CYRUS DURGIN

Gustav Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," Roy Harris' "Kentucky Spring" and the Bach Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, as orchestrated by Respighi, make one of the most unusual programs of the season for the Boston Symphony concerts this week. Bach and Mahler are conducted by Richard Burgin, while Mr. Harris directs the first Boston performances of his own music. The soloists for "The Song of the Earth" are mezzo-soprano Jennie Tourel and tenor David Garen.

I can think of but one word, and that over-worked, to describe Miss Tourel's qualities of voice and musicianship: wonderful. Her easy and deeply expressive delivery of a very difficult part shone like a light through what was in general a rather tame performance of Mahler's great score. To be sure, a voice of bigger size and darker color would be ideal for this passionate music, with its contrasting moods of reflective melancholy, as in "The Lonely One in Autumn," of sheer delicacy in "Of Beauty" and of the deeply moving resignation of the wonderful last movement "The Farewell."

But voice alone is not enough for so rare an evocation of poetry as "The Song of the Earth." The finest musicianship and style are demanded, and those Miss Tourel gave us in fullest measure. No one will forget, very soon, the soaring emotion, as Miss Tourel sang it, of the climactic melody of the first movement, which begins with the impassionate outburst of 'O Herr Freund' and ends with the repeated 'Ewig' as well, upon the word 'Ewig' as the soul at peace in the prospect of seeing earth no more.

As Miss Tourel sang exactly, Mr. Garen was disappointing in his failure to be always accurate. A good many phrases were lost in the torrential orchestration. His voice is not quite robust enough to cope with Mahler's vocal line and more than once he was wide of the beat.

It is not ingratitude to make reservations about Mr. Burgin's conducting of the work, although it it not been for his devotion to Mahler we should not have had the performance of this unique and personal masterpiece. But the truth is "The Song of the Earth" requires the touch of the virtuoso conductor, more intensity, and a somewhat faster pace in the slow sections than Mr. Burgin mustered.

Yesterday's performance was very good, but inescapably bound to the earth which Mahler was writing about. For some reason the conductor was much on the slow side in his tempi even in the Bach Passacaglia. Perhaps this all indicated an off day, and the story tonight may be different.

[103]

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
APR 20 1950

Music

Artisans And Artists

By FREDERICK J. KOUNTZ

IT WAS about a year and a half ago that Charles Munch, now conductor of the Boston Orchestra, and the National Orchestra of France concluded their memorable 2-night stand in the Peristyle of the Museum of Art. Those concerts were the occasion of our first acquaintance with Mr. Munch. They served also as an extraordinary opportunity to observe at first hand the matchless equilibrium which is developed out of the association of good French players with good French music.

Those who heard these concerts may recall that all the music of the two programs was French with the exception of a piece by Walter Piston which was composed for Mr. Munch and which was given its first playings in the National Orchestra's tour.

There is neither time nor space to recount now all the grandeurs of program material and execution which were displayed during those two evenings. But as an introduction to a consideration of the excellent qualities of contemporary French music—and its performance by Frenchmen—I should like to recall this particular exposition of Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2.

Maurice Ravel, because of the almost miraculous perfection of his technique, has been called the Swiss watchmaker of modern music. To him conception and execution represented only a single creative process. He was craftsman and artisan first of all. Roland-Manuel, the composer's friend, once observed that "the methods of this musician, his technique, and indeed his entire art imply a process of voluntary research and a distrust of inspiration."

* * *

THE greatest marvel of the Daphnis and Chloe music is that, gorgeously and sensuously colored as it is, it never becomes sodden or cloying. And that is so because there was combined in Ravel's work the artistic intellect which restrains and tempers the senses and the consummate skill of a most expert craftsman.

Now I have heard this music played as if it had been intended to be sodden and cloying. It has been given on occasion the kind of sensual treatment that makes its tonal colors lurid; that overpowers the compactness and conciseness of its development by sheer power; that makes impossible an exposition of the remarkable, enlarging tension that Ravel has incorporated into the music simply because it takes no account of the balance which alone makes the tension and the wonderful climax possible.

Mr. Munch and his French Orchestra did not play the piece in this fashion. Rather they displayed the respect of artisans for the work of an artisan. They produced a gorgeous coloration that was not allowed to become lurid, a sensuosity that did not become heavy or overbearing because it was not primarily of the senses but of the intellect. And they developed a climax that was as final and conclusive as Ravel had created it. There simply could be no more.

As I noted last week, we have heard during the year a large number of French performers; Mr. Munch was here again in his new post with the Boston Orchestra; Paul Paray conducted the Pittsburgh players; we heard Andre Marchal, the organist, Pierre Fournier, the cellist, the pianists, Robert and Gaby Casadesus, the Lowenguth Quartet, and Francis Poulenc and Pierre Bernac. Not all of them conducted and played only French music. And, in the case of Mr. Munch at least, the pure French conception was lost to a degree in the fact that he was conducting a magnificent orchestra which had been brought to its present level of virtuosity by the direction over 25 years of another and stronger personality.

But, with this one exception, there were apparent in all their performances the inherent French qualities that are in Ravel's music, that make themselves known in various ways in the music of Faurse, of Debussy, of Roussel, of Florent Schmitt, of Roger-Ducasse, of a dozen other Frenchmen whose works are not so well known, even of Stravinsky whose French training is frequently stronger than his Russian heritage.

These qualities evolve, I believe, out of the French sense that artisanship is basic to, a prerequisite of all artistry. That is to say that, before one sets out to compose or to play publicly the compositions of another, one should first learn how. Thus the characteristic French teaching seeks to develop first the technique of composing, of playing, of conducting. And conversely the normal Frenchman does not assay composing or playing or conducting until he has learned the fundamental techniques of those professions.

To one who suspects that this is mere flatulence I need cite only the case of the Columbia Concert Trio which lately closed the Museum's Chamber Music Series. These young people played a trio by Beethoven and one by Brahms. It is questionable that their technique was secure enough, or even existed in sufficient degree, to deal with lesser music than this. And, if they had any technical security at all, there was no doubt that their instruction had not been such as to enable them to apply this security to Beethoven and Brahms. They simply didn't know. But presumably they had studied their instruments, studied music. Where they studied or with whom is not specifically important. What is very important is that they are more or less representative of a kind of teaching, of the absence of a kind of personal judgement and taste that are not at all uncommon among contemporary composers and players.

* * *

IT IS THE great gift, the heritage of French musicians that they learn how to express themselves before they begin to speak in the language of music.

It is a French correlary of this French theorem that with composers and players alike the matters of technique and personal inspiration are not separate entities of an art but are together in the art itself. Thus the soul and the heart are not exposed in themselves, in which state they are frequently incomprehensible, but through the intellect, in which manner they can communicate and be understood.

A keen sense of proportion is another mark of the French musician. Thus Poulenc says of French music, "We realize that sombreness and good humor and not mutually exclusive. Our composers too write profound music, but when they do it is leavened with that lightness of spirit without which life would be unendurable."

Harris Work at Symphony

Henry B. Sawyer

Services Tomorrow for Noted Financier

Services for Henry Buckland Sawyer, 79, of 274 Beacon st., Back Bay, noted Boston financier and trustee for a half century, who died Friday, will be held at Arlington Street Church at 2 tomorrow. Burial will be at Forest Hills Cemetery.

Mr. Sawyer, a native of Lowell, was treasurer and vice president of Stone & Webster, Inc., for 40 years, and a trustee of the New Haven Railroad for 10 years. He was a member of the Fall River Finance Commission and of the State Advisory Board of Education.

He was president and director of the New England Transportation Company and president of the Massachusetts Distributors. He was a member of Battery A, F. A., M. V. M., from 1896 until he retired as commander in 1906.

HENRY B. SAWYER

He was president of Hale House from 1900 to 1914 and founded Camp Hale, one of the first settlement house camps for boys in the United States. He was vice chairman of the Boston Red Cross committees in World War I and for three years was chairman of the distribution committee of the Boston Community Fund, shortly after it was started.

He leaves his wife, the former Georgia W. Pope of Boston; three children, Henry Jr., Avery and Mrs. Charles G. Mixter Jr., and nine grandchildren, all Brookline.

'Kentucky Spring' Heard With Composer Conducting

By Harold Rogers

While conversing about his "Kentucky Spring" a few days ago, Roy Harris said that it was an interlude, "a little grace piece," not to be considered among his more significant works. But Mr. Harris, when referring to his own writings, may be prone to understatement. True, his "Kentucky Spring" is not to be classed with his better symphonies, but it certainly has more significance than an interlude.

For Mr. Harris is a musical poet, and when he talks of America or things American, they naturally translate themselves in terms of poetry—American poetry. If Mr. Harris were to leave the word Kentucky out of his title, we might have some doubt as to the specific location of his poem, but we would have no doubt that he was speaking about springtime in America. It is pure American music—an expression we so dearly need in an age when it is so rare. For this reason it is significant, though we may later find it sandwiched between some of his more important works.

While a longer rehearsal period would doubtless have eliminated some of the rough edges, the piece went well when Mr. Harris took the Boston Symphony through it yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. This was its first performance since its première a year ago with the Louisville Symphony Orchestra.

A short work in four sections, it is mainly a vital, earthy expression of spring, though Southern society enters in the third section, and the finale is an out-and-out dance. This dance is interrupted at its height by a long fermata, then brought to a close with a short paean-like phrase, majestic and brilliant.

Richard Burgin opened the program with Respighi's orchestration of Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor. Through the application of a romantic Italian veneer, Bach was considerably remade in Respighi's image and likeness. The last half of the program was devoted to Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" with Jennie Tourel, contralto, and David Garen, tenor, as soloists.

Since the work is mainly a setting of "The Chinese Flute" by Hans Bethge, the form of the poetry tends to hold the composer within bounds that he would otherwise ignore. "Das Lied von der Erde" is long, true enough, but it does not sprawl as much of Mahler's output does.

Mr. Burgin and the singers gave the work a glowing sheen—like Chinese pagodas seen through a shimmering mist. It is music that could come to life and should come to life, but yesterday it lay dreaming, and it never awoke from its dream.

Munch Ends Fine Year With Boston Symphony

APR 29 1950

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the Friday afternoon series yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Every seat in the house was taken, and it seemed as if every subscriber and ticket buyer had made an effort to be present at this final concert to wish Charles Munch a fond and grateful au revoir until next fall.

The program was a good one, consisting of two symphonies, Beethoven's Sixth and the Brahms First. The audience wanted to take one good last look at Mr. Munch before he leaves for his Paris vacation, and he gave them a beautiful performance of these stock pieces to remember him by through the summer.

* * *

IN RETROSPECT, it seems proper at this time to take a close look at this year which has countenanced so many changes in this orchestra, an orchestra which is probably the best in America today and most certainly one of the greatest in the world.

Munch took on this job with great disadvantages. First, he was given an orchestra which was almost perfect. He was to keep it perfect. He was given a two-year contract which, to many candid observers, fairly screamed make good or else.

Second, he was successor to a king. Koussevitzky had vacated a place which seemed impossible to fill. Koussevitzky was the meat and whalebone of the orchestra, and whoever succeeded him did so at his own risk.

* * *

THE FIRST order Munch gave his men was to relax. Personality clashes between conductor and musician came to be a thing of the past. The gossamer thread and the sheet of steel is still there, but into the orchestra has crept a warmth and sensitivity of tone which the perfect orchestra lacked before.

There is a tone which is more integrated and balanced, and instead of a group of men struggling with alter egos, there is a blended unit of unmechanical individuals who are playing for their conductor and not pulling against him.

The fact that Munch was following Koussevitzky seemed rather to serve as an incentive to him than a drawback. After the first tense concert of the season, the comments in the corridors of Symphony Hall were diversified, but they all added up to one thing. Some said that Munch wasn't as colorful on the podium. Others said that they would never be able to get used to the new orchestra seating arrangement. Others said the orchestra sounded shop worn. Still others remarked that Munch had no oomph.

* * *

AFTER THE last concert of the season, the same people are expressing thoughts of another color. They have found out that Munch has a great deal of oomph, that they like the seating arrangement after all. They admit that Munch is as dynamic on the podium as anybody, and each remark is aptly punctuated with and I knew it all the time.

Charles Munch's sensitivity, humor, and profound musicianship has made itself felt very deeply in Boston. Right now he is the victor. He is in a position to call the cards from here on in, and this reviewer, for one, hopes he will.

F. S.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 22 1950

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

AT ITS final New York concert of the season the Boston Symphony under its new conductor Charles Münch played the usual excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet"—but in an unusual order which violated the progression of programmatic sense to achieve a progression of increasing brilliance and excitement: first the Love Scene, then the Queen Mab, and finally the sequence from Romeo Alone to Festivities at the Capulets'. The performances revealed the orchestra as still the marvelously sensitive and beautiful-sounding instrument created by Koussevitzky, and confirmed the impressions of Münch I had got previously from his records and broadcasts: that he has no feeling for the correct measure in whatever he does—an acceleration, a retardation, a pause; which amounts to saying that he is preoccupied with the detail of the moment, unguided and uncontrolled by a feeling for continuity and coherence in the entire sequence of details. This showed itself not only on a large scale in the excessively whipped-up tempo in Festivities at the Capulets', but even within single measures of the quiet opening section of the Love Scene (right after the introductory Capulet's Garden), each of which was not too small for a feverish acceleration and slackening of pace with expansion and contraction of sonority. And of the whipped-up Festivities one can say what a great musician said once of Münch's similar performance of the finale of Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony: "It's easy to make it exciting in double tempo; but the orchestra can't even play the notes correctly."

The one performance I heard over the air of Mahler's Symphony No. 8, in which Stokowski conducted the New York Philharmonic and assisting choruses and soloists, left me with the impression of failure on the gigantic scale of what was attempted in the work. The first part, the Veni, Creator Spiritus, was twenty-five minutes of frenetically apocalyptic ranting; the second, the final scene of Goethe's "Faust," was more agreeable, but went on saying pretty much the same thing over and over again for almost an hour, with no progression, no development, no emerging form.

The New York City Opera Company opened its spring season with Prokofiev's "The Love for Three Oranges"; and again statements like "I have a pain in the kidney" struck the audience—for reasons that eluded me—as terrifically funny, as did the humor that I found heavy, forced, and childish. The new work was Puccini's "Turandot," which impressed me again as the worst kind of trash, on which it was a sin to waste the cost of the elaborate production and the wear and tear on the singers' voices. Wagner would do less damage to the magnificently clear and powerful young voice of Dragica Martinis, who made her New York debut on this occasion, than the succession of high notes Puccini gives her to scream over the full orchestra as Turandot.

At the Y. M. H. A., I heard Bloch's Piano Quintet again after a number of years, and found that unlike some other works of his it had lost none of its power for me. It was played by Nadia Reisenberg and the Budapest Quartet; and I also had the pleasant surprise of hearing more agreeable tone and more sensitive phrasing from Roisman than on previous occasions.

On a Columbia LP record (ML-4216) are Haydn's Quartet Opus 64 No. 5 ("Lark") and the even finer Opus 76 No. 4 ("Sunrise"), beautifully played by the Budapest Quartet. The first, with treble drastically cut down, loses the unpleasant sharpness the sound had on 78; the second retains a little sharpness in loud passages, and is heavy in bass.

The Beethoven Sonata Opus 30 No. 2 for violin and piano performed by Szigeti and Horszowski (ML-2097) is much played and recorded, but a work I don't care for. Szigeti seems to have begun this recorded performance with the pinched, wiry, and quavering tone he often begins with, and also to have swung around toward the microphone in crescendos that come off the record explosive and ear-piercingly sharp, even with treble cut down. Tone and recorded sound are better in later movements; and the recording reproduces the balance of the two instruments in an excellent ensemble perfomance. The first side has a curiously whistling surface.

Beethoven's Violin Sonata Opus 30 No. 3, on the other hand, played by Spivakovsky and Cornman (ML-2089), is a work I am very fond of. It is played with less than the vitality it requires, but otherwise well; the recorded sound is well-balanced and, with treble cut down, agreeable. On the reverse side is a good performance by Spivakovsky of Bach's dull G minor Sonata for unaccompanied violin, which Szigeti, in the old Columbia set, made exciting with his style of performance.

An Allegro record (AL-19) offers Brahms's Piano Quartet Opus 26, a work I don't care for, well played by the New Friends of Music Quartet—Hortense Monath, piano, Bronislav Gimpel, violin, Frank Brieff, viola, and Jascha Bernstein, cello. The strings are well reproduced; the piano in the first two movements sounds shallow and far away behind the strings; in the last two its sound is properly placed and rounder. Surfaces are noisy.

107

Munch Conducts Wagner

Thomson's 'Louisiana Story' at Symphony

By Harold Rogers

In the penultimate concerts of he week end series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch has at last done what many of us had hoped he would do earlier. He has programmed Wagner. And he handles Wagner, as he does Tchaikovsky, by extracting the sentiment and discarding the slush of sentimentality.

Devoting the last half of his program to Wagner, Mr. Munch first played "Daybreak" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from the first act of "Götterdämmerung." Perhaps the easiest way to present Wagner, since so many conductors do it, is to allow the various orchestral elements to merge in a sensuous flood. The listener either willingly becomes inundated, or he must struggle against it in an attempt to keep his feet on solid ground.

* * *

But when Mr. Munch conducts Wagner, the listener need not sink nor struggle. The orchestral elements maintain their individuality. We can trace the paths of the constantly weaving lines. Here again we have Mr. Munch's remarkable clarity, in the focus of which no confusion can exist.

"A Siegfried Idyll," Wagner's birthday gift to Cosima, is one of those songful, Arcadian expressions into which a conductor can easily inject a great amount of syrupy emotion. But Mr. Munch evaded such banal pitfalls. He did not eliminate the emotion; he established it on a higher plane.

Mr. Munch made the most of Wagner's grandiloquence in his exciting reading of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The colors were brilliant, the brasses blatant, and the tempos ebullient.

* * *

Virgil Thomson took the podium to conduct the first performance at these concerts of a suite from his film score to "Louisiana Story." While this atmospheric, uncomplicated music is properly programmatic, when divorced from the film action it has difficulty in standing alone. In the film it was exactly right, far more original in its treatment than most film scores. Background music seldom has the virtue of such a scholarly approach or such competent craftsmanship. Not often do film composers think in terms of the pastoral, the chorale, the passacaglia or fugue, as Mr. Thomson has in the construction of his four movements.

But when listening to this music in the concert hall, one has the sensation that he is still hearing the background music to a film. It is pleasant, entertaining, and of considerable interest, but of no great significance either as a concert piece or as American music. Mr. Thomson's score was too exactly suited to its original purpose to be transplanted.

* * *

The program also includes Weber's overture to "Oberon" and the Concerto in B minor for Viola, an arrangement by Henri Casadesus of an eighteenth-century composition. Though attributed to Handel, there is internal evidence, according to musicologists, that it was written by an Italian.

Joseph de Pasquale, who played this work at the concert last Sunday, was again the soloist yesterday afternoon. An unfortunate lapse of memory in the last movement upset his usual surety. But otherwise his tone was beautifully produced—rich, warm, and eloquent.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Suite made from his music for the film "Louisiana Story" served yesterday to introduce Virgil Thomson to Symphony Hall. And not only did it grace this 23rd Friday matinee, it came close to saving it. Mr. Thomson, who has been shockingly neglected in these parts, conducted his orchestral suite, and displayed a practiced hand, receiving from the orchestra a fine response, and from the audience warm acclaim.

As I had occasion to regret yesterday, I did not see the film when it was shown here in Boston. From it Mr. Thomson has made a suite that stands on its own feet as music. And he has lent it a scholarly cast by assigning to the four movements such titles as Pastoral, Chorall, Passacaglia and Fugue. They would frighten some movie goers, but fortunately for them, these sections would not be so identified in the theatre. There are also subtitles which, with the program notes, make clear the score's intent. They are "The Bayou and the Marsh Buggy," "The Derrick Arrives," "Robbing the Alligator's Nest" and "Boy Fights Alligator."

Mr. Thomson has used some indigenous material and he has achieved the difficult task of writing music that is readily comprehensible to the average auditor without, however, condescending to him. In addition to its resourcefulness, its pictorial quality and its apparent suitability to its original purpose, this suite is expertly orchestrated. We were a long time making Mr. Thomson's acquaintance as symphonic composer. Perhaps now we can hear some of his other things.

Instead of the Concerto da Camera by Honegger, originally announced, the current program contains the B minor Viola Concerto attributed to Handel and played, as it was at last Sunday's concert, by the orchestra's first violist, Joseph De Pasquale. Mr. De Pasquale drew a blank in the last movement but managed to recover himself, and here his intonation was not all that it might have been. The first two movements, however, went well as regards tone, technique and interpretation, and Mr. De Pasquale once more proved his value to the orchestra. Except for the slow division, this concerto is routine 18th century stuff, regardless of its authorship.

The afternoon began and ended operatically. Mr. Munch started off with Weber's Overture to "Oberon" and ended with three Wagner excerpts: "Daybreak" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Goetterdaemmerung," "A Siegfried Idyll" and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." In the Weber, Mr. Munch went in for excesses in the matter of tempo and dynamics, but it was nothing to what he did in the excerpts from "Goetterdaemmerung" and "Meistersinger." By token of these performances, he is far too excitable to be a good Wagner conductor. Goaded to a frenzy, the brass got out of control, and the rest had to fight to make themselves heard. The "Idyll" went better, though it was rushed here and dragged there and the reading of it could not be described as wholly felicitous.

105

MUSIC

Munch Conducts Wagner —Virgil Thomson His "Louisiana Story" Music

By CYRUS DURGIN

Yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra had its ups and downs. It began with a tense, brilliant performance of the Weber Overture to "Oberon," with conductor Charles Munch at the top of his febrile form.

Then came the B minor Viola Concerto, attributed to Handel and edited by Henri Casadesus, with first violist Joseph DePasquale repeating the fine performance he had given of the work last Sunday.

All went well, and the slow movement sang in Heavenly fashion, until midway in the finale Mr. DePasquale evidently suffered a brief lapse of memory. But he quickly found his way again and the Concerto came to a spirited conclusion.

Interest began to wane during "Louisiana Story." This is the score for the similarly-titled motion picture, by the New York music critic Virgil Thomson, who conducted the first Boston performance of his own work.

Mr. Thomson orchestrates beautifully, in a manner like Ravel, but he doesn't have much to say except in the fugue which forms the last of the four movements. Otherwise, this score is merely a slickly-written tissue of modal cadences, repeated chords and rhythmico-melodic patterns, none of it at all original.

In a way, though, "Louisiana Story" is an ideal film score because you can absorb music and picture simultaneously, without using either eyes or ears. The orchestra seemed to play well for Mr. Thomson and he was cordially received.

The rest of the program was devoted to Wagner: "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Goetterdemmerung"; "A Siegfried Idyll" and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." All three were disconcertingly played. The tone was coarse and often too loud, the balance shoddy and the brass badly strident in more than a few crucial places. Even "A Siegfried Idyll," which went a little better than the rest, was without distinction and much refinement. Mr. Munch seemed interested only in tension and sound, and Wagner's eloquence [illegible]

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 22 1950

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

AT ITS final New York concert of the season the Boston Symphony under its new conductor Charles Münch played the usual excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet"—but in an unusual order which violated the progression of programmatic sense to achieve a progression of increasing brilliance and excitement: first the Love Scene, then the Queen Mab, and finally the sequence from Romeo Alone to Festivities at the Capulets'. The performances revealed the orchestra as still the marvelously sensitive and beautiful-sounding instrument created by Koussevitzky, and confirmed the impressions of Münch I had got previously from his records and broadcasts: that he has no feeling for the correct measure in whatever he does—an acceleration, a retardation, a pause; which amounts to saying that he is preoccupied with the detail of the moment, unguided and uncontrolled by a feeling for continuity and coherence in the entire sequence of details. This showed itself not only on a large scale in the excessively whipped-up tempo in Festivities at the Capulets', but even within single measures of the quiet opening section of the Love Scene (right after the introductory Capulet's Garden), each of which was not too small for a feverish acceleration and slackening of pace with expansion and contraction of sonority. And of the whipped-up Festivities one can say what a great musician said once of Münch's similar performance of the finale of Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony: "It's easy to make it exciting in double tempo; but the orchestra can't even play the notes correctly."

The one performance I heard over the air of Mahler's Symphony No. 8, in which Stokowski conducted the New York Philharmonic and assisting choruses and soloists, left me with the impression of failure on the gigantic scale of what was attempted in the work. The first part, the Veni, Creator Spiritus, was twenty-five minutes of frenetically apocalyptic ranting; the second, the final scene of Goethe's "Faust," was more agreeable, but went on saying pretty much the same thing over and over again for almost an hour, with no progression, no development, no emerging form.

The New York City Opera Company opened its spring season with Prokofiev's "The Love for Three Oranges"; and again statements like "I have a pain in the kidney" struck the audience—for reasons that eluded me—as terrifically funny, as did the humor that I found heavy, forced, and childish. The new work was Puccini's "Turandot," which impressed me again as the worst kind of trash, on which it was a sin to waste the cost of the elaborate production and the wear and tear on the singers' voices. Wagner would do less damage to the magnificently clear and powerful young voice of Dragica Martinis, who made her New York debut on this occasion, than the succession of high notes Puccini gives her to scream over the full orchestra as Turandot.

At the Y. M. H. A., I heard Bloch's Piano Quintet again after a number of years, and found that unlike some other works of his it had lost none of its power for me. It was played by Nadia Reisenberg and the Budapest Quartet; and I also had the pleasant surprise of hearing more agreeable tone and more sensitive phrasing from Roisman than on previous occasions.

On a Columbia LP record (ML-4216) are Haydn's Quartet Opus 64 No. 5 ("Lark") and the even finer Opus 76 No. 4 ("Sunrise"), beautifully played by the Budapest Quartet. The first, with treble drastically cut down, loses the unpleasant sharpness the sound had on 78; the second retains a little sharpness in loud passages, and is heavy in bass.

The Beethoven Sonata Opus 30 No. 2 for violin and piano performed by Szigeti and Horszowski (ML-2097) is much played and recorded, but a work I don't care for. Szigeti seems to have begun this recorded performance with the pinched, wiry, and quavering tone he often begins with, and also to have swung around toward the microphone in crescendos that come off the record explosive and ear-piercingly sharp, even with treble cut down. Tone and recorded sound are better in later movements; and the recording reproduces the balance of the two instruments in an excellent ensemble perfomance. The first side has a curiously whistling surface.

Beethoven's Violin Sonata Opus 30 No. 3, on the other hand, played by Spivakovsky and Cornman (ML-2089), is a work I am very fond of. It is played with less than the vitality it requires, but otherwise well; the recorded sound is well-balanced and, with treble cut down, agreeable. On the reverse side is a good performance by Spivakovsky of Bach's dull G minor Sonata for unaccompanied violin, which Szigeti, in the old Columbia set, made exciting with his style of performance.

An Allegro record (AL-19) offers Brahms's Piano Quartet Opus 26, a work I don't care for, well played by the New Friends of Music Quartet—Hortense Monath, piano, Bronislav Gimpel, violin, Frank Brieff, viola, and Jascha Bernstein, cello. The strings are well reproduced; the piano in the first two movements sounds shallow and far away behind the strings; in the last two its sound is properly placed and rounder. Surfaces are noisy.

10+ -

Munch Conducts Wagner

Thomson's 'Louisiana Story' at Symphony

By Harold Rogers

In the penultimate concerts of he week end series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch has at last done what many of us had hoped he would do earlier. He has programmed Wagner. And he handles Wagner, as he does Tchaikovsky, by extracting the sentiment and discarding the slush of sentimentality.

Devoting the last half of his program to Wagner, Mr. Munch first played "Daybreak" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from the first act of "Götterdämmerung." Perhaps the easiest way to present Wagner, since so many conductors do it, is to allow the various orchestral elements to merge in a sensuous flood. The listener either willingly becomes inundated, or he must struggle against it in an attempt to keep his feet on solid ground.

* * *

But when Mr. Munch conducts Wagner, the listener need not sink nor struggle. The orchestral elements maintain their individuality. We can trace the paths of the constantly weaving lines. Here again we have Mr. Munch's remarkable clarity, in the focus of which no confusion can exist.

"A Siegfried Idyll," Wagner's birthday gift to Cosima, is one of those songful, Arcadian expressions into which a conductor can easily inject a great amount of syrupy emotion. But Mr. Munch evaded such banal pitfalls. He did not eliminate the emotion; he established it on a higher plane.

Mr. Munch made the most of Wagner's grandiloquence in his exciting reading of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The colors were brilliant, the brasses blatant, and the tempos ebullient.

* * *

Virgil Thomson took the podium to conduct the first performance at these concerts of a suite from his film score to "Louisiana Story." While this atmospheric, uncomplicated music is properly programmatic, when divorced from the film action it has difficulty in standing alone. In the film it was exactly right, far more original in its treatment than most film scores. Background music seldom has the virtue of such a scholarly approach or such competent craftsmanship. Not often do film composers think in terms of the pastoral, the chorale, the passacaglia or fugue, as Mr. Thomson has in the construction of his four movements.

But when listening to this music in the concert hall, one has the sensation that he is still hearing the background music to a film. It is pleasant, entertaining and of considerable interest, but of no great significance either as a concert piece or as American music. Mr. Thomson's score was too exactly suited to its original purpose to be transplanted.

* * *

The program also includes Weber's overture to "Oberon" and the Concerto in B minor for Viola, an arrangement by Henri Casadesus of an eighteenth-century composition. Though attributed to Handel, there is internal evidence, according to musicologists, that it was written by an Italian.

Joseph de Pasquale, who played this work at the concert last Sunday, was again the soloist yesterday afternoon. An unfortunate lapse of memory in the last movement upset his usual surety. But otherwise his tone was beautifully produced—rich, warm, and eloquent.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Suite made from his music for the film "Louisiana Story" served yesterday to introduce Virgil Thomson to Symphony Hall. And not only did it grace this 23rd Friday matinee, it came close to saving it. Mr. Thomson, who has been shockingly neglected in these parts, conducted his orchestral suite, and displayed a practiced hand, receiving from the orchestra a fine response, and from the audience warm acclaim.

As I had occasion to regret yesterday, I did not see the film when it was shown here in Boston. From it Mr. Thomson has made a suite that stands on its own feet as music. And he has lent it a scholarly cast by assigning to the four movements such titles as Pastoral, Chorall, Passacaglia and Fugue. They would frighten some movie goers, but fortunately for them, these sections would not be so identified in the theatre. There are also subtitles which, with the program notes, make clear the score's intent. They are "The Bayou and the Marsh Buggy," "The Derrick Arrives," "Robbing the Alligator's Nest" and "Boy Fights Alligator."

Mr. Thomson has used some indigenous material and he has achieved the difficult task of writing music that is readily comprehensible to the average auditor without, however, condescending to him. In addition to its resourcefulness, its pictorial quality and its apparent suitability to its original purpose, this suite is expertly orchestrated. We were a long time making Mr. Thomson's acquaintance as symphonic composer. Perhaps now we can hear some of his other things.

Instead of the Concerto da Camera by Honegger, originally announced, the current program contains the B minor Viola Concerto attributed to Handel and played, as it was at last Sunday's concert, by the orchestra's first violist, Joseph De Pasquale. Mr. De Pasquale drew a blank in the last movement but managed to recover himself, and here his intonation was not all that it might have been. The first two movements, however, went well as regards tone, technique and interpretation, and Mr. De Pasquale once more proved his value to the orchestra. Except for the slow division, this concerto is routine 18th century stuff, regardless of its authorship.

The afternoon began and ended operatically. Mr. Munch started off with Weber's Overture to "Oberon" and ended with three Wagner excerpts: "Daybreak" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Goetterdaemmerung," "A Siegfried Idyll" and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." In the Weber, Mr. Munch went in for excesses in the matter of tempo and dynamics, but it was nothing to what he did in the excerpts from "Goetterdaemmerung" and "Meistersinger." By token of these performances, he is far too excitable to be a good Wagner conductor. Goaded to a frenzy, the brass got out of control, and the rest had to fight to make themselves heard. The "Idyll" went better, though it was rushed here and dragged there and the reading of it could not be described as wholly felicitous.

[105]

MUSIC

Munch Conducts Wagner —Virgil Thomson His "Louisiana Story" Music

By CYRUS DURGIN

Yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra had its ups and downs. It began with a tense, brilliant performance of the Weber Overture to "Oberon," with conductor Charles Munch at the top of his febrile form.

Then came the B minor Viola Concerto, attributed to Handel and edited by Henri Casadesus, with first violist Joseph DePasquale repeating the fine performance he had given of the work last Sunday.

All went well, and the slow movement sang in Heavenly fashion, until midway in the finale Mr. DePasquale evidently suffered a brief lapse of memory. But he quickly found his way again and the Concerto came to a spirited conclusion.

Interest began to wane during "Louisiana Story." This is the score for the similarly-titled motion picture, by the New York music critic Virgil Thomson, who conducted the first Boston performance of his own work.

Mr. Thomson orchestrates beautifully, in a manner like Ravel, but he doesn't have much to say except in the fugue which forms the last of the four movements. Otherwise, this score is merely a slickly-written tissue of modal cadences, repeated chords and rhythmico-melodic patterns, none of it at all original.

In a way, though, "Louisiana Story" is an ideal film score because you can absorb music and picture simultaneously, without seeing either eyes or ears. The orchestra seemed to play well for Mr. Thomson and he was cordially received.

The rest of the program was devoted to Wagner: "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Goetterdaemmerung"; "A Siegfried Idyll" and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." All three were disappointingly played. The tone was coarse and often too loud, the balance shoddy and the brass badly strident in more than a few crucial places. Even "A Siegfried Idyll," which went a little better than the rest, was without distinction or much refinement. Mr. Munch seemed interested only in tension and speed, and Wagner's eloquence was lost in the process.

BOSTON HERALD APRIL 23

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 22d concert of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Joseph De Pasquale, viola; the guest conductor Virgil Thomson. The program:

Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Concerto in B minor for Viola ..... Handel
"Louisiana Story" ..... Thomson
"Tristan" and "Siegfried's Rhine
A Siegfried Idyll. Prelude to Die Meistersinger ..... Wagner

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Virgil Thomson, with whom we are best acquainted as the distinguished music critic of the New York Herald Tribune, yesterday afternoon made his first Boston appearance in the role of composer-conductor as the season reached its penultimate concerts. It is a very becoming role, too.

While it is true that Mr. Thomson's most forceful role is that of the critic, exactly the same qualities that inform his musical reviews and articles is gratefully apparent both in his music and his capacity to set that music forth. These qualities are clarity of thought combined with exact but artistic terminology, extreme purposefulness, an assured sense of esthetic direction and a winning lack of pretense or bombast.

This music, from the notable documentary film "The Louisiana Story," was primarily designed to support the emotional identification of an audience in the revelation of real—as contrasted with Hollywood—character. Utilitarian music of this type cannot stand on its own as a rule: the ear, freed from the bondage of the all-sensory absorption in human events on a screen, instantly detects shallowness or mere fabrication.

Such is not the case with Mr Thomson's suite which, without its association, would be as effective as it is with it; perhaps more so. For its four brief movements, consisting of the antique forms of the pastoral, the chorale, passacaglia and fugue, are first of all musical. They strive for pictorial imagery, but in doing so evoke a purely musical atmosphere. They employ devices time-honored in the movie music field—the mysteriosos of the scene of the robbing of the alligator's nest, for example—but in doing so hold interest. Although it is not easy to know when the Cajun tunes leave off and Mr. Thomson's begin, the overall melodic conception is at once distinctive and persuasive, and far more indigenous than the straining for grass roots authenticity so obvious in such homespun essays as Harris' "Kentucky Spring."

As in his music, Mr. Thomson is wholly in command as a conductor. He uses his hands gracefully and authoritatively to achieve a style that is at once clear and forthright. Here again there is no pretense; he knows exactly what he wants and, for one who obviously has little time to develop a conducting technique, knows remarkably well how to get what he wants. It is true enough, I think, that Mr. Thomson is not in the first rank of American composers: his real gift is his brilliant critical perception and his remarkable prose style. But he is a very good one and, I would say, by far the most honest and the most assured.

The concert began with an electrifying performance of Weber's Overture to "Oberon," a piece that Mr. Munch made live as I have never heard it live before, and came to an end with a brilliant session of Wagnerian excerpts. No matter what new (to us) style Mr. Munch essays, he proves himself a conductor of universal comprehension; it is nearly impossible to trip him stylistically or esthetically. To be sure he was tripped up yesterday by a rather surprising number of performance flaws, none very important save a momentary accident in the finale of the Handel Concerto. This was otherwise splendidly set forth by Joseph de Pasquale, the orchestra's gifted solo viola, who introduced it at last Sunday's concert. It may not be the work of Handel, but it is an agreeable enough addition to the slim repertoire for viola.

Next week's concert, which brings the season to an end save for the Pension Fund performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" on April 30, offers Beethoven's Sixth and Brahms' First.

The First Season: Munch Wins Over a Strange City

By RUDOLPH ELIE

On Sunday afternoon, April 30, when Charles Munch reaches the last measure of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," he will have completed his first season as conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will have found it, I am sure, a most difficult and taxing season, one to try the patience and the endurance of a man much more used to the American scene than he. Yet, when he returns to France for his vacation in May he can take with him the assurance of us all that he has, when all is said and done, achieved the impossible: he has filled a gap that few of us really believed could ever be filled in so brief a time, if, indeed, it could be filled at all.

When he arrived in Boston last October no one was more aware than he of the delicacy of the situation. Here was an orchestra, recognized as one of the three or four greatest in the world. For 25 years it had been dominated body and soul by a man of immense complexity; a man of iron will, of passionate temperament, of imperious authority, and of musical genius of the first rank. This orchestra had been conditioned for years to play on its nerve; how, in view of Koussevitzsky's actual baton technique, it ever achieved what it did remains a mystery for he recreated music, never conducted it. And any man chosen to follow him, had he not Mr. Munch's own special equipment, would have reaped a whirlwind.

FUTURE DIM

Added to this Mr. Munch arrived at a time when the bloom, so to speak, was off the rose from a purely box office point of view. Koussevitzky, who had had his share of the financial worries and crises that, regrettably enough, dog the careers of all American symphony orchestras, resigned at a time when its financial status was at its highest peak. The wartime attendance had been at capacity for all series. There were profitable radio arrangements. Record royalties were still climbing, and there were, as always, the Friends of the Orchestra in the immediate background, willing and at the time more than capable of lending whatever support might be needed. Indeed, as a final gesture to Koussevitzky, they raised more than $150,000 as his personal gift to the orchestra.

Although the management was immensely gratified to note that the announcement of Munch's succession resulted in a complete sell-out of all the series offered, it noted with misgiving that record sales, as a result of Victor's war with the long playing field, were coming to a halt. (That record war cost the Boston Symphony Orchestra no less than $50,000 and led to the bitterest episode Mr. Munch has had to face.) It noted, too, that no radio sponsors showed any inclination to present the orchestra over the air. It noted further that there was still no sign of a levelling off in salaries or expenses. It realized, in short, that Mr. Munch's first season was going to result in a very substantial deficit and that the future was anything but happy.

Everything hinged, then, on Charles Munch. He had, for one thing, the very real internal difficulty of re-orienting the orchestra to his own style without ever allowing that difficulty to be detected or even suspected by the audience. It is no gratuity to Koussevitzky to state that he had to retrain the orchestra, to discipline it in the very special and highly technical matter of attack at an exact and clearly defined downbeat. I have watched him at rehearsal time and again holding out his left forefinger and bringing his stick down onto it with the exasperated (but never personal) admonition to begin at that instant and at no other. He could not improve the tone of the orchestra, which under Koussevitzky had a radiance and an emotional incandescence that may not be equalled, but he could, and did, refine, sensitize, more perfectly integrate and more perfectly balance it.

AUDIENCE CORDIAL

He did this not only through his immense technical command, his uncanny ear, his extraordinary memory (which allows him to commit the most complicated score to memory and so concentrate on listening to and observing his men) and his profound musicianship, but through his own personal approach to the men. They recognized his musical authority from the outset but, more important, they recognized that whatever he may say in the heat of a rehearsal, it would never be personal and that it would never be carried over into any contact off the rehearsal stage. The result was that the technical transition from Koussevitzky to Munch was so smooth and so effective an operation that today, seven months since the transition began, it is impossible to detect any major difference in the overall sound of this orchestra.

While Munch's accession was, from the very beginning notably successful internally, he was faced with the more difficult and equally important task of winning over an audience whose attitude, though certainly cordial, was in the nature of the thing, "show me." Here, it may be said, he had a longer haul, which was certainly to be expected. For the human element, which is to say the X factor of personality, of projection across that gulf that separates all performers from all audiences, of inter-person communication, is nothing to be hurried. It develops, if it develops at all, without haste; people need time to make up their own minds. It is yes and then again no; it it I think so, what do you think? It is well, almost, and at last it all crystallizes into a sort of wave of approval or disapproval, acceptance or rejection.

It seemed to me—tuning in on this wave—that the audiences recognized his great musicianship from the very start, but it was not until the ninth concert, when he did Tchaikovsky's Sixth, that I began to feel that the audience really took him to its heart as I had. That devotion, though still tempered with Boston reserve, has deepened since that time: Today, on the eve of his final concerts for this season, Charles Munch seems to have achieved one of the most difficult feats a man could be called upon to achieve, which is to be the king when the king isn't dead.

CONCLUDED NEXT SUNDAY

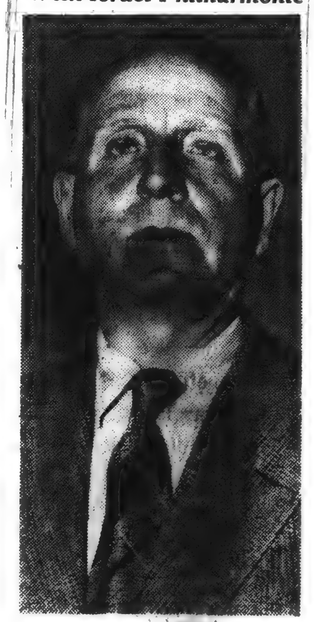
Boston Pops

A week from Tuesday the 65th season of the Boston Pops concerts will open at repainted Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler will direct on opening night. The Pops, according to long-standing traditions, provide music for varied tastes by a full symphony orchestra, with the added sociability of tables at which refreshments are served through the evening. Although "Pop" concerts of various sorts are now given across the nation, there has been nothing which quite duplicates the unique Boston Pops. Arthur Fiedler delves into the past and present for tuneful music in every likely category. The Pops will be given each night (including Sundays until the end of May). The opening program is typical:

Tuesday Evening, May 2, at 8:30 P. M.
"Television" March ..... Coates
Overture to "La Belle Helene" ..... Offenbach
Clair de Lune ..... Debussy
Salome's Dance ..... R. Strauss
Young Person's Guide to the Orcrestra ..... Britten
(First performance in Boston)
"Schatz" Waltzes ("My Treasure") from "The Gypsy Baron" ..... J. Strauss
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagnuer
Selection from "Kiss Me Kate" ..... Porter
Old Time Fiddlers' Square Dance Arranged by Burger
The Girl I Left Behind Me ..... Anderson

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES
APR 28 1950

Frenchman Resigns Post With Israel Philharmonic



Paul Paray
The New York Times

By The Associated Press.

TEL AVIV, April 27—Paul Paray, French conductor of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, said today he had resigned because big-name conductors were billed to lead the orchestra in its scheduled 1951 American tour.

M. Paray said he had been scheduled to direct the orchestra, but that the concert listings were changed for most of the large American cities, giving the baton to Serge Koussevitzky and other top American maestros.

The Frenchman will leave next Monday for Paris after having led the Israel orchestra for a year.

NORFOLK, VA. LEDGER DISPATCH
APR 27 1950

New Records--

Munch and the Boston

Charles Munch's new recording of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A makes a superb long playing disk with plenty of resonance and fullness of ensemble, as well as clarity of the various parts and realistic reproduction throughout.

While this is another symphony in which Toscanini excels, Munch and the Bostonians play it with spirit and beauty. It is one of Beethoven's most cheerful creations, dancing from begining to end with a great variety of rhythms. Wagner referred to it as the "apotheosis of the danc," a description we shall not try to improve on.

This is a promising debut, but we hope that Munch will soon be given an opportunity on records to show what he can do with the French reperotry. This reviewer heard him conduct the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Berlioz some 18 months ago, and it was a hair-raising experience.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS. NEWS
APR 27 1950

Local Violinist Will Join Boston Symphony Orchestra

Gottfried Wilfinger, Member of Springfield Symphony, Takes Big Step in His Musical Career

GOTTFRIED WILFINGER

A few short weeks ago, Gottfried Wilfinger, a member of the violin section of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, and a student at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, was washing dishes and doing any other odd jobs he could find to pay for his tuition. He cut his own hair. He economized right to the bone, because that was the only way he could stay in school.

This week, he learned that his sacrifices had not been in vain, for he has been accepted as a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At that the talented young musician, who has played many times with the Springfield Symphony, under the baton of Conductor Alexander Leslie at the Auditorium, almost missed his big chance. It was only at the constant urging of friends that he decided to audition for the Boston Symphony. He didn't think he was ready. The audition board thought otherwise, and now Mr. Wilfinger is well on the way toward a distinguished musical career.

Still in his early 20's, this young man has already made his mark in the musical world. A pupil of Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, he has appeared as soloist with the Philadelphia Philharmonic, and last year he played the Sibelius violin concerto at Tanglewood.

He has also appeared wit hthe Toronto (Can.) Symphony.

Mr. Leslie, music director of the Springfield Orchestra Association, which is now in the second and final week of its annual fund campaign, points to Mr. Wilfinger, and other Springfield Symphony musicians who have gone on to other, larger orchestras, as typical of the caliber of the talent represented in the local organization, and wished the violinist every success in his new venture.

He noted that anyone wishing to help further the advancement of the Springfield Orchestra Association may make their donations, by mail, or in person, to Friends of the Symphony, 49 Chestnut St.

Apr. 29

THE BOSTON HERALD, SA

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 24th program of the 69th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
Symphony No. 6 in F, Op. 68 . . Beethoven
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 . . Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

And so, with Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony and Brahms' First Symphony, Charles Munch has come to the end of his first season as the conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was a fitting conclusion to what has been an exceedingly interesting, stimulating and grateful year, and it resulted on the most prolonged audience demonstration of the season.

In an article on Mr. Munch's first season last Sunday, I said that it is impossible to detect any major difference in the overall sound of the orchestra so far. While this is essentially true, there are however a number of points that might appropriately be taken at this time, for the direction he is leading the orchestra in is certainly to be detected.

This direction is, first of all, towards clarity. His first move—with clarity and unity in mind—was to move the double basses from their Koussevitsky-esque position behind the violins to their present location behind the cellos and violas. The idea was that since the basses are more often than not doubling the cellos, a more perfect response could be obtained.

This has proved to be the case, but it has also lightened the body of string tone achieved by the first and second violins. The great, glowing masses of string tone with their emotionally incandescent sound, a sound that characterized the Koussevitzky orchestra, are now replaced by a firmer, more secure, more exact, more poised but a less persuasive quality.

There have been other, though less spectacular, changes in seating. The shift of the percussion from right to left has shifted the direction of its emphasis, which would not be noticed on records but which makes a quite different effect on the auditor customarily seated from season to season in the same seat. The horns have been moved into the right corner rear, where the horn tone does not bounce off the rear wall but emerges richer and fuller—as witness the finale of the Brahms.

However, the most noticeable change in the orchestral tone has been in the brasses. Here Mr. Munch has achieved what is known as the French style, which is bright, thin, very clear, very focussed, as contrasted with the broader German style. This, in combination with the lighter, more compact, more secco string style has given the orchestra what might be called its Munch sound, which is brilliant as contrasted with the Koussevitzky sound, which is juicy.

As for Charles Munch the interpreter, he has proved himself the master of every style he has so far essayed. The only serious criticism I can level at him is that he often whips up a tempo beyond practicability, losing the clarity, the balance, the proportion he so constantly seeks for a sense of nervousness or strain.

He is also so sensitive to sound he often judges dynamics more from his own situation in the middle of things than from the point of the listener at the far end of the all, a case in point being the "St. ohn Passion." Otherwise I feel we have all learned a very great deal, interpreatively, from this superb artist. He is, all said and done, a man of such dedication of purpose, of such musicianship and of such an informed musical spirit, that it is impossible to convey how appreciative we all are to have had him at this particular moment.

The audience yesterday, following a very brilliant performance of the Brahm's, recalled him with applause and bravos six times, which was eloquent testimony to the fact that he has been accepted body and soul. To have achieved this acceptance in one season, is, it seems to me, a very remarkable feat. Tomorrow afternoon Mr. Munch makes his final appearance of the season conducting, for the Pension Fund of the orchestra, Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" with soloists and the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Symphony Signs New Five-Year Contract With RCA-Victor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday signed a new five-year recording contract with RCA-Victor. Signatures were affixed at a ceremony on the stage of Symphony Hall following yesterday afternoon's concert by Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees, and Paul Barkmeier, vice president of RCA-Victor.

There was an interesting comparison of recording technics when parts of two records were played: Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which is the first recording to be made with this orchestra by conductor Charles Munch, and the Introduction to Act 3 of Wagner's "Lohengrin," recorded by the orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck at Camden, N. J., Oct. 3, 1917.

Present at the ceremonies, which were followed by a buffet supper, were Charles Munch and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Pops. The new contract will begin in November.

1950 Apr. 29

MUSIC

Munch Ends His First Symphony Season With Beethoven and Brahms

By CYRUS DURGIN

This week Charles Munch ends his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, and the 69th season of the orchestra. His actual final appearance will be made tomorrow afternoon when he conducts Beethoven's Missa Solemnis—the work with which Symphony Hall was opened in 1900—for the benefit of the pension fund.

This valedictory program of the "regular" series consists of two Symphonies, neither heard here recently, the "Pastoral" of Beethoven, and the First, in C minor, of Brahms. Thus this representation of two of the three most sacred "Bs" of music makes for a fitting and somewhat ceremonial program.

Mr. Munch was greeted with the familiar and pleasant Bostonian rite when he made his first appearance yesterday.

Both orchestra and audience rose to applaud him. At the end, when the tremendous final chord of Brahms' great Symphony barely had ceased to sound, the audience broke into handclapping and cheers, and stood applauding. Mr. Munch was called back to the stage time and again, and at each repetition the cheering grew louder. The conductor may feel satisfied that his first season has been a conspicuous success, and that Boston has taken him to its heart.

Apart from these ceremonials, there was further interest in this program, for Mr. Munch had presented neither work here before. His treatment of the "Pastoral," which proved a model of clarity, also reflected in high degree that quality of his which became evident early in the season: the fact that for him the orchestra plays with brilliance but without strain. This was a notably relaxed performance of Bethoven's essay in symphonic tone-painting, and yet it was perfectly proportioned and every nuance was observed. Perhaps best of all was that ease which characterized the second movement: you could almost feel the heated drowsiness of the brookside.

Brahms' First Symphony obviously is music that fires the Munch emotions, for it was done at a peak of excitement. Everything sounded "big," and very eloquent. In fact Mr. Munch rushed it a little here and there, and did not pause a second in the loud re-statement of the chorale melody in the last movement. But the musically significant detail of the whole afternoon was that the conductor dwelled not upon details but upon the whole, long line of each work.

A partial analysis of Mr. Munch's first season here will be found on the music page of Sunday's Globe.

For the rest, it is enough to say that over the season he has maintained the extremely high standards of the Boston Symphony, and has proved himself a conductor of first-rank musicianship, integrity and feeling. We shall look forward to his return in the Fall.

Cyrus Durgin, the Globe's drama and music critic, will leave shortly for Europe and will report to Globe readers on the Bach Commemorative Festival to be given in Prades, France, under the direction of Pablo Casals, world-famous cellist and Bach scholar. Mr. Durgin also will report on music and theatre in Madrid, Paris, Rome and London.

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—FRIDAY, APRIL 28, 1950

"HOW'S THIS MR. FIEDLER?"—The conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra handed his baton to "Bobby" as he gave the monkey a lesson in front of the new Pops sign on Symphony Hall. The monkey is owned by Alfred Fiorello.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The last Friday matinee of Charles Munch's first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended yesterday in a blare of sound that to a frantically applauding audience was the same thing as a blaze of glory. Like so many final concerts in the Koussevitzkyan quarter century, this one concluded with the First Symphony of Brahms. No doubt the composer had in mind a somewhat less exciting peroration, but we have become so accustomed to this treatment of the coda that we would hardly recognize the music in more restrained terms.

It was, at that, a less orotund and magniloquent finish than the Koussevitzky one; and taken as a whole, Mr. Munch's interpretation was just and eminently Brahmsian, hopped up here and there, to be sure; but the work can stand a little gingering. If it was not quite so fine as his performance of the Fourth earlier in the year, neither is the Symphony itself of the same quality. By token of these two performances, and of the Violin Concerto played at a special concert in mid-season, Mr. Munch is a good Brahms man. And Boston likes its Brahms.

Boston also likes its Beethoven, and Beethoven was likewise represented yesterday, by the "Pastoral" Symphony. This was, in fact, a beautifully relaxed performance of music that is almost too relaxed. But that is the spirit in which it must be presented. A feverish "Pastoral" would be unthinkable. This gentle symphony, the earliest successful one written completely to a program, has its moments of tedium. Beethoven's brook, like Tennyson's, goes on forever. Mr. Munch found here just the right tempo, and this "Scene by the Brookside," was made as endurable as might be. We have heard more violent storms than this one, but I am not going to start chiding Mr. Munch for a lack of violence. It is something he achieves all too readily.

When Mr. Munch appeared on the platform yesterday, orchestra and audience rose in greeting. This spontaneous tribute was well deserved. The new conductor, placed in the most trying position one can imagine, has definitely made good, and we can all look forward eagerly to his second season, which will be the Orchestra's 70th, and should turn out to be something special. Yesterday's program will be repeated this evening and the season will actually end tomorrow afternoon with a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, with which Symphony Hall was opened on Oct. 15, 1900. A week from tomorrow the music column will contain a summing up of these significant seven months.

rays.

N Y Times Apr 29

BOSTONIANS RENEW PACT

Symphony, Pops Orchestra Sign With R.C.A.-Victor for 5 Years

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES

BOSTON, April 28—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today signed a new five-year contract with R. C. A.-Victor for recording music by both the symphony and Boston Pops orchestras. It was a continuation of an association that began thirty-three years ago.

Before the formal signing of the contract, officials of both organizations listened to a reproduction of the first recording of the Boston Symphony, made by the Victor Talking Machine oCmpany in 1947. This followed the playing of an excerpt from the first recording made by the orchestra and its present leader, Charles Munch, who succeeded Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as conductor this season.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
Apr 1950

Boston Symphony Contract

Victor Red Seal Agreement Signed For 5 Years of Recording

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday that it has made a new five-year contract with Victor Red Seal Records, which takes effect at the end of the present contract in November.

The new contract, signed yesterday by Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, after the last afternoon concert of the regular season in Boston at Symphony Hall, covers both recordings by the full orchestra and by the "Pops" Orchestra.

The "Pops" Orchestra, under Arthur Fiedler, will record in the late spring and early summer in Symphony Hall. The full orchestra, under its former conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make recordings during the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., which runs from July 8 through Aug. 13. The orchestra has already made several recordings under its present conductor, Charles Munch, and will make others after Mr. Munch's return from Europe in September.

[107]

Munch Concluding First Season

Conductor Wins Acclaim At Final Friday Concert

By Harold Rogers

Charles Munch is bringing his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a resplendent close. His program for the final pair of week-end concerts is short and sweet, consisting of only two symphonies—the Beethoven Sixth and the Brahms First.

When Mr. Munch stepped on the platform to conduct this concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, both the orchestra and the audience arose to greet him. As the last notes of the Brahms were resounding, the audience again rose to its feet; this time showering him with bravos and applause. He returned to the stage at least half a dozen times to acknowledge the ovation.

Mr. Munch has a strong tendency, when gripped by the verve of the performance, to accelerate his tempos. This tendency was more noticeable and more commented upon at the beginning of the season than it is now. The seasoned concertgoer is no longer startled by what he has come to expect of the conductor.

But minor variations in tempo are of secondary importance when the performance is what may be called inspired. Then a tempo may seem to be correct at the moment of performance, though in retrospect it may not appear to be exactly right.

The music itself will often dictate its tempo. If the musicians lose their relaxation and the music loses its clarity, then it is being taken too fast. Mr. Munch overstepped the line of clarity several times yesterday, notably in the third movement of the Beethoven and in the Allegro non troppo portion of the final movement of the Brahms.

But the over-all effect in the Brahms was one of tremendous vigor and enthusiasm. The Beethoven "Pastoral" was handled with graceful refinement. And the audience response, as noted above, was wild and prolonged.

The concerts this week end will mark the last few times the orchestra will play on elevated platforms. Last Wednesday in a press conference Mr. Munch said that he preferred the orchestra to be "sur la même niveau"—on the flat.

Inscribing a circle in the air, he explained that the orchestra when arranged on the level sounded more as a whole, more as a unit. The brass and the timpani are too loud when elevated, he said as he frowned and placed his hands over his ears. "You cannot ask them to play mezzo-forte when the music is marked forte," he added.

The two exceptions to the "one level" rule will be the woodwinds and the cellos. These will be raised somewhat so as not to sound muffled to the listeners on the main floor. Those sitting in the balconies naturally have a better tonal perspective. Mr. Munch does not feel that the visual aspect of the orchestra is worth considering. The sound is the thing.

After the concert yesterday afternoon Mr. Munch, Arthur Fiedler, Henry B. Cabot, and six members of the trustees met on stage with the officials of the RCA Victor Company to sign new five-year contracts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops. These contracts will go into effect at the expiration of the present contracts in November.

Symphony Orchestra Signed for Records

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SIGNS NEW RECORD CONTRACT
Charles Munch, right, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, signs a new five-year recording contract with RCA Victor. Looking on are, left to right: Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops; Paul A. Barkmaier, vice president and general manager of RCA Victor's record department, and Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra.

Sounds reaching across 33 years were heard in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. They came from the first recording of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made by the Victor Talking Machine Co. in 1917, with the orchestra crowded into the Camden laboratory. That disc was a wonderful achievement of music and science at the time—the first full symphony orchestra recording ever made in this country.

But it was listened to yesterday a little condescendingly by some gentlemen on the stage. They included Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra; Charles Munch, its present conductor, and some recording officials. An excerpt then was played from the first recording made by Mr. Munch with the Boston orchestra. The listeners on the stage looked better pleased.

After some brief explanatory remarks, Mr. Cabot then signed a new five-year contract with RCA Victor, effective in November, when the present one expires. It will cover both Boston Symphony and Boston Pops recordings. This continues an association which has seen many transitions—from laboratory recording in 1917, to hall recording in 1928; from the acoustic to the electrical process; from one speed to the present three—at 78, at 45 and at 33⅓ (the long play records).

Present at the signing of the new contract, besides Messrs. Cabot and Munch, were Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops; George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, and from Camden and New York, representing RCA Victor, Mr. Paul Barkmeier, vice president and general manager; Richard A. Mohr, Alan Kayes, George Marek and Alan Steinert, president of the Eastern Company—RCA Victor distributors in this area.

Following the signing of the contract, representatives of the press were presented with souvenir reproductions of the first recording—the Introduction to Act III of Wagner's "Lohengrin."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its present conductor, Charles Munch, has already recorded a number of works, last December and early in the present month. Arrangements were made for the Boston Pops, under Arthur Fiedler, to record in Symphony Hall. After a press conference, a buffet supper was served in Symphony Hall foyer.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SAT

Munch Signs New Recording Contract

First Symphony Record Is Played

By LAWRENCE DAME

It sounded a bit more like the scratching of a cat's back than the customary finesse of a chaste Friday afternoon at the Symphony. But it was, after all, a rendition on the famous hall's stage of the first recording of an orchestral concert there, made in 1917—the first full symphony orchestra recording ever achieved in this country.

It was appropriate to the post-concert signing yesterday in Symphony Hall of a new five-year contract with the first record makers—RCA Victor—effective next November.

MUTUAL TRIBUTE

Perhaps this mutual tribute, to orchestra and recording corporation, accounted for the fact that Charles Munch, conductor, gave such a magnificent, all-out rendition of Brahms at the grand finale of the Symphony season. He waved his baton like one possessed. He swung like a dervish. He even went into a Nijinsky leap toward the end.

The initial recording by the Victor Talking Machine Company (His Master's Voice) 33 years ago was considered a triumph of music and science with arms linked. A huge horn ranked as an essential complement to the gramophone then. The next five years of recording music by the most famous and, some say, the best aggregation of musicians in the world, under a superb French master, may see even greater progress than has been set down this past quarter century and more.

The trustees were there yesterday, all smiles over the new attestation of faith from RCA Victor. Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, gave a beaming speech. Munch, who had hardly dried himself after a finale which took almost every ounce of his strength and humor, smiled naturaly over a gift bouquet of roses which he sniffed. He poised the contractual pen like a UN diplomat. In the background, one with-out whom the orchestra could not have progresesd so far—George E. Judd, its astute though modest manager—exchanged pleasantries with the press.

(Photo by Julian Carpenter)
HAPPY CONTRACT SIGNERS—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Paul Barkmeier, vice-president of RCA Victor, rejoice over the signing of a new five-year contract for recordings of orchestra music.

OTHERS PRESENT

Of course Arthur Fiedler, who conducts the Pops at its opening Tuesday night, was there together with his charming wife. Also Alan Steinert, president of the Eastern Company, RCA-Victor distributors; Paul Barkmeier vice-president and general manager of RCA-Victor; Richard A. Mohr, Alan Kayes and George Marek.

Oh yes, the first recording was the introduction to Act III of Wagner's "Lohengrin"—very tremolo. The new one just coming up is of Beethoven's Seventh.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 29 1950

Munch Ends Fine Year With Boston Symphony

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the Friday afternoon series yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Every seat in the house was taken, and it seemed as if every subscriber and ticket buyer had made an effort to be present at this final concert to wish Charles Munch a fond and grateful au revoir until next fall.

The program was a good one, consisting of two symphonies, Beethoven's Sixth and the Brahms First. The audience wanted to take one good last look at Mr. Munch before he leaves for his Paris vacation, and he gave them a beautiful performance of these stock pieces to remember him by through the summer.

* * *

IN RETROSPECT, it seems proper at this time to take a close look at this year which has countenanced so many changes in this orchestra, an orchestra which is probably the best in America today and most certainly one of the greatest in the world.

Munch took on this job with great disadvantages. First, he was given an orchestra which was almost perfect. He was to keep it perfect. He was given a two-year contract which, to many candid observers, fairly screamed make good or else.

Second, he was successor to a king. Koussevitzky had vacated a place which seemed impossible to fill. Koussevitzky was the meat and whalebone of the orchestra, and whoever succeeded him did so at his own risk.

* * *

THE FIRST order Munch gave his men was to relax. Personality clashes between conductor and musician came to be a thing of the past. The gossamer thread and the sheet of steel is still there, but into the orchestra has crept a warmth and sensitivity of tone which the perfect orchestra lacked before.

There is a tone which is more integrated and balanced, and instead of a group of men struggling with alter egos, there is a blended unit of unmechanical individuals who are playing for their conductor and not pulling against him.

The fact that Munch was following Koussevitzky seemed rather to serve as an incentive to him than a drawback. After the first tense concert of the season, the comments in the corridors of Symphony Hall were diversified, but they all added up to one thing. Some said that Munch wasn't as colorful on the podium. Others said that they would never be able to get used to the new orchestra seating arrangement. Others said the orchestra sounded shop worn. Still others remarked that Munch had no oomph.

* * *

AFTER THE last concert of the season, the same people are expressing thoughts of another color. They have found out that Munch has a great deal of oomph, that they like the seating arrangement after all. They admit that Munch is as dynamic on the podium as anybody, and each remark is aptly punctuated with and I knew it all the time.

Charles Munch's sensitivity, humor, and profound musicianship has made itself felt very deeply in Boston. Right now he is the victor. He is in a position to call the cards from here on in, and this reviewer, for one, hopes he will.

F. S.

[108]

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
APR 2

JUST AS A MATTER OF RECORDS

Charles Munch Makes His Victor Debut

He Leads Boston Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7

FIRST OF a series of major symphonic works featuring the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A marks the RCA Victor record debut of Charles Munch. It is a distinguished first recording.

From the opening chord, the performance proceeds at a high level of excellence to demonstrate Munch's vigorous, clean-cut and decisive style. The chords ring out resolutely and solo voices emerge with delicacy and excellent shading. These evidences of Munch's technic prevail throughout the recording.

The recording is available in all three speeds. Incidentally, Munch made his most recent New York appearance with the Boston orchestra on March 17, conducting the same Seventh Symphony.

Using the organ in Boston's Symphony Hall, E. Power Biggs has made two long-playing records for Columbia. The first features six chorale-preludes and the second presents Trio Sonatas Nos. 1 and 2 and the Prelude and Fugue in G

CHARLES MUNCH

the symphony as a whole a

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 30 1950

Of Charles Munch: The Man Who Didn't Come to Dinner

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Upon his arrival in Boston in October, Charles Munch—to conclude this two-part essay on his first season as conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—was pleased to have been nominated, by the readers of a French periodical as the man they would most like to have dinner with after Winston Churchill. His first season in Boston has proved, beyond a question of doubt, that the last man the readers of that French periodical—or the readers of anything—will ever have dinner with is Charles Munch.

For while it is easy enough to appraise and evaluate Charles Munch the conductor, it is entirely impossible to appraise and evaluate Charles Munch the man outside his purely musical role. Nobody, and by nobody I mean almost precisely that, has had the least opportunity to meet, let alone strike up the most casual acquaintance with this remarkably solitary man. On several occasions he has been tendered formal dinners by venerable Boston organizations, and these he has dutifully but reluctantly attended. During them he has been charming, but it is obvious to those who have had any contact with him whatever that they confuse and bore him beyond endurance.

He has been seen at no other musical event in the city; he has been spotted at smart restaurants by no one; he has not, so far as is known, attended any theatrical event, sporting event, or social function of any description. He does not hold court in the green room following his concerts for he cannot bear compliments or any fuss over him whatever. He is, as a matter of fact, one of the first to leave the hall after a concert, scurrying into his chauffeur-driven Oldsmobile and heading straight for his Milton residence, where he lives in complete isolation.

NOBODY'S BUSINESS

It may be pointed out by some that it is nobody's business what Mr. Munch does with his leisure hours. It may be pointed out that he was engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra, not to appear socially or to entertain and hold court. This is of course entirely true. But the fact that he has remained wholly aloof from the social and cultural life of the city, yet has achieved such a complete success speaks, as I see it, to the considerable credit of the symphony audience of this city. For if Mr. Munch can achieve, in his native France, such personal popularity and attraction as to be singled out as a personality with whom the readers of a French picture magazine would—after Churchill—most like to dine, the implication is clearly non-musical? The implication is that here is a man of such physical attractiveness, such charm of manner, such social grace and such eminence in his own field that merely being with him for an hour or two is of itself a notable experience.

Now Bostonians are as susceptible to social grace, physical attractiveness and all the rest as anyone else. Koussevitzky had all these qualities and more. He was never reluctant to appear socially, hold court in the green room, and charm everyone within range of his personality. He was, indeed, the star performer in any social function that found him present, and few were the people who ever came in contact with him who didn't totter away unaware that they had been in his presence. This formula, genuine enough with Koussevitzky, can hardly fail to lend additional glamour to a man of great talent.

Charles Munch, on the contrary, during his residence in Boston, has consistently refrained from any social contact and I choose to see in this an added testimony to the real stature of the man. For he had, in electing wholly musical means to communicate to us, informed us that he wants to be evaluated in wholly musical terms. I often feel he accepted the Boston orchestra, not because he needed it in terms of money or reputation (though what more eminent a position is there in the field today?) but because it was a real challenge to his inner necessity for artistic expression on the highest and most consistent level, away from momentary contacts as a lionized guest conductor and away from the native orchestras with which he had had years of contact.

Here, not in a hostile but certainly in a new field, and one in which, without the endless social contacts enforced on a prominent man who knows everyone and is known by everyone, he could be alone. Being alone—and artists, as Stephen Spender has pointed out, can only be alone in America—he could re-examine his own art, his own esthetic, his own artistic direction.

NO OSTENTATION

The result of this concentration we have seen in Mr. Munch's complete dedication to music and to nothing else. He has, it is true, fought for his men and he has asserted himself as musical director of the orchestra, but his only real interest has been in making music without ostentation, without any playing to the audience, without any extra-musical display whatever.

That the Boston audiences have caught his deep sense of musical perceptiveness without having been appealed to on any other but musical grounds is, I think, to their great credit. They have gone through, so to speak, the personality factors and have perceived in Charles Munch's musicianship val- far greater impact than any could offer. But the real s to Charles Munch without the least effort himself, has won the oston audience while eir minds.

BORDEAUX

Bordeaux in France is entering the international festival field. Under the patronage of the French Minister of Education, it is opening its first such festival this Friday. It will continue until May 12. The symphonic ensemble will be the Orchestre National, conducted by Charles Munch.

Solo artists giving recitals include Yehudi Menuhin, Robert Casadesus and Alfred Cortot. There will also be chamber music by the Loewenguth Quartet, a Bach recital by Marcel Dupre on the organ of the Cathedral of St. Andre and performances by the Grand Ballet de Monte Carlo.

Munch's First Season Here Remarkable Success

By CYRUS DURGIN

With the final D major chord of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis at Symphony Hall this afternoon, Charles Munch will end his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This has been an eventful season and a gratifying one, to Mr. Munch, to the orchestra and the public. The great French conductor has settled in as a complete success, and he is not only respected for his work but personally admired.

Such a happy outcome is all the more remarkable when you stop to consider the circumstances under which Mr Munch made his advent. He was known here by virtue of his appearances as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony, and with the French Orchestre National in 1948. We had a pretty good notion that he was a musician of force and imagination, of stature and authority, but the range of his versatility had yet to be proved.

Mr. Munch had the unenviable task of following an international celebrity who had been with us for 25 years. That would be most difficult for any one, and a man of lesser capacity might easily have failed to impress either orchestra or public. Mr. Much, however, is a great man, and his triumph has been easy and unmistakable. I have yet to hear any Bostonian speak a disparaging word of him.

His Repertory

It took only a few concerts to realize what one had guessed before: that his experience had been broad; that he had assimilated a sizable repertory and his capabilities extended over a wide variety of styles and periods. Although French music has received a special accent this season, Mr. Munch's programs have been catholic. He has neglected neither the classics nor the moderns, and although he has gone slowly in the matter of American music, the native composer has received due attention.

I think it was wise that Mr. Munch invited several American composers to conduct their own music; he could not be expected to have a working familiarity with a big cross-section of new material in a country where he had spent comparatively little time.

The French side of Mr. Munch's interpretive nature, I believe, was uppermost until the afternoon of Good Friday, when he presented Bach's "St. John" Passion. Then there was a sudden, miraculous and unexpected change. The German side of his ancestry and training came to the fore with this great example of Lutheran church music. And yet his Wagner was disappointing.

His Beethoven and his Brahms have been more universal, less national, superbly styled and poised, very clear, lyric and dramatic according to the demands of the work at hand. Not unnaturally, his forte has been the French school. At Debussy, Ravel, Berlioz, Honegger (French in character though Swiss in birth), Roussel, Mr. Munch has been a master hand.

In fact, Mr. Munch had the courage to perform some works which had been noted for many years as Koussevitzky war-horses, works like "Daphnis and Chloe," "La Mer," "La Valse," even Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony. Of course he read them quite differently from his predecessor's way, but in every case his interpretation was personal and dazzling. With only one of them did he fail, and that was "La Mer," which, for my taste, was too dry.

Certain other scores and performances were unforgettable, among them Honegger's "Jeanne d'Arc au Bucher," which Munch introduced here; Bach's "Art of the Fugue," in the orchestral version by his cousin, Ernest Munch, and performed under most trying personal circumstances, for within a day Charles Munch had learned of the tragic death of Ginette Neveu, a cherished younger colleague whose career Munch had done much to further and encourage.

Mendelssohn's fading old "Reformation" Symphony took on renewed vigor and brilliance in Munch's hands, and the D'Indy Symphony on a French Mountain Air, a score fresh and lovely, but neglected, was one of the finest revivals. The Saint-Saens C minor Symphony was another spectacular example of resuscitation, but Mr. Munch had done that at a guest appearance, and we knew how fine a job it was.

Anything by Berlioz sounds like a million dollars in a Munch performance, and we have had quite a little of Berlioz to prove it, most notably the excerpts from the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony. Perhaps he will undertake "Harold in Italy" and "The Damnation of Faust" later on. And there were numerous other pieces and interpretations written in golden letters on the Munch record.

His Programs

It is not disservice to point out that Mr. Munch as a programmaker is not so skilled as Serge Koussevitzky, who had the greatest genius for that business that I ever have known. Not that the Munch programs have been poor, or uninteresting. But there have been occasions when one piece did not seem to go too well with the next, or when there seemed to be one too many, or when, as in the case of the Mozart Concerto that Casadesus played, a piece was overshadowed by something bigger coming before. This is nothing serious, merely a casual reference for the sake of the record.

And what is the state of the orchestra at the end of Mr. Munch's first season? Excellent! He has maintained the same super-high standard of technic that the orchestra has shown for many years, and furthermore I believe they all play with just as much brilliance as ever, but with less strain. There were those who foresaw that the conductor, with his Gallic ear for light, bright and clear sonorities, would polish away the rich "Koussevitzky tone." Well, there has been some change, and the purple quality is no longer there, but under Munch the Boston Symphony tone is still resplendent and deep as the sea.

So, as "Le beau Charles" lays down his baton for a summer and prepares to vacation in France, let us wish him bon voyage and look forward to his return in the Fall.

New RCA Victor Pact To Symphony Orchestra

A historic recording—the first full symphony orchestra recording ever made in this country—was played in Symphony Hall yesterday in observance of the continuance of a notable association.

The occasion marked the signing of a five-year contract by Henry B. Cabot, president of Boston Symphony Orchestra, with RCA Victor.

In 1917, the first recording of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was made by Victor Talking Machine Company with the orchestra crowded into the Camden laboratory. That disc was a wonderful achievement of music and science at the time. But it was a "first" that was listened to a little condescendingly by some gentlemen on stage. They included Mr. Cabot, Charles Munch, the orchestra's present conductor; Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops; George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra; Alan Steinert, president of Eastern Company, RCA distributors, and, from Camden and New York, representing RCA, Paul Barkmeier, vice-president and general manager; Richard A. Mohr, Alan Kayes and George Marek.

The contract covers both Boston Symphony and Boston Pops recordings. It continues an association which has seen many transitions—from laboratory recordings in 1917, to hall recordings in 1928; from the acustic to the electrical process; from one speed to the present three—at 78, at 45 and at 33 1/3 (the long play records).

The orchestra, with its present conductor, Mr. Munch, has already recorded a number of works. Arrangements have been made for the Pops to record in Symphony Hall this season.

[109]

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

MUSIC on RECORDS

by JOHN M. HARRISON

A RECORDING debut ought to be in all ways a happy event, in which performer and music and reproduction are perfectly blended and wholly compatible. If, too often, debuts are not such pleasant occasions, that of Charles Munch with RCA-Victor measures up to all the requirements of the

Mr. Munch appears [illegible] the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The music is Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A. The album is Set DM or WDM-1360.

A new recording of this particular Beethoven symphony which meets highest standards has been needed for some time. The best previous effort was that of Arturo Toscanini with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, a performance made for RCA-Victor almost 15 years ago. Several others are available, but while some have the benefit of more modern reproduction techniques, each has had other flaws.

It is true that Charles Munch is not considered a good Beethoven man by many music lovers. His almost frantic tempi in conducting the Fifth in Toledo last fall were the cause of considerable unhappiness in some portions of the audience. But even if this generalization concerning Munch and Beethoven be true, it should be obvious that the Seventh is the one best suited to his Gallic temperament and his tendencies to race horse speeds.

To my ear, he seems to have both these faults well under control in this performance. In any event, this comes out a thoughtful, well-rounded and exhilirating playing of the gayest and happiest of the nine Beethoven symphonies. Mr. Munch and the Boston musicians are at their best. The recording itself is big, lucid and fairly glowing.

★

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Boston is justly proud of its Symphony Orchestra. It has reason also to be proud of the auditorium in which the orchestra's concerts are held. Symphony Hall was opened on Oct. 15, 1900, and this Symphony season has twice taken note of the fact. The first pair of concerts presented the program that Wilhelm Gericke played at the first pair in the new hall, and yesterday afternoon there was a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, the work heard at the actual dedication of the building. At that time the program contained a Bach Chorale, the reading of a poem by Owen Wister and an address by the orchestra's founder and sustainer, Major Henry L. Higginson. Yesterday there was just the Mass, and its performance aided the orchestra's pension fund.

The chorus on the earlier occasion was the Cecilia Society, still in existence, so far as I know, but hardly the organization that it was then. Yesterday, as Dr. Koussevitzky did so many times, Mr. Munch had for a chorus the combined choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe, admirably trained, as always, by G. Wallace Woodworth. The solo singers were Christine Cardillo, Lucile Cummings, Paul Knowles and Denis Harbour. E. Power Biggs was the organist and Richard Burgin played the violin solo in the Benedictus.

Beethoven may be said to have dramatized the text of the Mass, even to the use of martial music in the "Dona nobis pacem" and Mr. Munch may be said to have dramatized Beethoven. We are not used to the strong contrasts he achieved in the Gloria, and whenever the opportunity arose, he was inclined to drive his singers in the Munchian manner. On the whole, the quieter passages, such as the beautiful opening Kyrie, were the most successful. Once again there was the disparity—let's make it a matter of age—between the mature and seasoned orchestra and the youthful chorus and soloists. We could have stood yesterday a little more maturity on the vocal side, but that is not the way we do it hereabouts. It was Mr. Munch's wish that there should be no applause. But for that, the capacity audience would have staged a demonstration at the end. In the opinion of this member of the audience, it would have been better thus. Symphony Hall, in whose honor the concert was given, deserved it.

MUSIC

Munch Conducts Missa Solemnis to Benefit Symphony Pension Fund

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch conducted Beethoven's Missa Solemnis yesterday afternoon at a concert to benefit the pension fund for retired members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The chorus consisted of the full numbers of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Christine Cardillo, soprano; Lucile Cummings, contralto; Paul Knowles, tenor, and Denis Harbour, bass.

It was altogether appropriate that the Missa Solemnis should be chosen for the season's closing concert, for this was the work with which Symphony Hall had been opened Oct. 15, 1900. Also, it is one of the great and monumental pieces of the choral repertory. Not before had Mr. Munch conducted so large a choral work as this and his treatment of it was both individual and grandly proportioned.

Once again the Munch characteristic of tracing the big, main line of a score was satisfyingly evident. The details were not neglected, either, but the emphasis was upon the whole. Those wondrous passages, page after page, where the full power of Beethoven's chorus and orchestra thunder out the grandeur of the Kyrie, the Gloria and the Credo were almost breath-taking. These three sections are the most dramatic of the Missa Solemnis, and so Mr. Munch conducted them. But the most interesting aspect was his reading of the Agnus Dei.

I have heard some conductors treat this in the same dramatic style of the Kyrie, Gloria and Credo. But Mr. Munch perceives here more eloquence of gentle statement, and a great serenity permeated all this section. Even the ominous trumpetings that momentarily interrupt its course were subdued, and the actual ending reflected, in tempo and dynamics, the plea "dona nobis pacem."

The orchestra was at its best through the afternoon, and kept up with seeming ease the furious pace that Munch now and then set for it. The Harvard and Radcliffe singers had been admirably trained. Their work was crisp, precise, and finely shaded, the interweavings of the voices were clear, and the body of tone was full and rich. The four soloists, however, were uniformly disappointing. None had big enough voices, and the brilliance and the sense of contrast so important was practically non-existent. Thus, here was an uneven but an interesting performance, and in its finest moments it had elements of greatness.

Mr. Munch had requested that there be no applause, and except for a scattering of thoughtless handclapping, the Missa Solemnis was received in silence. So, he quietly left the stage, not turning to bow, and that was the end of his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Missa Solemnis

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave a Pension Fund Concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing Beethoven's Missa Solemnis. The soloists were Christine Cardillo, soprano; Lucille Cummings, contralto; Paul Knowles, tenor and Denis Harbour, bass. The chorus was that of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. E. Power Biggs was the organist, and the violin solo was performed by Richard Burgin.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The final appearance this season of Charles Munch in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis for the Pension Fund of the Orchestra was an occasion of mixed blessings. When it was good it was very good indeed, but when it was bad, (though never horrid), it just didn't come up to expectations.

There were two and possibly three reasons for this. One was that Mr. Munch set a tempo in some sections that a group of singers so immense as that of the full choruses of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society simply could not negotiate with the proper clarity of line. More than that, in the instrumental vivace of the Agnus Dei, not even the orchestra could handle the tempo called for.

A second reason was that he simply did not have soloists with bi genough voices or with sufficient experience to traverse this music, which ranks with the most difficult and demanding music for soloists and solo quartet in the literature. The surprising thing was that these young people, all of them displaying the greatest promise, did as well as they did. But this is no situation for singers of promise; even the greatest vocalists have been humbled by the difficulties that abound in this monumental score.

Despite the fine quality of the first half, specially that of the Gloria, the performance of which seemed to me one of the finest choral renditions I ever heard, there was always conveyed a sense of lack of preparation. The chorus itself was obviously splendidly trained; it responded with remarkable flexibility and, save in the instance mentioned, acquitted itself bravely and well. It was in the integration of all the forces, that is orchestra, chorus and soloists, that the insecurity was conveyed. Insufficient full dress rehearsal, in fine, combined with end-of-season fatigue on the part of the conductor, who heaven knows has every reason to be exhausted.

Well, this is all relative, you understand, relative to the potential quality of the assembled forces. For it was by no means a second class performance, merely a slightly disappointing one. It might be added, while we're in the irascible vein, that Mr. Munch's printed request for no applause is not a happy idea.

In the case of the St. John Passion, performed on the holiest day of the Christian year, the custom of not applauding is entirely appropriate. The Missa Solemnis, however, despites its quality of utter devotion, is as theatrical as it is religious, and there is no reason in the world that it should not be applauded in the concert hall. Moreover, an audience needs the release of applause; a function of this sort without applause leaves a sense of unfulfillment, and applause is no less devotional than, for example, a bravura postlude on the organ following a church service. Had there been an ovation at the end, indeed, we would all have come away thinking we heard a better performance than actually we had.

Missa Solemnis

By BRENTON WELLING, Jr.

Any performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis done in Boston these day's can't help but be compared to Serge Koussevitzky's interpretation of the same work, either as performed in Symphony Hall two years ago or as released on records. The version given by Charles Munch with the Boston Symphony, the Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, yesterday afternoon was certainly different, and in many places better.

Munch's interpretation of the great D Major Mass was by all odds more dramatic. He achieved this effect by having everything played faster, with more dynamic contrasts, and with more snap. Whether or not yesterday's concert was good or bad, depends largely on the individual. But nobody who heard it can deny that it led to an extremely exciting afternoon.

The Missa Solemnis is a monumental piece of music. It was written towards the end of Beethoven's life when he was way ahead of his age musically. Hence, there is nothing obvious about it. It contains little or no development of themes, and it passes over each musical idea so quickly that the unfamiliar are soon lost and unappreciative.

Munch and the vast number of people on the Symphony Hall stage did their best to clarify this setting of the Roman Catholic Mass. By giving it such a dramatic treatment especially in the first half the audience couldn't help concentrating on every note. The result was that the musical setting of the text made sense.

The chorus work was magnificent throughout. Great credit must go to Professor Woodworth who prepared the Glee Club and Choral Society. It must be extraordinarily difficult to rehearse them for Koussevitzky one year and change stlye completely two years later for Munch. Their response to the conducting through all of Beethoven's surprises was excellent, and their top speed singing in the Gloria was nothing short of amazing.

The soloists were unfortunate. None of them could be heard adequately, but this was largely because they were placed behind rather than in front of the orchestra.

There were complaints yesterday that the speed of the allegros and the whispering of the pianissimos caused the words to be lost. For the most part, this is pedantry. The Missa Solmnis was a magnificent climax to Boston's musical season.

Our Readers Say—

Losing Face on a Billboard

To THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR:

Perhaps Rudyard Kipling, were he here to see a well-known orchestra conductor's picture on billboards advertising a certain brand of ale and beer, would express himself somewhat as follows:

"I've Found Out!"

It isn't the notion that out of devotion
To him we will order their brand—
It's the fact that an artist has flouted esteem
For lucre (esteem he can scarcely redeem)—
That we never can understand.

Cambridge, Mass. STILLMAN C. DAVIS

This newspaper assumes no responsibilities for statements of opinions in letters from its readers.

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
APR 30 1950

MUSIC on RECORDS

By JOHN M. HARRISON

A RECORDING debut ought to be in all ways a happy event, in which performer and music and reproduction are perfectly blended and wholly compatible. If, too often, debuts are not such pleasant occasions, that of Charles Munch with RCA-Victor measures up to all the requirements of the ideal.

Mr. Munch appears, of course, in the role of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The music is Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A. The album is Set DM or WDM-1360.

A new recording of this particular Beethoven symphony which meets highest standards has been needed for some time. The best previous effort was that of Arturo Toscanini with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, a performance made for RCA-Victor almost 15 years ago. Several others are available, but while some have the benefit of more modern reproduction techniques, each has had other flaws.

It is true that Charles Munch is not considered a good Beethoven man by many music lovers. His almost frantic tempi in conducting the Fifth in Toledo last fall were the cause of considerable unhappiness in some portions of the audience. But even if this generalization concerning Munch and Beethoven be true, it should be obvious that the Seventh is the one best suited to his Gallic temperament and his tendencies to race horse speeds.

To my ear, he seems to have both these faults well under control in this performance. In any event, this comes out a thoughtful, well-rounded and exhilirating playing of the gayest and happiest of the nine Beethoven symphonies. Mr. Munch and the Boston musicians are at their best. The recording itself is big, lucid and fairly glowing.

★

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Boston is justly proud of its Symphony Orchestra. It has reason also to be proud of the auditorium in which the orchestra's concerts are held. Symphony Hall was opened on [illegible] 1900, and this Symphony season has twice taken note of the fact. The first pair of concerts presented the program that Wilhelm Gericke played at the first pair in the new hall, and yesterday afternoon there was a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, the work heard at the actual dedication of the building. At that time the program contained a Bach Chorale, the reading of a poem by Owen Wister and an address by the orchestra's founder and sustainer, Major Henry L. Higginson. Yesterday there was just the Mass, and its performance aided the orchestra's pension fund.

The chorus on the earlier occasion was the Cecilia Society, still in existence, so far as I know, but hardly the organization that it was then. Yesterday, as Dr. Koussevitzky did so many times, Mr. Munch had for a chorus the combined choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe, admirably trained, as always, by G. Wallace Woodworth. The solo singers were Christine Cardillo, Lucile Cummings, Paul Knowles and Denis Harbour. E. Power Biggs was the organist and Richard Burgin played the violin solo in the Benedictus.

Beethoven may be said to have dramatized the text of the Mass, even to the use of martial music in the "Dona nobis pacem" and Mr. Munch may be said to have dramatized Beethoven. We are not used to the strong contrasts he achieved in the Gloria, and whenever the opportunity arose, he was inclined to drive his singers in the Munchian manner. On the whole, the quieter passages, such as the beautiful opening Kyrie, were the most successful. Once again there was the disparity—let's make it a matter of age—between the mature and seasoned orchestra and the youthful chorus and soloists. We could have stood yesterday a little more maturity on the vocal side, but that is not the way we do it hereabouts. It was Mr. Munch's wish that there should be no applause. But for that, the capacity audience would have staged a demonstration at the end. In the opinion of this member of the audience, it would have been better thus. Symphony Hall, in whose honor the concert was given, deserved it.

MUSIC

Munch Conducts Missa Solemnis to Benefit Symphony Pension Fund

By CERUS DURGIN

Charles Munch conducted Beethoven's Missa Solemnis yesterday afternoon at a concert to benefit the pension fund for retired members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The chorus consisted of the full numbers of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Christine Cardillo soprano; Lucile Cummings, contralto; Paul Knowles, tenor, and Denis Harbour, bass.

It was altogether appropriate that the Missa Solemnis should be chosen for the season's closing concert, for this was the work with which Symphony Hall had been opened Oct. 15, 1900. Also, it is one of the great and monumental pieces of the choral repertory. Not before had Mr. Munch conducted so large a choral work as this and his treatment of it was both individual and grandly proportioned.

Once again the Munch characteristic of tracing the big, main line of a score was satisfyingly evident. The details were not neglected, either, but the emphasis was upon the whole. Those wondrous passages, page after page, where the full power of Beethoven's chorus and orchestra thunder out the grandeur of the Kyrie, the Gloria and the Credo were almost breath-taking. These three sections are the most dramatic of the Missa Solemnis, and so Mr. Munch conducted them. But the most interesting aspect was his reading of the Agnus Dei.

I have heard some conductors treat this in the same dramatic style of the Kyrie, Gloria and Credo. But Mr. Munch perceives here more eloquence of gentle statement, and a great serenity permeated all this section. Even the ominous trumpetings that momentarily interrupt its course were subdued, and the actual ending reflected, in tempo and dynamics, the plea "dona nobis pacem."

The orchestra was at its best through the afternoon, and kept up with seeming ease the furious pace that Munch now and then set for it. The Harvard and Radcliffe singers had been admirably trained. Their work was crisp, precise, and finely shaded, the interweavings of the voices were clear, and the body of tone was full and rich. The four soloists, however, were uniformly disappointing. None had big enough voices, and the brilliance and the sense of contrast so important was practically non-existent. Thus, here was an uneven but an interesting performance, and in its finest moments it had elements of greatness.

Mr. Munch had requested that there be no applause, and except for a scattering of thoughtless handclapping, the Missa Solemnis was received in silence. So, he quietly left the stage, not turning to bow, and that was the end of his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Missa Solemnis

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave a Pension Fund Concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing Beethoven's Missa Solemnis. The soloists were Christine Cardillo, soprano; Lucille Cummings, contralto; Paul Knowles, tenor and Denis Harbour, bass. The Chorus was that of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. E. Power Biggs was the organist, and the violin solo was performed by Richard Burgin.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The final appearance this season of Charles Munch in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis for the Pension Fund of the Orchestra was an occasion of mixed blessings. When it was good it was very good indeed, but when it was bad (though never horrid), it just didn't come up to expectations.

There were two and possibly three reasons for this. One was that Mr. Munch set a tempo in some sections that a group of singers so immense as that of the full choruses of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society simply could not negotiate with the proper clarity of line. More than that, in the instrumental viaca of the Agnus Dei, not even the orchestra could handle the tempo called for.

A second reason was that he simply did not have soloists with bi genough voices or with sufficient experience to traverse this music, which ranks with the most difficult and demanding music for soloists and solo quartet in the literature. The surprising thing was that these young people, all of them displaying the greatest promise, did as well as they did. But this is no situation for singers of promise; even the greatest vocalists have been humbled by the difficulties that abound in this monumental score.

Despite the fine quality of the first half, specially that of the Gloria, the performance of which seemed to me one of the finest choral renditions I ever heard, there was always conveyed a sense of lack of preparation. The chorus itself was obviously splendidly trained; it responded with remarkable flexibility and, save in the instance mentioned, acquitted itself bravely and well. It was in the integration of all the forces, that is orchestra, chorus and soloists, that the insecurity was conveyed. Insufficient full dress rehearsal, in fine, combined with end-of-season fatigue on the part of the conductor, who heaven knows has every reason to be exhausted.

Well, this is all relative, you understand, relative to the potential quality of the assembled forces. For it was by no means a second class performance, merely a slightly dis[illegible]. It might be added, in the irascible vein [illegible] Munch's printed re[illegible] applause is not a [illegible] St. John Pas[illegible] the holiest day [illegible] ear, the custom of [illegible] entirely appropriate to the Missa Solemnis, however, despite its quality of utter devotion, is as theatrical as it is religious, and there is no reason in the world that it should not be applauded in the concert hall. [illegible] an audience needs the release of applause; a function of the [illegible] without applause leaves a sense of unfulfillment, and applause is no less devotional than, for example, a bravura postlude on the organ following a church service. Had there been an ovation at the end, indeed, we would all have come away thinking we heard a better performance than actually we had.

Missa Solemnis

By BRENTON WELLING, Jr.

Any performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis done in Boston these day's can't help but be compared to Serge Koussevitzky's interpretation of the same work, either as performed in Symphony Hall two years ago or as released on records. The version given by Charles Munch with the Boston Symphony, the Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, yesterday afternoon was certainly different, and in many places better.

Munch's interpretation of the great D Major Mass was by all odds more dramatic. He achieved this effect by having everything played faster, with more dynamic contrasts, and with more snap. Whether or not yesterday's concert was good or bad, depends largely on the individual. But nobody who heard it can deny that it led to an extremely exciting afternoon.

The Missa Solemnis is a monumental piece of music. It was written towards the end of Beethoven's life when he was way ahead of his age musically. Hence, there is nothing obvious about it. It contains little or no development of themes, and it passes over each musical idea so quickly that the unfamiliar are soon lost and unappreciative.

Munch and the vast number of people on the Symphony Hall stage did their best to clarify this setting of the Roman Catholic Mass. By giving it such a dramatic treatment especially in the first half the audience couldn't help concentrating on every note. The result was that the musical setting of the text made sense.

The chorus work was magnificent throughout. Great credit must go to Professor Woodworth who prepared the Glee Club and Choral Society. It must be extraordinarily difficult to rehearse them for Koussevitzky one year and change stlye completely two years later for Munch. Their response to the conducting through all of Beethoven's surprises was excellent, and their top speed singing in the Gloria was nothing short of amazing.

The soloists were unfortunate. None of them could be heard adequately, but this was largely because they were placed behind rather than in front of the orchestra.

There were complaints yesterday that the speed of the allegros and the whispering of the pianissimos caused the words to be lost. For the most part, this is pedantry. The Missa Solmnis was a magnificent climax to Boston's musical season.

Our Readers Say—

Losing Face on a Billboard

To THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR:

Perhaps Rudyard Kipling, were he here to see a well-known orchestra conductor's picture on billboards advertising a certain brand of ale and beer, would express himself somewhat as follows:

"I've Found Out!"

It isn't the notion that out of devotion
To him we will order their brand—
It's the fact that an artist has flouted esteem
For lucre (esteem he can scarcely redeem)—
That we never can understand.

Cambridge, Mass. STRATTAN C. DAVIS

This newspaper assumes no responsibilities for statements of opinions in letters from its readers.

[110]

Friday Afternoon Symphony

By KATHLEEN E. LAURENZ

Charles Munch

THE warning bell has sounded and as the overhead lights in the large hall dim, last minute arrivals scurry for their seats. The side doors have already closed. The audience has fallen into silence but in a moment breaks out in excited, almost uncertain applause as the tall Gallic figure of the conductor strides on stage and steps to the podium.

This is the first concert in the 1949-50 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston's Symphony Hall. The program opens with Beethoven's Symphony Number 5. Oblivious to the presence of the audience at his back the conductor has given himself over to the music. He makes rapid, angular gestures of his head, arms, shoulders, the whole trunk of his body. It is not long before his hair falls into bangs across his forehead. The violence of the music seems to find its origin in his physical enthusiasm.

Vogue has described this man as "long, strong, shy", with his blue eyes, gray hair, and blonde Gallic look. To the ladies of Paris he is known simply as "le beau Charles", Charles Munch, successor to Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, for twenty-five years conductor of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcement of his appointment to the post last Spring brought surprise to Boston Symphony-goers but at the same time an excited pleasure. The fifty-six year old French Mr. Munch has great personal charm, which should bring him success with the Beacon Hill and Back Bay elements of Boston. His spoken English is still not sure, but his very French manner more than makes up for that.

A conductor is made, his ultimate qualities of leadership and musicianship are developed in his early training, through the experience-mill of various municipal theatres, small to large, and so on step by step to Vienna, Paris, Berlin, Moscow, Boston, Philadelphia, or New York.

Born in Alsace-Lorraine, Charles Munch first studied music with his father, a professional organist, and later under Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin. He served his conducting apprenticeship under Wilhelm Furtwangler in Leipzig. Later he founded the Paris Philharmonic and in 1938 succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, a post which he resigned in 1946 at the time of a personal appearance tour in America. He arrived in this country in 1946 unheralded, but left triumphant. His Boston concert was a tremendous success but no more so than his later appearances with the New York Philharmonic in 1947 when the members of the orchestra gave him a surprise cocktail party, an honor previously accorded only one other conductor, Arturo Toscannini.

The conductor who is to leave an impression upon the culture of a nation must be more than just a wielder of a stick. He must be an interpreter of music, a teacher, trainer, expert organizer and personnel manager.

It is interesting to recall the circumstances

(Continued on Page 60)

[111]

...SYMPHONY

...r received his appoint-
...ay in 1924 "sight un-
...ceiving his appoint-
... and hired a steamer
... river, carrying such
...n heard by the rude
...ts shores. However,
...end to this activity.
...d "Concerts Kous-
... that he was called
... Symphony at the
...iendation of one of
... her travels on the
...nd been much im-

... in Boston, by any
... be considered an
... exceptional virtuoso
...t he possessed a very
...ckground in conduct-
...ys of conducting he hired
... the scores over to him
...t all of the gestures and
... familiarized himself with
... must even now at times re-
... method.

The relationship between a conductor and an orchestra presents a fascinating study. Dr. Koussevitsky likes to call this "artistical discipline". It may be said that the members of his orchestra feared him, but they could not love him. He was a demanding tyrant, and at times went into terrible rages during rehearsals. These became less frequent and somewhat mellowed in recent years due to his age. Before the unionization of the orchestra in 1942 a member's job had depended solely upon the temper of "Koussey". They lived in dread fear of the days when he would decide to hold special critical hearings of one section of the orchestra or perhaps one instrument. It was during these special rehearsals that he would ... and dismiss without warning the ... with whom he was dissatisfied. ... with the advent of the union his

YOUR HOME

... considerably limited.
Real... man could take the place of s... s Koussevitsky, it would seem... the orchestra have pur-posel... Charles Munch to succeed... known and belove... friendly qualities.
He ... ndness and person... mbers of his orches... -tempered, easygoi... well as during p... known, too, that a ... young conductor
... down to one or-
... length of time.
Boston Symphony
...ars, an interim, al-
... life of a symphony

THE HARVARD C

THE MUSIC BOX

E. Parker Hayden, Jr. '50

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Last weekend Brahms' First Symphony received its first performance. This is not to say that a work by this name hasn't appeared before. In fact, it has been going the rounds since 1876. But anyone who heard Charles Munch conduct Brahms' in Symphony Hall must have had the feeling of hearing it for the first time.

The task of recreating such a familiar work becomes increasingly difficult with each successive performance. If Munch's interpretation had had one new slant, or two, probably no one would have noticed. But everything about this was different, startling, and best of all it wasn't Munch (or Koussevitzky), it was Brahms. From the first page everything converged upon a cataclysmic finale. The brass chorale in the last movement nearly knocked the statue of Pan in the second balcony off its pedestal. The end was a great overpowering mass of sound.

Magnificent as it was, the Brahms by no means obliterated Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, the other item on the program. The work presents such a succession of beauties that it is impossible to absorb them all at once. This performance revealed new ones, testifying again to the versitility of Mr. Munch and not incidently to the genius of Beethoven.

Last Fall I had thought that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was at such a state of perfection that it would sound magnificent no matter who the conductor. Charles Munch's first season has caused me to change my mind. Not only does the Orchestra sound different, it sounds better, something many people would have thought impossible. Mr. Munch seems to instill the men with his boundless enthusiasm, extracting every ounce from the music without crossing into the realm of sensationalism. He is a musician through and through; it is as a musician that he has already won the full confidence of his audience, and the ovation he received on Saturday predicts growing support in the years to come.

CHARLES MUNCH

THE MUSIC BOX

Brenton Welling, Jr.

Pops Opener

At Symphony Hall

For 64 years the coming of spring has brought one of Boston's finest traditions, the Pops concerts. Tuesday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra minus its top men in each section opened the sixty-fifth Pops season. Almost nothing has changed.

Arthur Fiedler still races on stage, slaps his huge baton on the score for attention, plays each piece with the same sparkle, and sits down behind the same orange flowers. The programs look the same, the match books look the same, and the audience still eats, drinks, and talks through the lighter pieces. Once again the New England Grenfell Association was present on opening night. The only important changes noticeable were the new chairs and tables (the old ones had come from the old Music Hall in 1900) and the heaviness of the music played.

The program consisted of nine scheduled pieces and seven extras. They ran in seriousness from a brassy Overture to Tannhauser to Selections from Kiss Me Kate. Curiously enough, the most popular number by far was an extra entitled Classical Jute Box. This consisted of a little Wagner, Tchaikovsky, Liszt, and Put Another Nickel In all played more or less simultaneously. It is always amazing how the members of this orchestra can carry on a rigorous concert schedule all winter, change their name and style of playing two days after the Symphony season ends, and then, begin the nightly and unrehearsed Pops concert.

Despite this they seem to enjoy themselves while playing, frequently bursting into laughter. If for nothing else it is worth a trip into Symphony Hall to see Alfred Krips, the Symphony Orchestra's gifted Assistant Concertmaster, plucking his way through A Surrey with A Fringe on Top.

The music was exceedingly well played on opening night considering the lack of rehearsals, but that is only part of the Pops. It isn't every day that an orchestral version of Claire de Lune is accompanied by the popping of champagne corks. Each night during the season all or part of the floor in Symphony Hall is sold to one or more groups.

THE HARVARD CRIMS

These groups then sell their blocks to friends at slightly higher prices. This serves the double purpose of raising money and having a social outing at the same time. It is for this reason that there is always a low murmur and clink of glasses during a concert, although Tuesday's was a little restrained.

The programs for the next six days, all printed in the same book along with the menu and wine list, promise increasing levity. The concerts should become once again the more equally mixed social and musical occasion they have been in the past. If you have never been to the Pops it is practically essential that you go. To spend four years at Harvard without going to the Pops is to leave one's education lacking.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON SYMPHONY

(Continued from Page 23)

under whi[illegible]z. Kou[illegible]tsky received his appointment to t[illegible] S[illegible]hony in 1924 "sight unseen". Sev[illegible] [illegible]re receiving his appointment he c[illegible]d an[illegible]stra and hired a steamer to carry [illegible] the Volga river, carrying such music as [illegible] had been heard by the rude villagers [illegible] its shores. However, the Russi[illegible] an end to this activity. In Paris he established his famed "Concerts Koussevitsky". It was from this post that he was called by the trustees of the Boston Symphony at the age of fifty upon the recommendation of one of the ladies on the board who on her travels on the continent the previous season had been much impressed by his performance.

At the time of his debut in Boston, by any standards, he would have to be considered an amateur conductor. He was an exceptional virtuoso of the bass fiddle, but he possessed a very scant theoretical background in conducting. In his early days of conducting he hired a pianist to play the scores over to him while he worked out all of the gestures and at the same time familiarized himself with the music. He must even now at times resort to this method.

The relationship between a conductor and an orchestra presents a fascinating study. Dr. Koussevitsky likes to call this "artistical discipline". It may be said that the members of his orchestra feared him, but they could not love him. He was a demanding tyrant, and at times went into terrible rages during rehearsals. These became less frequent and somewhat mellowed in recent years due to his age. Before the unionization of the orchestra in 1942 a member's job had depended solely upon the temper of "Koussey". They lived in dread fear of the days when he would decide to hold special critical hearings of one section of the orchestra or perhaps one instrument. It was during these special rehearsals that he would weed out and dismiss without warning the players with whom he was dissatisfied. However, with the advent of the union his powers of discharge were considerably limited.

YOUR HOME

Realizing that no one man could take the place of so tremendous a figure as Koussevitsky, it would seem that the trustees of the orchestra have purposely chosen a man such as Charles Munch to succeed him; a man who is well known and beloved for his humane and friendly qualities. He has a reputation for kindness and personal contact with the members of his orchestra. And he is smooth-tempered, easy-going [illegible] rehearsals as well as during publi[illegible] concerts. It is known, too, that as ye[illegible] relatively young conductor is not [illegible] settling down to one orchest[illegible] for any length of time. His [illegible] Boston Symphony Orc[illegible] years, an interim, almost [illegible] the life of a symphony

THE MUSIC BOX

E. Parker Hayden, Jr. '50

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Last weekend Brahms' First Symphony received its first performance. This is not to say that a work by this name hasn't appeared before. In fact, it has been going the rounds since 1876. But anyone who heard Charles Munch conduct Brahms' in Symphony Hall must have had the feeling of hearing it for the first time.

The task of recreating such a familiar work becomes increasingly difficult with each successive performance. If Munch's interpretation had had one new slant, or two, probably no one would have noticed. But everything about this was different, startling, and best of all it wasn't Munch (or Koussevitzky), it was Brahms. From the first page everything converged upon a cataclysmic finale. The brass chorale in the last movement nearly knocked the statue of Pan in the second balcony off its pedestal. The end was a great overpowering mass of sound.

Magnificent as it was, the Brahms by no means obliterated Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, the other item on the program. The work presents such a succession of beauties that it is impossible to absorb them all at once. This performance revealed new ones, testifying again to the versitility of Mr. Munch and not incidently to the genius of Beethoven.

Last Fall I had thought that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was at such a state of perfection that it would sound magnificent no matter who the conductor. Charles Munch's first season has caused me to change my mind. Not only does the Orchestra sound different, it sounds better, something many people would have thought impossible. Mr. Munch seems to instill the men with his boundless enthusiasm, extracting every ounce from the music without crossing into the realm of sensationalism. He is a musician through and through; it is as a musician that he has already won the full confidence of his audience, and the ovation he received on Saturday predicts growing support in the years to come.

CHARLES MUNCH

THE MUSIC BOX

Brenton Welling, Jr.

Pops Opener

At Symphony Hall

For 64 years the coming of spring has brought one of Boston's finest traditions, the Pops concerts. Tuesday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra minus its top men in each section opened the sixty-fifth Pops season. Almost nothing has changed.

Arthur Fiedler still races on stage, slaps his huge baton on the score for attention, plays each piece with the same sparkle, and sits down behind the same orange flowers. The programs look the same, the match books look the same, and the audience still eats, drinks, and talks through the lighter pieces. Once again the New England Grenfell Association was present on opening night. The only important changes noticeable were the new chairs and tables (the old ones had come from the old Music Hall in 1900) and the heaviness of the music played.

The program consisted of nine scheduled pieces and seven extras. They ran in seriousness from a brassy Overture to Tannhauser to Selections from Kiss Me Kate. Curiously enough, the most popular number by far was an extra entitled Classical Jute Box. This consisted of a little Wagner, Tchaikovsky, Liszt, and Put Another Nickel In all played more or less simultaneously. It is always amazing how the members of this orchestra can carry on a rigorous concert schedule all winter, change their name and style of playing two days after the Symphony season ends, and then, begin the nightly and unrehearsed Pops concert.

Despite this they seem to enjoy themselves while playing, frequently bursting into laughter. If for nothing else it is worth a trip into Symphony Hall to see Alfred Krips, the Symphony Orchestra's gifted Assistant Concertmaster, plucking his way through A Surrey with A Fringe on Top.

The music was exceedingly well played on opening night considering the lack of rehearsals, but that is only part of the Pops. It isn't every day that an orchestral version of Claire de Lune is accompanied by the popping of champagne corks. Each night during the season all or part of the floor in Symphony Hall is sold to one or more groups.

These groups then sell their blocks to friends at slightly higher prices. This serves the double purpose of raising money and having a social outing at the same time. It is for this reason that there is always a low murmur and clink of glasses during a concert, although Tuesday's was a little restrained.

The programs for the next six days, all printed in the same book along with the menu and wine list, promise increasing levity. The concerts should become once again the more equally mixed social and musical occasion they have been in the past. If you have never been to the Pops it is practically essential that you go. To spend four years at Harvard without going to the Pops is to leave one's education lacking.

Pops Off to Gala Start With Fiedler Di[illegible]ing

The 65th season of the Boston Pops [illegible] dashing start last night at Symphony Hall [illegible] ous leadership of Arthur Fiedler, who beg[illegible] son as the most popular of all the leaders of these concerts.

A man who keps his eye on the present in music, as well as paying his respects to the past, Mr. Fiedler opened with Eric Coates' bright and shining new Television March.

A first performance in Boston was "The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra," by England's most noted younger generation composer, Benjamin Britten. The piece chases a theme through each section of the orchestra in turn—with the voice of a narrator characterizing each kind of instrument—and then churns up the whole orchestra together into a rousing conclusion. The clearly-spoken comments were by Leonard Burkat of the Symphony Hall staff.

An excerpt, "The Girl I Left Behind Me," from Leroy Anderson's "Irish Suite," newly recorded by the Pops Orchestra, was another up-to-the-minute offering.

There were plenty of perennial favorites on the program, by Offenbach, Debussy, Richard and Johann Strauss, and Wagner.

But a leader in favor among the throng of listeners who included many tables of patrons of the New England Grenfell Association—was a string of selections from the current Cole Porter stage hit, "Kiss Me Kate."

Tonight at the Pops

Polonaise from "Eugene Onegin" Tchaikovsky

Suite from "The Water Music" Handel-Harty
Allegro—Air—Allegro deciso

Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" R. Strauss

"Classical" Symphony Prokofieff
Allegro—Larghetto—Gavotte—Finale

Concerto in A major for Piano and Orchestra, No 2 Liszt
Soloist: Helen Zoe Duncan

Selection from "Kiss Me Kate" Porter

Smoke Gets In Your Eyes Kern

March of the Bowmen from "Robin [illegible]

CINC[illegible] OHIO

M[illegible] 50

cized bef[illegible] be extre[illegible]

The p[illegible] to a adapted to [illegible]igor- used to en[illegible] sea- crease total[illegible] out the righ[illegible] tial produc[illegible] vided well [illegible] our war pl[illegible] supplies to [illegible] ians had mo[illegible] ever before

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES
MAY 7- 1950

Hub Pop Ork, Symph Ink 5-Yr. RCA Renewal

NEW YORK, April 29.—The Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops orchestra have signed a five-year renewal contract with RCA Victor. The outfits, which employ virtually the same personnel, are conducted by Charles Munch and Arthur Fielder, respectively. Munch took over the reins this season following Serge Koussevitsky's retirement as permanent conductor of the prominent unit.

The signing of the pact by Paul Barkmeir, vice-president and general manager of RCA Victor's record division, and Henry B. Cabot, president of the ork's board of trustees, continues an affiliation begun in 1917, and interrupted only for one year in the late 1930's when the outfit cut a couple of dates for Columbia. During the past year both London and Columbia diskeries are known to have been dickering with the Boston organization because of an impression that Munch was reluctant to sign and exclusive pact with Victor. He had previously recorded with various symphonic units for London (English Decca), Columbia and French Polydor, represented here by Vox Records.

An extensive recording program with both units will be conducted this summer by Richard Mohr, Red Seal recording director. The Pops unit will cut in Boston's Symphony Hall during the annual Esplanade series, which runs from May 2 thru July 1. The symphony, under the direction of Koussevitsky, will record at Tanglewood, Mass., at the close of the Berkshire Music Festival, which will run from July 8 thru August 13. Munch will record with the unit on his return from Europe in the fall.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAY 6- 1950

RECORDS on Review

CONCERT RECORDS

Charles Munch's debut recording as conductor of the Boston Symphony and successor of Serge Koussevitzky is Beethoven's Seventh, a pleasing choice. The man's buoyant, as the piece is. All that is aerial and exultant he spreads wide and carries the orchestra on that wing. (RCA Victor; one 12-inch LP.)

A worthy thing about it is that Beethoven is exalted and not Munch, which has point because of Mengelberg-Amsterdam Concertgebouw recordings of the First and Eighth also newly available. You're awed all over again by a conductorial genius, but you're stunned by egoistic arrogance.

He lays out the First with an evident preconception it has to be no less Beethovenesque than the post-Eroica symphonies. He frees it of antecedents, particularly in the first movement, but with accents strained and Mengelbergian. And some of the tempi he arrogates to the Eighth will make you bat your eyes.

Controversial interpretations, these, as so many of Mengelberg's are. Yet stimulating, by being invocative of enlivening argument. The recording is fair to good, much below the superlative quality Victor has given the Munch Seventh. Capitol-Telefunken has put them both on one 12-inch LP, which marks the first time a Beethoven Symphony has come from the phonograph without interruption.

MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES
MAY 6- 1950

ON THE RECORDS

Munch Makes Debut
Stokowski Conducts
New Operatic Star

[By DEWEY DUNN]

CHARLES MUNCH, THE ALSATIAN-BORN conductor who took over the Boston Symphony when Serge Koussevitzky retired, makes his recording debut with RCA Victor this week with an admirable performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. After achieving success in Europe, Israel and South America, he was picked for the Boston post following his guest appearances in Boston and New York in 1946-47.

Munch is a stickler for perfection; every nuance must be just right, every instrument in action must contribute its proper shading to the overall orchestral color. And we see a beautiful example of the dividends of such fastidiousness in the meticulous handling of this "dance symphony."

The work has earned that sobriquet because of the folk dance themes which permeate its structure. The symphony has no program. Its music is rhapsodic in character, touched now and then with a bit of gruff humor or homely philosophy, and resplendent with constantly shifting orchestral color. Its rhythms are vigorous and elastic, working up to a final movement of almost bacchanalian frenzy. It has been released in all three record speeds.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 7- 1950

OTHER REVIEWS

Victor's long-playing disks are beginning to appear in quantity. A new recording of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony on a twelve-inch record comes from the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch. It is a vigorous, incisive reading of the score, and the orchestra plays with brilliance of tone. But even though the Toscanini version is relatively old, it is superior musically.

The Symphony Orchestra of the Academy of Santa Cecilia, Rome, conducted by Jacques Rachmilovich, has made a new recording of Glière's Symphony No. 3, in B minor (Ilya Mourometz), and it is released by Capitol on a twelve-inch, long-playing disk. The performance is sonorous and alive, although the music's length and bombast make the work tedious after a time.

London record-

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS
MAY 7- 1950 32

The release of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, played by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heralds an auspicious recording debut by a conductor who in his fourth year in the United States has won a cherished place in the affection of music lovers throughout the country. Munch's debut disc is the first of a series of major symphonic events scheduled for release in the near future by one of the top companies.

The "Allegretto" on the final side of the album is a miniature jewel of a work that is seldom performed.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By ROSS PARMENTER

CONDUCTORS may be remaining at their posts next season, but first desk men are certainly shifting around. Every year there is a moderate amount of changing, but 1950-51 looks as if it will set a record for migration. Names of instrumentalists are often hard to come by, since orchestra directors are solicitous to protect the reputations of those musicians they replace. But from various sources eleven names have reached this desk in the last week that reveal changes in ten different orchestras. Since nearly every new appointment has a chain reaction and these eleven are merely the first changes learned about, it is plain that there will be many more before every man is snugly in his seat when the concerts begin next fall.

The Boston Symphony and the Cleveland Orchestra are each getting two new first desk men. Ralph Gomberg and Gino Gioffi will head the oboe and clarinet sections of the former and Marc Lifschey and Ross Taylor will head the oboe and horn sections of the latter. Mr. Gioffi's job as first clarinetist of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra is being taken by Herbert Blayman, which leaves the Utah Symphony needing another clarinetist. Mr. Lifschey's post as first oboist of the National Symphony has been gained by Julien Balogh, and Mr. Taylor's post as fourth horn in the New York Philharmonic-Symphony is going to Ranier De Intinis Jr.

Ignatius Gennusa will be the new first clarinetist of the Chicago Symphony. Jan Tomasow, who has been the concertmaster of the National Symphony for the last six years, is moving to head the violinists and to be assistant conductor of the Baltimore Symphony. Kenneth Scutt is to be the new first flutist of the Kansas City Philharmonic and Edward Goldbrecht will be the new first bassoonist of the New Orleans Symphony.

Next Season May Br Of Changes in

John Brook

John N. Burk, historian and program annotator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on whom was conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Music today by the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia.

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Save for the fact that each is a conductor of the emotional, temperamental variety, capable of generating a degree of excitement in excess of the composer's probable intentions, it would be difficult to find two leaders more sharply contrasted than Serge Koussevitzky and his successor as head of the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch. This difference is most marked in the men themselves. Koussevitzky is expansive, something of a politician, and his social gift is as pronounced as his artistic one. Munch, as most people see him, is shy, reserved, aloof, though you can sense beneath the quiet exterior the dynamism, the volcanic energy that continually bursts forth on the podium.

However, if the term "strenuous" applies to both, only Munch can be called violent. Fortunately, these leaps and gyrations, these berserker frenzies, which are likely to prove distracting to the listener, have moderated considerably since we first made his acquaintance, and we can hope for further progress in the same direction. It has been proven more than once that a conductor can get results of the most impressive sort without twisting himself into bowknots or jumping clear of the platform. A man must be true to himself, and I believe that in this, as in other respects, Munch is fundamentally sincere. One could overlook the occasional acrobatics were it not for the fact that their effects is generally the above-mentioned one of creating more excitement than is either desirable or necessary.

The Fat and Lean

In the matter of orchestral tone Koussevitzky inclines toward the fat while Munch courts the lean. The Russian is the more voluptuous, the Alsatian the more ascetic in their respective approaches. The famed luxuriance of the Koussevitzky tone was chiefly attributable to the strings, and, as already observed here, if the string tone of the Boston Symphony is now less rich, it is more varied. In this respect Munch proves himself the better stylist of the two. Already inclined toward sharpness and stridency, the heavy brass has become more so. This was noticeable in Mr. Munch's Strauss and still more apparent in his Wagner, the composer with whom to date he has failed most conspicuously. This is also the trend of the times. Authoritative Wagner conducting seems to be getting scarcer year by year.

Both Koussevitzky and Munch tend to speed up fast movements, often at the expense of clarity. But whereas Koussevitzky is inclined to drag the slow ones, Munch will often hurry them also, a process that may prove even more damaging. A good example is found in their treatment of Andante of Schubert's C major Symphony, which Koussevitzky takes too slowly and Munch too fast. On the other hand, the latter may deliver the andante tempo that the composer had in mind where Koussevitzky will produce an adagio. The slow movement of Brahms' First Symphony is a case in point. Generally speaking, Koussevitzky emphasizes color and Munch line, and they will succeed or fail in proportion to the amount of emphasis that should rightly be placed on each of these qualities. That is chiefly why the Munch version of Debussy's "La Mer" proved so disappointing in comparison with the one with which we had been so long familiar.

Different Methods

In rehearsal Koussevitzky is an empiricist, testing out his effects as he goes along. Munch, the players will tell you, comes with everything fully worked out in his mind, and for that reason, rehearsals are frequently shorter. Munch, I suspect, is more of a musician's musician than Koussevitzky, who, despite Munch's incontestable success with the public, is more likely to impress the average auditor.

I have drawn this comparison between the two leaders because if a conductor has a sufficiently powerful personality, an orchestra becomes a projection of that personality. For 25 years we had a Koussevitzky orchestra. Now we have a Munch orchestra. The Koussevitzky one was a glamorous instrument, the like of which we may never hear again. But it was not the ideal instrument for all kinds of music. Already, if some things have not turned out so well, others have turned out better. In many cases it is 50-50.

What is more important, a change was definitely in order. Besides the new and often welcome points of view, Mr. Munch has freshened the repertory, a matter that I shall discuss next week. In sum, if the past season was something to be looked forward to with interest the coming one may safely be anticipated with both interest and pleasure.

[113]

Pops Off to Gala Start With Fiedler Directing

The 65th season of the Boston Pops got away to a dashing start last night at Symphony Hall under the vigorous leadership of Arthur Fiedler, who began his 21st season as the most popular of all the leaders of these concerts.

A man who keps his eye on the present in music, as well as paying his respects to the past, Mr. Fiedler opened with Eric Coates' bright and shining new Television March.

A first performance in Boston was "The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra," by England's most noted younger generation composer, Benjamin Britten. The piece chases a theme through each section of the orchestra in turn—with the voice of a narrator characterizing each kind of instrument—and then churns up the whole orchestra together into a rousing conclusion. The clearly-spoken comments were by Leonard Burkat of the Symphony Hall staff.

An excerpt, "The Girl I Left Behind Me," from Leroy Anderson's "Irish Suite," newly recorded by the Pops Orchestra, was another up-to-the-minute offering.

There were plenty of perennial favorites on the program, by Offenbach, Debussy, Richard and Johann Strauss, and Wagner.

But a leader in favor among the throng of listeners who included many tables of patrons of the New England Grenfell Association—was a string of selections from the current Cole Porter stage hit, "Kiss Me Kate."

Tonight at the Pops

Polonaise from "Eugene Onegin" Tchaikovsky
Suite from "The Water Music" Handel-Harty
Allegro—Air—Allegro deciso
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" R. Strauss
"Classical" Symphony Prokofieff
Allegro—Larghetto—Gavotte—Finale
Concerto in A major for Piano and Orchestra, No 2 Liszt
Soloist: Helen Zoe Duncan
Selection from "Kiss Me Kate" Porter
Smoke Gets in Your Eyes Kern
March of the Bowmen from "Robin

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 7- 1950

Hub Pop Ork, Symph Ink 5-Yr. RCA Renewal

NEW YORK, April 29.—The Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops orchestra have signed a five-year renewal contract with RCA Victor. The outfits, which employ virtually the same personnel, are conducted by Charles Munch and Arthur Fielder, respectively. Munch took over the reins this season following Serge Koussevitsky's retirement as permanent conductor of the prominent unit.

The signing of the pact by Paul Barkmeir, vice-president and general manager of RCA Victor's record division, and Henry B. Cabot, president of the ork's board of trustees, continues an affiliation begun in 1917, and interrupted only for one year in the late 1930's when the outfit cut a couple of dates for Columbia. During the past year both London and Columbia diskeries are known to have been dickering with the Boston organization because of an impression that Munch was reluctant to sign and exclusive pact with Victor. He had previously recorded with various symphonic units for London (English Decca), Columbia and French Polydor, represented here by Vox Records.

An extensive recording program with both units will be conducted this summer by Richard Mohr, Red Seal recording director. The Pops unit will cut in Boston's Symphony Hall during the annual Esplanade series, which runs from May 2 thru July 1. The symphony, under the direction of Koussevitsky, will record at Tanglewood, Mass., at the close of the Berkshire Music Festival, which will run from July 8 thru August 13. Munch will record with the unit on his return from Europe in the fall.

MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES
MAY 8 - 1950

ON THE RECORDS

Munch Makes Debut
Stokowski Conducts
New Operatic Star

[By DEWEY DUNN]

CHARLES MUNCH, THE ALSATIAN-BORN conductor who took over the Boston Symphony when Serge Koussevitzky retired, makes his recording debut with RCA Victor this week with an admirable performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. After achieving success in Europe, Israel and South America, he was picked for the Boston post following his guest appearances in Boston and New York in 1946-47.

Munch is a stickler for perfection; every nuance must be just right, every instrument in action must contribute its proper shading to the overall orchestral color. And we see a beautiful example of the dividends of such fastidiousness in the meticulous handling of this "dance symphony."

The work has earned that sobriquet because of the folk dance themes which permeate its structure. The symphony has no program. Its music is rhapsodic in character, touched now and then with a bit of gruff humor or homely philosophy, and resplendent with constantly shifting orchestral color. Its rhythms are vigorous and elastic, working up to a final movement of almost bacchanalian frenzy. It has been released in all three record speeds.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 7- 1950

OTHER REVIEWS

Victor's long-playing disks are beginning to appear in quantity. A new recording of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony on a twelve-inch record comes from the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch. It is a vigorous, incisive reading of the score, and the orchestra plays with brilliance of tone. But even though the Toscanini version is relatively old, it is superior musically.

The Symphony Orchestra of the Academy of Santa Cecilia, Rome, conducted by Jacques Rachmilovich, has made a new recording of Glière's Symphony No. 3, in B minor (Ilya Mourometz), and it is released by Capitol on a twelve-inch, long-playing disk. The performance is sonorous and alive, although the music's length and bombast make the work tedious after a time.

London record

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS
MAY 7- 1950

The release of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, played by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heralds an auspicious recording debut by a conductor who in his fourth year in the United States has won a cherished place in the affection of music lovers throughout the country. Munch's debut disc is the first of a series of major symphonic events scheduled for release in the near future by one of the top companies.

The "Allegretto" on the final side of the album is a miniature jewel of a work that is seldom performed.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 7- 1950

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Next Season May Br Of Changes in

By ROSS PARMENTER

CONDUCTORS may be remaining at their posts next season, but first desk men are certainly shifting around. Every year there is a moderate amount of changing, but 1950-51 looks as if it will set a record for migration. Names of instrumentalists are often hard to come by, since orchestra directors are solicitous to protect the reputations of those musicians they replace. But from various sources eleven names have reached this desk in the last week that reveal changes in ten different orchestras. Since nearly every new appointment has a chain reaction and these eleven are merely the first changes learned about, it is plain that there will be many more before every man is snugly in his seat when the concerts begin next fall.

The Boston Symphony and the Cleveland Orchestra are each getting two new first desk men. Ralph Gomberg and Gino Gioffi will head the oboe and clarinet sections of the former and Marc Lifschey and Ross Taylor will head the oboe and horn sections of the latter. Mr. Gioffi's job as first clarinetist of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra is being taken by Herbert Blayman, which leaves the Utah Symphony needing another clarinetist. Mr. Lifschey's post as first oboist of the National Symphony has been gained by Julien Balogh, and Mr. Taylor's post as fourth horn in the New York Philharmonic-Symphony is going to Ranier De Intinis Jr.

Ignatius Gennusa will be the new first clarinetist of the Chicago Symphony. Jan Tomasow, who has been the concertmaster of the National Symphony for the last six years, is moving to head the violinists and to be assistant conductor of the Baltimore Symphony. Kenneth Scutt is to be the new first flutist of the Kansas City Philharmonic and Edward Goldbrecht will be the new first bassoonist of the New Orleans Symphony.

John Brook

John N. Burk, historian and program annotator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on whom was conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Music today by the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAY 6- 1950

RECORDS on Review

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Save for the fact that each is a conductor of the emotional, temperamental variety, capable of generating a degree of excitement in excess of the composer's probable intentions, it would be difficult to find two leaders more sharply contrasted than Serge Koussevitzky and his successor as head of the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch. This difference is most marked in the men themselves. Koussevitzky is expansive, something of a politician, and his social gift is as pronounced as his artistic one. Munch, as most people see him, is shy, reserved, aloof, though you can sense beneath the quiet exterior the dynamism, the volcanic energy that continually bursts forth on the podium.

However, if the term "strenuous" applies to both, only Munch can be called violent. Fortunately, these leaps and gyrations, these berserker frenzies, which are likely to prove distracting to the listener, have moderated considerably since we first made his acquaintance, and we can hope for further progress in the same direction. It has been proven more than once that a conductor can get results of the most impressive sort without twisting himself into bowknots or jumping clear of the platform. A man must be true to himself, and I believe that in this, as in other respects, Munch is fundamentally sincere. One could overlook the occasional acrobatics were it not for the fact that their effects is generally the above-mentioned one of creating more excitement than is either desirable or necessary.

The Fat and Lean

In the matter of orchestral tone Koussevitzky inclines toward the fat while Munch courts the lean. The Russian is the more voluptuous, the Alsatian the more ascetic in their respective approaches. The famed luxuriance of the Koussevitzky tone was chiefly attributable to the strings, and, as already observed here, if the string tone of the Boston Symphony is now less rich, it is more varied. In this respect Munch proves himself the better stylist of the two. Already inclined toward sharpness and stridency, the heavy brass has become more so. This was noticeable in Mr. Munch's Strauss and still more apparent in his Wagner, the composer with whom to date he has failed most conspicuously. This is also the trend of the times. Authoritative Wagner conducting seems to be getting scarcer year by year.

Both Koussevitzky and Munch tend to speed up fast movements, often at the expense of clarity. But whereas Koussevitzky is inclined to drag the slow ones, Munch will often hurry them also, a process that may prove even more damaging. A good example is found in their treatment of Andante of Schubert's C major Symphony, which Koussevitzky takes too slowly and Munch too fast. On the other hand, the latter may deliver the andante tempo that the composer had in mind where Koussevitzky will produce an adagio. The slow movement of Brahms' First Symphony is a case in point. Generally speaking, Koussevitzky emphasizes color and Munch line, and they will succeed or fail in proportion to the amount of emphasis that should rightly be placed on each of these qualities. That is chiefly why the Munch version of Debussy's "La Mer" proved so disappointing in comparison with the one with which we had been so long familiar.

Different Methods

In rehearsal Koussevitzky is an empiricist, testing out his effects as he goes along. Munch, the pianist will tell you, comes with everything fully worked out in his mind, and for that reason, rehearsals are frequently shorter. Munch, I suspect, is more of a musician's musician than Koussevitzky, who, despite Munch's incontestable success with the public, is more likely to impress the average auditor.

I have drawn this comparison between the two leaders because each conductor has a sufficiently powerful personality, an orchestra that becomes a projection of that personality. For 25 years we had a Koussevitzky orchestra. Now we have a Munch orchestra. The Koussevitzky one was a glamorous instrument, the like of which we may never hear again. But it was not the ideal instrument for all kinds of music. Already, if some things have not turned out so well, others have turned out better. In many cases it is 50-50.

What is more important, a change was definitely in order. Besides the new and often welcome point of view, Mr. Munch has freshened the repertory, a matter that I shall discuss next week. In sum, if the past season was something to be looked forward to with interest, the coming one may safely be anticipated with both interest and pleasure.

CONCERT RECORDS

Charles Munch's debut recording as conductor of the Boston Symphony and successor of Serge Koussevitzky is Beethoven's Seventh, a pleasing choice. The man's buoyant, as the piece is. All that is aerial and exultant he spreads wide and carries the orchestra on that wing. (RCA Victor; one 12-inch LP.)

A worthy thing about it is that Beethoven is exalted and not Munch, which has point because of Mengelberg-Amsterdam Concertgebouw recordings of the First and Eighth also newly available. You're awed all over again by a conductorial genius, but you're stunned by egoistic arrogance.

He lays out the First with an evident preconception it has to be no less Beethovenesque than the post-Eroica symphonies. He frees it of antecedents, particularly in the first movement, but with accents strained and Mengelbergian. And some of the tempi he arrogates to the Eighth will make you bat your eyes.

Controversial interpretations, these, as so many of Mengelberg's are. Yet stimulating, by being invocative of enlivening argument. The recording is fair to good, much below the superlative quality Victor has given the Munch Seventh. Capitol-Telefunken has put them both on one 12-inch LP, which marks the first time a Beethoven Symphony has come from the phonograph without interruption.

A Backward Glance: The Music Season of 1949-1950

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Taking it by and large the music season now closed (it is defined as that period of time between the opening of the Boston Symphony series in October and its close at the end of April) has been a notable one, both as to the number of events offered and as to the variety and musical value of the programs offered. It has not been a notable season of audience attendance, however. Save for the concerts of the Boston Symphony, all series of which were entirely sold out throughout the season, I would say that attendance, which is to say business, was this season about 20 per cent. below that of last season.

But that as it may, I find that The Herald reviewed a total of 153 musical events during the period from Oct. 1 to April 30. What the total number of all concerts and musical events offered to the public in Greater Boston during that period is I do not know; I have regrettably never kept such records. But to judge by the programs and announcements sent in to The Herald every week, only a fraction of which (again regrettably) are published, at least 500 musical events are given in and around Boston every season, ranging all the way from the events put on by community orchestras in the suburbs to the series sponsored by the Gardner Museum and the Museum of Fine Arts.

FAMOUS NAMES

Omitting, for the moment, the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the concerts reviewed have included 24 pianists, 23 singers, 13 violinists, seven different orchestras, 13 different chamber music ensembles, 15 large-scale choral affairs, 20 different operas (there was some duplication during the season), and a half a dozen miscellaneous affairs offering everything from accordions to theremins.

The pianists who appeared this year were Eunice Podis, Luboschutz and Nemenoff, Tung Kwong Kwong, Solomon, Frank Glazer, Rita La Plante, Artur Rubinstein, Nicholle Henriot Rudolf Firkusny, Celia Huan, Maryla Jonas, Vronsky and Babin, Whittemore and Lowe, Robert Casadesus, Gregory Tucker, Alexander Brailowsky, Francis Poulenc, Menahmen Pressler, Miklos Schwalb, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Myra Hess, Stanislaus Niedzielski, Benno Moisevitch and Vladimir Horowitz.

Among the singers who gave recitals in Boston this season were Roland Hayes, Giuseppe de Stefano, Thomas Thomas, Ebe Stignani, Helen Alexander, Richard Dyer-Bennett, Maggie Teyte, Ferdinand Bernac, Adele Addison, Italo Tajo, Martial Singher, Alice Farnsworth, Aniceta Shea, Blanche Thebom, Mildah Polia, Muriel Rahn, Nelson Eddy, John Feeney, Camille Girouard, Eleanor Steber, Jennie Tourel, Christopher Lynch and Lotte Lehman.

The violinists were Joseph Ponte, Yehudi Menuhin, Louis Kaufman, Isaac Stern, Nathan Milstein, Ossy Renardy, Zvi Zeitlin, Zino Francescatti, Ma Si Han, Mischa Elman and Robert Brink. The orchestras were the Civic Symphony, the Zimbler Sinfonietta, the Indianapolis Symphony, the St. Louis Symphony, and the orchestras of Boston University, Harvard and the New England Conservatory.

Among the chamber music ensembles that appeared were the London Quartet, the Moyse Trio, the Trieste Trio, the Juilliard Quartet, the New Friends of Music Quartet, the Collegium Musicum, the Griller Quartet, the Benington Ensemble, Busch and Serkin, the Roth Quartet, and various ensembles contrived by the Harvard Music Club, the Bach Festival of Brandeis University, the Pro Musica Antiqua, the Fanny Mason Foundation, and Hindemith for his concert of medieval music.

The operas given in the city were "Iphigenia in Tauris," "Albert Herring," "The Turk in Italy," "Rigoletto," "Carmen," "La Boheme," "La Traviata," "Madame Butterfly," "Manon Lescaut," "Tosca," "Faust," "Die Walkuere," "Simon Boccanegra," "Der Rosenkavalier," "Barber of Seville," "Aida," "Lohengrin," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "I Pagliacci," "Gianni Schicchi," and "La Finta Giardiniera," (incomplete). Among the larger choral works were the "St. John Passion," the "St. Matthew Passion" and the Christmas Oratorio (complete) of Bach; Mozart's C minor Mass, Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri;" Handel's "Messiah" and "Israel in Egypt;" Schultz' Christmas Oratorio and "St. John Passion," and Brahms' Requiem.

OUTSTANDING EVENTS

Perhaps the most striking musical news event of the year was the accession, as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, of Charles Munch, and it was Mr. Munch who conducted the two outstanding musical events of the season: Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake" and Bach's "St. John Passion." Other outstanding events: the two appearances of Solomon, the chamber music series of the Zimbler Sinfonietta, the Metropolitan Opera Company's performance of "Simon Boccanegra," the Trieste Trio, the vocal recitals given by Adele Addison, Alice Farnsworth, Italo Tajo and Roland Hayes; the violin recitals of Isaac Stern and Nathan Milstein; the Bach series offered by the Collegium Musicum; the performance of "La Finta Giardiniera" and "Gianni Schicchi" by students of Boston University; the connoisseur series offered by the Fanny Peabody Mason Foundation; the performance of Schuetz' "St John Passion" by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and the appearance of the Belgian Pro Musica Antiqua.

New music was not the rule at the Symphony concerts this season, Mr. Munch confining himself largely to the repertoire without undue emphasis on French music. By all odds the most pretentious offering was Messaien's "Turangalila," the celebrated symphony of love. It was done by Leonard Bernstein, who had it more or less tossed in his lap, and nobody so far has come forth as its champion, though it was certainly interesting enough. Otherwise, save for a symphony by Bernard Waagenaar (and a good one), Lukas Foss' "Song of Anguish," and Randall Thompson's Third Symphony, there has been

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 9 - 1950

MUSIC

Brown, Pembroke Glee Clubs Sing With Pops Orchestra at Hub

By LANING HUMPHREY

Boston, May 8.—The musical skill and enthusiasm of the Brown University and Pembroke College Glee Clubs, and their director, Edward Barry Greene, made a spirited contribution to the second week of the 65th season of the Boston Pops at Symphony Hall tonight, before a houseful of Brunonians.

Conductor Arthur Fiedler opened the program with an up-to-the-minute note, the catchy "Television" march of Eric Coates. Walter Piston's jocular music from his ballet, "The Incredible Flutist," and the first group ended with Bach's "Little Fugue" in G minor, and the rousing third movement of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The boyish-appearing Samuel Mayes, head of the Boston Symphony's 'cello section, was the soloist of the second section, given over entirely to the compact and spritely Saint Saens concerto in A minor.

From first balcony seats, while awaiting their stage call, the choristers registered keen interest in the selections and the versatility with which the varied styles of the first two program sections were tossed off by Mr. Fiedler, the Pops orchestra of just under 100 men—and the handsome and musically dazzling 'cello soloist. As they trouped downstairs to take their places on stage, they looked impressed with their approaching task of making a good showing against the preceding competition.

They made it. Under Mr. Greene's incisive direction, they got their voices and their words out to the far reaches of the big hall. Whether the two choruses were combined, or whether the Brown or the Pembroke groups sang separately, quality and quantity both were produced. Ann Pickles gave a good account of herself as soprano soloist in the opening number. There was good variety in the choice and sequence of the selections, which opened with a pair each from Vaughan-Williams and Brahms, and continued with two sea chanties arranged by Mr. Greene, and three lively choruses from Offenbach's "La Belle Helene." The latter was a treat to regular pops-goers who know only the overture to that topsy-turvy version of the legend of Helen of Troy.

The combined glee clubs climaxed their share of the program with "Alma Mater," joined by some two thousand voices of the audience, which presented a striking sight as occupants of the floor and two balconies rose to their feet simultaneously.

Before going back to their balcony seats for the final numbers by the pops orchestra, a number of singers from each of the clubs managed to invade Arthur Fiedler's room near the stage, and get their programs autographed. Another side event of the evening was the discovery that on the walls of the corrido stair walls were hangin government's exhibit of contemporary native had been shown last Rhode Island School of

The pops orchestra w selections from "South
roy Anderson's "Sleigh was not altogether a co weather—and "Brunon
last really shook the st
Symphony Hall.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 9 - 1950

Music

Brown and Pembroke Glee Clubs Sing with Hub Pops Orchestra

By LANING HUMPHREY

Boston, May 8.—The musical skill and enthusiasm of the Brown University and Pembroke College Glee Clubs, and their director, Edward Barry Greene, made a spirited contribution to the second week of the 65th season of the Boston Pops at Symphony Hall tonight, before a houseful of Brunonians.

Conductor Arthur Fiedler opened the program with an up-to-the-minute note, the catchy "Television" march of Eric Coates. Walter Piston's jocular music from his ballet, "The Incredible Flutist," and the first group ended with Bach's "Little Fugue" in G minor, and the rousing third movement of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The boyish-appearing Samuel Mayes, head of the Boston Symphony's 'cello section, was the soloist of the second section, given over entirely to the compact and spritely Saint Saens concerto in A minor.

From first balcony seats, while awaiting their stage call, the choristers registered keen interest in the selections and the versatility with which the varied styles of the first two program sections were tossed off by Mr. Fiedler, the Pops orchestra of just under 100 men—and the handsome and musically dazzling 'cello soloist. As they trouped downstairs to take their places on stage, they looked impressed with their approaching task of making a good showing against the preceding competition.

They made it. Under Mr. Greene's incisive direction, they got their voices and their words out to the far reaches of the big hall. Whether the two choruses were combined, or whether the Brown or the Pembroke groups sang separately, quality and quantity both were produced. Ann Pickles gave a good account of herself as soprano soloist in the opening number. There was good variety in the choice and sequence of the selections, which opened with a pair each from Vaughan-Williams and Brahms, and continued with two sea chanties arranged by Mr. Greene, and three lively choruses from Offenbach's "La Belle Helene." The latter was a treat to regular pops-goers who know only the overture to that topsy-turvy version of the legend of Helen of Troy.

The combined glee clubs climaxed their share of the program with "Alma Mater," joined by some two thousand voices of the audience, which presented a striking sight as occupants of the floor and two balconies rose to their feet simultaneously.

Before going back to their balcony seats for the final numbers by the pops orchestra, a number of singers from each of the clubs managed to invade Arthur Fiedler's room near the stage, and get their programs autographed. Another side event of the evening was the discovery that on the walls of the corridors and the stair walls were hanging the Irish government's exhibit of paintings by contemporary native artists, which had been shown last month at the Rhode Island School of Design.

The pops orchestra wound up with selections from "South Pacific," Leroy Anderson's "Sleigh Ride"—which was not altogether a contrast to the weather—and "Brunoniana." That last really shook the sturdy walls of Symphony Hall.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
MAY 7 - 1950

Recordings

SOUNDS REACHING across 33 years were heard in Symphony Hall, Boston, the other afternoon. They came from the first recording of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made by the Victor Talking Machine Company in 1917, with the orchestra crowded into the Camden laboratory. That disc was an achievement of music and science at the time—the first full symphony orchestra recording ever made in this country. But it was listened to recently a little condescendingly by some gentlemen on the stage. They included Henry B. Cabot, president of the Orchestra, Charles Muench, it's present conductor, and some recording officials. An excerpt then was played from the first recording made by Muench with the Boston Orchestra. The listeners on the stage looked better pleased. After some brief explanatory remarks, Cabot then signed a new five-year contract with RCA Victor, effective next November, when the present one expires. It will cover both Boston Symphony and Boston Pops recordings. This continues an association which has seen many transitions—from laboratory recording in 1917, to hall recording in 1928; from the acoustic to the electrical process; from one speed to the present three—at 78, at 45, and at 33 1/3 (the long play records).

PRESENT AT the signing of the new contract, in addition to Cabot and Muench, were Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Pops, George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra; and from Camden and New York, representing RCA Victor. Paul Barkmeier, vice president and general manager, Richard A. Mohr, Alan Kayes and George Marek. Following signing of the contract, representatives of the press were presented with souvenir reproduction to Act III of Wagner's "Lohengrin." The Boston Symphony Orchestra with its present conductor, Charles Muench has already recorded a number of works—last December and early in the present month. Arrangements were made for the Boston Pops, under Arthur Fiedler, to record in Symphony Hall. Following a press conference, a buffet supper was served in Symphony Hall foyer.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN
MAY 7 1950

Munch and the Boston in New Recordings

(By The Associated Press)

RECORD collectors will be glad to know that RCA Victor has just published the first American recording made by Charles Munch with the Boston Symphony of which he has been the conductor for one full season. It's the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, and a good selection. Munch moves it right along rapidly, taking the first movement in particular at a fast pace. It is a vigorous interpretation, both rugged and brilliant, with sharp and dramatic contrasts. It takes one 12-inch lp with no interruptions except at the end of movements; or it takes an album of five of the small disks, with two breaks in the first movement and one each in the others. However, for a bonus, you get on the tenth surface the courtly Allegretto in E flat, the "gratulations minuet."

With Toscanini and the NBC symphony barnstorming from here to the west coast, RCA Victor, sponsor of the tour, came up unexpectedly with the idea that this might be the time to circulate some extra Toscanini recordings. There are excellent ones. Toscanini too does a Beethoven, the third; Tchaikovsky's symphonic poem, "Manfred;" Haydn's symphony No. 101, the "Clock" and Mozart's symphony No. 35, the "Haffner."

The Haydn is a dependable sample. It's a light, gay work. Many conductors speed it up, as if to be gay it had to be fast. Toscanini does it slowly, and makes it the gayest of all. The maestro had recorded the Haydn and Mozart previously with the New York philharmonic, and the Beethoven third was done a few years ago in the days of 78s.

[114]

NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN-PILOT
MAY [illegible] 1950

Recording the Records

New 'Brandenburg' Set

The powers-that-be at Columbia Records, faced with the necessity of replacing a splendid but aging performance by the Busch Chamber Players of Bach's six "Brandenburg" Concerti with a set suitable for LP reproduction, assigned Fritz Reiner the task of organizing a chamber group capable of surpassing the heretofore definitive version by the Busch orchestra.

Since such redoubtable musicians as Marcel Moyse, Rudolf Serkin, Aubrey Brain, Evelyn Rothwell and George Eskdale were soloists in the old set, the problems facing Reiner must at first have seemed almost insurmountable.

The only serious flaw in the Busch set is the use of piano instead of harpsichord and it is precisely here that the new version is superior. Sylvia Marlowe's playing of the important solo part in the fifth concerto is perfectly recorded which could not be said of Serkin's piano, and the use of harpsichord continuo throughout makes for a more convincingly authentic performance as a whole.

Sylvia Marlowe

Further, such fine musicians as Julius Baker, flute; Robert Bloom, oboe; Leonard Rose, cello, and William Vacchiano, trumpet, are in no wise overshadowed by their more famous European counterparts; only in Eskdale's incomparable playing of the difficult trumpet passages in the second concerto is there marked superiority. The recording is superb and the set is unhesitatingly recommended to all music lovers. (Columbia 3-12" LP's).

Three Symphonies

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 7 in A, Op. 92, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting. Munch, in his first assignment as permanent conductor of the Boston Orchestra, is given the difficult task of replacing in the Victor catalog a splendid Toscanini version of the "Seventh" and it is to his credit that he succeeds on most counts. His performance is less brilliant, perhaps, than that of the Maestro, but soundly conceived nevertheless, and the recording is a model of clarity and detail, which unfortunately can rarely be said of a Toscanini record, even of recent vintage. All in all, an auspicious debut for Munch and a prospect of better things to come for admirers of the Boston orchestra. (RCA-Victor 1-12" LP).

Beethoven: Symphony No. 7; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conducting (Victor, 5-45 discs). This is the first Victor edition of the Boston Symphony under Mr. Munch's direction, and it is a truly formidable piece of work. On records, as in performance, the conductor's very powerful musical personality emerges very clearly. He here gives a nervous, vigorous, intense performance of this famous work and Victor has caught it with concert hall fidelity and impact. A most auspicious

FORT WORTH, TEX.
EVENING STAR TELEGRAM
MAY 11 1950

A Woman's New York

Charles Is Boston's Man Who Won't Come to Dinner

BY ALICE HUGHES.

NEW YORK, May 11.—My recent week-end in Boston coincided with the last concert of the season played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. Such concerts at Carnegie Hall in New York are never as high-church as in Boston whose symphony set has a more worshipful attitude toward music.

This season they are further titivated by Conductor Munch who is as much idolized in Boston as Ezio Pinza is in New York. Back Bay matrons have tried to snare Munch socially, but he accepts absolutely no invitations, he is said to be: "The man who won't come to dinner." The contrast between Munch and former Conductor Koussevitzky is marked; the latter loved to be lionized. Munch shuns applause; seems painfully shy.

CHARLES MUNCH.

As my Boston sister is married to a symphony musician, we are privy to some of the musical gossip, particularly the rivalry existing between Koussevitzky and Toscanini. The latter has not too much regard for the former, and vice versa. Arturo rarely mentions Koussy by name, but speaks of him as "that bassoon player," while Koussevitzky asks rhetorically about Toscanini, "when is that old man going to quit conducting?" "That old man" is 83 and Koussevitzky is not much younger. Though he no longer conducts in Boston, he leads the same musicians at the Berkshire Festival each summer.

At this end-of-season concert Munch conducted Beethoven's 6th Symphony in F Major and Brahms No. 1 in C Minor. Heavenly pastoral music drawn out in liquid melody on strings. Particularly the violas make almost human sounds too lovely to describe. A trifling accident seemed to upset Munch during the allegretto movement of the Brahms. Vigorously swinging his baton, his vest band snapped in the back and its buckle fell to the floor. Visibly disturbed, Munch hurried the finale; handed his baton to the first violin during the applause and fumbled to tie the vest band. Retrieving his baton, he completed the fourth movement. A slight incident, but to an ear so sensitive, it must have seemed like a cannon shot. If Munch has a valet de chambre, I'll bet he caught it that night. they can get away with, but those of us who just sit and look wear just any old thing.

(Copyright, 1950, King Feat. Synd., Inc.)

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
MAY 10 1950

Boston Conductor Munch Refuses to Be Lionized

By ALICE HUGHES

New York, May 9 — My recent weekend in Boston coincided with the last concert of the season played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. Such concerts at Carnegie Hall in New York are never as high-church as in Boston whose symphony set has a more worshipful attitude toward music. This season they are further titivated by Conductor Munch who is as much idolized in Boston as Ezio Pinza is in New York. Back Bay matrons have tried to snare Munch socially, but as he accepts absolutely no invitations, he is said to be: "The man who won't come to dinner." The contrast between Munch and former Conductor Koussevitzky is marked; the latter loved to be lionized. Munch shuns applause, seems painfully shy.

Alice Hughes

As my Boston sister is married to a symphony musician, we are privy to some of the musical gossip, particularly the rivalry existing between Koussevitzky and Toscanini. The latter has not too much regard for the former and vice versa. Arturo rarely mentions Koussy by name, but speaks of him as "that bassoon player," while Koussevitzky asks rhetorically about Toscanini, "When is that old man going to quit conducting?" "That old man" is 83 and Koussevitzky is not much younger. Though he no longer conducts in Boston, he leads the same musicians at the Berkshire Festival each Summer.

At this end-of-season concert Munch conducted Beethoven's 6th Symphony in F Major and Brahms No. 1 in C Minor. Heavenly pastoral music drawn out in liquid melody on strings. Particularly the violas make almost human sounds too lovely to describe. A trifling accident seemed to upset Munch during the allegretto movement of the Brahms. Vigorously swinging his baton, his vest band snapped in the back and its buckle fell to the floor. Visibly disturbed, Munch hurried the finale, handed his baton to the first violin during the applause and fumbled to tie the vest band. Retrieving his baton, he completed the fourth movement. A slight incident, but to an ear so sensitive, it must have seemed like a cannon shot. If Mr. Munch has a valet de chambre, I'll bet he caught it that night.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN
MAY 10 1950

Symphony Leader Idolized in Boston

By Alice Hughes

MY recent weekend in Boston coincided with the last concert of the season played by the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. Such concerts at Carnegie hall in New York never as high-church as in Boston whose symphony set has a more worshipful attitude toward music. This season they are further titivated by conductor Munch who is as much idolized in Boston as Ezio Pinza is in New York. Back Bay matrons have tried to snare Munch socially, but as he accepts absolutely no invitations, he is said to be "The man who won't come to dinner." The contrast between Munch and former conductor Koussevitzky is marked; the latter loved to be lionized. Munch shuns applause; seems painfully shy.

AS my Boston sister is married to a symphony musician, we are privy to some of the musical gossip, particularly the rivalry existing between Koussevitzky and Toscanini. The latter has not too much regard for the former, and vice versa. Arturo rarely mentions Koussy by name, but speaks of him as "that bassoon player," while Koussevitzky asks rhetorically about Toscanini, "When is that old man going to quit conducting?" "That Old Man" is 83 and Koussevitzky is not much younger. Though he no longer conducts in Boston, he leads the same musicians at the Berkshire festival each summer.

At this end-of-season concert Munch conducted Beethoven's 6th Symphony in F Major and Brahms No. 1 in C Minor. Heavenly pastoral music drawn out in liquid melody on strings. Particularly the violas make almost human sounds too lovely to describe. A trifling accident seemed to upset Munch during the allegretto movement of the Brahms. Vigorously swinging his baton, his vest band snapped in the back and its buckle fell to the floor. Visibly disturbed, Munch hurried the finale; handed his baton to the first violin during the applause and fumbled to tie the vest band. Retrieving his baton, he completed the fourth movement. A slight incident, but to an ear so sensitive, it must have seemed like a cannon shot.

DIAL AND DINE—An odd new business has sprung up in the wake of the many skyscraper office buildings jutting heavenward. Finding an uncrowded restaurant to eat breakfast, lunch or dinner is a vexing problem in the crowded sections where thousands of white collar workers pour out at the same time. There was always crowding, pushing, waiting and time-waisting. Suddenly into the mail of thousands of workers came daily menus, tasty, economical and promising food speedily delivered. All you do is dial a telephone number, order and, very soon after, dine.

No one knows who runs these dial-and-dines. No names, no addresses are given: just a telephone number. The service is rapid; the food is hot, good and well-packaged. The voice on the phone is helpful in suggesting special dishes, non-fattening desserts, etc. This new wrinkle is not the ordinary soda-and-sandwich delivery of the corner drugstore, but more like the fastidiously planned meal served on some of the better airlines.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES
MAY 11 1950

MUSIC on RECORDS

BY BRUCE BOHLE

CHARLES MUNCH

Still In Good Hands

ALL THE ADMIRERS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra aren't confined to the Back Bay set, and those of the faithful removed from the scene since Serge Koussevitsky's departure will be particularly gratified to hear a new recording of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 by their favorite orchestra. This is its first recording session under some one other than Koussevitzky is a long time, and it is up to the old standard in just about every respect.

Charles Munch, who conducts the performance, is past that stage in his career when he must win his spurs with collectors of serious music. Still, it is nice to hear the band still performing so handsomely. This is a carefully wrought job, an approach particularly appropriate to the famous Allegretto. It is such a careful reading that my first reaction was to regard the opening movement as a bit deficient in spirit. That impression didn't last long, however. There is certainly nothing overcautious about Munch's outlook in the final two movements, which have a full-bodied character equally in keeping with the melodious exuberance of this score.

All told, the performance can probably be set down as a very sound one, benefitting a great deal by fine orchestral tone and a recording which is fully up to it, technically. (RCA Victor LM-1034; one 12-inch 33⅓ r. p. m. Also available in 45 and 78 r. p. m.)

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS
MAY 14 1950

ON THE RECORD

Munch, Weill Work Tops on Newer Discs

A PAIR OF significant "firsts" are included among new record releases for May. One of them presents Charles Munch in his first recorded performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the other brings an initial memorial to the late Kurt Weill.

Both are impressive, the Munch extremely so in a vigorous and convincing reading of the Symphony No. 7 in A Major by Beethoven (RCA-Vic. WDM 1360, five 45s, or DM 1360, conventional). There is much satisfying sincerity and authority in Munch's Beethoven and the orchestra remains an exceptional unit of virtuosity, precision and tonal brilliance.

[115]

Pops Concerts

Arthur Fiedler will conduct all of this week's Pops concerts, except tomorrow night, for which occasion he has invited Paul Cherkassky to be the guest conductor. The concerts are given nightly at 8:30 in Symphony Hall, in which the floor seats have been removed and replaced by tables. Refreshments are served there and in a special room upstairs for the balcony sitters.

The soloists this week are Gerson Yessin (tonight), Leo Litwin (Tuesday and Thursday), Bernhard Weiser (Wednesday), Giuseppe de Lellis (Friday), George Zazofsky (Saturday), and Andrew Heath, Jr. next Sunday. The new music of the week is an American rhapsody by Manton, which will be played Saturday.

The choruses appearing are from Framingham State Teachers College (Edward Gilday conducting, tomorrow), and Northeastern University (Tucker Keiser conducting, Wednesday).

The complete programs are as follows:

TONIGHT AT 8:30

"Boston Commandery" March — Carter
Overture "Sakuntala" — Goldmark
Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" — Mascagni
"Masquerade" Suite — Khatchaturian
Spanish Caprice — Rimsky-Korsakov
Concerto in G minor for Piano and Orchestra — Mendelssohn
Soloist, Gerson Yessin
Selection from "Kiss Me Kate" — Porter
Old Timers Night at the Pops. Arranged by Lake
Strike up the Band — Gershwin

TOMORROW

Paul Cherkassky, guest, conducting
Triumphal March from "Aida" — Verdi
Allegretto from the "Egyptian" Ballet — Luigini
Clair de Lune — Debussy
Peer Gynt Suite — Grieg
Overture to "Rienzi" — Wagner
Three Dances from the Ballet, "Gayane" — Khatchaturian
Framingham State Teachers College Glee Club
Edward F. Gilday, conductor
Selection from "Kiss Me Kate" — Porter
Smoke Gets In Your Eyes — Kern
First Hungarian Dance — Brahms

TUESDAY

Introduction to Act III. "Lohengrin" — Wagner
Largo from the "New World" Symphony — Dvorak
Minuet for Strings — Bolzoni
"Artists Life" Waltzes — Strauss
"Bostonia" Suite — Keith Brown
Warsaw Concerto for Piano and Orchestra — Addinsell
Soloist
Northeastern University Chorus
M. Tucker Keiser, conductor
Selection from "South Pacific" — Rodgers
Gypsy Tango, "Jealousy" — Gade
Knightsbridge March — Coates

WEDNESDAY

March of the Bowmen from "Robin Hood" — Curzon
First Movement from the "Unfinished" Symphony — Schubert
The Music Box — Liadov
Overture to "The Barber of Seville" — Rossini
The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra — Britten
Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini for Piano and Orchestra — Rachmaninoff
Soloist: Bernhard Weiser
George M. Conan Medley — Bodge
Pavane — Gould
"Our Director" March — Bigelow

THURSDAY

"Rakoczy" March — Berlioz
Overture to "Oberon" — Weber
Minuet for Strings — Bolzoni
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" — Saint-Saens
Suite from "The Comedians" — Kabalevsky
Warsaw Concerto for Piano and Orchestra — Addinsell
Soloist, Leo Litwin.
Bolero — Ravel
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" — R. Strauss
Selection from "South Pacific" — Rodgers
"The Stars and Stripes Forever" — Sousa

FRIDAY

"Semper Fidelis" March — Sousa
"In a Persian Market" — Ketelby
Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" — Mascagni
Overture to "La Belle Helene" — Offenbach
Ballet Music from "Aida" — Verdi
"Ride of the Valkyries" — Wagner
First Movement, Piano Concerto No. 1, in B-Flat Minor — Tchaikovsky
Soloist, Giuseppe de Lellis
Selection from "South Pacific" — Rodgers
"Sleigh Ride" — Anderson
Old-Timers Night at the Pops. Arranged by Lake

SATURDAY

Prelude to "Carmen" — Bizet
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" — Tchaikovsky
"Jeanie," An American Rhapsody — Manton
(First performance)
Danse Macabre, Symphonic Poem — Saint-Saens
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" — Mozart
Concerto for Violin in D major, K. 218 — Mozart
Soloist: George Zazofsky
Bolero — Ravel
Selection from "Oklahoma" — Rodgers
"On the Trail" from the "Grand Canyon" Suite — Grofe
Strike Up the Band — Gershwin

SUNDAY, MAY 28

Procession from "The Queen of Sheba" — Gounod
Suite from the Egyptian Ballet — Luigini
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" — Mendelssohn
Ride of the Valkyries — Wagner
Third Movement, Symphony No. 4 in F minor — Tchaikovsky
Concerto in A minor for Piano and Orchestra — Grieg
Soloist: Andrew Heath, Jr.
Selection from "Kiss Me Kate" — Porter
Bain Goes to Town — Templeton
Sixth Hungarian Dance — Brahms

GERSON YESSIN and ARTHUR FIEDLER prepare for tonight's Pops concert at Symphony Hall, at which Mr. Fiedler, now in his 21st year as director of the Pops, will conduct the Mendelssohn concerto with Mr. Yessin, winner of last year's Academy Award, as soloist.

BOSTON SUNDAY HERALD, MAY 14, 1950

REGARDING ART

By LAWRENCE DAME.

Fresh from Dublin via Providence comes the largest Irish art show ever hung in this city so far as my records reveal. It came through vicissitudes, which are but as gentle rain to the Irish, and it adorns the chaste corridors of Symphony Hall, which seems not at all harmed by the fact that price tags are on the pictures. To tell the truth, the tags mean nothing in some cases because a phenomenal number of these offerings have already been sold. The tour proceeds to Canada when May is spent.

The Eire Society of Boston a valiant body which fought tooth and nail to find the exhibition a temporary home here, hopes that every friend of the Ould Sod and every lover of art will attend. Open Thursdays, Fridays, Saturdays and Sundays from 2 to 5 P. M.

Faith, it's a fine display. As we have said before in a reference to the gala opening in Providence in March, the vigor and ingenuity of the Irish race shines as bright as the stars in a Sean O'Casey play. Forrign influences have come to bear upon these 70-odd artists but the stamina and independence of the race have kept practically all of them from copyism. Many are mystics, others realists. They prove that, if there is no great movement to change the course of art in Eire, at least there is creative spirit which may once again make the halls of Tara ring.

Outstanding portrait is that of James Stephens, whom O'Casey called "the jesting poet with a radiant star in's coxcomb," by Patrick Tuohy. It has the haunting quality linked to character delineation, form and color combined nicely, which should depict such a near-genius.

Most strikingly original work, I believe, is Louis Le Brockquy's 'Condemned Man," a bold abstraction in which a tormented figure made up of planes and curves in segments assembles, writhes with thoughts of the morrow in a cell. The color scheme, largely ghost-white with accent marks, the little symbols — a black cat, a guard's silhouette on a wall, a faded flower —aptly strike the mood. Needless to say, though, this has no red ticket of sale. Only a museum could buy it and the museums hereabouts have not been hospitable to this Irish show.

I feel that Frederick G. O'Dwyer an accomplished painter with great strength and finesse, hits the most vigorously realistic note with his "Men of the West," a depiction of three American frontiersmen in various poses sinister enough to tackle a buffalo bare - handed or clear a barroom with their Colts. I don't know whether O'Dwyer has been West (he has a brother, Frank, living in Floral Park, N. Y.), but he has certainly caught some types of the early days.

There are poetic oils, like Maurice McGonigal's " Summer Day" and Daniel O'Neill's Donegal scene, to say nothing of a charming landscape by Ernest Hayes. For rich coloring there is Norah McGuinness' Dublin view with two girls on a bridge. Ralph Cusack seems to follow Utrillo in his stark view of a town, whereas Thurloe Conolly, a favorite in this display, and an all-out seller, hits one of the few modernist notes with an utter abstraction borrowing from no man.

Compliments to the Eire Society, the Irish consul, Symphony Hall, and all others who helped bring this display to Boston. It would have been an affront to have done without it, though we came close to so doing, and a high attendance is merited.

CHILDREN TO PALESTINE

At the Margaret Brown Gallery, a widely known French-Palestinian

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony First BSO Recording by Munch

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch's first recording with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. The album has been on sale for some little time and now is available to reviewers. It is a stunning performance, as all who heard Mr. Munch perform the "symphony of the dance" last Autumn will easily remember. To be sure, the pace gets whipped up too fast in spots, but the Boston Symphony can navigate even at that speed. Tonally, and in interpretation, this is a brilliant recording. R. C. A.-Victor, WDM—1360.

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY 27 1950

Recordings in Review

One-Third of the "Nine"

BEETHOVEN: Symphonies Nos. 1 and 8. Willem Mengelberg conducting the Concertgebouw Orchestra. (Capitol-Telefunken LP 8079, $4.85.)

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 7. Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (RCA Victor album 1360, $7.25; 45 rpm, $5.25; LP 1034, $5.45.)

—Jo Jonas.

Henry Swoboda, conductor of "Macbeth" —"the prowess of the cook is apparent."

In one way, at least, Willem Mengelberg is a conductor designed by nature for the phonograph. For, just as every record has two sides, so does Mengelberg—the great and the not so good. He is rarely neutral in his effect on any work and here, in this one disc, one can find him sublime and ridiculous all within the space of forty minutes or so.

As of this recording session Mengelberg was a stunning master of the "little" No. 8 and a rather tedious improviser with No. 1. Rarely has the modest, humorous F major sounded so unlittle, been given such a measure of musical sense and dramatic contrast as to clarify its status among the later works of Beethoven. Big as the conception is, it moves with such certainty and assurance that one is carried irresistibly along.

However, the Mengelberg No. 1 is barely started before the tampering begins—with nuance, with dynamics, even with the rhythmic pattern itself. One can well imagine that this is the kind of "personality" in conducting that made Reginald Kell (see page 47) feel himself no longer an honest man as a symphony player. Both recordings are the big-style, concert-hall variety that Mengelberg favored in the Thirties—impressive then, rather meager in color and detail now.

The new style in concert-hall recording is impressively evident in the Munch-Boston No. 7, the conductor's first undertaking for records with this ensemble. It is full of felicities in sound, powerful at both extremes of the compass—gruff, hearty double basses, clean, savorous woodwinds. Some of the mass of sound (especially in the magnificent introduction) is almost tangible in shape and weight. Personally, I would sacrifice some of the clarity for a little more resonance in the strings, but it is certainly the best-sounding No. 7 now available. As an interpretation, it hardly is. Munch as a personality can scarcely be distinguished, save as one who prefers his Beethoven undistorted, rather literal, and rhythmically crisp. Hardly a great No. 7, rather a comprehending, musical one. The LP is satisfactory, except for a quaver in sustained string passages (especially in the scherzo-trio) not heard in the 45 rpm.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
MAY 28 1950

Boston Orchestra and Munch Magnificent in Beethoven's 7th

By Col. L. H. Boals

A recording which presages fine things to come is that of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A Major, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new conductor, Charles Munch, in the RCA Victor five disk album No. 1360, both 78 and 45 rpm, and on its LP disk ML-1034.

The great orchestra seems to play with a new vitality, and Munch's pace and his interpretation are all that could be desired. I never expected the time would come when I should recommend a recording of the Seventh over that of Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic in Victor's old set AM-317, but this is it. This recording has the advantage of a dozen or more year's advance in recording technique, and it is a great orchestra playing in a live hall under a fine conductor,

[116]

Pops Concerts

Arthur Fiedler will conduct all of this week's Pops concerts, except tomorrow night, for which occasion he has invited Paul Cherkassky to be the guest conductor. The concerts are given nightly at 8:30 in Symphony Hall, in which the floor seats have been removed and replaced by tables. Refreshments are served there and in a special room upstairs for the balcony sitters.

The soloists this week are Gerson Yessin (tonight), Leo Litwin (Tuesday and Thursday), Bernhard Weiser (Wednesday), Giuseppe de Lellis (Friday), George Zazofsky (Saturday), and Andrew Heath, Jr., next Sunday. The new music of the week is an American rhapsody by Manton, which will be played Saturday.

The choruses appearing are from Framingham State Teachers College (Edward Gilday conducting, tomorrow), and Northeastern University (Tucker Keiser conducting, Wednesday).

The complete programs are as follows:

TONIGHT AT 8:30

"Boston Commandery" March — Carter
Overture "Sakuntala" — Goldmark
Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" — Mascagni
"Masquerade" Suite — Khatchaturian
Spanish Caprice — Rimsky-Korsakov
Concerto in G minor for Piano and Orchestra — Mendelssohn
Soloist: Gerson Yessin
Selection from "Kiss Me Kate" — Porter
Old Timers' Night at the Pops — Arranged by Lake
Strike up the Band — Gershwin

TOMORROW

Paul Cherkassky, guest, conducting
Triumphal March from "Aida" — Verdi
Allegretto from the "Egyptian" Ballet — Luigini
Clair de Lune — Debussy
Peer Gynt Suite — Grieg
Overture to "Rienzi" — Wagner
Three Dances from the Ballet, "Gayane" — Khatchaturian
Framingham State Teachers College Glee Club
Edward F. Gilday, conductor
Selection from "Kiss Me Kate" — Porter
Smoke Gets In Your Eyes — Kern
First Hungarian Dance — Brahms

TUESDAY

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" — Wagner
Largo from the "New World" Symphony — Dvorak
Minuet for Strings — Bolzoni
"Artists Life" Waltzes — Strauss
"Bostonia" Suite — Keith Brown
Warsaw Concerto for Piano and Orchestra — Addinsell
Soloist
Northeastern University Chorus
M. Tucker Keiser, conductor
Selection from "South Pacific" — Rodgers
Gypsy Tango, "Jealousy" — Gade
Knightsbridge March — Coates

WEDNESDAY

March of the Bowmen from "Robin Hood" — Curzon
First Movement from the "Unfinished" Symphony — Schubert
The Music Box — Liadov
Overture to "The Barber of Seville" — Rossini
The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra — Britten
Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini for Piano and Orchestra — Rachmaninoff
Soloist: Bernhard Weiser
George M. Conan Medley — Bodge
Pavane — Gould
"Our Director" March — Bigelow

THURSDAY

"Rakoczy" March — Berlioz
Overture to "Oberon" — Weber
Minuet for Strings — Bolzoni
Bacchanale from "Samson and Dalilah" — Saint-Saens
Suite from "The Comedians" — Kabalevsky
Warsaw Concerto for Piano and Orchestra — Addinsell
Soloist, Leo Litwin.
Bolero — Ravel
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier," — R. Strauss
Selection from "South Pacific" — Rodgers
The Stars and Stripes Forever" — Sousa

FRIDAY

"Semper Fidelis" March — Sousa
"In a Persian Market" — Ketelby
Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," — Mascagni
Overture to "La Belle Helene" — Offenbach
Ballet music from "Aida" — Verdi
"Ride of the Valkyries" — Wagner
First Movement, Piano Concerto No. 1, in B-Flat Minor — Tchaikovsky
Soloist, Giuseppe de Lellis
Selection from "South Pacific" — Rodgers
"Sleigh Ride" — Anderson
"Old-Timers' Night at the Pops," Arranged by Lake

SATURDAY

Prelude to "Carmen" — Bizet
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" — Tchaikovsky
"Jessie," An American Rhapsody — Manton
(First performance)
Danse Macabre, Symphonic Poem — Saint-Saens
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" — Mozart
Concerto for Violin in D major, K. 218 — Mozart
Soloist: George Zazofsky
Bolero — Ravel
Selection from "Oklahoma" — Rodgers
"On the Trail" from the "Grand Canyon" Suite — Grofe
Strike Up the Band — Gershwin

SUNDAY, MAY 28

Procession from "The Queen of Sheba" — Gounod
Suite from the Egyptian Ballet — Luigini
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" — Mendelssohn
Ride of the Valkyries — Wagner
Third Movement, Symphony No. 4 in F minor — Tchaikovsky
Concerto in A minor for Piano and Orchestra — Grieg
Soloist: Andrew Heath, Jr.
Selection from "Kiss Me Kate" — Porter
Bach Goes to Town — Templeton
Sixth Hungarian Dance — Brahms

GERSON YESSIN and ARTHUR FIEDLER prepare for tonight's Pops concert at Symphony Hall, at which Mr. Fiedler, now in his 21st year as director of the Pops, will conduct the Mendelssohn concerto with Mr. Yessin, winner of last year's Academy Award, as soloist.

BOSTON SUNDAY HERALD, MAY 14, 1950

REGARDING ART

BY LAWRENCE DAME

Fresh from Dublin via Providence comes the largest Irish art show ever hung in this city so far as my records reveal. It came through vicissitudes, which are but a gentle rain to the Irish, and it adorns the chaste corridors of Symphony Hall, which seems not at all harmed by the fact that price tags are on the pictures. To tell the truth, the tags mean nothing in some cases because a phenomenal number of these offerings have already been sold. The tour proceeds to Canada when May is spent.

The Eire Society of Boston, a valiant body which fought tooth and nail to find the exhibition a temporary home here, hopes that every friend of the Ould Sod and every lover of art will attend. Open Thursdays, Fridays, Saturdays and Sundays from 2 to 5 P. M.

Faith, it's a fine display. As we have said before in reference to the gala opening in Providence in March, the vigor and ingenuity of the Irish race shines as bright as the stars in a Sean O'Casey play. Forrign influences have come to bear upon these 70-odd artists but the stamina and independence of the race have kept practically all of them from copyism. Many are mystics, others realists. They prove that, if there is no great movement to change the course of art in Eire, at least there is creative spirit which may once again make the halls of Tara ring.

Outstanding portrait is that of James Stephens, whom O'Casey called "the jesting poet with a radiant star in's noxcomb," by Patrick Tuohy. It has the haunting quality linked to character delineation, form and color combined nicely, which should depict such a near-genius.

Most strikingly original work, I believe, is Louis Le Brockquy's 'Condemned Man," a bold abstraction in which a tormented figure made up of planes and curves in segments assembled writhes with thoughts of the morrow in a cell. The color scheme, largely ghost-white with accent marks, the little symbols — a black cat, a guard's silhouette on a wall, a faded flower —aptly strike the mood. Needless to say, though, this has no red ticket of sale. Only a museum could buy it and the museums hereabouts have not been hospitable to this Irish show.

I feel that Frederick G. O'Dwyer, an accomplished painter with great strength and finesse, hits the most vigorously realistic note with his "Men of the West," a depiction of three American frontiersmen in various poses sinister enough to tackle a buffalo bare - handed or clear a barroom with their Colts. I don't know whether O'Dwyer has been West (he has a brother, Frank, living in Floral Park, N. Y.), but he has certainly caught some types of the early days.

There are poetic oils, like Maurice McGonigal's "Summer Day" and Daniel O'Neill's Donegal scene, to say nothing of a charming landscape by Ernest Hayes. For rich coloring there is Norah McGuinness' Dublin view with two girls on a bridge. Ralph Cusack seems to follow Utrillo in his stark view of a town, whereas Thurloe Conolly, a favorite in this display, and an all-but seller, hits one of the few modernist notes with an utter abstraction borrowing from no man.

Compliments to the Eire Society, the Irish consul, Symphony Hall, and all others who helped bring this display to Boston. It would have been an affront to have done without it, though we came close to so doing, and a high attendance is merited.

CHILDREN TO PALESTINE

At the Margaret Brown Gallery, a widely known French-Palestinian

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY 27 1950

Recordings in Review

One-Third of the "Nine"

BEETHOVEN: Symphonies Nos. 1 and 8. Willem Mengelberg conducting the Concertgebouw Orchestra. (Capitol-Telefunken LP 8079, $4.85.)

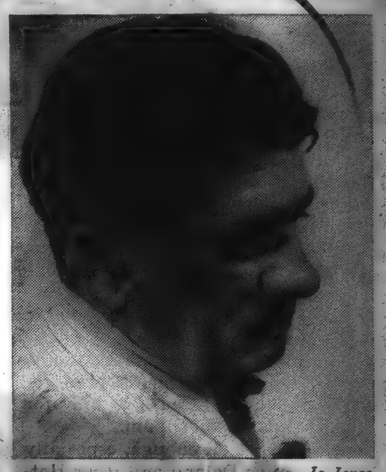
BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 7. Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (RCA Victor album 1360, $7.25; 45 rpm, $5.25; LP 1034, $5.45.)



Henry Swoboda, conductor of "Macbeth" —"the prowess of the cook is apparent."

—Jo Jonas.

In one way, at least, Willem Mengelberg is a conductor designed by nature for the phonograph. For, just as every record has two sides, so does Mengelberg—the great and the not so good. He is rarely neutral in his effect on any work and here, in this one disc, one can find him sublime and ridiculous all within the space of forty minutes or so.

As of this recording session Mengelberg was a stunning master of the "little" No. 8 and a rather tedious improviser with No. 1. Rarely has the modest, humorous F major sounded so unlittle, been given such a measure of musical sense and dramatic contrast as to clarify its status among the later works of Beethoven. Big as the conception is, it moves with such certainty and assurance that one is carried irresistibly along.

However, the Mengelberg No. 1 is barely started before the tampering begins—with nuance, with dynamics, even with the rhythmic pattern itself. One can well imagine that this is the kind of "personality" in conducting that made Reginald Kell (see page 47) feel himself no longer an honest man as a symphony player. Both recordings are the big-style, concert-hall variety that Mengelberg favored in the Thirties—impressive then, rather meager in color and detail now.

The new style in concert-hall recording is impressively evident in the Munch-Boston No. 7, the conductor's first undertaking for records with this ensemble. It is full of felicities in sound, powerful at both extremes of the compass—gruff, hearty double basses, clean, savorous woodwinds. Some of the mass of sound (especially in the magnificent introduction) is almost tangible in shape and weight. Personally, I would sacrifice some of the clarity for a little more resonance in the strings, but it is certainly the best-sounding No. 7 now available. As an interpretation, it hardly is. Munch as a personality can scarcely be distinguished, save as one who prefers his Beethoven undistorted, rather literal, and rhythmically crisp. Hardly a great No. 7, rather a comprehending, musical one. The LP is satisfactory, except for a quaver in sustained string passages (especially in the scherzo-trio) not heard in the 45 rpm.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
MAY 28 1950

Boston Orchestra and Munch Magnificent in Beethoven's 7th

By Col. L. H. Reis

A recording which presages fine things to come is that of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A Major, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new conductor, Charles Munch, on the RCA-Victor five disk album No. 1360, both 78 and 45 rpm; and on its LP disk ML-1034.

The great orchestra seems to play with a new vitality, and Munch's pace and his interpretation are all that could be desired. I never expected the time would come when I should recommend a recording of the Seventh over that of Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic in Victor's old set AM-317, but this is it. This recording has the advantage of a dozen or more year's advance in recording technique, and it is a great orchestra playing, it's [illegible] under a fine conductor.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony First BSO Recording by Munch

May 15

By CYRIL BURGIN

Charles Munch's first recording with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. The album has been on sale for some little time and now is available to reviewers. It is a stunning performance, as all who heard Mr. Munch perform the "symphony of the dance" last Autumn will easily remember. To be sure, the pace gets whipped up too fast in spots, but the Boston Symphony can navigate even at that speed. Tonally, and in interpretation, this is a brilliant recording. R. C. A.-Victor, WDM—1360.

MUSIC

Dr. Koussevitzky and Charles Munch: Programs

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last Sunday comparisons were drawn here between Serge Koussevitzky and Charles Munch, as conductors, and note taken of the effect upon the tonal and other qualities of the Boston Symphony already brought about by the change in leadership. Today it is pertinent to consider the programs of the past season, to reflect upon Mr. Munch's attitude in this respect, as contrasted with that of his predecessor.

It was suggested in the prveious article that Mr. Munch had freshened the repertory. Actually, he has had more to do with than did Koussevitzky in the last few years. This season, for example, we had Richard Burgin for three of the 24 pairs of regular concerts and Leonard Bernstein for two, while Mr. Munch conducted the rest. Only two pairs were really assigned to Mr. Burgin, but when Mr. Munch fell ill the associate conductor presented the program his superior had made. On the other hand, in the '48-'49 season Messrs. Johnson, Ansermet and Stravinsky each had one pair; Burgin and DeCarvalho each two; and Bernstein three—or 14 pairs of concerts for Koussevitzky as opposed to 20 planned for and 19 actually led by the present incumbent.

Works by 48 Men

In the preceding season 48 composers were represented by 80 pieces and in the one just ended the respective figures were 49 and 81. (The official count of 82 was due to the double performance of the Allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, once in its accustomed surroundings and once by itself as a memorial to Mrs. Ernest B. Dane). Twenty-six composers appeared on both lists. There are certain masters, both old and new, that have the call. This season added to the Boston Symphony repertory the names of Couperin, Jolivet, Thomson and Wagenaar, while those of Bizet, d'Indy, Lalo, Pfitzner, Rabaud and Rossini appear on the Boston programs with varying degrees of infrequency.

On the whole, then, there was a definite gain in the matter of both new and unfamiliar music. Eight items were repeated from the season before, six of them by Mr. Munch, who did not hesitate to ride some of Koussevitzky's most mettlesome war horses. In certain cases, discretion would have been the better part of valor, but the immediate repitition of Brahm's Fourth Symphony was all to the good. This performance was one of Mr. Munch's revelations, some of the others being those of the Schumann Fourth, Mendelssohn's "Reformation" and the Saint-Saens Third. Comment has already been made to Mr. Munch's partiality to overtures, the score here being 9-5; or, if we include preludes and introductions, 14-7.

Nine American Pieces

Dr. Koussevitzky was famed for his interest in the contemporary American composer. Last year he devoted two programs to native works and the total for the season was 13, five of them first performances. This year we had nine American pieces, of which three were premieres and five local novelties. It was to be foreseen that we would have less music by Russian composers and more by French. As against 13 Russian pieces we had but four, while the French jumped for 10 to 22. The German post-Romantics took a bit of a licking. Brahms dropped from five pieces to four, Mahler from three to one, Strauss from four to two and Bruckner from one to none. Mr. Munch announced ahead of time that he would ignore Bruckner, and also Sibelius, and he was as good as his word. The long and sometimes prolix symphonies of Bruckner and Mahler would seem at variance with his nervous temperament, and the single Mahler item, "The Song of the Earth," we owed to Mr. Burgin.

Bach, not represented last season, was in second place in this anniversary one, with a score of five. Beethoven dropped from six to three, not counting the repeated Allegretto, but Mozart's tally rose from two to six, making him high man. Some of these fluctuations are normal. Others were plainly due to the change in conductorship. We may take exception to Mr. Munch's reading of this or that score, but while he is around we are going to have our musical horizon broadened.

Of the American pieces heard here for the first time, the most rewarding were Foss' "Song of Anguish," and Thomson's "Louisiana Story." The most ponderable novelty was Honegger's choral, "Joan of Arc at the Stake," which would have been even more impressive in its original form as a stage piece and, because of the multitude of characters, easier to follow. The most welcome addition to the repertory was the youthful Symphony of Bizet.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
MAY 14 1950

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

VICTOR'S Long-Playing records are all they were expected to be and more. With their release reproduction has probably attained the highest point of satisfaction. The 45s marked an historic stride, but the long-playing discs sound even better to these ears. Since they avoid all the unfortunate breaks experienced in several recordings on 45s, the emergence of Victor's LP records certainly stabilizes the industry.

Those that have come to my attention include three of the Toscanini items released to synchronize with the coast-to-coast tour he is making with the NBC Symphony. They comprise the new releases of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Tchaikowsky's "Manfred," Haydn's "Clock" and Mozart's "Hafner" symphonies (on one record).

The superb quality of the performances and the definitive nature of the interpretation automatically makes these choice items in the record library. With them and others also made available, it is now possible to balance some of the standard repertory with the Toscanini versions. At this late date there is no need to enlarge on the authoritative aspect of this conductor's work.

Impressive Debut

OF special interest is Charles Munch's RCA Victor debut with the Boston Symphony. It is made with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. That it is impressive reflects on the orchestra as well as on the conductor, but interest focuses on the interpretation. It is a vital and commanding one, significant of the musical insight and energizing force which are happily combined in Munch's conducting. There should be no diminution in the demands for Boston Symphony recordings under his direction.

In the symphonic repertory Victor brings forth two other works: Mozart's "Linz" Symphony and Haydn's "The Imperial" Symphony. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony play the Mozart with special inflection. The work seems to have caught Koussevitzky's fancy and the freshness of this far-too-infrequently heard music proves enchanting. Stokowski and his symphony play the Haydn.

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
GAZETTE
MAY 22 1950

Koussevitzky Gets Brussels Ovation Plans September Return To Phoeni

By HUAN MADDEN
Special to The Phoenix Gazette

BRUSSELS, May 22—The audience stood for almost half an hour and filled the great hall with thunderous applause and shouts of "Maestro! Maestro!" Each time the small, distinguished man appeared, the audience rose to a pitch of near hysteria.

The place? The Palais des Beaux Arts in Brussels, Belgium. The man? Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Arizona's first citizen of music, on world tour.

This ovation to Koussevitzky, one of the great orchestra conductors of our time, was the highest tribute the Belgian people could bestow on the man. Normally, the Belgians are not so demonstrative. They express their appreciation in a more subdued manner. Koussevitzky was the exception — and what an exception.

THE DEMONSTRATION after each of his appearances as guest conductor of the Belgian National Orchestra had been the same. They have been the same in every city he has visited. And no one was so humbly pleased at the success of his triumphal world tour as Serge Koussevitzky.

When I entered his private dressing room to greet him after his last concert, exhausted as he must have been, he drew me to him and with a smile of surprise, asked, "Where have you been? What are you doing here?"

WE WERE NO more than three sentences deep in conversation before Phoenix became the important topic. It was happy talk, radiating the warmth of the Arizona sun. It reflected, too, the warmth of Koussevitzky's personality. Few of the great conductors today have his humanism. Few, who can match him as a technician and interpreter of music, can match his kindness, his generosity and his willingness to give of himself.

As the conversation became more animated, my husband asked where he had learned to speak such fluent French. The doctor thought a moment, and his eyes sparkled gaily.

"Artists," he answered, "have to know languages. One day they're in Phoenix—and the next, Brussels."

WE THOUGHT the answer a very fine indication of Phoenix's place in the international scene.

"Ah, but Phoenix!" the doctor continued. "I shall be there in September. Will you?" We shook our heads a little sadly. He explained that, after he has finished his world tour, he is scheduled to conduct in Hollywood Sept. 5, after which he will return to the Valley of the Sun.

"Will it be warm then in Phoenix?" he asked.

We told him it would be. Warm and wonderful.

As we wished the doctor and Madame Koussevitzky goodby and good luck, we thought of how proud Arizona was to have them as residents. And we gave them part of our hearts to bring back to that warm and wonderful country.

[117]

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

Music Season Just Completed Notable For Program Variety

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

Now that we have arrived at the end of another concert season, a "review" of local musical activities during the past months is in order. I say review advisedly, for, as usual, the writer will make no attempt to give a complete résume of programs given here during the past season. Rather I would like to set down a few observations and comments engendered by a "bird's eye view" of our musical scene in retrospect. In a backward glance at this, or any other season's musical panorama, the "mountaintops" or highlights naturally catch the mind's eye, casting shadows which obscure lesser musical peaks and thus precluding more than a brief mention of many fine events.

At the outset, it may truthfully be said that all three of our major concert series offered a variety in programs this past season that has not been exceeded in recent years, or at least in my short listening experience here. The variety was encountered both in regard to artists and music performed in the various programs. From this point of view, at least, the season was an outstanding one.

The Woolsey Hall Series presented some new faces here this season, while adhering to its policy of signing only top-flight artists. The dePaur Infantry Chorus, appearing here for the first time, gave an outstanding program as the third concert in the series. Patrice Munsel, young coloratura soprano of the "Met," and Gaby Casadesus, who performed in a two piano program with her famous husband, were other newcomers to the local scene.

Two "regulars" of the series—Artur Rubenstein and Yehudi Menuhin were back this year. As usual, the famous pianist and the equally celebrated violinist provided listeners with performances unexcelled in their respective spheres. Despite the fact that there is less worthwhile new music for the violin than for the pianoforte, Mr. Menuhin is somewhat less cautious with regard to performing modern compositions than is Mr. Rubenstein. The violinist's program introduced an intriguing new Sonata by the late Bela Bartok, while the pianist stuck for the most part to works of the "tried and true" variety.

Charles Munch Leads Boston Symphony

Actually, the Boston Symphony introduced a new personality in its two concerts this season. Charles Munch made his bow here as the new conductor of the orchestra though he had appeared in a "preview" appearance with the French Orchestra last year. While some listeners profess to recognize a great disparity in this season's performances and those given in the past under Serge Koussevitsky, the writer believes that the two conductors are "birds of a feather," though they reach their objective by "flying" different routes. Both men display a flair for the dramatic in music, though Mr. Munch is a believer in the inspirational in performance while Dr. Koussevitsky insists on a full and careful working out of details in rehearsal. With a less superb instrument than the Boston Symphony, Mr. Munch might have to change his theories somewhat but this season's results maintained, if not exceeded, the general excellence of past performances.

The two concerts by this orchestra were notable for different reasons; the first, because of new music interest and the first local hearing of a new musical instrument; the second, because of the sensational playing of Nicole Henriot, the young French pianist.

In the performance of Jolivet Concerto, a local audience heard the Ondes Martenot, a new electronic instrument, for the first time. Played by Ginette Martenot, a sister of the instrument's inventor, its chief feature seemed to be that it could withstand and triumph over one of the most raucous tonal backgrounds ever perpetrated on a local audience. In fairness to the work itself, it should be said that, as in a three ring circus, the star performer claimed most of one's attention and little except the element of novelty could register at a first hearing. The Second Suite for Orchestra, by Harvard's Walter Piston, also had its local premiere in this concert and proved to be one of the composer's most vigorous and stimulating works to date.

Nicole Henriot Impressive As Soloist

The orchestra's second program, the concluding event of the series, presented an outstanding young French pianist in the performance of Ravel's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Nicole Henriot, the artist in question, gave a truly great performance as the soloist with the orchestra. She is certainly one of the most natural and finished performers among younger artists ever to appear here. As the writer remarked at the time, if there is such a phenomenon as a natural born pianist, she is it.

B.S.O. Opens Rehearsals To Students Next Year

Inaugurates Thursday Night Music Series

By BRENTON WELLING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a special series of rehearsal-concerts next season, for students only, George E. Judd '11, the Orchestra's manager, told the CRIMSON last night.

Tickets for the new concerts, which will take place in Symphony Hall on five Thursday nights next winter, will go on sale at any college that guarantees to sell them only to students. The tickets will all cost the same, around $1.50, and will be for unreserved seats. Proceeds from their sale will benefit the Orchestra's pension fund.

Ducat Delivery

Tickets will be allocated to colleges, music conservatories, and other orchestras in the Boston area according to the demand that develops and the size of the institution.

The program has "grown out of demands in a CRIMSON editorial that more undergraduates be allowed in Sanders Theatre when the Orchestra plays there, and a letter from the Dean of Humanities at M.I.T. asking for a private listening wire from Symphony Hall," Judd said.

Each Thursday night concert will actually be the Orchestra's final rehearsal for the regular concert the following afternoon. Thus the B.S.O. can not promise that pieces will be played in the same order on Thursday as on Friday, or that all the works to be performed Friday will even be rehearsed the evening before. Moreover, there is always the possibility that the Orchestra will be stopped to correct a flaw. The concert-rehearsals will, however, last the regulation rehearsal time limit from 7:30 to 10 p.m.

Students Voted In

Under the existing trade agreement between the management and the members of the Orchestra, nobody is allowed into a rehearsal except by a majority vote of the Orchestra. Such a vote was held recently, and the musicians unanimously agreed to admit students.

The six concerts regularly held in Sanders Theatre will be continued next year along with the present policy of holding 83 "rush" tickets for undergraduates.

The new Thursday night series will bring the Orchestra's total number of concerts to 161 in Boston alone.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 1950

The BSO's New Series

Ever since 1881, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded, it has been playing six concerts a year in Cambridge "to benefit Harvard University." But few undergraduates, for whom the concerts were intended, have been able to get into Sanders Theatre. The Orchestra's subscriptions have been mostly bought up by the faculty and residents of Cambridge before the College year even started.

Beginning next year the Orchestra will rectify this situation by adding a new concert series in Symphony Hall, double Sanders' seating capacity. These concerts, five in number, will be open only to students whose colleges are willing to take the responsibility of selling tickets.

For the first time, now, students who have had the cultural aspect of Boston drummed into their ears but who have never been able to take advantage of it can hear the BSO.

Though the Orchestra has not yet decided whether tickets for its new concerts will be sold singly or by the series, they will be kept at a minimum price. The seats will be unreserved so that late-comers, shunted into the balcony, will not disturb the rehearsal, and so that students may sit with dates. If there is enough demand for tickets next fall the Orchestra will have a second Thursday night series the following year.

The Boston Symphony has done a good job in answering what has been an obvious need.

Fiedler Interview

BOSTON—Arthur Fiedler, [illegible] conducting the sixty-fifth season of the Boston Pops Concerts—his own twenty-fifth with that organization. These concerts have been a fabulous success under Mr. Fiedler's direction, due in great part to the fact that he possesses an almost uncanny knack of sensing exactly what his audiences want most to hear.

The other day this writer caught him in one of his rare leisure moments and asked him if he would give us some rules-of-thumb for program building.

"For SYMPHONY? Of course!" said Mr. Fiedler, and here is the substance of his remarks:

Of first importance, a "Pop" conductor should not allow his own taste to be the determining factor. As often as not he must play things that he himself does not like if his audience is to be kept happy. When a young conductor gets a "break," he must not yield to the urge to show his genius by conducting a Brahms symphony or other long and heavy work which will only succeed in boring a pop concert audience to tears.

The people attending this type of concert come to be entertained, and therefore variety in the program is important. Try to appeal to as many different tastes as possible each night. Find tunes that were popular years ago for the older people, and also play the current popular tunes from shows for the young listeners.

Balancing the program is important, too. Any classical numbers should be played first with the light pieces at the end. The timing of each section is important—it must not be too long. Experience has shown that a well-balanced and well-timed program can consist of ten numbers with two intermissions and five or six carefully chosen encores. The encores are as important as the program itself. If a string number has been played, the encore might be something for woodwinds. Never play a slow encore after a slow number, and don't encore a Chaikovsky piece with an Irish jig.

A soloist lends a great deal of variation and contrast to a program. There are many interesting numbers written for solo instruments and orchestra which have a lot of audience appeal.

The conductor must [illegible] either take himself too [illegible] the audience to do so. Don't [illegible] the audience to be silent [illegible] of numbers by rapping on the stand or glaring indignantly: experience has shown that they resent it. If the number to be played is particularly delicate, a note might be inserted in the program saying that silence is requested during the playing of the number. This was a practice in the Pops programs of fifty years ago and proved to be effective.

In short, remember that in this field the successful conductor is he who can temporarily forget his own importance and concentrate his efforts on trying to appeal to and please his audience. This is definitely not the [illegible] for stuffed shirts!

[illegible] any readers think that Mr. Fiedler is [illegible] a popular figure in Boston, it should be [illegible] mentioned that his picture is spread all over [illegible] area in magazines, newspapers, programs [illegible] and on billboards advertising Carling [illegible] Ale!

ANNE DE GUICHARD.

SYMPHONY

JUNE 1950

Increase Pensions

BOSTON—The resourceful personnel manager of the Boston Symphony, Rosario Mazzeo, has worked out improvements in the pension plan to increase the payments to BSO members. The amount for "full members" next year will be increased from $1,800 to $2,400 a year, and a raising in basic pay will bring a corresponding increase in pension payments.

The musicians are elated, and it is not too much to say that the Boston Symphony is one of the very few orchestras where the personnel manager is regarded as a "swell fellow."

Tying in with the plan is the new schedule of Thursday rehearsals, approved by a vote of the Orchestra musicians. Instead of mornings, they will be held Thursday evenings and will be open [illegible] charged admissions. [illegible] split between the [illegible] and the Pension [illegible] raise extra money with [illegible]

If your [illegible] children have been driving you mad the past few years playing the recording of Richard Addinsell's "Warsaw Concerto," grit your teeth, for there's another coming up. Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra are premiering Addinsell's new Hollywood [illegible] "The Smoky Mountains." Leo Litwin will play the solo piano part.

Jacques Ibert, the French composer, will teach at Tanglewood this summer where he will also hear the first American performances of his opera "Le Roi d'Yvetot" on August 6 and 7 under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

George Magerl, first trumpet, and William Valkenier, first [illegible] are definitely retiring from the Symphony. Ralph Gomberg, brother of the first oboist of the New York Philharmonic, will be the first oboist next year, joining Jack Holmes, Jean Devergie, and English hornist Louis Speyer, present members of the section. Other personnel news, but not connected with the Boston Orchestra, are that Leland Lincoln will be the first oboe in Oklahoma City next season, and John O'Meara will play second and English horn. Arthur Goldstein will play third horn with the Buffalo Philharmonic.

ANNE DE GUICHARD.

SYMPHONY

JUNE 1950

Fiedler Interview

BOSTON—Arthur Fiedler, [illegible] conducting the sixty-fifth [illegible] Pops Concerts — his [illegible] with that organization. These concerts have been a fabulous success under Mr. Fiedler's direction, due in great part to the fact that he possesses an almost uncanny knack of sensing exactly what his audiences want most to hear.

The other day this writer caught him in one of his rare leisure moments and asked him if he would give us some rules-of-thumb for program building.

"For SYMPHONY? Of course!" said Mr. Fiedler, and here is the substance of his remarks:

Of first importance, a "Pop" conductor should not allow his own taste to be the determining factor. As often as not he must play things that he himself does not like if his audience is to be kept happy. When a young conductor gets a "break," he must not yield to the urge to show his genius by conducting a Brahms symphony or other long and heavy work which will only succeed in boring a pop concert audience to tears.

The people attending this type of concert come to be entertained, and therefore variety in the program is important. Try to appeal to as many different tastes as possible each night. Find tunes that were popular years ago for the older people, and also play the current popular tunes from shows for the young listeners.

Balancing the program is important, too. Any classical numbers should be played first with the light pieces at the end. The timing of each section is important—it must not be too long. Experience has shown that a well-balanced and well-timed program can consist of ten numbers without intermissions and five or six carefully chosen encores. The encores are as important as the program itself. If a string number has been played, the encore might be something for woodwinds. Never play a slow encore after a slow number, and don't encore a Chaikovsky piece with an Irish jig.

A soloist lends a great deal of interest and contrast to a program. There are many interesting numbers written for solo instruments and orchestra which have a lot of audience appeal.

The conductor must [illegible] either take himself too [illegible] the audience to do so. Don't try to compel the audience to be silent [illegible] of numbers by rapping on the stand or glaring indignantly; experience has shown that they resent it. If the number to be played is particularly delicate, a note might be inserted in the program saying that silence is requested during the playing of the number. This was a practice in the Pops programs of fifty years ago and proved to be effective.

In short, remember that in this field the successful conductor is [illegible] can temporarily forget his own importance and concentrate his efforts on trying to appeal to and please his audience. This is definitely not the [illegible] for stuffed shirts!

[illegible] any readers think that Mr. Fiedler [illegible] ular figure in Boston, it should [illegible] that his picture is spread [illegible] magazines, newspapers [illegible] on billboards—advertising [illegible]ar-

ANNE DE GUICHARD.

Increase Pensions

BOSTON—The [illegible] manager of the Boston Symphony Players Musical [illegible] has worked out [illegible] plan to increase the payments to [illegible] members. The amount for "full members" next year will be increased from $2,400 to $2,600 [illegible] and a [illegible] basis will bring a corresponding increase in pension payments.

The musicians are elated, and it is not too much to say that [illegible] one of the very few [illegible] personnel manager is rewarded [illegible] fellow."

Tying in with the [illegible] of Thursday rehearsals, approved by a vote of the Orchestra musicians. Instead of mornings, they will be [illegible] evenings and will [illegible] admissions [illegible] split between the [illegible] and the Pension [illegible] raise extra money with [illegible]

If your [illegible] have been driving you [illegible] the past few years playing the recording of Richard Addinsell's "Warsaw Concerto," grit your teeth, for there's another contender [illegible] Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra [illegible] premiering Addinsell's new Hollywood [illegible] "The Smoky Mountains." Leo Litwin will play the solo piano part.

Jacques Ibert, [illegible] composer, will teach at Tanglewood [illegible] where he will also hear the first [illegible] performances of his opera "Le [illegible] on August 6 and 7 under the [illegible] Serge Koussevitsky.

George Mager, [illegible] and William Valkenier, first [illegible] definitely retiring from the Symphony. Ralph Gomberg, brother of the first oboist of the New York Philharmonic, will be the first oboist next year, joining Jack Holmes, Jean Devergie, and English [illegible] Louis Speyer, present members of the [illegible] Boston Orchestra, are that Leland Lincoln will be the first oboe in Oklahoma City next season, and John O'Meara will play second and English horn. Arthur Goldstein will play third horn with the Buffalo Philharmonic.

ANNE DE GUICHARD.

This Time I Saw Paris

A Visit to Charles Munch's Home; the Conversation Is Free and Gay

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS — The cab driver stopped at No. 8 Rue Alfred Duodencq in the 16th Arrondissement, a street he had had some little difficulty in finding since it is short, quiet, hidden and comparatively new. Here in this well-heeled quarter of the city, on the third floor of a dignified and spacious apartment block, is the Paris home of Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"IT WAS A NEW EXPERIENCE" to visit the distinguished musician in his study in Paris.

The distinguished musician was in his study, conservatively but handsomely dressed in brown as I arrived at the appointed time for lunch. He had just finished a morning's work on his Symphony plans for next season, with that gracious lady, Mrs. Hirshman, who after a decade as secretarial assistant to Serge Koussevitsky in Boston, is continuing in the same capacity with Mr. Munch.

"Bon jour, monsieur," I said in a bold attempt to speak French and as quickly abandoned when he politely responded in the language he has been learning these past two years: "How nice it is to see you in Paris, Mr. Durgin."

"Now make an effort, speak French," smiled Mrs. Hirshman at me, for she is an accomplished woman who speaks several languages herself and who has a mind and spirit that are unceasingly active. So for the remainder of my visit we all talked in a mixture of the two tongues.

* * *

Mr. Munch has been back in Paris about a month, following his first arduous season in Boston, and about 10 days' holiday in New York. Favoring air travel, he flew back. He looks rested and well, the handsome "Beau Charles."

It was a new experience for this chronicler to have the privelege of a friendly visit with him away from the official air of his room at Symphony Hall and the pressures of his work. Here he was just as warm and friendly as ever, but much more relaxed and expansive among his familiar surroundings.

You quickly got a new impression of Mr. Munch, the non-musical side, just from looking over the study, salon and dining room. He has a taste and an enthusiasm for art, and is surrounded by it. Many paintings, a good deal of sculpture. A striking landscape of Monnet, some sculptural fragments of Egyptian origin, a Breughel new to him, and a wild design in vivid colors by a modern young Italian, displayed with mingled excitement and humor.

Many old prints, including some of ships, and a handsome screen behind the grand piano(on which stood an opened piano reduction of Bloch's "Schelomo"). In the octagonally-sided entrance hall—a bit confusing to the visitor because its doors are mirrors from ceiling to floor—a superb round table. Shelf after shelf filled with beautifully bound books. Of the well-rounded mind and elegant taste, which up to now you could only have suspected, here was positive proof.

* * *

We were joined at lunch by Mr. Munch's nephew, Ernest, a personable, dark young man, who will return to the Longy School in Cambridge next September to resume his studies in cello and musical theory. He is another musician in an already extensive musical family. Mr. Munch explained that Mrs Munch is away for a few days in Switzerland.

The conversation at table was free and gay, not much about music, and it ranged from this pilgrim's peregrinations on cruiser, tanker, bus and train, to however did the Munch cat, the biggest one I ever have seen, get so enormous? There seemed to be no logical explanation of that: it just happened. Somehow the name of this puss-kitty got lost in the conversational shuffle.

THE DISTINGUISHED musician, was in his study

Mr. Munch is no ivory-tower artist, either, but a man of the world aware of the varied life about him, as well as appreciative of the treasures left from the past.

* * *

What had I seen in Paris? The museums? Notre Dame? Had I been able to spend any time in the celebrated cafes? Over on the Left Bank, the Cafe Flor and Les Deux Magots, where the Americans like to go now? The Ronde Point? When I explained that I had accomplished all of these, heard some music, too, and delighted to sit resting a bit in whatever little sidewalk cafes happened to be on the route of the walking rubbernecker, he expressed laughing approval.

Over coffee in the salon, the talk soon acquired another conversationalist as we were joined by Irving Fine, the young Boston composer and member of the music faculties of both Harvard and Brandeis Universities. Mr. Fine is just finishing a season in Paris as a holder of both a Guggenheim and a Fulbright fellowship. He returns to Boston June 21. His months in the French artistic center have produced a lot of fruitful observations of contemporary musical currents here.

Free and candid were the opinions expressed on all sides about music, its creators and its performers. Since they were private, those opinions will not be turned loose in this article, but rest assured they were lively. But there was one story of an elder French composer who was attending the first performance of a new opera by a younger man. At the end of the first act the elder composer said to the younger: "Well, I'm going. How about you?"

Mr. Munch expressed his own admiration for Darius Milhaud's "Le Creation du Monde," which he will present in Boston next season, and the original manuscript of which he showed me, done in a fabulously neat hand. The conductor's plans are not completed this early, and he will have to suspend work on them for a time since he is leaving to give concerts in Holland.

But these compositions, some of them novelties for Boston, he has chosen: Honegger's "La Danse des Morts," the late Albert Roussel's setting of the 85th Psalm; Bach's Christmas Oratorio at that holiday season, and the St. Matthew Passion at Easter. There will also be a Schubert Mass.

Now that his first season with the Boston Symphony is ended, Mr. Munch expressed pleasure with the orchestra. But he does feel that the heavy schedule of 109 concerts left him insufficient time to rehearse certain scores to his own complete satisfaction. Beethoven's Missa Solemnis for example.

Mr. and Mrs. Munch will return to the house in Milton which they occupied last Fall and Winter. They liked it there, and they enjoy the peace and quiet and the beauty of the New England countryside.

TOMORROW—The music of Paris in the Spring.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—TUESDAY, JUNE 27, 1950

This Time I Saw Paris

A Visit to Charles Munch's Home; the Conversation Is Free and Gay

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS — The cab driver stopped at No. 8 Rue Alfred Duodencq in the 16th Arrondissement, a street he had had some little difficulty in finding since it is short, quiet, hidden and comparatively new. Here in this well-heeled quarter of the city, on the third floor of a dignified and spacious apartment block, is the Paris home of Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The distinguished musician was in his study, conservatively but handsomely dressed in brown as I arrived at the appointed time for lunch. He had just finished a morning's work on his Symphony plans for next season, with that gracious lady, Mrs. Hirshman, who after a decade as secretarial assistant to Serge Koussevitsky in Boston, is continuing in the same capacity with Mr. Munch.

"Bon jour, monsieur," I said in a bold attempt to speak French and as quickly abandoned when he politely responded in the language he has been learning these past two years: "How nice it is to see you in Paris, Mr. Durgin."

"Now make an effort, speak French," smiled Mrs. Hirshman at me, for she is an accomplished woman who speaks several languages herself and who has a mind and spirit that are unceasingly active. So for the remainder of my visit we all talked in a mixture of the two tongues.

* * *

Mr. Munch has been back in Paris about a month, following his first arduous season in Boston, and about 10 days' holiday in New York. Favoring air travel, he flew back. He looks rested and well, the handsome "Beau Charles."

It was a new experience for this chronicler to have the privelege of a friendly visit with him away from the official air of his room at Symphony Hall and the pressures of his work. Here he was just as warm and friendly as ever, but much more relaxed and expansive among his familiar surroundings.

You quickly got a new impression of Mr. Munch, the non-musical side, just from looking over the study, salon and dining room. He has a taste and an enthusiasm for art, and is surrounded by it. Many paintings, a good deal of sculpture. A striking landscape of Monnet, some sculptural fragments of Egyptian origin, a Breughel new to him, and a wild design in vivid colors by a modern young Italian, displayed with mingled excitement and humor.

Many old prints, including some of ships, and a handsome screen behind the grand piano(on which stood an opened piano reduction of Bloch's "Schelomo"). In the octagonally-sided entrance hall—a bit confusing to the visitor because its doors are mirrors from ceiling to floor—a superb round table. Shelf after shelf filled with beautifully bound books. Of the well-rounded mind and elegant taste, which up to now you could only have suspected, here was positive proof.

* * *

We were joined at lunch by Mr. Munch's nephew, Ernest, a personable, dark young man, who will return to the Longy School in Cambridge next September to resume his studies in cello and musical theory. He is another musician in an already extensive musical family. Mr. Munch explained that Mrs Munch is away for a few days in Switzerland.

The conversation at table was free and gay, not much about music, and it ranged from this pilgrim's peregrinations on cruiser, tanker, bus and train, to however did the Munch cat, the biggest one I ever have seen, get so enormous? There seemed to be no logical explanation of that: it just happened. Somehow the name of this puss-kitty got lost in the conversational shuffle.

THE DISTINGUISHED musician, was in his study

Mr. Munch is no ivory-tower artist, either, but a man of the world aware of the varied life about him, as well as appreciative of the treasures left from the past.

* * *

What had I seen in Paris? The museums? Notre Dame? Had I been able to spend any time in the celebrated cafes? Over on the Left Bank, the Cafe Flor and Les Deux Magots, where the Americans like to go now? The Ronde Point? When I explained that I had accomplished all of these, heard some music, too, and delighted to sit resting a bit in whatever little sidewalk cafes happened to be on the route of the walking rubbernecker, he expressed laughing approval.

Over coffee in the salon, the talk soon acquired another conversationalist as we were joined by Irving Fine, the young Boston composer and member of the music faculties of both Harvard and Brandeis Universities. Mr. Fine is just finishing a season in Paris as a holder of both a Guggenheim and a Fulbright fellowship. He returns to Boston June 21. His months in the French artistic center have produced a lot of fruitful observations of contemporary musical currents here.

Free and candid were the opinions expressed on all sides about music, its creators and its performers. Since they were private, those opinions will not be turned loose in this article, but rest assured they were lively. But there was one story of an elder French composer who was attending the first performance of a new opera by a younger man. At the end of the first act the elder composer said to the younger: "Well, I'm going. How about you?"

Mr. Munch expressed his own admiration for Darius Milhaud's "Le Creation du Monde," which he will present in Boston next season, and the original manuscript of which he showed me, done in a fabulously neat hand. The conductor's plans are not completed this early, and he will have to suspend work on them for a time since he is leaving to give concerts in Holland.

But these compositions, some of them novelties for Boston, he has chosen: Honegger's "La Danse des Morts," the late Albert Roussel's setting of the 85th Psalm; Bach's Christmas Oratorio at that holiday season, and the St. Matthew Passion at Easter. There will also be a Schubert Mass.

Now that his first season with the Boston Symphony is ended, Mr. Munch expressed pleasure with the orchestra. But he does feel that the heavy schedule of 109 concerts left him insufficient time to rehearse certain scores to his own complete satisfaction. Beethoven's Missa Solemnis for example.

Mr. and Mrs. Munch will return to the house in Milton which they occupied last Fall and Winter. They liked it there, and they enjoy the peace and quiet and the beauty of the New England countryside.

TOMORROW—The music of Paris in the Spring.

[120]

This Time I Saw Paris

A Visit to Charles Munch's Home; the Conversation Is Free and Gay

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS — The cab driver stopped at No. 8 Rue Alfred Duodencq in the 16th Arrondissement, a street he had had some little difficulty in finding since it is short, quiet, hidden and comparatively new. Here in this well-heeled quarter of the city, on the third floor of a dignified and spacious apartment block, is the Paris home of Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"IT WAS A NEW EXPERIENCE" to visit the distinguished musician in his study in Paris.

The distinguished musician was in his study, conservatively but handsomely dressed in brown as I arrived at the appointed time for lunch. He had just finished a morning's work on his Symphony plans for next season, with that gracious lady, Mrs. Hirshman, who after a decade as secretarial assistant to Serge Koussevitsky in Boston, is continuing in the same capacity with Mr. Munch.

"Bon jour, monsieur," I said in a bold attempt to speak French and as quickly abandoned when he politely responded in the language he has been learning these past two years: "How nice it is to see you in Paris, Mr. Durgin."

"Now make an effort, speak French," smiled Mrs. Hirshman at me, for she is an accomplished woman who speaks several languages herself and who has a mind and spirit that are unceasingly active. So for the remainder of my visit we all talked in a mixture of the two tongues.

* * *

Mr. Munch has been back in Paris about a month, following his first arduous season in Boston, and about 10 days' holiday in New York. Favoring air travel, he flew back. He looks rested and well, the handsome "Beau Charles."

It was a new experience for his chronicler to have the privelege of a friendly visit with him away from the official air of his room at Symphony Hall and the pressures of his work. Here he was just as warm and friendly as ever, but much more relaxed and expansive among his familiar surroundings.

You quickly got a new impression of Mr. Munch, the non-musical side, just from looking over the study, salon and dining room. He has a taste and an enthusiasm for art, and is surrounded by it. Many paintings, a good deal of sculpture. A striking landscape of Monnet, some sculptural fragments of Egyptian origin, a Breughel new to him, and a wild design in vivid colors by a modern young Italian, displayed with mingled excitement and humor.

Many old prints, including some of ships, and a handsome screen behind the grand piano (on which stood an opened piano reduction of Bloch's "Schelomo"). In the octagonally-sided entrance hall—a bit confusing to the visitor because its doors are mirrors from ceiling to floor—a superb round table. Shelf after shelf filled with beautifully bound books. Of the well-rounded mind and elegant taste, which up to now you could only have suspected, here was positive proof.

* * *

We were joined at lunch by Mr. Munch's nephew, Ernest, a personable, dark young man, who will return to the Longy School in Cambridge next September to resume his studies in cello and musical theory. He is another musician in an already extensive musical family. Mr. Munch explained that Mrs Munch is away for a few days in Switzerland.

The conversation at table was free and gay, not much about music, and it ranged from this pilgrim's peregrinations on cruiser, tanker, bus and train, to however did the Munch cat, the biggest one I ever have seen, get so enormous? There seemed to be no logical explanation of that; it just happened. Somehow the name of this puss-kitty got lost in the conversational shuffle.

Mr. Munch is no ivory-tower artist, either, but a man of the world aware of the varied life about him, as well as appreciative of the treasures left from the past.

* * *

What had I seen in Paris? The museums? Notre Dame? Had I been able to spend any time in the celebrated cafes? Over on the Left Bank, the Cafe Flor and Les Deux Magots, where the Americans like to go now? The Ronde Point? When I explained that I had accomplished all of these, heard some music, too, and delighted to sit resting a bit in whatever little sidewalk cafes happened to be on the route of the walking rubbernecker, he expressed laughing approval.

Over coffee in the salon, the talk soon acquired another conversationalist as we were joined by Irving Fine, the young Boston composer and member of the music faculties of both Harvard and Brandeis Universities. Mr. Fine is just finishing a season in Paris as a holder of both a Guggenheim and a Fulbright fellowship. He returns to Boston June 21. His months in the French artistic center have produced a lot of fruitful observations of contemporary musical currents here.

Free and candid were the opinions expressed on all sides about music, its creators and its performers. Since they were private, those opinions will not be turned loose in this article, but rest assured they were lively. But there was one story of an elder French composer who was attending the first performance of a new opera by a younger man. At the end of the first act the elder composer said to the younger: "Well, I'm going. How about you?"

Mr. Munch expressed his own admiration for Darius Milhaud's "Le Creation du Monde," which he will present in Boston next season, and the original manuscript of which he showed me, done in a fabulously neat hand. The conductor's plans are not completed this early, and he will have to suspend work on them for a time since he is leaving to give concerts in Holland.

But these compositions, some of them novelties for Boston, he has chosen: Honegger's "La Danse des Morts," the late Albert Roussel's setting of the 85th Psalm; Bach's Christmas Oratorio at that holiday season, and the St. Matthew Passion at Easter. There will also be a Schubert Mass.

Now that his first season with the Boston Symphony is ended, Mr. Munch expressed pleasure with the orchestra. But he does feel that the heavy schedule of 109 concerts left him insufficient time to rehearse certain scores to his own complete satisfaction. Beethoven's Missa Solemnis for example.

Mr. and Mrs. Munch will return to the house in Milton which they occupied last Fall and Winter. They liked it there, and they enjoy the peace and quiet and the beauty of the New England countryside.

TOMORROW—The music of Paris in the Spring.

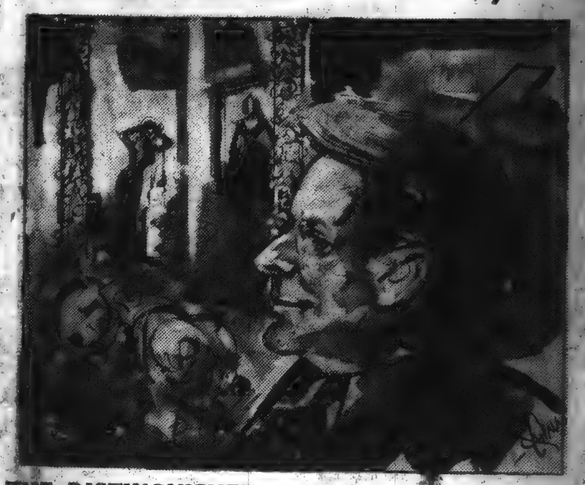
BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—TUESDAY, JUNE 27, 1950

This Time I Saw Paris

A Visit to Charles Munch's Home; the Conversation Is Free and Gay

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS — The cab driver stopped at No. 8 Rue Alfred Duodencq in the 16th Arrondissement, a street he had had some little difficulty in finding since it is short, quiet, hidden and comparatively new. Here in this well-heeled quarter of the city, on the third floor of a dignified and spacious apartment block, is the Paris home of Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.



THE DISTINGUISHED musician, was in his study

The distinguished musician was in his study, conservatively but handsomely dressed in brown as I arrived at the appointed time for lunch. He had just finished a morning's work on his Symphony plans for next season, with that gracious lady, Mrs. Hirshman, who after a decade as secretarial assistant to Serge Koussevitsky in Boston, is continuing in the same capacity with Mr. Munch.

"Bon jour, monsieur," I said in a bold attempt to speak French and as quickly abandoned when he politely responded in the language he has been learning these past two years: "How nice it is to see you in Paris, Mr. Durgin."

"Now make an effort, speak French," smiled Mrs. Hirshman at me, for she is an accomplished woman who speaks several languages herself and who has a mind and spirit that are unceasingly active. So for the remainder of my visit we all talked in a mixture of the two tongues.

* * *

Mr. Munch has been back in Paris about a month, following his first arduous season in Boston, and about 10 days' holiday in New York. Favoring air travel, he flew back. He looks rested and well, the handsome "Beau Charles."

It was a new experience for his chronicler to have the privelege of a friendly visit with him away from the official air of his room at Symphony Hall and the pressures of his work. Here he was just as warm and friendly as ever, but much more relaxed and expansive among his familiar surroundings.

You quickly got a new impression of Mr. Munch, the non-musical side, just from looking over the study, salon and dining room. He has a taste and an enthusiasm for art, and is surrounded by it. Many paintings, a good deal of sculpture. A striking landscape of Monnet, some sculptural fragments of Egyptian origin, a Breughel new to him, and a wild design in vivid colors by a modern young Italian, displayed with mingled excitement and humor.

Many old prints, including some of ships, and a handsome screen behind the grand piano (on which stood an opened piano reduction of Bloch's "Schelomo"). In the octagonally-sided entrance hall—a bit confusing to the visitor because its doors are mirrors from ceiling to floor—a superb round table. Shelf after shelf filled with beautifully bound books. Of the well-rounded mind and elegant taste, which up to now you could only have suspected, here was positive proof.

* * *

We were joined at lunch by Mr. Munch's nephew, Ernest, a personable, dark young man, who will return to the Longy School in Cambridge next September to resume his studies in cello and musical theory. He is another musician in an already extensive musical family. Mr. Munch explained that Mrs Munch is away for a few days in Switzerland.

The conversation at table was free and gay, not much about music, and it ranged from this pilgrim's peregrinations on cruiser, tanker, bus and train, to however did the Munch cat, the biggest one I ever have seen, get so enormous? There seemed to be no logical explanation of that; it just happened. Somehow the name of this puss-kitty got lost in the conversational shuffle.

Mr. Munch is no ivory-tower artist, either, but a man of the world aware of the varied life about him, as well as appreciative of the treasures left from the past.

* * *

What had I seen in Paris? The museums? Notre Dame? Had I been able to spend any time in the celebrated cafes? Over on the Left Bank, the Cafe Flor and Les Deux Magots, where the Americans like to go now? The Ronde Point? When I explained that I had accomplished all of these, heard some music, too, and delighted to sit resting a bit in whatever little sidewalk cafes happened to be on the route of the walking rubbernecker, he expressed laughing approval.

Over coffee in the salon, the talk soon acquired another conversationalist as we were joined by Irving Fine, the young Boston composer and member of the music faculties of both Harvard and Brandeis Universities. Mr. Fine is just finishing a season in Paris as a holder of both a Guggenheim and a Fulbright fellowship. He returns to Boston June 21. His months in the French artistic center have produced a lot of fruitful observations of contemporary musical currents here.

Free and candid were the opinions expressed on all sides about music, its creators and its performers. Since they were private, those opinions will not be turned loose in this article, but rest assured they were lively. But there was one story of an elder French composer who was attending the first performance of a new opera by a younger man. At the end of the first act the elder composer said to the younger: "Well, I'm going. How about you?"

Mr. Munch expressed his own admiration for Darius Milhaud's "Le Creation du Monde," which he will present in Boston next season, and the original manuscript of which he showed me, done in a fabulously neat hand. The conductor's plans are not completed this early, and he will have to suspend work on them for a time since he is leaving to give concerts in Holland.

But these compositions, some of them novelties for Boston, he has chosen: Honegger's "La Danse des Morts," the late Albert Roussel's setting of the 85th Psalm; Bach's Christmas Oratorio at that holiday season, and the St. Matthew Passion at Easter. There will also be a Schubert Mass.

Now that his first season with the Boston Symphony is ended, Mr. Munch expressed pleasure with the orchestra. But he does feel that the heavy schedule of 109 concerts left him insufficient time to rehearse certain scores to his own complete satisfaction. Beethoven's Missa Solemnis for example.

Mr. and Mrs. Munch will return to the house in Milton which they occupied last Fall and Winter. They liked it there, and they enjoy the peace and quiet and the beauty of the New England countryside.

TOMORROW—The music of Paris in the Spring.

[120]

It's a Grand Night for a Symphony Concert

By a Staff Photographer

Here is what the Hatch Memorial Shell and the Charles River Esplanade will look like soon when the Esplanade Concerts open their 22d season on July 3. Every good night—and even every threatening night—from then until the 23d, crowds of music lovers will sit silent and engrossed as the baton of Arthur Fiedler again coaxes the world's greatest harmonies from his 90 musicians. If the weather is good, some 5,000 to 6,000 music lovers are expected.

Popular Esplanade Concerts To Open July 3 at Hatch Shell

By Laura Haddock
Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Boston's favorite outdoor musical event, the annual series of Esplanade Concerts at the Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River, will begin July 3, Monday night, at 8:30.

If the weather is favorable, it can be safely predicted that 5,000 to 6,000 people will gather on the grass in front of the Shell to listen in the twilight as the 90 musicians under the baton of Arthur Fiedler open the 22d season of these concerts.

As the season advances, the audiences grow in size until, according to Jackson Chairs, Inc., the firm which has had the chair-renting concession for almost every year since the first concert, the number of chairs rented reaches 10,000 a night, to say nothing of those who sit on the grass or stand on the paths skirting the area.

Begun in 1929

These concerts began in 1929, when Mr. Fiedler, then a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, believed that outdoor concerts, hitherto the sole prerogative of brass bands, could be performed by a symphonic ensemble.

Almost no one agreed with him, even those who backed him financially. But as time went on and the esplanade concerts weathered even the depression years, public sentiment had to concede that he was right.

There have been three shells erected for the concerts: the first one of wood, to accommodate the original group of 46 musicians; the second of steel; and finally the granite Hatch Memorial Shell which was dedicated on July 2, 1940, and which cost $240,000.

Several Experiments

Steady popularity of the esplanade concerts has given Mr. Fiedler the courage to attempt several experiments in programing. In 1935, for instance, he tested the musical taste of his audiences by including all nine of Beethoven's symphonies during the short season. The following year he played the four Brahms symphonies. Both experiments were successful: the crowds were enthusiastic and came back for more.

Mr. Fiedler has since introduced a variety of soloists on the concerts and has played outstanding contemporary music.

Concerts for children, with programs designed especially for young listeners, have become a popular Wednesday morning event each summer.

The esplanade concerts are free, although voluntary contributions are encouraged and have, in fact, been sufficient to defray much of the seasonal expense each year. The Trust Department of the Merchants National Bank has voluntarily handled any contributions from individuals apart from members of the nightly audiences.

[12']

Johnny Geikie Called Arthur Fiedler and He Said "Yes"

A Nickel, Plus Lots of Youthful Talent, Responsible for 14-Year-Old Pianist Appearing With Pops Orchestra

BY EDWARD T. MARTIN

Next Wednesday morning 14-year-old G. Johnstone Geikie, Jr., will step before an audience his own age and demonstrate that talent doesn't take years to grow.

The tall, angular kid from South Hamilton, appearing as guest pianist with Boston Pops Orchestra in the season's first concert for children, will lay his hands to a hard number.

"I'm going to play the Hungarian Fantasy by Liszt," he told us. "Mr. Fiedler said I could."

From the Hatch Shell podium, where he guides his 80-piece orchestra, Conductor Arthur Fiedler will keep a confident eye toward the boy who called him on the phone one day recently to ask him "would you like to hear me play?"

The maestro gave him an appointment and this is the result—a crowning goal to any musical-minded lad.

In South Hamilton, the name is "Johnny" when you inquire about the "boy who plays the piano," although a good section of the north shore knows him as the deer-footed high school student who won the mile race in a five-school competition.

Johnny is an all-around lad, despite the growing fame he's earning as a talented boy pianist.

In freshly-laundered dungarees, and the light blue sport-shirt he wears while pedaling a bike downtown, he looks like anything but a boy who would faithfully practice three hours a day on the piano keyboard.

"It's simply that I like piano playing," Johnny put it matter-of-factly as he dismounted from his bike and led us into the house. "I've been playing ever since I was five."

His dad, an electrical inspector with a Boston firm, inspired him.

"Dad's a good pianist. He's been playing piano all his life. He also taught music in schools in Canada, where he was born."

Johnny grinned when we prodded his memory back to those "early years," to the time when most youngsters are more concerned with the alphabet than with G-clefs and quarter-notes.

"Dad had me learn the first six letters of the alphabet first. These are necessary in order to learn the keyboard of a piano. Then he would take an apple and slice it in half to explain what a half-note was. The quarter-notes and eighth-notes were taught the same way."

At the time, the Geikie family was living in Athol. Johnny was born there. They moved to North Orange for three years to live on a farm.

"That was fun," Johnny remembers, "The schoolhouse was almost directly across the street. And we had plenty of hens, cows and chickens to take care of."

The route from North Orange to South Hamilton was by way of Fairfield, Conn., where his parents lived for a year and one-half, before buying this 12-year-old home at 31 Durham ave.

In Earnest

"No matter where we moved there was always a piano nearby," Johnny said. "My dad taught me the first year and a half. Then I took lessons from a number of teachers. There was a time when I quit playing, though, for almost two years. I sort of let things slide, except to play for my own amusement."

Once the family was settled at the South Hamilton address, however, his music career began in earnest.

"Music comes to me as easy as eating dinner and supper."

He took lessons from instructors in Hamilton and Salem, sharing his time among school studies, sports and household chores. One of his first "public appearances" was a music recital conducted by his Salem teacher.

"I played Fantasia in D Minor. I suppose you might want to know who wrote it. I'll have to look that up. I think it was Mozart."

Preparing for the recital, Johnny would climb out of bed at 6 a. m. every morning to practice "before Dad went to work."

The recital went over with a bang. Then Johnny, as a fifth grade student at Lamson School, concentrated his piano practicing for another "public appearance," this time a school operetta, "Blue Belt."

"I played Fantasia in D Minor at the one, too. I think that was the only number I knew well."

Conductor Arthur Fiedler coaches "Johnny" Geikie, Jr., as the 14-year-old pianist runs through the score he'll play at Hatch Shell this Wednesday.

Honor Student

Johnny's talents were beginning to be recognized locally. "Mr. Donald Sandford . . . he used to direct the Fireside Singers of Hamilton [illegible]men's chorus with about 30 [illegible] he liked my playing, I guess, and brought me to his teacher at Boston University."

The teacher, Johnny explained gratefully, was Professor Alfredo Fondacaro, who has had the lad under his wing now for five years.

"I've been going to B. U. as a special student, once a week . . . on Saturday mornings, and Professor Fondacaro has been very good to me."

Despite a heavy concentration on his music, Johnny has found time to finish his freshman year at Hamilton High School as an honor student. His favorite course is science, but when the final bell rings, you'll find him, in season, jogging around a track or puffing up and down a tennis court.

"Try getting him pried loose from a radio when a Red Sox game is being broadcast," his young mother interjected as she came into the parlor. She was trailed, Indian-style, by two other sons, David, who is 12, 4-year-old Richard, and a gray, striped kitten.

"Actually, he doesn't need to be goaded into practice," she added. "Johnny enjoys playing."

Just A Boy

Soon after his first few appearances, the youngster began getting numerous requests to appear at programs all over the north shore. Audiences at each one were not only impressed by his handling of difficult pieces, they were also moved by the quiet, unassuming boyhood mannerisms the youngster displayed toward praise.

"All the accolades he's been receiving haven't affected him one bit," his mother explained. "He's just as easy going a boy as he's always been."

The first real opportunity the South Hamilton youth had to test his talents came when he passed an audition to play on the "Spotlight of Youth" program, two years ago, a Sunday afternoon WBZ radio show, sponsored by the First National Bank of Boston for promising young musical talent.

Competent music critics, including Arthur Fiedler, auditioned 500 contestants who displayed their skills unsoop by the judges. Johnny Geikie was called back, along with 33 other contestants, to appear in the semifinals. The contestant nearest Johnny's age was 20.

"I didn't win," Johnny pointed out. "But being picked for the semifinals gave me a lot of courage."

Meanwhile, there were numerous requests for him as a guest artist with musical groups in Melrose, Winchester, Beverly, the New England Federation of Men's Glee Clubs. Johnny shared a spot on the same programs with several top-notch soloists.

In 1948 he won a pair of trophies at the North Shore Music Festival in Manning Bowl, Lynn, taking a first prize for his piano-playing and second honors in the instruments class. He also performed at the B. U. College of Music's annual recital.

His "big event," prior to next Wednesday's appearance at the Esplanade Shell, was, obviously, his first concert. This was held last March in South Hamilton's Community House.

Startled Audience

John startled his audience with masterful renditions, drawing on difficult selections by Handel, Chopin, Mozart, Paderewski and Grieg.

"The whole family was thrilled," Johnny's mother said.

Thus, one morning recently, the lad reached for the phone and put a call through to Arthur Fiedler.

"He was awfully kind, and he gave me an appointment to play for him. When I told him I would play the Hungarian Fantasy by Liszt, he said he didn't think I could play it. He gave me something else to play instead.

"Afterward, he had me play the Fantasy and I guess he liked it. That's the number he's going to let me do Wednesday."

When he comes out of Hamilton High with the class of 1953, Johnny plans to enroll as a regular student at B. U. College of Music.

"But I'd appreciate it very much if you would mention in your story," he asked, "my time for the mile. I did it in 5 minutes, 29 seconds. That's only 16 seconds short of the record."

THIS ISSUE

First RCA Victor Long Plays

May, 1950

Complete Reviews and Listings of all New RCA Victor Popular, Red Seal and Bluebird Records

CHARLES MUNCH IS CARRIED AWAY AS HE CONDUCTS

TURBULENT FRENCHMAN

Charles Munch, the new regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is noted for the vigor and sweep with which he leads his musicians. This is typical of a man who has led a vigorous life, who has conducted all over Europe and in North and South America, in Palestine and Egypt.

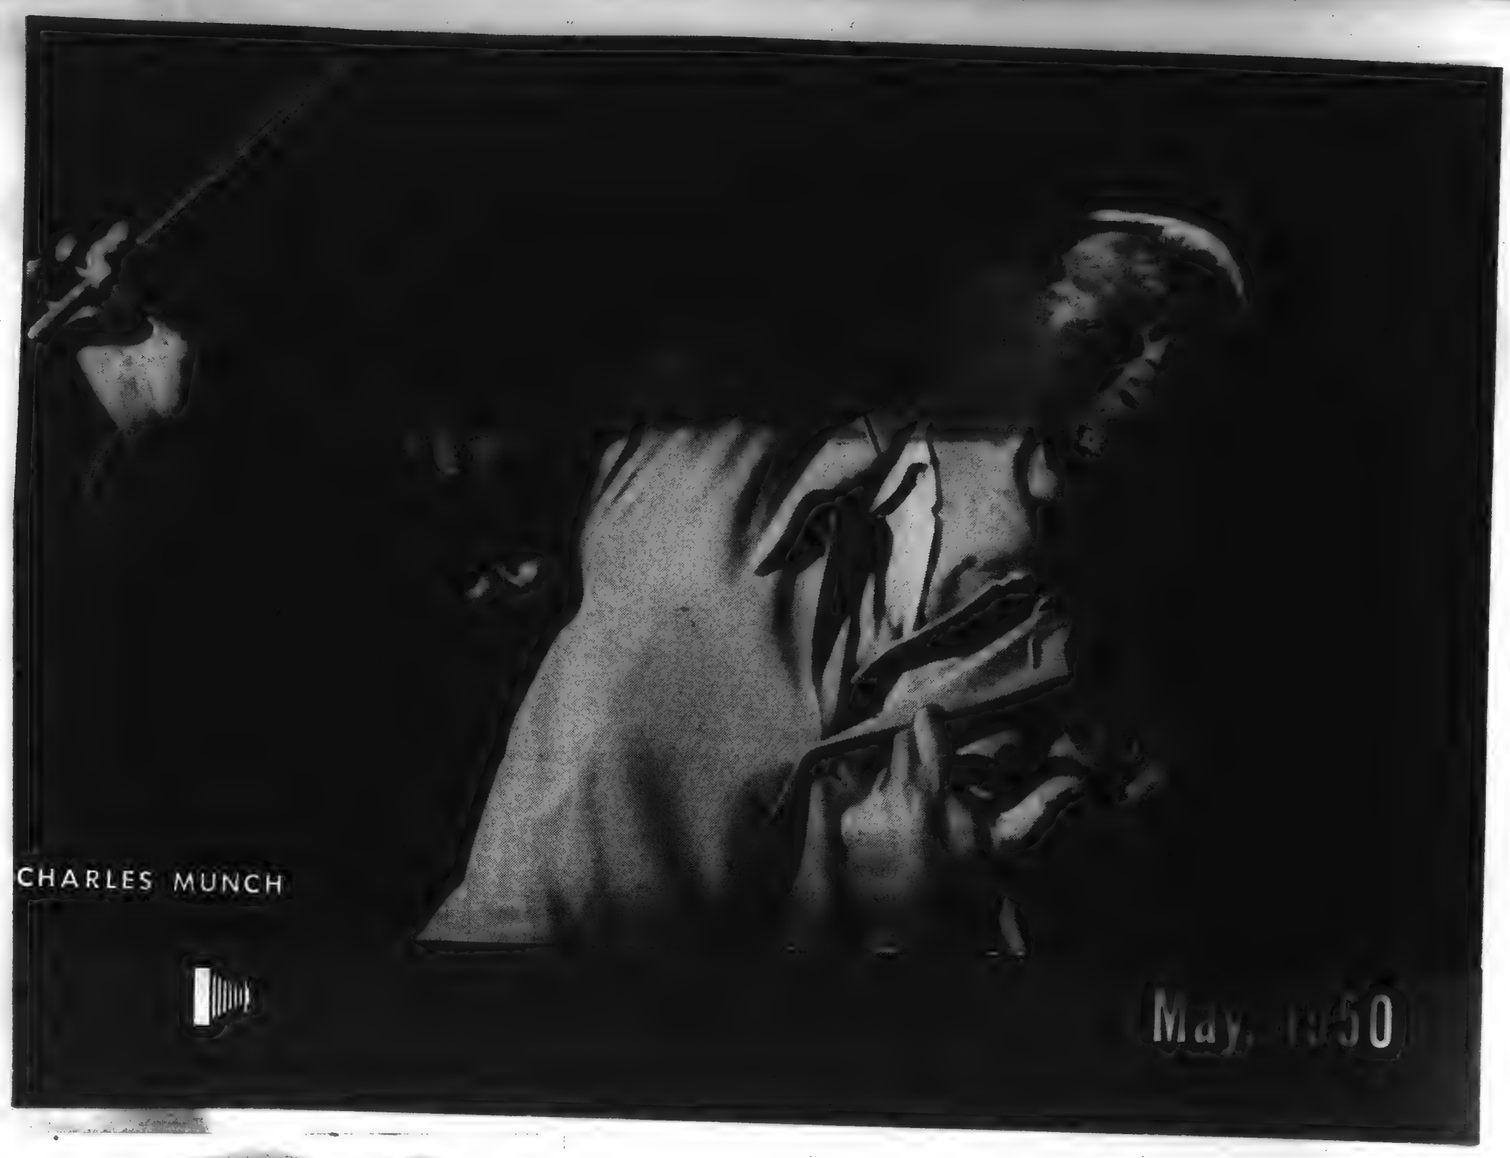
Munch, like many other European musicians, had his brush with the Nazis. He was studying at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig under Bruno Walter, Fritz Busch and Furtwängler when he was asked to become a German citizen. Rather than do so, he left. Again, with France occupied by the Germans, he refused to conduct for a Nazi audience. But when obliged to do so, he agreed, turning over his fees to the French Resistance. He was asked for permission to examine the racial background of his orchestra. He refused, saying, "musicians are musicians, not races!" When the director of the opera, Jacques Rouche, invited him to conduct he would not do so, since many known collaborators were associated with the organization.

At a recent press conference Munch stated that he intends no deviation from established Boston Symphony traditions and maintained that orchestral arrangements will retain the same "format." He intends, however, to bring to Boston audiences seldom-heard music and promises programs which will direct new light on the classics and embrace interpretations of modern works as well.

Born in Strasbourg, in 1891, Charles Munch says of his nationality: ". . . My father was Alsatian—a descendant of a family which lived in Alsace long before 1870. I was born when Alsace was under German domination, but as you know, true Alsatians have always remained French, as the country itself has remained a French province . . ."

Charles Munch's first recorded work with the Boston Symphony has just been released. It is an album containing Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92."

[123]



CHARLES MUNCH IS CARRIED AWAY AS HE CONDUCTS

TURBULENT FRENCHMAN

Charles Munch, the new regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is noted for the vigor and sweep with which he leads his musicians. This is typical of a man who has led a vigorous life, who has conducted all over Europe and in North and South America, in Palestine and Egypt.

Munch, like many other European musicians, had his brush with the Nazis. He was studying at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig under Bruno Walter, Fritz Busch and Furtwängler when he was asked to become a German citizen. Rather than do so, he left. Again, with France occupied by the Germans, he refused to conduct for a Nazi audience. But when obliged to do so, he agreed, turning over his fees to the French Resistance. He was asked for permission to examine the racial background of his orchestra. He refused, saying, "musicians are musicians, not races!" When the director of the opera, Jacques Rouche, invited him to conduct he would not do so, since many known collaborators were associated with the organization.

At a recent press conference Munch stated that he intends no deviation from established Boston Symphony traditions and maintained that orchestral arrangements will retain the same "format." He intends, however, to bring to Boston audiences seldom-heard music and promises programs which will direct new light on the classics and embrace interpretations of modern works as well.

Born in Strasbourg, in 1891, Charles Munch says of his nationality: "... My father was Alsatian—a descendant of a family which lived in Alsace long before 1870. I was born when Alsace was under German domination, but as you know, true Alsatians have always remained French, as the country itself has remained a French province ..."

Charles Munch's first recorded work with the Boston Symphony has just been released. It is an album containing Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92."

[123]

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 10 1950

Koussevitzky and Monteux To Conduct Boston Symphony

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has invited Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Montex to conduct the concerts in Boston and other cities during the weeks of his mid-season vacation.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in its home city for the first time since his retiretment as its leader in the Spring of 1949. Pierre Monteux, who was the conductor of the orchestra for five years (1919-24), for many years has been conductor orf the San Francisco Orchestra.

Charles Munch is resting at his country home in Alsace, after a notable season of concerts in France and Belgium. He will return to this country next month to open the Boston orchestra's 70th season in Symphony Hall, Oct. 6, his second season as its conductor.

* * *

IN A LETTER to season ticket holders, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, pointed out that the Boston Orchestra will lose an expected $165,000 of additional income which would have been the result of tax exemption the proposed Federal measure ruled out by the national emergency. The orchestra is without available funds to meet its deficits.

Instead of raising the price of tickets, he has asked those who renew their season tickets to add 20 per cent as a voluntary gift to their checks to make up the amount which had been hoped for through tax repeal.

DAYTON, OHIO
HERALD

AUG 12 1950

Band, Choral Programs Given At Island Park

Selections From "South Pacific" Listed By Summer Chorus Directed By Rapp

Two concerts will be presented at Island park this coming week. The Municipal band led by Don Bassett, will give the first of these at 8:30 p. m. tomorrow.

The Dayton summer chorus directed by William Rapp is to sing a concert at the same hour Wednesday evening.

Virginia Patterson, popular Dayton soprano, will appear with the Municipal band tomorrow evening in the presentation of the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria" and "Romance" from Romberg's "The Desert Song."

The band is to open its program with Benter's "Chief of Naval Operations." Among other selections to be presented are Rimsky-Korsakov's "Song of India," Work's "Grandfather's Clock," a selection from Richard Strauss' "Die Fledermaus," a selection from Romberg's "The New Moon," Walters' "A Night At the Ballet," Fletcher's "Bal Masque" and Johann Strauss's "Emperor Waltz."

Wednesday Concert

The chorus which is to sing at Island park Wednesday evening is comprised of members from William Rapp's Dayton Choral club, the University of Dayton chorus and the YMCA chorus. There are 65 singers in the group.

The program will open with nine songs from the Rodgers-Hammerstein "South Pacific." Among these are "A Wonderful Guy" sung by the chorus, "Bali Ha'i" presented by Phillis Iseringhausen and chorus, "Younger Than Springtime" sung by Louis Willhelm, "I'm Gonna Wash That Man Right Outo My Hair" sung by a Girls chorus.

Pat Nelson will sing "Honey Bun" and a Men's chorus is to present "There Is Nothin' Like a Dame." John McDonough, baritone, is to present "Some Enchanted Evening."

The second part of the program is constituted of many popular numbers including "Surrey With the Fringe On Top," "It's a Big Wide Wonderful World;" the "Habanera" and "The Flower Song" from "Carmen;" "Smoke Gets Into Your Eyes," "Pale Hands," and "Wanting You."

The last portion of the program will be devoted to sacred numbers. Phyllis Iseringhausen will sing Christiansen's "Beautiful Savior" and the chorus is to present several selections including an arrangement of "Onward Christian Soldiers."

Madonna Wine Goss will be at the organ and Kenneth Turvey, at the piano.

Koussevitzky Directs

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestar, has invited Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteux to conduct concerts in Boston when Munch takes a mid-season vacation during the season of 1950-51.

Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in Boston for the first time since his retirement as its director in the spring of 1949.

Monteux, who was conductor of the Boston orchestra for five years (1919-24), will return after many years of service as conductor of the San Francisco orchestra.

In a letter to season ticket holders, Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston orchestra's board of trustees, draws attention to the fact that the orchestra will lose an expected $165,000 of additional income. This income would have been the result of a proposed federal measure ruled out by the national emergency.

The orchestra is without available funds to meet its deficit. Cabot asks that season ticket holders add 20 per cent to their checks as a voluntary gift to make up the amount which it had been hoped would be met through tax repeal.

N Y TIMES 8/13/50

POLITESSE

Charles Munch is proving a man of tact. He did not intrude on Serge Koussevitzky by conducting this summer at the Berkshire Festival, at Tanglewood. And this week it was announced that the two men he has invited to be guest conductors of the Boston Symphony during his midseason vacation are his two predecessors, on the podium—Pierre Monteux, who led the orchestra from 1919 to 1924, and Dr. Koussevitzky.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

AUG 1 2 1950

Dr. Koussevitsky, Pierre Monteux to Conduct Orchestra

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has invited Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteux to conduct the Symphony concerts in Boston and other cities during the weeks of his mid-season vacation, according to a letter just sent to each season subscriber by Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra Board of Trustees.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in Boston for the first time since his retirement as its leader in the spring of 1949. Mr. Monteux, who was conductor of this orchestra for five years (1919-24), will return after many years as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

Charles Munch is now resting at his country home in Alsace, after a notable season of concerts in France and Belgium. He will return to this country next month to open this orchestra's 70th season in Symphony Hall on October 6, thus beginning his second season as its conductor.

In his letter to the season ticket holders, Mr. Cabot drew attention to the fact that the Boston Orchestra will lose an expected $165,000 of additional income which would have been the result of tax exemption—the proposed Federal measure ruled out by the national emergency. The Orchestra is without available funds to meet its deficits. Instead of raising the price of tickets, he has asked those who renew their season tickets to add 20 per cent as a voluntary gift to their checks to make up the amount which had been hoped for through tax repeal.

BostonSymphonyInvites Koussevitsky, Monteux

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Aug. 12.—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has invited Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteux to conduct the concerts in Boston and other cities during his mid-season vacation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, announced yesterday.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in Boston for the first time since his retirement as its leader in 1949. Mr. Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra, will return to lead the orchestra whose conductor he was from 1919 to 1924. The season is scheduled to begin Oct. 6 in Symphony Hall.

In a letter to season-ticket holders, Mr. Cabot asked persons renewing season tickets to add 20 per cent to their checks as a voluntary gift to make up the $165,000 additional income the orchestra would have gained if a proposed Federal tax exemption had not been ruled out by the preesnt war emergency.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

AUG 13 1950

Monteux Will Conduct Boston Symphony

Pierre Monteux has accepted an invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony for two weeks in February while the orchestra's regular conductor, Charles Munch, takes a midwinter vacation.

Mr. Monteux is an old hand with the Boston orchestra and conducted it from 1919 through 1922.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who retired after 25 years as the Boston's conductor in 1949, will also pinch-hit during Munch's holiday.

The two appointments and acceptances were announced yesterday by Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony's board of trustees. Monteux is vacationing in the East and was not available for comment here.

NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 1 2 1950

Invite Koussevitzky To Lead Old Orchestra

Retired Conductor, Pierre Monteaux to Conduct Some Winter Concerts.

Charles Munch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has invited Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteux to conduct concerts in Boston and other cities during the weeks of his mid-season vacation this winter, according to Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra board of trustees. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in Boston for the first time since his retirement as its leader in the spring of 1949. Pierre Monteux, who was the conductor of the orchestra for five years, from 1919-1924, will return after many years in his present post as the conductor of the San Francisco orchestra.

Mr. Munch is now at his country home in Alsace, after a season of concerts in France and Belgium. He will return to this country next month to open the orchestra's 70th season in Symphony hall, Boston, on Oct. 6, thus beginning his second season as its conductor.

In his letter to the season ticket holders, Mr. Cabot said the Boston orchestra will lose an expected $165,000 of additional income which would have been the result of a proposed tax exemption now ruled out by the national emergency. The orchestra is without available funds to meet its deficits, he said, but instead of raising the price of tickets, he has asked those who renew their season tickets to add 20 per cent as a voluntary gift to their checks to make up the amount which had been hoped for through tax repeal.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

AUG 13 1950

divisions.

Monteux to Lead Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Aug. 12.—(AP)—Two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been engaged to replace Conductor Charles Munch during his midwinter vacation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, said today.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired in 1949 after twenty-five years as leader, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra, have accepted invitations, Cabot said.

Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony for five years, 1919 through 1942, and was succeeded by Doctor Koussevitsky. Munch is expected to take a month's vacation in February, with Doctor Koussevitzky and Monteux each conducting two weeks.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 13 1950

BOSTON

NAME GUEST CONDUCTORS FOR SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Sunday (AP) — Two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been engaged to replace Conductor Charles Munch during his mid-Winter vacation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said yesterday.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired in 1949 after 25 years as leader and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra, have accepted invitations, Cabot said.

Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony for five years, 1919 through 1924, and was succeeded by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Munch is expected to take a month's vacation in February with Dr. Koussevitzky and Monteux each conducting two weeks.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

Koussevitzky, Monteux To Replace Muench

Boston, Aug. 12. (AP) — Two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been engaged to replace Conductor Charles Muench during his mid-winter vacation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, said today.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired in 1949 after 25 years as leader, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra, have accepted invitations, Cabot said.

Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony for five years, 1919 through 1924, and was succeeded by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Muench is expected to take a month's vacation in February with Dr. Koussevitzky and Monteux each conducting two weeks.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

AUG 1950

GUEST CONDUCTORS

Koussevitzky and Monteux to Fill In for Munch at Boston

Boston, Aug. 12. — (AP) —Two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been engaged to replace conductor Charles Munch during his mid-winter vacation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, said today.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired in 1949 after 25 years as leader, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco orchestra, have accepted invitations, Cabot said.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

AUG 13 1950

Koussevitzky and Monteux To Conduct in Boston Again

By the Associated Press

BOSTON, Aug. 12.—Two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been engaged to replace Conductor Charles Munch during his mid-winter vacation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, said today.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired in 1949 after 25 years as leader, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra, have accepted invitations, Mr. Cabot said.

Mr. Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony for five years, 1919 through 1924, and was succeeded by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Munch is expected to take a month's vacation in February with Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Monteux each conducting two weeks.

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD

AUG 13 1950

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLANS FOR SEASON

BOSTON, Aug. 12 (AP)—Two former conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been engaged to replace Conductor Charles Munch during his mid-Winter vacation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, said today.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired in 1949 after 25 years as leader, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco orchestra, have accepted invitations, Cabot said.

Monteux conducted the Boston symphony for five years, 1919 through 1942, and was succeeded by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Munch is expected to take a month's vacation in February with Dr. Koussevitzky and Monteux each conducting two weeks.

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES

AUG 13 1950

TIMES — MAIN 0500

New Symphony Conductors

BOSTON, Aug. 12.—(AP)—Two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been engaged to replace Conductor Charles Munch during his mid-winter vacation, it was announced today. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired in 1949 after 25 years as leader, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco orchestra, have accepted invitations.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR

Koussevitzky, Monteaux Lead Boston Symphony

[illegible] Munch, the Conductor [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky and [illegible] Monteux to conduct the concerts in Boston and other cities during the weeks of his mid-season vacation, according to a letter just sent to each season subscriber by Henry B. Cabot, the President of the Board of Trustees. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in its own city for the first time since his retirement as its leader in the spring of 1949. Pierre Monteux, who was the conductor of this orchestra for five years, 1919-24, will return after many years as the conductor of the San Francisco orchestra.

Instead of raising the price of tickets, he has asked those who renew their season tickets to add 20% as a voluntary gift to their checks to make up the amount which had been hoped for through tax repeal.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT
AUG 13 1950

CHARLES MUNCH

. . . conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has [illegible] Dr. Koussevitsky and Pierre Monteux to conduct the concerts of the orchestra in Boston and other cities during the weeks of his mid season vacation. Dr. Koussevitsky will conduct it for the first time since his retirement as its leader in the spring of 1949 and Pierre Monteux, who was conductor of the orchestra for five years, 1919-24, will return after many years as the conductor of the San Francisco orchestra.

MR. MUNCH

. . . is now resting at his home in Alsace, after a notable season of concerts in France and Belgium. He will return to Boston next month to open the 70th season of concerts in Symphony Hall on October 6. This will be his second year on the podium. With the shelving of the law which would have exempted all orchestras from the excise tax on admissions, the Boston orchestra will lose about $165,000 of additional income. It is without available funds to meet its deficits and instead of raising the price of tickets, subscribers who renew their season tickets have been asked to add 20% voluntarily as a gift to help make up the amount which it had hoped to receive thru the tax repeal.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
AUG 13 1950

Subscribers Are Alerted In Boston

BOSTON—Charles Munch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has invited Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteux to conduct the concerts in Boston and other cities during the weeks of his mid-season vacation, according to a letter just sent to each season subscriber by Henry B. Cabot, the president of the Board of Trustees. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in its own city for the first time since his retirement as its leader in the spring of 1949. Pierre Monteux, who was the conductor of this orchestra for five years (1919-24), will return after many years of distinguished service in his present post as the conductor of the San Francisco orchestra.

Charles Munch is now resting at his country home in Alsace, after a notable season of concerts in France and Belgium. He will return to this country next month to open this orchestra's 70th season in Symphony Hall on October 6, thus beginning his second season as its conductor.

In his letter to the season ticket holders, Mr. Cabot drew attention to the fact that the Boston orchestra will lose an expected $165,000 of additional income which would have been the result of tax exemption—the proposed federal measure ruled out by the national emergency. The orchestra is without available funds to meet its deficits. Instead of raising the price of tickets, he has asked those who renew their season tickets to add 20 per cent as a voluntary gift to their checks to make up the amount which had been hoped for through tax repeal.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

2 to Pinch-Hit for Munch

BOSTON, Aug. 12 (AP)—Two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been engaged to replace Charles Munch, conductor during his mid-winter vacation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, said today. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired in 1949 after twenty-five years as leader, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra, have accepted invitations, Mr. Cabot said.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
AUG 13 1950

Boston Symphony Head Rests for New Season

Music Calendar

WEDNESDAY, 8.15 p. m. Thornden park, free concert, Community Symphony orchestra, George [illegible]om, director; Jane Cranen, soloist.

BY THOLA TABOR SCHENCK

Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear at the Coliseum Oct. 18 on the Famous Artists series, is now resting at his country home near Strasbourg in Alsace, after a notable list of summer concerts in France and Belgium.

Charles Munch

He will return to this country next month to open the orchestra's 70th season in Symphony hall, Boston, on Oct. 4, thus beginning his second season as its conductor.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, has just made known that Munch has invited Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteaux to conduct the concerts in Boston and other cities during the weeks of his mid-season vacation for '50-51.

This afternoon marked the final concert in The Shed at Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music center. Dr. Koussevitzky will be on the podium leading the 105-member orchestra, playing the Prokofieff "Symphony No. 6" and the Brahms "Symphony No. 1."

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
SEP 2 - 1950

Paris Acclaims Charles Munch, Boston Leader

CHARLES MUNCH, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard in the State Fair Coliseum the night of Oct. 18, is due back in Boston within a few days from a triumphal series of European concerts this summer, according to word received here by Famous Artists Series, sponsor of the Syracuse concert. Munch conducted concerts in Paris, Brussels and Amsterdam during the summer. He had appearances with the Orchestre National of France, when the Parisian critic, Marcel Schneider wrote: "Munch, the inspired artist, conducted his orchestra like a medium . . . The public, rising to acclaim the great leader at the end, had to shake off a spell which had held audience as well as orchestra. The applause seemed endless."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST HOME NEWS
SEP 13 1950

Koussevitzky, Monteaux To Be Boston's Guests

Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteux have been invited to guest conduct the Boston Symphony for the season '50-'51, during the mid-season vacation of the orchestra's regular conductor, Charles Munch.

This will be the first orchestral appearance in Boston of Dr. Koussevitzky since his retirement as the ensemble's musical director in '49. Monteux was director of the Boston ensemble for five years (1919-24).

FRESNO, CAL.
BEE
AUG 14 1950

Monteux Will Fill In On Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Aug. 14.—AP—Two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been engaged to replace conductor Charles Munch during his mid-Winter vacation.

Serge Koussevitzky, who retired in 1949 after 25 years as leader, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco orchestra, have accepted invitations.

Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony for five years and was succeeded by Koussevitzky.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN
AUG 14 1950

Boston Engages 2 Ex-Conductors

BOSTON, Aug. 13 (AP)—Two ex-conductors of the Boston symphony orchestra have been engaged to replace Conductor Charles Munch during his mid-winter vacation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, said Sunday.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired [illegible] years as leader, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco orchestra, have accepted invitations, Cabot said.

Monteux conducted the Boston symphony [illegible] years, 1919 through 1942, and was suceeded by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Munch is expected to take a month vacation in February with Dr. Koussevitzky and Monteux each conducting two weeks.

DALLAS, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD
AUG 14 1950

2 Conductors To Pinch Hit

BOSTON, Aug. 14.—(AP)—Two former conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been engaged to replace Conductor Charles Munch during his midwinter vacation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, said.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired in 1949 after twenty-five years as leader, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco orchestra, have accepted invitations, Cabot said.

Monteux conducted the Boston symphony for five years and was succeeded by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Munch is expected to take a month's vacation in February with Dr. Koussevitzky and Monteux each conducting two weeks.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
SEP 3 - 1950

Munch Conducted While in Europe

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will give a concert in state fair coliseum Oct. 18, is due back in Boston within a few days from a triumphal series of European concerts this summer, according to word received here by Famous Artists series, which will sponsor the local concert.

Munch conducted performances at Paris, Brussels and Amsterdam, including appearances with the Orchestre National at Paris. Of his work with the Orchestre National the Parisian critic Marcel Schneider wrote "Munch, the inspired artist, conducted his orchestra like a medium. The public, rising to acclaim the great leader at the end had to shake off a spell which held audience as well as players. The applause seemed endless."

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Another Pipe Dream--- A New Music Station

It begins to look as if there is some good news on the horizon for those very numerous people who were dismayed last May when a radio station that had devoted three years to broadcasting classical music exclusively dropped that policy in favor of jazz.

For a slim, shock-headed chap named John Thornton came in here the other day, set down a sheaf of notes, plans and prospectuses, and said that come the first of September, classical music will return to the local lists for another go. "And this time," said Mr. Thornton, who was formerly assistant manager of the erstwhile 'most beautiful music' station, "it's going to work."

Listeners Blamed

In view of the fact that two different station managements had not been able to succeed before, I received this enthusiastic intelligence with a slight touch of caution. For, after all, according to a statement issued by the late station, it had been the listeners themselves who had killed the idea by being so difficult about the advertising they had actually called the advertisers themselves to inform them they wouldn't buy their stuff under any circumstances.

But Mr. Thornton, who was chief of overseas communication for the Mutual network during the war and a former newspaperman and symphony program annotator, is confident this will never happen to him. "People who like and listen to classical music don't really mind advertising," he said. "They haven't any objection to it as such at all. What they do not like, and what they really object to," he went on, "is the ridiculous business of breaking into a movement of, for instance, a Beethoven symphony, to blat about deodorants. That isn't funny. Naturally people are going to be offended."

So on September one, Mr. Thornton, as manager of station WXHR, launches an entirely new format of classical music exclusively, with, he claims, advertising of a most discreet and tasteful nature. "We've sold a lot of it already," he said, "and the buyers have taken it on our own terms." These terms, Mr. Thornton continued, include restrictions against singing commercials, against fading or interrupting music for announcements, and against language or phrases of an undignified nature.

On FM in Evening

The station, which appears to have been on the air for some time now, is a Frequency Modulation station that has hitherto been an outlet for what Mr. Thornton called the Continental Network, an outfit—like WXHR itself—entirely new to me. "You should hear our signal," said Mr. Thornton proudly. "We broadcast from the top of Mt. Zion in Woburn with 5000 watts, and you can hear it as clear as a bell practically all over New England." For the time being, he remarked, the station would be on the air only from 5 o'clock in the evening to 11 at night, but if the listeners respond as he is sure they will, it will extend its broadcasting time to include early afternoon, too.

One of the devices he has developed to help give the classical music station a special impetus is what he calls a Citizen's Committee. This body, whose membership seems to include many of the most influential people in the musical world in this area, will have a sort of paternal interest in the programming of the music and will cock a watchful ear at the quality of the advertising.

Although he realizes the classical music audience is exacting and impatient of errors, he thinks that it is possible to meet the highest standards of programming, comment and advertising content and still make a living at it. The only fly in his ointment at the moment is the fact that there are, so far as is known, only about 85,000 FM receivers in the Boston area. "Of course there are more than 400,000 television receivers in the Boston area now," he added hopefully, "and about 20 per cent of them are equipped with FM tuning bands, so that's another 80,000. If the classical music listeners are still the solid citizens they were when I worked at the other station, they won't mind the small expense involved in converting their AM radios to AM-FM. And even if we get only ten per cent of the FM-equipped listeners, we can keep going nicely."

He gathered up his papers, plans and prospectuses, stuffed them into his brief case, and departed. Well, I hope the old saw that the third time never fails is still in good working order. If others miss a classical music station as much as I do, it should be.

THE BOSTON HERALD
THURSDAY, AUGUST 24, 1950

[128]

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
SEP 8 - 1950

Koussevitzky and Monteux To Conduct BSO This Winter

BOSTON—The only two living former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteux, will conduct during the orchestra's 70th anniversary season this winter, it was announced today.

The invitations have been extended by Charles Munch, who is returning Sept. 20 after a vacation in Switzerland and conducting engagements in France, Belgium and Holland.

The winter season will open in Symphony Hall Friday, Oct. 6, and extend through April 28. The management has announced that the four series of concerts in Boston and the series in other cities will be fully subscribed.

Mr. Munch has announced an all-Beethoven program for the opening of the 70th anniversary season, including the first symphony, the third "Leonore" overture and the "Eroica" symphony, No. 3.

Four Newcomers

Soloists to be heard in the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series include four artists of international reputation who are to appear with this orchestra for the first time. They are Aldo Ciccolini, the 24-year-old Italian pianist, who is about to make his first visit to America. Solomon, the pianist whose tour of last season made so remarkable an impression, will appear with the orchestra, as will another English pianist, Clifford Curzon. A notable singer, Suzanne Danco, completes the list of newcomers.

Familiar from the past seasons are the pianists Rudolf Firkusny and Nicole Henriot, and the violinists Yehudi Menuhin and Ruth Posselt. The soloists for the Sunday afternoon and Tuesday evening series will be announced shortly.

Choral works for the anniversary season are to include two parts of Bach's Christmas oratorio in Christmas week and Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew." New to these concerts will be Stravinsky's "Les Noces."

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
SEP 9 - 1950

Boston Symphony To Open Oct. 6

Charles Munch, who is on vacation in Switzerland after conducting in France, Belgium and Holland, will return to America Sept. 20 to prepare for the 70th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will open in Symphony Hall Friday, Oct. 6, and extend through Apr. 28.

The four series of concerts in Boston and the series in other cities will be fully subscribed. The trustees have tried to compensate the loss of expected income through the non-passage of the federal tax exemption bill by suggesting voluntary contributions from the renewing subscribers.

* * *

MR. MUNCH announces an all-Beethoven program to open the season, including the First Symphony, the Third Leonore Overture and the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3. Mr. Munch will invite the only two former conductors of this orchestra now living to appear as guests, Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteux.

Soloists in the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series include four artists of international reputation who are to appear with this orchestra for the first time.

* * *

THEY ARE Aldo Ciccolini, 24-year-old Italian pianist, who is about to make his first visit to America; Solomon, the pianist whose tour of last season made so remarkable an impression; another English pianist of the highest reputation, Clifford Curzon, and a notable singer, Suzanne Danco.

Familiar from past seasons are the pianists Rudolf Firkusny and Nicole Henriot, the violinists Yehudi Menuhin and Ruth Posselt.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION-REPUBLICAN
SEP 10 1950

BOSTON SYMPHONY LOOKS FORWARD TO ITS 70TH SEASON

Three Pianists to Appear With the Orchestra for First Time

Boston, Sept. 9—Charles Munch, now on vacation in Switzerland after conducting in France, Belgium and Holland, will return to America on the 20th to prepare for the 70th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will open in Symphony Hall on Friday, Oct. 6, and extend through April 28. The four series of concerts in Boston and the series in other cities will be fully subscribed in the orchestra's second season under the eminent French conductor.

The trustees have tried to compensate the loss of expected income through the nonpassage of the federal tax exemption bill by suggesting voluntary contributions from the renewing subscribers. Their almost unanimous response is a gratifying reassurance of good will on the part of the orchestra's audiences.

All Beethoven

Charles Munch announces an all-Beethoven program for the opening of the 70th anniversary season, including the first symphony, the third Leonore overture and the "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3. Mr. Munch will appropriately celebrate the anniversary season by his invitation to the only two former conductors of this orchestra now living to appear as guests. These are Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra for 25 years, and his predecessor, Pierre Monteux.

Soloists to be held in the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series include four artists of international reputation who are to appear with this orchestra for the first time. One is Aldo Cicolini, the Italian pianist, aged 24, who is about to make his first visit to America. Solomon, the pianist whose tour of last season made so remarkable an impression, will appear with this orchestra and likewise another English pianist of the highest

A notable singer is announced, Suzanne Danco. Familiar from past seasons are the pianists Rudolf Firkusny and Nichole Henriot, the violinists Yehudi Menuhin and Ruth Posselt.

Choral works for the anniversary season are to include two parts of Bach's Christmas oratorio in Christmas week and Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew." New to these concerts will be Stravinsky's "Les Noces."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 10 1950

MUNCH RETURNS SOON

Boston, Sept. 9.—(UP)—Charles Munch, who is now on vacation in Switzerland, will return to the United States Sept. 20 to prepare for the opening of his second season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be the orchestra's 70th year.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
SEP 13 1950

Amusement Notes

Mr. Wilson

Amusement Tax Poses Problems For Musicians

Ballet and Theater Business, However, Thrive in Spite Of Such Box Office Hazards.

By Samuel L. Wilson

CROSS country reports on the financial state of the arts continue to make agreeable reading. Since repeal of the federal amusements tax has now to be written off the agenda, the Boston Symphony is asking its subscribers to send in voluntary contributions, over and above the price of tickets, to help cut down an unexpectedly large potential deficit. The Metropolitan's Rudolf Bing has gone so far as to say that our major opera house might have to suspend activity for lack of the around $80,000 added revenue repeal of the tax would have assured it.

On the other hand England's Sadler's Wells Ballet opened at the Metropolitan on Sunday night for through Oct. 1 engagement for which all the best seats were sold early in the summer and the company's national tour is expected to gross in the neighborhood of two million dollars. A one-night stand engagement in Oklahoma City on Nov. 28 was completely sold out by the middle of August. And, then, there's the case of Ethel Merman's new show, "Call Me Madam" which is seemingly destined to have piled up an advance sale of $800,000 by the time it opens its Broadway run on Oct.

The amusement tax will, of course, cut net grosses seriously in the last two instances. But the ballet company is subsidized by the British government, which eases things in that quarter, and "Call Me Madam" likely will have a long enough run to still pay off its backers and come out on top.

ANOTHER item of general interest concerns Maurice Evans' tour in "The Devil's Disciple." Mr. Evans is now on the West Coast and the air has been thick with rumors that he would abandon his tour to co-star with Ethel Barrymore in "Kind Lady" for Metro and then dash back to New York to supervise the drama season at the N. Y. City Center which is to get under way around Christmas.

Variety reported last week that announcement of Mr. Evans' movie committment had been premature. Mr. Evans has made not even tentative agreement to appear in the film and has not seen a script. He's said not to be particularly interested in the role proposed for him. Variety states that so long as the Shaw play, which has a steep overhead, continues to do well at the box-office he'll stay with it and will supervise the City Center project by telephone. Only if his present vehicle goes too deeply in the red will he cancel his tour and head back for Broadway.

EVENING SUN
HANOVER, PA.
Sept. 16, 1950

Charles Munch, who is now on vacation in Switzerland after conducting in France, Belgium and Holland, will return to America on September 20 to prepare for the seventieth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra which will open in Symphony hall on Friday, Oct. 6, and extend through April 28. The four series of concerts in Boston and the series in other cities will be fully subscribed in this, the orchestra's second season under the eminent French conductor.

Charles Munch announces an all-Beethoven program for the opening of the season, including the First Symphony, the Third Leonore Overture and the "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3. Mr. Munch will appropriately celebrate the anniversary by his invitation to the only two former conductors of this orchestra now living to appear as guests. These are Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra for twenty-five years, and his predecessor, Pierre Monteux.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
SEP 18 1950

Biggs' Forthcoming Organ Concerts

E. Power Biggs, the celebrated concert organist, who recently returned from England, where he was invited to give concerts in Westminster Abbey and in the Royal Albert Hall in the London Promenade Concert Season, announces the programs for his forthcoming Monday evening series of concerts in Symphony Hall. He will present on his program for November 6 music of Bach, Handel, Soler, Schumann, Ahlin and Reubke; on November 20, a commemorative Bach program based on a recital given by Felix Mendelssohn, and including music for organ and for organ and brass instruments with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; on December [illegible] solo master-works for organ, Hindemith, Franck, and Christmas Music of Bach, Daquin, Brahms and Dupre.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
SEP 21 1950

George Mager, 65, Trumpet Player

'Golden Voice' of Boston Symphony Orchestra

HOUSATONIC, Mass., Sept. 20 (AP).—George Mager, sixty-five, trumpet player who retired from the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, died today at his home after a long illness.

At the time of Mr. Mager's retirement, Serge Koussevitzky described him as "the golden voice of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." He was for many years solo trumpet player with the orchestra.

Mr. Mager was graduated from the Paris Conservatory of Music with highest honors. During World War I he was captured by the Germans while playing with a French Army band. Mr. Mager taught at the New England Conservatory of Music and at the orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival.

His wife, Claire Mager, and a son, Pierre Mager, survive.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 23 1950

STUDENT CONCERT SERIES

Dress Rehearsal Subscriptions Arranged by Boston Symphony

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Sept. 22—George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today outlined to representatives of fourteen Greater Boston educational institutions a plan for admitting students to dress rehearsals on a subscription series basis.

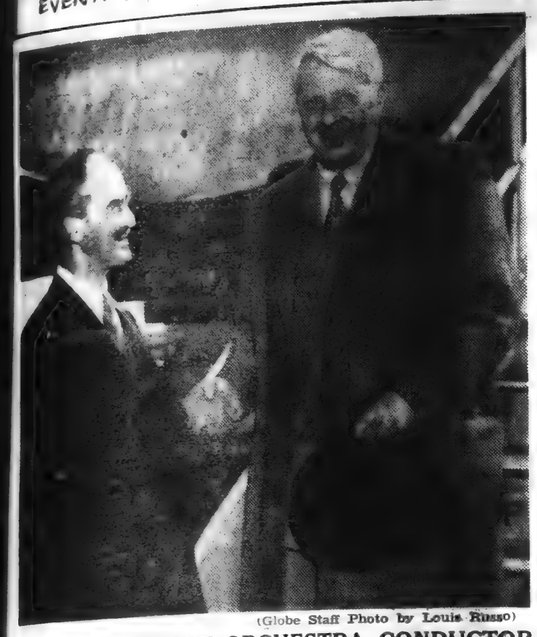
Noting that many students arrived in Boston after all regular concerts had been sold out, Mr. Judd said that beginning this year they may subscribe for a series of five rehearsals for $8.

The 2,631 seats in Symphony Hall, he said, would be unreserved and would be filled by "first come, first seated."

Proceeds of the student series will benefit the orchestra pension fund, he added.

[129]

EVENING GLOBE SEPTEMBER 21, 1950



(Globe Staff Photo by Louis Russo)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR Charles Munch, right, is greeted at airport today by Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony trustees, as musician arrived from Europe.

Munch, Conductor of Symphony, Back

Conductor Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Boston today after an extended conducting tour and vacation in France and Belgium.

He returned on an Air France plane that landed at Logan Airport, East Boston, shortly before noon.

He was greeted at the airport by Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Board of Trustees, and George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, which opens it's 70th season in Symphony Hall on Oct. 6.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 23 1950

OPERA SUBSCRIBERS ASKED TO AID 'MET'

Association Requests 20% of Ticket Prices as Donation in View of Continued Tax

The Metropolitan Opera Association is asking its subscribers for voluntary contributions amounting to 20 per cent of ticket prices, in view of its failure to obtain exemption from the Federal Admissions Tax.

The request, it was announced yesterday, is being made in the form of a letter from George A. Sloan, chairman of the board, and is enclosed with the regular billing for season tickets.

The action was precipitated when it became certain that Congress would not repeal the tax, which also affects such other non-profit, cultural institutions as the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony Orchestras. The latter also has appealed for additional gifts from its subscribers.

Officials of the Metropolitan, Mr. Sloan explained, had planned the season with a reasonable hope that the tax would be repealed before the opera opening on Nov. 6. The estimated savings—approximately $325,000—would have almost exactly equaled the opera's operating deficit of last year.

Calling the subscribers "one of the lasting assets of the Metropolitan Opera Association," Mr. Sloan wrote that the opera had not raised its prices since before the tax was instituted as a war-time measure in 1941.

Explaining the board's "confident expectation" that the tax would be repealed, he added that it was now known that "our exemption will not be restored."

"We hope you will send (this amount) to us as a voluntary gift to meet the emergency," he wrote to the subscribers. "This voluntary gift is deductible as a charitable contribution under the Federal Income Tax Law."

Mr. Sloan described the added revenue as a necessity even if the company's exemption was restored, since it had expended all available funds to meet the deficits of recent years.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
SEP 24 1950

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
SEP 24 1950

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

ANNIVERSARIES are evidently to play an important part in this new music season. Announcements of varied character keep pouring in to remind music lovers of different milestones. Several performing organizations are pointing up their programs by way of celebration.

Most venerable among the organizations is the Boston Symphony. It will chalk up its 70th season this year. To give an historical slant to the event Charles Munch has invited Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitsky as his guest conductors. These men represent the living symbols which have molded the tradition of the Boston Symphony.

Guest Conductor

Though not exactly an anniversary year, the Philadelphia Orchestra starts on its second half century with its first concert on Oct. 6. The orchestra's 51st season will of course be presided over by Eugene Ormandy.

The guest conductors announced are Alexander Hilsberg, Saul Caston, Ernest Ansermet, and Eduard van Breinum, conductor of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra.

The National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C., will observe its 20th anniversary The American-born conductor, Howard Mitchell, has set up a season of three series of concerts which are expected, in the words of press agentry, to be "without parallel as far as variety, originality, and musical content are concerned." Since the orchestra has been given a new lease on life under the stimulus of Mitchell's direction, the national capital may be injecting a progressive note into the life of the country.

20th Anniversary

NEW YORK'S training orchestra, the National Orchestral Association, will celebrate its 20th season. Leon Barzin, its musical director from the start, feels that the need that it met in 1930 is as prevalent today as it was then. Its contribution in the expansion of symphonic activity throughout the country these 20 years has been of inestimable value.

Whether intentional or not the New Friends of Music will mark its 15th season in a most significant manner. Included in its programs devoted to Bach, Haydn and Schubert will be the string quartets of six contemporary American composers: Aaron Copland, Virgil Thomson, Samuel Barber, Ernest Bloch, David Diamond and Roger Sessions.

First Time in History

THIS is the first time in the history of the New Friends that recognition has been given to native composers. The gesture is a most welcome one and a departure in the right direction inasmuch as a great deal of worthwhile chamber music has been written by Americans.

Other anniversaries will doubtless be announced. Among them will be special observance of the 50th anniversary of Verdi's death. Due account has already been taken of it in the announcement that the opening opera of the new Metropolitan season will be "Don Carlos."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
SEP 23 1950

Private Rites Tomorrow for Georges Mager

Retired First Trumpet of BSO Dies in Housatonic

HOUSATONIC—Private funeral services will be held at the Kelly Funeral Home, Lee, tomorrow for Georges Mager, 65-year-old retired first trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died yesterday afternoon at his 80-acre farm, Sky Terrace, following a long illness. Burial also will be private.

Mr. Mager, first trumpet in the BSO for 30 years, retired a month ago following the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of Tanglewood and retired conductor of the BSO, described Mr. Mager as a musician who "covered the orchestra with gold."

Mr. Mager did not appear with the orchestra at the Tanglewood concerts this season because of a serious illness and early in August he fell at his home, suffering a broken hip. He spent a short time at Pittsfield General Hospital and recently returned to his home here.

In 1940 when the Berkshire Festival started to come into its own, Mr. and Mrs. Mager decided to make the Berkshires their home. They started looking around Southern Berkshire for a place and found what they wanted at the old Pixley farm, located about a mile and a half north of this village. They transformed the tumble-down house and abandoned land into an attractive farm and produced with their own hands all the food they could eat.

Tenor-Soprano Team

Before World War I, Mr. and Mrs. Mager were a well-known tenor-soprano team in France. As a singer, he won first prize at the Paris Conservatory of Music in 1906. Mrs. Mager studied there also, and later was a member of the Opera Comique in Paris.

While on tour in 1919 with a French Army band, Mr. Mager was engaged by the BSO. For one year he played the viola and then took the first trumpet chair.

Along with his BSO work, he taught at the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston University and the Longy School of Music in Cambridge. He had also instructed scores of private pupils, many of whom have gone on to jobs in symphony orchestras throughout the country.

His summer pupils worked with him for 10 years at Tanglewood and in his studio here.

Besides his wife, Claire, Mr. Mager is survived by a son, Pierre, of Boston.

Instead of sending flowers, the family has requested that friends send donations in Mr. Mager's memory to the Peabody Home for Crippled Children.

Boston's Temple of Glory

Symphony Hall's Story Set Down by "A Bostonian by Conviction"

Symphony Hall, Boston, by H. Earle Johnson: Little, Brown and Co., $6.

This voluminous book contains the story of the red brick temple at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts aves., for 50 years the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and as characteristic a part of our city as the Common and Public Garden. The story has been told, on the whole very well, by H. Earle Johnson, born in Connecticut but "a Bostonian by conviction," and, by occupation, an assistant professor of music at Clark University in Worcester.

Symphony Hall is a monument to Maj Henry Lee Higginson's devotion to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded and for so long maintained, and to the spirit of the citizens who subscribed the $750,000 to build it. In half a century, Symphony Hall also has become a tradition and, to those except sports followers, the best-known of all Boston's public gathering places.

Built at the turn of the century specifically to house the Boston Symphony, the hall was designed by the architectural firm of McKim, Mead and White, after the Gewandhaus in Leipzig, Ger. The first major work to be performed there was Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, at a special pre-season concert, when the two most expensive series seats, purchased at auction through a broker for the still fabulous amount of $1120, were occupied by Mrs. Jack Gardner and the local pianist, George Proctor.

As a musician, Mr. Johnson naturally devotes by far the greater part of his book to the concerts of the Boston Symphony. There is also a section on the Pops, and a chapter on the personalities who have given miscellaneous independent concerts at Symphony Hall over 50 years.

Symphony Hall came eventually to lead a double life, and it has seen and heard lectures, banquets, balls, college commencements, political rallies, religious services, plays, movies, book fairs, cooking schools and even, in the early years, automobile shows.

As aforesaid, Mr. Johnson's work is good, but I noticed that he was a little casual about including dates and other specific details, and that his style is often a little prissy and frequently fancy, as witness his paragraph on the death of H. T. Parker.

There are valuable indices of compositions played by the Boston Symphony from 1881 through 1949, of soloists with the orchestra, of orchestras from other cities which have visited Symphony Hall, a selected list of concert artists, and the specifications of the new organ. But, sadly, there is no general index.

This story has had to be mainly factual, but there are touches of color and humor, notably the battle of the women's tall hats in 1908, led by Mrs. Jack Gardner and a few others. The same Mrs. Gardner was a baseball fan, and in 1904 arrived late at a Friday concert, wearing a hat adorned with a red band and the sentence: "O you Red Sox!"

—CYRUS DURGIN.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
SEP 23 1950

Story of Boston Portrays a Gr

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON, by H. Earle Johnson, Little, Brown & Co., $6.

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The chronicle of events, musical mainly, but also forensic, balletic, histrionic, political, cultural and some not easily pigeonholed, which took place in Symphony Hall in Boston since its construction 50 years ago is a history of American life during the half-century just passed. It has a double interest for residents of this section, who from their acquaintance and contacts with Tanglewood know and recognize so many of the personalities involved.

Of course, the Boston Symphony Orchestra supplies most of the material which is here recorded, and while much of it, especially the last decade and more, is familiar to many of us, the skilful job that Professor Johnson does makes it fascinating in its revival. The Koussevitzky era, naturally, consumes a half of the orchestra's pages, but the names which appear for the first quarter century are equally as evocative of memories for those capable of recalling that epoch as they should be of traditions for those to whom they can be but matters of history.

It seems incredible now that it should ever have been such major items of importance to request the audience, the ladies, to be sure, not to wear hats (and what hats!) during concerts, or to detain that part of the audience at the doors which arrived after the music had started. And the hats and gloves that the artists themselves wore, at least the female vocalists!

Some Famous Names

Henry Cabot Lodge, Theodore Roosevelt, Isadora Duncan, Conan Doyle, the great traveloguers Elmendorf Newman and Burton Holmes, the unprecedented success of [illegible] Sergeant Guy Empey, Sir Philip Gibbs, Gilbert K. Chesterton, H. G. Wells, Margot Asquith, Ellen Terry, Michael J. Curley, are only a few of the names and events of nostalgic interest in the book.

At the very outset, Professor Johnson speaks of one "W. Murray Crane who in 1900 succeeded Roger Wolcott in Mr. Bullfinch's beautifully designed State House." The musical history as it is here related is enhanced by many quotations from Boston's two outstanding critics of the day, indeed, of two of the outstanding men in the history of American musical letters, H. T. Parker and Philip Hale. It seems, though, that the quotations, when favorable, are selected to fortify the importance of the event or the personality, and, on occasion, to cast an amused, mildly scornful spotlight on the critics.

The parade of famous men and women who in one capacity or another trod the boards of Symphony Hall over these 50 years is a formidable one and the book, if for no other reason, merits attention on that score as a lesson in contemporary cultural history. The incidents which two world wars excited are tremendously absorbing now in retrospect. The address to the Symphony men by the orchestra's founder, Maj. Higginson, at the start of the 1914 season, when he was within a month of his 80th birthday, bears repetition today: "We meet again under difficult circumstances. We are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we are all on American soil. . . . Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words . . . for our task is to make harmony . . . Musical forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensible. Without it the orchestra cannot live."

[130]

EVENING GLOBE SEPTEMBER 21, 1950

(Globe Staff Photo by Louis Russo)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR Charles Munch, right, is greeted at airport today by Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony trustees, as musician arrived from Europe.

Munch, Conductor of Symphony, Back

Conductor Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Boston today after an extended conducting tour and vacation in France and Belgium.

He returned on an Air France plane that landed at Logan Airport, East Boston, shortly before noon.

He was greeted at the airport by Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Board of Trustees, and George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, which opens it's 70th season in Symphony Hall on Oct. 6.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 23 1950

OPERA SUBSCRIBERS ASKED TO AID 'MET'

Association Requests 20% of Ticket Prices as Donation in View of Continued Tax

The Metropolitan Opera Association is asking its subscribers for voluntary contributions amounting to 20 per cent of ticket prices, in view of its failure to obtain exemption from the Federal Admissions Tax.

The request, it was announced yesterday, is being made in the form of a letter from George A. Sloan, chairman of the board, and is enclosed with the regular billing for season tickets.

The action was precipitated when it became certain that Congress would not repeal the tax, which also affects such other non-profit cultural institutions as the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony Orchestras. The latter also has appealed for additional gifts from its subscribers.

Officials of the Metropolitan, Mr. Sloan explained, had planned the season with a reasonable hope that the tax would be repealed before the opera opening on Nov. 6. The estimated savings—approximately $325,000—would have almost exactly equaled the opera's operating deficit of last year.

Calling the subscribers "one of the lasting assets of the Metropolitan Opera Association," Mr. Sloan wrote that the opera had not raised its prices since before the tax was instituted as a war-time measure in 1941.

Explaining the board's "confident expectation" that the tax would be repealed, he added that it was now known that "our exemption will not be restored."

"We hope you will send (this amount) to us as a voluntary gift to meet the emergency," he wrote to the subscribers. "This voluntary gift is deductible as a charitable contribution under the Federal Income Tax Law."

Mr. Sloan described the added revenue as a necessity even if the company's exemption was restored, since it had expended all available funds to meet the deficits of recent years.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
SEP 24 1950

Boston's Temple of Glory

Symphony Hall's Story Set Down by "A Bostonian by Conviction"

Symphony Hall, Boston, by H. Earle Johnson: Little, Brown and Co., $6.

This voluminous book contains the story of the red brick temple at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts aves., for 50 years the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and as characteristic a part of our city as the Common and Public Garden. The story has been told, on the whole very well, by H. Earle Johnson, born in Connecticut but "a Bostonian by conviction" and, by occupation, an assistant professor of music at Clark University in Worcester.

Symphony Hall is a monument to Maj Henry Lee Higginson's devotion to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded and for so long maintained, and to the spirit of the citizens who subscribed the $750,000 to build it. In half a century, Symphony Hall also has become a tradition and, to those except sports followers, the best-known of all Boston's public gathering places.

Built at the turn of the century specifically to house the Boston Symphony, the hall was designed by the architectural firm of McKim, Mead and White, after the Gewandhaus in Leipzig, Ger. The first major work to be performed there was Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, at a special pre-season concert, when the two most expensive series seats, purchased at auction through a broker for the still fabulous amount of $1120, were occupied by Mrs. Jack Gardner and the local pianist, George Proctor.

As a musician, Mr. Johnson naturally devotes by far the greater part of his book to the concerts of the Boston Symphony. There is also a section on the Pops and a chapter on the personalities who have given miscellaneous independent concerts at Symphony Hall over 50 years.

Symphony Hall came eventually to lead a double life, and it has seen and heard lectures, banquets, balls, college commencements, political rallies, religious services, plays, movies, book fairs, cooking schools and even, in the early years, automobile shows.

As aforesaid, Mr. Johnson's work is good, but I noticed that he was a little casual about including dates and other specific details, and that his style is often a little prissy and frequently fancy, as witness his paragraph on the death of H. T. Parker.

There are valuable indices of compositions played by the Boston Symphony from 1881 through 1949, of soloists with the orchestra, of orchestras from other cities which have visited Symphony Hall, a selected list of concert artists, and the specifications of the new organ. But, sadly, there is no general index.

This story has had to be mainly factual, but there are touches of color and humor, notably the battle of the women's tall hats in 1908, led by Mrs. Jack Gardner and a few others. The same Mrs. Gardner was also a baseball fan, and in 1904 arrived late at a Friday concert, wearing a hat adorned with a red band and the sentence: "O you Red Sox!"

—CYRUS DURGIN.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
SEP 24 1950

MUSIC -:- By Miles Kastendieck

ANNIVERSARIES are evidently to play an important part in this new music season. Announcements of varied character keep pouring in to remind music lovers of different milestones. Several performing organizations are pointing up their programs by way of celebration.

Most venerable among the organizations is the Boston Symphony. It will chalk up its 70th season this year. To give an historical slant to the event Charles Munch has invited Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitsky as his guest conductors. These men represent the living symbols which have molded the tradition of the Boston Symphony.

Guest Conductor

Though not exactly an anniversary year, the Philadelphia Orchestra starts on its second half century with its first concert on Oct. 6. The orchestra's 51st season will of course be presided over by Eugene Ormandy.

The guest conductors announced are Alexander Hilsberg, Saul Caston, Ernest Ansermet, and Eduard van Breinum, conductor of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra.

The National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C., will observe its 20th anniversary The American-born conductor, Howard Mitchell, has set up a season of three series of concerts which are expected, in the words of press agentry, to be "without parallel as far as variety, originality, and musical content are concerned." Since the orchestra has been given a new lease on life under the stimulus of Mitchell's direction, the national capital may be injecting a progressive note into the life of the country.

20th Anniversary

NEW YORK'S training orchestra, the National Orchestral Association, will celebrate its 20th season. Leon Barzin, its musical director from the start, feels that the need that it met in 1930 is as prevalent today as it was then. Its contribution in the expansion of symphonic activity throughout the country these 20 years has been of inestimable value.

Whether intentional or not the New Friends of Music will mark its 15th season in a most significant manner. Included in its programs devoted to Bach, Haydn and Schubert will be the string quartets of six contemporary American composers: Aaron Copland, Virgil Thomson, Samuel Barber, Ernest Bloch, David Diamond and Roger Sessions.

First Time in History

THIS is the first time in the history of the New Friends that recognition has been given to native composers. The gesture is a most welcome one and a departure in the right direction inasmuch as a great deal of worthwhile chamber music has been written by Americans.

Other anniversaries will doubtless be announced. Among them will be special observance of the 50th anniversary of Verdi's death. Due account has already been taken of it in the announcement that the opening opera of the new Metropolitan season will be "Don Carlos."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
SEP 23 1950

Story of Boston Symphony Portrays a Golden Era

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON, by H. Earle Johnson, Little, Brown & Co., $6.

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The chronicle of events, musical mainly, but also forensic, balletic, histrionic, political, cultural and some not easily pigeonholed, which took place in Symphony Hall in Boston since its construction 50 years ago is a history of American life during the half-century just passed. It has a double interest for residents of this section, who from their acquaintance and contacts with Tanglewood know and recognize so many of the personalities involved.

Of course, the Boston Symphony Orchestra supplies most of the material which is here recorded, and while much of it, especially the last decade and more, is familiar to many of us, the skilful job that Professor Johnson does makes it fascinating in its revival. The Koussevitzky era, naturally, consumes a half of the orchestra's pages, but the names which appear for the first quarter century are equally as evocative of memories for those capable of recalling that epoch as they should be of traditions for those to whom they can be but matters of history.

It seems incredible now that it should ever have been such major items of importance to request the audience, the ladies, to be sure, not to wear hats (and what hats!) during concerts, or to detain that part of the audience at the doors which arrived after the music had started. And the hats and gloves that the artists themselves wore, at least the female vocalists!

Some Famous Names

Henry Cabot Lodge, Theodore Roosevelt, Isadora Duncan, Conan Doyle, the great traveloguers Elmendorf Newman and Burton Holmes, the unprecedented success of John McCormack, the choral societies, the "Pops," Sergeant Guy Empey, Sir Philip Gibbs, Gilbert K. Chesterton, H. G. Wells, Margot Asquith, Ellen Terry, Michael J. Curley, are only a few of the names and events of nostalgic interest in the book.

At the very outset, Professor Johnson speaks of one "W. Murray Crane who in 1900 succeeded Roger Wolcott in Mr. Bullfinch's beautifully designed State House." The musical history as it is here related is enhanced by many quotations from Boston's two outstanding critics of the day, indeed, of two of the outstanding men in the history of American musical letters, H. T. Parker and Philip Hale. It seems, though, that the quotations, when favorable, are selected to fortify the importance of the event or the personality, and, on occasion, to cast an amused, mildly scornful spotlight on the critics.

The parade of famous men and women who in one capacity or another trod the boards of Symphony Hall over these 50 years is a formidable one and the book, if for no other reason, merits attention on that score as a lesson in contemporary cultural history. The incidents which two world wars excited are tremendously absorbing now in retrospect. The address to the Symphony men by the orchestra's founder, Maj. Higginson, at the start of the 1914 season, when he was within a month of his 80th birthday, bears repetition today: "We meet again under difficult circumstances. We are of many nationalities, including Americans, and we are all on American soil. . . . Therefore, we must use every effort to avoid all unpleasant words . . . for our task is to make harmony . . . Musical forbearance and respect toward each other is absolutely indispensible. Without it the orchestra cannot live."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
SEP 21 1950

Private Rites Tomorrow for Georges Mager

Retired First Trumpet of BSO Dies in Housatonic

HOUSATONIC—Private funeral services will be held at the Kelly Funeral Home, Lee, tomorrow for Georges Mager, 65-year-old retired first trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died yesterday afternoon at his 80-acre farm, Sky Terrace, following a long illness. Burial also will be private.

Mr. Mager, first trumpet in the BSO for 30 years, retired a month ago following the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of Tanglewood and retired conductor of the BSO, described Mr. Mager as a musician who "covered the orchestra with gold."

Mr. Mager did not appear with the orchestra at the Tanglewood concerts this season because of a serious illness and early in August he fell at his home, suffering a broken hip. He spent a short time at Pittsfield General Hospital and recently returned to his home here.

In 1940 when the Berkshire Festival started to come into its own, Mr. and Mrs. Mager decided to make the Berkshires their home. They started looking around Southern Berkshire for a place and found what they wanted at the old Pixley farm, located about a mile and a half north of this village. They transformed the tumbledown house and abandoned land into an attractive farm and produced with their own hands all the food they could eat.

Tenor-Soprano Team

Before World War I, Mr. and Mrs. Mager were a well-known tenor-soprano team in France. As a singer, he won first prize at the Paris Conservatory of Music in 1906. Mrs. Mager studied there also, and later was a member of [illegible] and more cynical era. How much ing. This is another era, a g in terms of friendship and un[illegible]y well-intentioned but profoundly [illegible]t downright silly. Much of it was [illegible]ng, some of it blindly fanatical. [illegible] of this was supercilious and con[illegible]ith pennies for foreign missions [illegible]om my own childhood—filled mit[illegible]ican children—how well I remem[illegible] them in Asia.

[130]

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

The Hall That Grows in Boston

The Bookshelf

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON, by H. Earle Johnson. (Boston: Little, Brown & Company. $5.)

If you have just read the definitive biography of a great contemporary with whom you thought you were well acquainted anyway, meeting him again will be a memorable experience. So it will be with new eyes that we shall see Symphony Hall when the doors open this fall. For some time we may have difficulty concentrating on the music, while we look up to see whether Mayor Curley's campaign balloons of the early nineteen hundreds have finally come down from the ceiling, whether the Greek statues in the niches—quite apart from their acoustical value—really deserved Isadora Duncan's derision, and wondering whether the drafty door which stopped Paderewski in the middle of a Liszt transcription will do the same to Horowitz!

It is a most intimate and revealing biography that Mr. Johnson, a professor of music at Clark University, has given us. Yet more important even than the numberless anecdotes brimful with nostalgia is the beautifully handled procession of musical high lights and "low lights" which have shone and flickered in that remarkable building, season after season, since the year 1900. With what admirable consistency the author remains "objective"; as a true historian he almost invariably allows the praising or the damning to come from the pens of the critics of the day, or through the reaction of the audience. (How clearly do the personalities of H. T. P. and Philip Hale emerge while the wagging of the feathery hats at Stravinsky's "Rite" becomes almost unbearably visual!) "Fortunate the posterity," writes Mr. Johnson, "which may, in a measure, relive a concert by reading the initial impression written with the dew of freshness upon it."

When Nelson Eddy gave a recital at Symphony Hall in the thirties, a lady listener was overheard to ask "do you suppose that is the place where they have those symphony concerts?" Proving her assumption correct, the author offers us a musical and personal history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which is as absorbing as a fine novel. Even though the book was written at the recommendation of the trustees, and some of the tenser episodes in the conductor-orchestra relationship are glossed over a bit, one never has the impression of a stiff and "official" history, thanks to the writer's witty and often meaningful understatements.

When this first printing is sold out (which should happen almost immediately) one hopes the publishers can be persuaded to include in the next edition a set of portraits of all conductors thus far, of Major Higginson, the founder, of such stalwarts as Richard Burgin, and such great critics as Hale and Parker. The present four illustrations are hardly sufficient. Of great usefulness are the six appendices: (All works performed, by composer, with dates; conductors and guest conductors; soloists with the orchestra; visiting orchestras; artists appearing in Symphony Hall, and the specifications of the new organ.) Yet the need for a general index, with references to the text itself, is often badly missed. A few factual mistakes as to dates and titles do not materially detract from the astonishing accuracy of the research.

What the Hall has come to mean to Bostonians, proper or otherwise, is well understood when one reads of the incredible variety of events to which it has been host: from McCormack to Houdini, from Farrar to an Automobile Show (in 1903); even sessions of a cooking school! Most significant of all perhaps is the appearance of great artists like Roland Hayes, and the meteoric rise of such natural talents as Leonard Bernstein. Contemporary music was fostered from the time of Major Higginson and almost all conductors; for its progress Symphony Hall often became "a laboratory and a workshop." The grace with which the "Koussewitzky Era" is now merging with the "Munch Era" is merely another tribute to the stability of the Hall's living tradition. M. A. DeWolfe Howe is not exaggerating when he writes, in his charming introduction: "The present volume may be taken as a contribution to the general history of music in America . . . what indeed is the universal in history but a broad synthesis of the local?"

KLAUS G. ROY

Two pages of book reviews appear each Saturday in the Magazine Section.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR SEPT. 23, 1950

New Student Symphony Series

A preview of a new chapter in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given by its manager, George E. Judd, yesterday to representatives of 14 Greater Boston educational institutions, who attended a luncheon at the Harvard Club as the orchestra's guests.

Explaining the new move, Mr. Judd told of the problem confronting the symphony-minded student who finds all of the orchestra's concerts fully subscribed. As the result of strong student sentiment, Mr. Judd said, a plan is being worked out which for the first time would give Greater Boston college and conservatory students a Boston Symphony Orchestra subscription series of their own in Symphony Hall. On the historic pattern of the "public rehearsals" which became the present-day Friday matinees, the student series will be dress rehearsals. They will offer the interest of concert performance mingled with occasional glimpses of the working methods of the conductor, Charles Munch, in preparing a performance.

Spaced about a month apart, there will be five evening programs, and the series ticket is to be set at $8, including the tax. The 2,631 seats in Symphony Hall are to be apportioned on an equitable basis among the eligible institutions. Further, to assure an equitable result, tickets will be unreserved. Thus, individual preference in location—as to sitting downstairs, or in the first or second balcony, nearer to or farther from the stage, or on a side—may be settled on the basis of first come, first served.

The plan was enthusiastically received by the students at the luncheon. Besides settling a student problem, the new series will benefit the Pension Fund of the orchestra.

Heifetz, Rubinstein, Jan Peerce, Isaac Stern, and Malcuzynski.

NEW YORK TIMES SEPT. 23, 1950

STUDENT CONCERT SERIES

Dress Rehearsal Subscriptions Arranged by Boston Symphony

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Sept. 22—George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today outlined to representatives of fourteen Greater Boston educational institutions a plan for admitting students to dress rehearsals on a subscription series basis.

Noting that many students arrived in Boston after all regular concerts had been sold out, Mr. Judd said that beginning this year they may subscribe for a series of five rehearsals for $8.

The 2,631 seats in Symphony Hall, he said, would be unreserved and would be filled by "first come, first seated."

Proceeds of the student series will benefit the orchestra pension fund, he added.

, SEPTEMBER 27, 1950 Art—Music—Theater 5

Preview of Symphony Season

Geoffrey Landesman

Charles Munch, who will open his second season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, Oct. 6, in Symphony Hall.

New Works by Americans To Be Played by Munch

By Harold Rogers

There was an air of easy late-afternoon informality in Charles Munch's green room in Symphony Hall. Members of the press were seated in a large circle while the genial maestro presided at the western end — the glow of an autumn sun lighted the windows behind him. He told us, in English that is still very close to his French, something of what he had in store for the Boston Symphony concerts this season.

But before launching into the high lights of new works, revivals, choral works, and soloists, there is an incident worth reporting that takes precedence, as far as I am concerned, over all of these—however exciting they may be in prospect.

It was like finding a pearl in an oasis of sand—a little thing, easily passed over, yet priceless. Mr. Munch had concluded the formal part of his interview; the photographers had finished their chores; the guests drew into smaller groups for chatting. Then Mr. Munch turned informally to two of those present.

"I tell you," Mr. Munch began impulsively, his voice subdued, intense, "the Boston Symphony Orchestra is — is a marvelous thing. It is a great institution. There is nothing like it that I know. The personalities—Gericke, Nikisch, all of them — they will come and they will go. I will go. But the Boston Symphony—it will not go. We will go, but it will stay. It will stay the same."

* * *

Now to return to the high lights of the new season, to open Friday afternoon, Oct. 6. Mr. Munch will devote the first concert to Beethoven—the "Fidelio" Overture, the First Symphony, and, after the intermission, the "Eroica." Symphony patrons will be interested in Mr. Munch's policy to repeat no works played last season.

For his second pair of weekend concerts, Mr. Munch will present Rudolf Firkusny as soloist in Martinů's Third Piano Concerto. Handel's "Royal Fireworks" Music; Honegger's Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude from "Amphion," and the César Franck Symphony in D minor will fill out the program.

Among new works planned this season, which include the Honegger already mentioned, are to be found Peter Mennin's Third Symphony, Lukas Foss's Oboe Concerto, David Diamond's Third Symphony, and Samuel Barber's Second Symphony (revised version).

* * *

There is much of interest among the revivals. These include Walter Piston's Third Symphony; Bartók's Divertimento No. 9 and Piece for Strings and Percussion; Mahler's Fourth Symphony (with Erna Berger, perhaps, as soloist); Martinů's Double Concerto for Two String Orchestras, Piano, and Timpani; Schumann's Concert Piece for Four Horns and from Schönberg, either the Kammer-symphonie No. 1, or Pelleas and Melisande."

Other revivals include Stravinsky's "Pulcinella," Debussy's "Printemps," Reger's Mozart Variations, Ravel's "Sheherazade" to be sung by Suzanne Danco, and Vincent D'Indy's Second Symphony. The D'Indy work will commemorate the centennial of the composer's birth (March 27, 1851).

* * *

Among the choral works selected by Mr. Munch will be four cantatas from Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio, the Berlioz Requiem, Stravinsky's "Les Noces," Schubert's Mass in G, and Honegger's "Danse des Morts." In the spring Mr. Munch will produce the first act of Wagner's "Die Walküre."

The soloists, aside from those already mentioned, will be Yehudi Menuhin, Solomon (in the Brahms Piano Concerto in B-flat), Aldo Ciccolini (in the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto), Ruth Paselt, and Nicole Henriot.

When Mr. Munch had completed his announcements, he unveiled a scale model of the Symphony Hall stage, executed by Edward Charron, superintendent. He pointed out his new seating arrangement for the musicians — not materially different, so far as the placement of the instruments is concerned, from what he had last year. But the violins and violas will all sit on the floor level. The cellos will be on shallow platforms. The remainder of the chairs will stand on risers, though not so high as heretofore. The musicians will still be seen by those seated in the main floor. The sound, according to Mr. Munch, will be vastly improved.

Boston Symphony To Open Friday

SEP 30 1950

The 70th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon. Beethoven's First and Third Symphonies and "Fidelio" overture are on the program.

New works scheduled to be introduced to Boston this season will be Honegger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude and the Third Piano Concerto of Martinu, with Firkusny as soloist. Charles Munch, conductor, is considering the Third Symphony by Walter Piston, the Fifth by Peter Mennin, the Third by David Diamond, Samuel Barber's revision of his Second Symphony and the Oboe Concerto by Lukas Foss for performance in the course of the season.

Also upon his intended list is Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion. Martinu's Concerto for Two String Orchestras with Piano, Ravel's "Scheherazade," Mahler's Fourth Symphony and Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben." Music seldom heard is the early "Printemps" of Debussy and Schumann's Piece for Four Horns and Orchestra. He will remember the 100th anniversary of the birth of Vincent D'Indy next March with a performance of that composer's Second Symphony.

Choral works will include: Bach's Christmas Oratorio (four parts) and St. Matthew Passion, Berlios' Requiem, Schubert's Mass in G, Honegger's "Danse des Morts" and Stravinsky's "Les Noces."

Every series in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, New York and Brooklyn is completely subscribed. The orchestra will make a tour westward in the third week of the season.

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE OCTOBER

Three Orch... The Ac...

All-B... Mun...

By C...

Charles M... Immaculate ...

Beethoven's ... in the openin... three orchestra... home seasons ... Munch will ... Symphony's ... Friday after... night with ... the overture ... first and third ... same dates. ... opens the Phila... fifty-first year ... "Leonore" overture ... symphony, follow... from Wagner's ... Isolde." The fifth ... George Szell's in... gram for the Cle... thirty-third season ... night, following B... Variations, Debu... of a Faun" and ... Cleveland, the late ... sella's "Paganini...

In his second ... and 14, Mr. Mun... Honegger's Prel... Postlude and ... third piano con... Rudolf Firkusny ... Mr. Munch is con... ties for this season. ... third symphony, P... fifth symphony, Dav... third symphony, Sam... second symphony, in ... form, and Lukas Foss ... certo. Vincent ... symphony will be play... to commemorate the ... tenary.

The Philharmonic ...

HOUSTON, TEX. POST

SEP 12 1950

Symphony In 70th Boston Season Oct 6

BOSTON, Sept 11—(Sp)—Charles Munch, who is now on vacation in Switzerland after conducting in France, Belgium and Holland, will return to America Sept 20 to prepare for the 70th Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will open in Symphony Hall Oct 6 and extend through April 28.

The four series of concerts in Boston and the series in other cities will be fully subscribed in this, the orchestra's second season under the eminent French conductor.

The trustees have tried to compensate the loss of expected income, due to the non-passage of the federal tax exemption bill, by suggesting voluntary contributions from the renewing subscribers. Their almost unanimous response is a gratifying reassurance of good will on the part of the orchestra's audiences.

Mr Munch has announced an all-Beethoven program for the opening of the 70th Anniversary Season, including the First Symphony, the Third "Leonore" Overture and the "Eroica" Symphony, Number 3.

Munch will appropriately celebrate the anniversary season by his invitation to the only two former conductors of this orchestra now living to appear as guests. These are Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra for 25 years, and his predecessor, Pierre Monteux.

Munch's Plans ... or Season

Charles Munch, who ... oston Sept. 21 by ... aris to prepare for t... ason of the Boston ... rchestra, has ... usical plans for his ... n as the orchestra's ... he 70th season of t... ymphony Orchestra ... ymphony Hall next F... on.

New works schedule... oduced to Boston will ... r's Prelude, Fugue a... d the Third Piano C... artinu, with Firkusny ... r. Munch ... is consi... hird Symphony by ... the Fifth by Peter ... hird by David Diamon... arber's revision of h... ymphony and the Obo... Lukas Foss for per... e course of the sea... on his intended list is ... usic for Strings and Pe... artinu's Concerto f... ring Orchestras with P... l's "Sheherazade" ... urth Symphony and ... in Heldenleben." Mu... rd is the only ... bussy and Schu... Four Horns and ... He will remember ... niversary of the birth ... ndy next March ... rmance of ... ond Symphony ... l include: ... atorio (... tthew Pa... liem, Schu... lonegger's ... nd Stravinsky ... Rehearsals ...

[131]

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 116,020) (S 381,517)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
SEP 26 1950

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 2,674)
This Clipping From
MORRISTOWN, TENN.
SEP 26 SUN 1950

All-Beethoven for Opener; Munch Plans No Repeats

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch, handsome and immaculate as ever, and newly returned from France, invited the press in yesterday afternoon to discuss his plans for the 70th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin Friday, Oct. 6.

He announced first of all, as he sat at his graceful, inlaid table in the conductor's room at Symphony Hall, that the opening program will be devoted to Beethoven; the "Fidelio" Overture and the First and "Eroica" Symphonies.

At the second pair of concerts in the Friday-Saturday series, Mr. Munch will conduct Handel's "Royal Firworks" Music; Honegger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude from "Amphion"; Martinu's Third Piano Concerto with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and the Cesar Franck D minor Symphony.

* * *

Mr. Munch also announced a rule for the programs which will work for freshness and novelty: he will repeat nothing that he performed last season.

Some of the highlights to come are four cantatas of Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio for the holiday time, and the "St. Matthew Passion" at Easter; Stravinsky's "Les Noces," Honegger's "Le Danse des Morts," the Mass in G of Schubert and the gigantic Requiem of Berlioz.

Among the new American music will be first performance of David Diamond's Third Symphony, Lukas Foss' Oboe Concerto, the Fifth Symphony by Peter Mennin, a revised version of Samuel Barber's Second Symphony. Walter Piston's Third Symphony will also be heard.

Other projected works are the Fourth Symphony of Mahler, perhaps with Erna Berger as soprano soloist; Reger's Mozart Variations, the Divertimento No. 9 and Piece for Strings and Percussion by Bartok, and either the Kammersymphonie No. 1 or the "Pelleas and Melisande" by Schoenberg; Martinu's Concerto for Two String Orchestras, Piano and Tympani; the first act of Wagner's "Die Waukuere" (in the Spring, singers not announced). Vaughan Williams' Thomas Tallis Fantasy; the B-flat Symphony of D'Indy in honor of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth, Stravinsky's "Pulcinella," Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and Debussy's early "Printemps." There will also be a Schumann Concerto for four horns.

Long dissatisfied with the high platforms of the orchestra's seating plan, Mr. Munch has worked out a new arrangement, which he displayed in a charming scale model of wood made by Symphony Hall's superintendent, Edward Charron. Under this arrangement, the violins and violas will be on the flat stage with the rest of the orchestra placed on risers varying from three to 15 inches in height. This, the conductor believes, will produce a finer, more compact tone.

Mr. Munch has solved another problem, that of the student demand for tickets which far exceeds the capacity of any of the usual series by scheduling a series of five Thursday evening rehearsals. These will cost $8 for the series, all unreserved seats, and they literally will be rehearsals. The income derived will benefit the pension fund.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony, will lead the orchestra in November, two weeks in Boston and one in New York. His programs will include, probably, the Boston premiere of Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony and the Bruckner Seventh Symphony. Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor for a week in January.

The soloists will include violinist Yehudi Menuhin, pianist Solomon in the Brahms B-flat Concerto; pianist Aldo Ciccolini, Italian and new here, in the Tchaikovsky Concerto; soprano Suzanne Dancos in Ravel's "Scheherazade," pianist Nicole Henriot and violinist Ruth Posselt.

Major Symphonies Are Dismayed At Congressional Tax Failure

NEW YORK, Sept. 23 (UP)—The major symphony orchestras and the Metropolitican Opera Company are entering the new season dismayed by the failure of Congress to repeal the 20 per cent federal admission tax, which it had been expected to do.

The season will go ahead as planned but in the face of mounting costs, managements are tearing their hair over the problem of finances. Rudolf Bing, new general manager of the Metropolitan was extremely gloomy on his return from a talent-scouting journey to Europe.

It is a "matter of life and death" to the Metropolitan, he said, without comming up with any suggestion of how the opera is tosurvive.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced it would try to make ends meet by suggesting voluntary contributions from renewing subscribers. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony has made no announcement as yet, nor has the Philadelphia Orchestra. The latter revealed that it had made a new two-year contract with the musicians' union which provides a minimun salary of $10 a week for the musicians, plus liberal sick benefits.

No Curtailment

Regardless of deficits, there has been no sign of curtailing season plans already made. The Philadelphia Orchestra, under Eugene Ormandy, will give its regular subscription series ar home, plus student, children's and pension fund concerts, in addition to ten concerts in New York, eight in Washington, six in Baltimere, two in Richmond and Harrisburg, six-concert festivals in Worchester, Mass., and Ann Arbor, Mich., and single concerts in nine other cities. The Philadelphians will have their usual quota of noted instrumental and vocal soloists.

The Bostonians, now under Charles Munch, also will have a list of famous soloists. The season will open with an tll-Beethoven program. This being the orchestra's 70th anniversary, Munch has invited as guest conductors the only two former leaders of the orchestra now living—Sergevitsky, conductor for 25 years, and Pierre Monteux, his predecessor. Koussevitsky, conductor for 25 years, and Pierre Monteux, his predecessor.

All-Beethoven for Opener; Munch Plans No Repeats

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch, handsome and [illegible] as ever, and newly returned from France, invited the press in yesterday afternoon to discuss his plans for the 70th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin Friday, Oct. 6.

He announced first of all, as he sat at his graceful, inlaid table in the conductor's room at Symphony Hall, that the opening program will be devoted to Beethoven; the "Fidelio" Overture and the First and "Eroica" Symphonies.

At the second pair of concerts in the Friday-Saturday series, Mr. Munch will conduct Handel's "Royal Firworks" Music; Honegger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude from "Amphion"; Martinu's Third Piano Concerto with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and the Cesar Franck D minor Symphony.

Mr. Munch also announced a rule for the programs which will work for freshness and novelty: he will repeat nothing that he performed last season.

Some of the highlights to come are four cantatas of Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio for the holiday time, and the "St. Matthew Passion" at Easter; Stravinsky's "Les Noces," Honegger's "Le Danse des Morts," the Mass in G of Schubert and the gigantic Requiem of Berlioz.

Among the new American music will be first performance of David Diamond's Third Symphony, Lukas Foss' Oboe Concerto, the Fifth Symphony by Peter Mennin, a revised version of Samuel Barber's Second Symphony. Walter Piston's Third Symphony will also be heard.

Other projected works are the Fourth Symphony of Mahler, perhaps with Erna Berger as soprano soloist; Reger's Mozart Variations, the Divertimento No. 9 and Piece for Strings and Percussion by Bartok, and either the Kammersymphonie No. 1 or the "Pelleas and Melisande" by Schoenberg; Martinu's Concerto for Two String Orchestras, Piano and Tympani; the first act of Wagner's "Die Waukuere" (in the Spring, singers not announced), Vaughan Williams' Thomas Tallis Fantasy; the B-flat Symphony of D'Indy in honor of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth, Stravinsky's "Pulcinella," Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and Debussy's early "Printemps." There will also be a Schumann Concerto for four horns.

Long dissatisfied with the high platforms of the orchestra's seating plan, Mr. Munch has worked out a new arrangement, which he displayed in a charming scale model of wood made by Symphony Hall's superintendent, Edward Charron. Under this arrangement, the violins and violas will be on the flat stage with the rest of the orchestra placed on risers varying from three to 15 inches in height. This, the conductor believes, will produce a finer, more compact tone.

Mr. Munch has solved another problem, that of the student demand for tickets which far exceeds the capacity of any of the usual series by scheduling a series of five Thursday evening rehearsals. These will cost $8 for the series, all unreserved seats, and they literally will be rehearsals. The income derived will benefit the pension fund.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony, will lead the orchestra in November, two weeks in Boston and one in New York. His programs will include, probably, the Boston premiere of Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony and the Bruckner Seventh Symphony. Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor for a week in January.

The soloists will include violinist Yehudi Menuhin, pianist Solomon in the Brahms B-flat Concerto; pianist Aldo Ciccolini, Italian and new here, in the Tchaikovsky Concerto; soprano Suzanne Dancos in Ravel's "Scheherazade," pianist Nicole Henriot and violinist Ruth Posselt.

THEATRE TODAY

"CALL ME MADAM"—Shubert Theatre. Irving Berlin musical starring Ethel Merman with Paul Lukas and Alan Hewitt. At 8:30.

"CITY LIGHTS"—Copley Theatre. Revival of the famous Charlie Chaplin film classic. Continuous showings from 1 p. m.

"THE CURIOUS SAVAGE"—Wilbur Theatre. New comedy by John Patrick with Patricia Collinge in the leading role. At 8:30.

"OKLAHOMA!"—Colonial Theatre. The Rodgers and Hammerstein musical hit back for its sixth visit to Boston. Jerry Kelly, Patricia Northrup, Jacqueline Daniels, Jerry Mann in leading roles. At 8:20.

"PARDON OUR FRENCH"—Boston Opera House. Zanies Ole Olsen and Chic Johnson starred in their own madcap revue. Denise Darcel, Marty May and June Johnson also featured. At 8:30.

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE
OCTOBER 1, 1950

Three Orchestras Open Seasons; The Accent Is on Beethoven

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

Beethoven's music is prominent in the opening programs of the three orchestras which begin their home seasons this week. Charles Munch will launch the Boston Symphony's seventieth season next Friday afternoon and Saturday night with an all-Beethoven list: the overture to "Fidelio" and the first and third symphonies. On the same dates, Eugene Ormandy opens the Philadelphia Orchestra's fifty-first year with the third "Leonore" overture and the seventh symphony, followed by excerpts from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." The fifth symphony closes George Szell's introductory program for the Cleveland Orchestra's thirty-third season next Thursday night, following Brahms's Haydn Variations, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and a work new to Cleveland, the late Alfredo Casella's "Paganiniana."

In his second program, Oct. 13 and 14, Mr. Munch will introduce Honegger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude and Bohuslav Martinu's third piano concerto to Boston; Rudolf Firkusny will be the soloist. Mr. Munch is considering as novelties for this season Walter Piston's third symphony, Peter Mennin's fifth symphony, David Diamond's third symphony, Samuel Barber's second symphony, in its revised form, and Lukas Foss's oboe concerto. Vincent d'Indy's second symphony will be played in March to commemorate the composer's centenary.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, which opens its 109th season Thursday night, Oct. 12, in Carnegie Hall, will disclose details of its first few concerts during the coming week. Thor Johnson has chosen Beethoven's seventh symphony, with Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C major and Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote" for the first concert of the Cincinnati Symphony's fifty-sixth season on Oct. 13. Rafael Kubelik, the Chicago Symphony's new conductor, opens that orchestra's sixtieth season Oct. 12. Unlike several of his colleagues, he is not presenting a Beethoven symphony in his first program, but will offer Bach's fourth suite, Bela Bartok's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta and Brahms's fourth symphony.

Following the example of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in its recent fortnight at the Roxy Theater, the Dallas Symphony Orchestra will begin a week in the Texan city's Palace Theater as a part of its stage show on Nov. 10, nine days before the start of the regular season. Walter Hendl's program, planned to take forty-five minutes, includes Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Spring," Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" suite, German Dances by Mozart and part of Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony. The regular home season consists of eighteen concerts on Sunday afternoons and Tuesday nights.

BOSTON POST, TUESDAY,

MUNCH MEETS PRESS

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived here by plane from Paris last Thursday, met members of the press at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to announce plans for his second season, which begins Oct. 6. Mr. Munch made a special point of the fact that nothing played last year would be repeated. That is all to the good. There is enough fine music in the world to keep the Boston Symphony occupied for several seasons without repetitions.

For actual novelties, Mr. Munch mentioned the Third Symphony of the rising young American, Peter Mennin, as yet unknown hereabouts. Lukas Foss, who has left his position as official pianist of the orchestra for a sojourn in Rome, as winner of the American Academy prize, will be represented by an oboe concerto, and there will be a prelude, fugue and postlude from Honegger. New to these concerts will be a divertimento of Bartok, a double concerto for two string orchestras by Piston and Schumann's concert piece for four horns, reputedly of a terrifying difficulty. It will be interesting to see what the Boston men do with it. To the repertory Mr. Munch will restore Barton's music for strings and percussion, the Fourth Symphony of Mahler and the Second of d'Indy, to be played in March in commemoration of the centenary of that composer's birth. Schoenberg will be represented either by his First Chamber Symphony or his "Pelleas and Melisande," a turgid tone poem that he himself conducted here in 1934. We will hear again Stravinsky's "Pulcinella," Reger's Variations on a Theme of Mozart and the early "Printemps" of Debussy. A new soprano, Suzanne Danco, will be heard in the "Scheherazade" of Ravel.

Mr. Munch is evidently partial to choral music. He will give us in that field Bach's Christmas Oratorio and St. Matthew Passion and introduce us to the Requiem of Berlioz, Stravinsky's "Les Noces," the G major Mass of Schubert and Honegger's "Danse des Morts." The first program, marking the 50th anniversary of the opening of Symphony, will be all Beethoven.

GLOBE OCTOBER 3, 1950

Symphony Holds First Rehearsal With New Men

The first rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 70th season, starting Friday, was conducted yesterday by Charles Munch. There were two brief ceremonies. The conductor spoke of the recent death of Georges Mager, retired first trumpet, and of the earlier demise of Hans Werner, viola, both of whom had given many years of service to the orchestra. At the conductor's bidding, his musicians stood for a moment of silent tribute.

Then several new players were welcomed into the orchestra's "family," as Mr. Munch put it. Ralph Gomberg is first oboe, a post he held with the Baltimore Symphony, and Stokowski's All American Youth Orchestra. He is a graduate of the Curtis Institute, where he was a pupil of the famous Marcel Tabuteau.

The first clarinet is Gino Cioffi, for the past three years with the Metropolitan Opera in the same capacity, and prior to that first clarinet at Radio City Music Hall, and with the Cleveland and the Pittsburgh orchestras. He served as assistant first clarinet with the New York Philharmonic.

Other newcomers [illegible]ger Schermanski, and [illegible]ilfiner, violins, and Re[illegible]and Robert Margi, viola.

In the evening new voices were auditioned by Arthur Fiedler for the special chorus with which Mr. Munch will perform the Christmas Oratorio of Bach.

BOSTON, MASS. TRAVELER
OCT 1 1950

Munch's Plans For Season

Charles Munch, who arrived in Boston Sept. 21 by plane from Paris to prepare for the pending season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced his musical plans for his second season as the orchestra's conductor. The 70th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon.

New works scheduled to be introduced to Boston will be Honegger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude and the Third Piano Concerto of Martinu, with Firkusny as soloist. Mr. Munch is considering the Third Symphony by Walter Piston, the Fifth by Peter Mennin, the Third by David Diamond, Samuel Barber's revision of his Second Symphony and the Oboe Concerto by Lukas Foss for performance in the course of the season. Also upon his intended list is Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion, Martinu's Concerto for Two String Orchestras with Piano, Ravel's "Scheherazade," Mahler's Fourth Symphony and Strauss' Ein Heldenleben." Music seldom heard is the early "Printemps" of Debussy and Schumann's Piece for Four Horns and Orchestra.

He will remember the 100th anniversary of the birth of Vincent d'Indy next March with a performance of that composer's Second Symphony. Choral works will include: Bach's Christmas Oratorio (four parts)) and St. Matthew Passion, Berlioz's Requiem, Schubert's Mass in G, Honegger's "Danse des Morts" and Stravinsky's "Les Noces."

Rehearsals will begin next Monday for the opening concert, which will consist of Beethoven's First and Third Symphonies and "Fidelio" Overture. Every series in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, New York and Brooklyn is completely subscribed. The orchestra will make a tour westward in the third week of the season, giving concerts in Troy, Syracuse, Rochester and Buffalo, New York; and Detroit, Ann Arbor, Battle Creek and Kalamazoo, Michigan.

The orchestra's previous conductors, Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteux, will return to conduct as guests in the 70th season in November and January respectively.

BOSTON, MASS. ADVERTISER
OCT 1 - 1950

Symphony Nights For Hub Students

In an effort to give students in the Boston area a chance to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, five final rehearsals on Thursday nights during the current season will be opened according to Mr. George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra.

The announcement was made at a luncheon held today for representatives of 14 colleges and conservatories at the Harvard Club of Boston.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS. REPUBLICAN
OCT 1 - 1950

Boston Symphony to Play In New R. P. I. Music Shell

Troy, N. Y., Sept. 30—To make possible the appearance of the full personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Field House on Oct. 17 Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute is constructing a replica of the Tanglewood shell as a permanent installation in the Field House. With the completion of the new shell and the concert seating of the Field House equal to that of the famous Tanglewood Shed, the City of Troy will have a "Tanglewood" of its own.

The concert will come in the third week of the orchestra's 17th anniversary season. Charles Munch, the orchestra's present conductor, will be seen for the first time in this area. During the summer season of the orchestra at Tanglewood Mr. Munch was fullfilling engagements in Europe.

BOSTON, MASS. HERALD
OCT 1 - 1950

Male Singers Wanted By Munch for Oratorio

A call has been issued by Charles Munch, conducted of the Boston Syhphony Orchestra for experienced male singers to join the special volunteer chorus, with whom and the orchestra he will present Bach's Christmas Oratorio on Dec. 22 and 23. Arthur Fiedler will train the chorus. Those interested are invited to apply for an audition by calling Mr. Fiedler's secretary at Symphony Hall (CO 6-1492).

DAVENPORT, IOWA DEMOCRAT
OCT 1 1950

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY . . . will present a student concert series this season, by permitting students to attend the dress rehearsals of the orchestra. Noting that many students arrived in Boston after all regular concerts had been sold out, George Judd, the manager of the orchestra, has announced that beginning this year they may subscribe to a series of five rehearsals for five dollars. The 2,631 seats in Symphony hall will be unreserved and will be filled "first come, first served." Proceeds of the students series will be for the pension fund of the orchestra.

WASHINGTON, D. C. TIMES HERALD
OCT 1 - 1950

Because the concerts of the Boston Symphony are sold out by subscription, the management has opened final rehearsals to music students of the city. They may attend the five final Thursday night rehearsals of the season.

WORCESTER, MASS. TELEGRAM
OCT 1 - 1950

YOUTH D FOR OCT.

By RAYMOND MORIN

A notable [illegible] Another [illegible]wood?

Mail[illegible]ston Symphony [illegible]terhead arrives fr[illegible]d regularly, but only [illegible] has been postmarked Troy, N. Y.

This release tells that a replica of the Tanglewood shell is being constructed by Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute "to make possible the appearance of the full personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

It goes on to say—"this is of significant importance, for with the completion of the new Shell and the concert seating of the Field House equal to that of the famous Tanglewood Shed, the city of Troy will have a 'Tanglewood' of its own."

With all the fuss last summer over de Sabata's engagement to conduct at Tanglewood, and the last-minute withdrawal of movies after one of the concerts, the idea of another "Tanglewood" could very easily make one sus-

HOUSTON, TEX. POST
SEP 12 1950

[132]

-70th Symphony Season Begins Friday

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the first concert of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The all-Beethoven program offered the Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72b; the Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21; and the Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

IT IS VERY ODD and somehow very reassuring how wonderfully poised in space and time are these first Symphony concerts of the season.

What has happened in these five months and more since this audience last assembled? A war has been fought and won on the battlefield if nowhere else; the growing things of this latitude have had their season in the sun, have produced their fruits and have gone on; so, too, have gone on some of the members of the audience who were with us in the spring. But only those who lost these members feel that; now there are new faces, and who remembers all the old faces well enough to know the new?

Yet whatever has happened elsewhere and to whom, yesterday's opening concert might as well have been the 25th concert of last season, so unchanged and so alike in mood, atmosphere and look it was. One felt that here was one thing that would endure intact, not smugly, not ostentatiously, but with a calm resolution founded on artistic integrity.

THERE WERE NEW things, of course. New faces in the orchestra, for one. A new and clearly exceptional solo oboe in the person of Ralph Gomberg; a new and clearly fine solo clarinet in Gino Cioffi, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera orchestra; several new violinists in the ranks, and Roger Voisin, acceding to the solo trumpet desk replacing the late, memorable Georges Mager.

There was a new arrangement of the orchestra, Mr. Munch having lowered the proportions of the risers to achieve more tonal unity and balance, an arrangement that is auditorily triumphant. It is visually much better than I had expected, too, though I feel the last two desks of violins and violas might be better with some little elevation.

Otherwise, save for the performance of the national anthem at the beginning, and the fact that the audience had arrived somewhat earlier than it usually does to greet old friends and meet new ones, everything was the same. It was a resumption rather than a beginning, and it may be said that musically it was a superb resumption, too. I have long admired and been thoroughly stimulated by Charles Munch's approach to Beethoven, and to hear him in an all-Beethoven program proved to be a very exhilarating experience.

What he does is quite remarkable: he infuses Beethoven with a surging vigor on one hand while giving it a clarity and lucidity of texture on the other that proves to be a truly astonishing lesson in orchestral form. You keep thinking, when suddenly you hear a bassoon or an oboe proclaiming in inner voice of the greatest beauty, "For goodness sake, I never happened to hear that before!" Every little melodic or contrapuntal glint in the texture emerges; who sets apart and gives individual meaning, as Munch does, to every variation of the Eroica's finale? Who gives a better demonstration, while still creating an artistic whole, of the parts—exposition, development and recapitulation—sonata form as represented in the first movement of the First Symphony?

WHERE HE LAYS himself open to criticism and discussion in Beethoven is in his tendency to do what is called "whipping up" the orchestra. He does exact fearful tempos (how the strings ever did the coda of the variations I cannot imagine), and he does drive the orchestra. But there is no denying that it is effective, and who can say that it is or is not Beethoven? I am inclined to accept this speed and drive as expressing the tempo of the day; it is certainly not to be gainsaid that Munch does, in re-creating the music we have all heard a hundred times, make it a fresh and invigorating experience. The orchestra, incidentally, started the season in nearly mid-season form; it never had more tonal cohesion or technical brilliance.

The program next week offers Handel's Fire Music, Honegger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude, Martinu's Third Piano Concerto (Rudolf-Firkusny, soloist) and Franck's D minor Symphony.

TONIGHT IN THE THEATERS:

BRATTLE THEATER—"Six Characters In Search of an Author," Luigi Pirandello's study of illusion and reality starring Joseph Shildkraut, Ruth Ford, Cavada Humphrey, Michael Wager and others: 2:30 P. M., 8:30 P. M.

PLYMOUTH—"Burning Bright," a new play by John Steinbeck with Howard Da Silva, Barbara Bel Geddes, Kent Smith and others. Produced by Richard Rogers and Oscar Hammerstein 2nd, directed by Guthrie McClintic; sets by Jo Mielziner: 2:30 P. M., 8:30 P. M.

COLONIAL—"Oklahoma!" Rodgers and Hammerstein's fabulous piece of musical Americana. Featuring Jack Kilty, Patricia Northrop, Jerry Mann and others: 2:30 P. M., 8:30 P. M.

SHUBERT—"Call Me Madam," with Ethel Merman as the ambassador to Lichtenburg. Music by Irving Berlin, book by Howard Lindsay and Russel Crouse. Presented by Leland Hayward, Paul Lukas, Russell Knipe and others assist Ia Merman: 2:30 P. M., 8:30 P. M.

WILBUR—"The Curious Savage," John Patrick's drama of the sane and the not-so-sane. Presented by the Theater Guild and directed by Peter Glenville. Marie Carroll, Robert Emhardt, Isobel Elsom and others: 2:30 P. M., 8:30 P. M.

Social Chatter

By Alice Arnold

A whole program of Beethoven, which director Charles Munch promised when he succeeded Serge Koussevitsky, opened the 70th season of Symphony concerts yesterday. As it's modern music, alone, rather than illness or infirmity that can prevent a proper Bostonian from attending one of the Friday afternoon concerts, Symphony Hall was sold out. Many men left their offices early to attend. Among them was Wallace Goodrich, who was at the dedication of the hall 50 years ago and at the first concert.

* * *

Eben S. Draper, distinguished from his nephew by his middle initial, left at intermission, but staying on were Charles Fanning Ayer, with Mrs. Ayer, Judge and Mrs. Robert Wolcott, and Maxim Karolik, who was greeted with a "Hi, Peter!" by Mrs. Benjamin O. Gardiner. The latter's mother, Mrs. Francis P. Sears, added a note of color to the many fall ensembles with her red bolero and beret.

* * *

Among mothers and daughters attending this family institution together included Mrs. Allan Forbes and Mrs. Tudor Leland. Mrs. Benjamin D. Shreve was with her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Richard S. Shreve, and Mrs. Dwight Evans came in with her daughter, Mrs. Chase Kimball, from Milton. Miss Elizabeth C. Leland took time out for Symphony after working all summer to help prepare the new Milton Hospital which opened Monday and already has half a dozen babies.

* * *

The baby sitter problem has been successfully solved by many, for young-marrieds were there in full dress. Mrs. Edward B. Simmons (Peggy Hardwick) was chatting with Mrs. Lawrence L. Reeve, and still others were Mrs. William C. Loring, Mrs. Augustus P. Loring, 3d, Mrs. B. Devereux Barker, Jr., Mrs. Charles F. Hovey and Mrs. Eustus Walcott and Mrs. Wisner P. Kinne (Barbara Bremer).

* * *

A net crown with vintage color leaves of this season's popular red and purple framed the traditionally small and non-obstructing Symphony hat worn by Mrs. Thomas E. Proctor, who attended with Mr. Proctor. Others were Mrs. William Dexter, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Mrs. Harold D. Hodgkinson, Miss Amy Sacker, Mrs. Ben Ames Williams, who saw her daughter, Anne, off for a year in Europe yesterday, and Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, asking for former Governor Alvan T. Fuller by greeting Mrs. Fuller with an anxious, "How is papa?"

Increased Novelty and Variety Expected in Symphony Season

By CYRUS DURGIN

The 70th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon at 2:30 when Charles Munch will conduct a Beethoven program: the "Fidelio" Overture and the First and "Eroica" Symphonies. A new period in Boston's—and for that matter, the country's—music began last October when Mr. Munch became regular conductor of this orchestra. His first season, necessarily tentative in certain respects, proved a great success, with distinction and novelty of its own. We may expect, in the seven months to come, increasing richness and novelty and the distinction which comes from so forceful an artistic personality as Mr. Munch.

CHARLES MUNCH

A partial outline of the season's programs lends weight to that belief. A year ago Mr. Munch could not have been expected to be broadly conversant with contemporary music, for the simple reason that his experience in this country had been sporadic guest appearances. Obviously he has been learning, for last season he gave us a certain amount of American compositions, and he has promised more to come.

Among them will be David Diamond's Third Symphony, in first performance; an Oboe Concerto by Lukas Foss; Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony; a revised version of the Second Symphony by Samuel Barber,

No Repeats

But the one factor that indicates exceptional variety is the rule which Mr. Munch has set for himself; that he will repeat nothing that he played last year. It is an excellent rule, and it will prevent shrinkage of the repertory.

Mr. Munch is a man of energy and, I believe, a broad point of view. To be sure by birth and background he is largely French. It is only natural that he would present a considerable amount of French music. But he knows perfectly well that the ideal symphonic repertory is inclusive of many styles and countries. I think he knows equally well that the American public, more than the European one, expects wide variety. And I think it will be forthcoming.

There always are those who kick about the programs. Before last season was halfway through, voices were heard complaining there was too much French music. Personally I did not find it so. There were so many things not done here in recent years that I found the novelty of them not only interesting but refreshing. If only such complainers would stop and realize that you cannot do everything in one season and that, given time, most of the great works will have their periodic opportunity to be heard.

Such, in the near future, will include Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio (four cantatas of it) at the holiday time, and the "St. Matthew" Passion in the Spring; Berlioz' Requiem, with all the trimmings of the three brass bands, if they can find a place to put them in various parts of Symphony Hall; Mahler's Four Symphony, Ravel's 'Scheherazade, and Shubert's Mass in G.

New Seating Plan

An innovation of Mr. Munch that may or may not arouse opposition is his new seating plan for the orchestra. The conductor has disliked intensely the high platforms of the former arrangement. He believed the brass was too loud, and the string tone diffused.

He tried a flat stage last season and immediately was criticized for it by press and public. Quickly he abandoned the idea. But he is a persistent man when he thinks he is right, and in the late Spring he invited press and others to hear a rehearsal on the flat stage, and he asked suggestions.

The new arrangement which he worked out during the Summer seems to be a compromise. The violins will sit practically on one level and the rest of the orchestra will be given slight elevation ranging from three to 15 inches. That seems entirely reasonable, but its merit remains to be proved by actual sound.

The cellos will be placed on low resonating boxes; the tympani will remain in the left stage corner, but on a small platform which will not increase the reverberation. Mr. Munch firmly believes that the violins and violas on the flat stage will produce a finer and more compact tone.

Certainly the experiment is worth trying. As a matter of something pretty close to fact, the opposition to Mr. Munch's flat stage boiled down to the notion that the orchestra looked better on the high platforms which undoubtedly is true. Also that you couldn't see the players so well when they were all on the same level. Nonetheless, the sound not the appearance, is what counts. Though I, for one, like to see what is going on, I'll gladly sacrifice that pleasure to any enhancement of the orchestral sonorities.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 8 - 1950

MUSICAL HISTORY OVER MANY YEARS

'Symphony Hall, Boston' by H. Earle Johnson

In "Symphony Hall, Boston" (Little Brown; $6), H. Earle Johnson tells the story of this famous building, how it was planned and built, its purpose, and goes on at length to tell of the variety of events it has housed.

The story takes on color when he tells of the auction of symphony tickets and a mysterious person bids $1120 for two season tickets in the balcony. Everyone is of course agog to see who will occupy the expensive seats. The owner turned out to be Mrs. Jack Gardner, and her escort at the opening concert was George Proctor, a well-known Boston patron.

Music was but one of Mrs. Gardner's enthusiasms, baseball being another, and at a later concert she caused a bit of a stir when she arrived late from a ball game wearing a hat with a ribbon upon which was emblazoned "O You Red Sox!" All this was 50 years ago. Mrs. Gardner passed on some time ago and Mr. Proctor died during the past year.

To those interested in the Boston Orchestra, the Koussevitzky era is familiar enough but Mr. Johnson recalls in considerable detail the previous seasons of Wilhelm Gericke, Dr. Karl Muck, Max Fiedler and Pierre Monteux, their outstanding achievements, what they played, and the names of the soloists who appeared with them. Of equal interest is the resume of the solo recitals over the same period with occasional critical estimates.

Of especial value are the last 100 pages of the book which are devoted to a complete list of works performed by the Boston Symphony from 1881 to 1949 with [illegible] of their performances, the names of the soloists who have appeared with the orchestra as well as all of the re-cit[illegible] who have appeared in Symphony [illegible]

V. P.

[133]

day

Variety Season

Orchestra will be-noon at 1:30 when grams: the "Fidelio" onies.' A new period
—music began last conductor of this ive in certain re-
n and novelty of its
to come, increasing which comes from so
h.

If they can find a place in various parts of Sym-
Mahler's Four Sym-
's "Scheherazade," and
ise in G.

w Seating Plan
ation of Mr. Munch that not arouse opposition if ting plan for the orches-nductor has disliked in-high platforms of the angement. He believes was too loud, and the diffused.
a flat stage last season
ately was criticized fol and public. Quickly he the idea. But he is a when he thinks he is the late Spring he in-end others to hear a rethe flat stage, and h
tions.
arrangement which h
during the Summe
a compromise. The vio practically on one level of the orchestra will b elevation ranging fro inches. That seems en able, but its merit re proved by actual sound will be placed on low boxes; the tympani wil left stage corner, bu platform which will no reverberation. Mr believes that the vio
as on the flat stage wi
nor and more compac

he experiment is worth matter of somethin fact, the opposition t flat stage boiled down that the orchestra
on the high platforms ubtedly is true. Als dn't see the players s hey were all on th
Nonetheless, the sound
rance, is what counts
one, like to see wha ll gladly sacrifice tha enhancement of th
orities.

FIELD, MASS.
PUBLICAN
CT 8 - 1950

HISTORY
ER MANY YEARS

y Hall, Boston' by rle Johnson
Hall, Boston" (Little Earle Johnson tells famous building, how and built, its pur-
on at length to tell events it has housed.
akes on color when he ction of symphony ticmysterious person bids season tickets in the yone is of course agog ill occupy the expensive ner turned out to be ardner, and her escort concert was George known Boston pianist.
ut one of Mrs. Gardner's baseball being another,
r concert she caused a
when she arrived late me wearing a hat with which was emblazoned Sox!" All this was 50
rs. Gardner passed on and Mr. Proctor died
t year.
terested in the Boston
Koussevitzky era is h but Mr. Johnson reerable detail the prev-
Wilhelm Gericke, Dr.
x Fiedler and Pierre outstanding achieve-y played, and the oloists who appeared equal interest is the solo recitals over the occasional critical are the last book which are plete list of works

ston Symphony of the names of the appeared with the all of the re-
peared in Sym-
V. P.

POST, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7

SYMPHONY STARTS ON 70TH YEAR

First Families Back in Same Old Seats

BY ROSE WALSH

Not only did the 70th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted for the second year by Charles Munch, open with the national anthem, as the program specifically noted it would, but the music-loving audience that filled every seat in 50-year-old Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon sang the entire first verse.

KEEP SAME SEATS

Many Boston first families needed little help from the ushers for they have been hearing the great symphony concerts from the same seats season after season. Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, a symphony enthusiast since she was a little girl, arrived in plenty of time to greet old friends in the lobby. Mrs. Allan Forbes, a sable cape over her new-length black crepe dress, was accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. S. Tudor Leland who complemented her violet tweed suit with a grey felt beret.

Mrs. John Taylor Bottomley, whose family is listed among the early symphony subscribers, was joined by her daughter, Mrs. Arthur Fiedler in the lobby. Recently returned from a tour of the West Coast with her noted conductor husband, Mrs. Fiedler wore a striking chartreuse derby-type hat (his choice) with her slim black suit.

A becoming French blue wool suit caught at the neck with a brilliant red scarf was Mrs. Malcolm Bradley French's costume of the afternoon and her daughter, Mrs. Lyman P. Gutterson contrasted her beige fur jacket with a black hat.

In Fall Fashions

Also noted Wallace Goodrich, M. A. De Wolfe Howe, Mrs. Ernest Henderson who came via subway after a brief shopping tour; Mrs. John V. Spalding, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, an autumn yellow scarf accenting her black tailored suit and dashing green hat; Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Ayer, Eben Draper, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Coburn, Mrs. Lawrence Percival, Mrs. William S. Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel H. Hallowell, Mrs. Robert Hoffman, Mrs. Marcien Jencks, Mrs. Mason Whiting, sable skins adorning her wine red suit; Mrs. Robert Hoffmann, Mrs. Fanny Curtis, Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, her lovely white hair unhampered by a hat, Miss Ann O'Day, Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray and Miss Amy Sacker.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Shortly after 2:30 yesterday afternoon Charles Munch bounded onto the stage of Symphony Hall. Orchestra and audience rose in greeting and the latter remained standing; for the Boston Symphony's 70th season, as expressly stated in the program book, opened with the National Anthem. This gesture will be repeated tonight and again Tuesday evening; but not at subsequent concerts, unless international affairs take a turn for the worse.

If Mr. Munch stayed around long enough we might stop comparing him with Koussevitzky. Just now, after 25 years of the Russian and one of the Frenchman, the comparisons inevitably spring to mind. Mr. Munch plays "The Star Spangled Banner" more briskly than did his predecessor and the change is all to the good. It is the function of the anthem to be inspiring and inspiriting rather than solemnly impressive.

The program-proper began with Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," last heard at the regular series in 1920. It isn't much of a piece, though it makes a better introduction to the first scene of Beethoven's only opera than would its mighty forerunners, the Second and Third "Leonora." In point of fact, "Leonora" No. 3 had been announced and the shift to the "Fidelio" was a wise one. The great "No. 3" would have completely blanketed the little First Symphony that followed in this all-Beethoven list. Measure for measure, it overtops even the "Eroica," with which this opening bill concludes.

Mr. Munch took the "Fidelio" at a pretty good clip, at times there was an unnecessary vehemence and a hint of roughness. A more cautious performance would have been a more satisfactory one. The First Symphony, a work far inferior to the respective last symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, went its way acceptably, but with not quite the degree of eloquence Koussevitzky used to impart to it.

We have always thought of Koussevitzky's Beethoven as romantic rather than classic, though Ernest Newman has steadily insisted that it is the other way around, that his desire to make Beethoven makes the effect on us that he made upon [illegible] contemporaries is the truly classic approach, whereas making it sound as it sounded in the early 1800's is a romantic attitude. Disregarding this paradox, we may say that Mr. Munch's Beethoven is also romantic. Except for a slightly slower tempo in the Scherzo his "Eroica" was much freer, must less traditional than Koussevitzky's. This approach found its fullest justification in the second movement, which emerged, not as the intended funeral march, but as an impassioned threnody.

The outset of the 70th season finds the orchestra personnel slightly altered. There is a new first oboe, Ralph Gomberg; a new first clarinet, Gino Cioffi. Willem Valkenier, so long first horn, has retired, leaving Mr. Stagliano in his place. We will no longer see Georges Mager among the trumpets. It was his intention to retire and death took him a few days ago. Yesterday the new "firsts" acquitted themselves well. There are also minor changes in the string section.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
OCT 10 1950

JOINS SYMPHONY — Ralph Gomberg who has joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra as solo oboist. He will appear as a guest performer at the Brookline Chamber Music Society's concert Oct. 27 at 8:30 P. M., Brookline High School.

[134]

GLOBE SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1950

Capacity Audience Greets Boston Symphony Opening

By CYRUS DURGIN

So far as the exterior facts are concerned, the story could be told in a paragraph: Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony began at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon the 70th season of the great orchestra. They were most warmly received by a capacity audience which rose in greeting upon Mr. Munch's first entrance. The program was devoted to Beethoven of the "Fidelio" Overture and the First and 'Eroica" Symphonies, prefaced by "The Star Spangled Banner."

But this information alone would not give you the tiniest notion of what this event actually was like. Music and the reception of it is more than elementary facts. Actually there is a warmth of feeling through Symphony Hall, when the orchestra resumes its concerts, that almost equals the warmth of Spring.

Music An Enchanted World

When the audience rises to greet Mr. Munch, it is no perfunctory gesture, but one intended to express in a simple, gracious way the admiration and affection felt for him and his orchestra. As for the music-making itself, that is a whole enchanted world which has no truck whatever with facts.

Mr. Munch started off the "Fidelio" Overture with a rush of excitement. Those opening staccato chords, whose rhythm illustrates the way the name of Smetana should be pronounced, as that composer pointed out, went so fast they were startling. Except for the contrasting slow passages, which immediately follow the statements of that phrase, the pace was pretty fast. But it all was likewise very clear, and it was consistently Beethovenish.

The First Symphony, which sounds less and less like Haydn the more you hear it, although the slightly patronizing term "early Beethoven" will cling to it so long as the music lasts, was set forth by Mr. Munch in somewhat similar terms. The tempi were brisk, the treatment energetic, yet so far from exaggeration that the matter is mentioned only for the sake of the record. The C major Symphony is "small," comparatively, in scope and character, but it is Beethoven, and therefore not fragile. Mr. Munch has the right way with it; the line is long and steady, the accents strong, and there is no suggestion of an artificially contrived delicacy.

With the "Eroica" the results were mixed. Here again were the same big line and the wonderful clarity; the clean phrasing and the springiness of rhythms. But I found that Mr. Munch was tinkering with the tempo in the first movement, speeding it up from time to time so that certain pages sounded hurried. The same thing, though less often, happened in the finale. These details were a very free handling that contrasted forcefully with the high accuracy elsewhere.

Many conductors concern themselves only with the main tune that happens to be going on at the moment in Beethoven, leaving the inner voices to form background. Oftentimes that is correct. But there are others where wind instruments deserve to be heard a little louder, and in this respect Mr. Munch shows a careful ear and good taste. He brings out the trumpets, which add so much liveliness to orchestral sound.

New Seating Arrangement

In general this reading is a French one, sharp of outline and pungent of texture. It does not aim at the German ideal of mellow sonorities and massive texture. On that ground you may accept or reject it. In its manner, however, it is first-rate.

I did not happen to hear any lobby comment about the new seating arrangement, which has violins and violas on the flat stage, and the rest of the orchestra on elevations varying from three to 15 inches. The sound thus calculated I found compact and refined. With their slight elevation the woodwinds come through better than if on the flat stage. The tympani is in about the same corner position, but its penetrating sonority has been cut down a little from last year—when it frequently was too heavy. With this new plan the brass sound better, but a little more calculation is desirable for the horns, which are on the muffled side except when exposed in solo places.

These observations made, let it be added that the Boston Symphony remains the glorious and supreme instrument it has been these many years, and that Mr. Munch is just the man to keep it so.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1950

SOCIETY: Symphony Opens 70th Season, and Keeps a Pledge

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

When Henry Lee Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, one of his primary purposes was to make its fine music available to any student in Boston interested in music. The final rehearsal of the orchestra on each Friday afternoon was open to "all who paid a coin at the door," and in 1882 the orchestra's student concert series began in Harvard's Sanders Theatre. In this, the orchestra's 70th season, with the famous Friday concerts sold out months ago, and the Cambridge series fully subscribed, there is little chance for hundreds of music students to hear a single concert.

With typical Boston concern for a promise made nearly a century ago, the trustees of the orchestra, headed by Henry Cabot, Jacob Kaplan and Richard C. Paine, will open the final rehearsals during five weeks of the season to students from colleges, conservatories and orchestras in Boston. These rehearsals will be held on Thursday evenings and the seats will be unreserved. Tickets will be distributed through the schools at a nominal price, and the proceeds will be turned over to the orchestra's pension fund.

A fresh coat of the familiar cream paint, and an exhibit of baroque paintings lent by the Museum of Fine Arts helped celebrate Symphony Hall's own 50th anniversary yesterday, and in the vast audience that gathered promptly and leisurely were quite a few who could remember the curving stair rail out of the front lobby when it stood in the old Boston Music Hall. Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs doesn't look it, but she can remember the opening of Symphony Hall, and so can Wallace Goodrich of yesterday's audience, and Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, and Mark De Wolfe Howe. Mrs. Allan Forbes was beautiful little Josephine Crosby then, and younger than the tall, lovely daughter (Mrs. Tudor Leland) who came with her to Symphony yesterday.

Still others with family "heirloom" Symphony places that date back half a century are the Roger Wolcotts, there yesterday as usual; the George Lewises, the Ralph Bradleys, Mrs. Roger Griswold and her daughter Penelope, the Eben Drapers, the Oliver Wolcotts, Lewis Perry, the John Lymans, the Louis Curtises, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, MRS. CHARLES F. HOVEY at the Symphony opening yesterday.

Mrs. Reginald Bird, and many another.

Just back from a Summer in Scotland and England, Mrs. Malcolm B. French was busy telling friends about the October Cushman Club benefit with all her usual energy and charm, and still others of the big, familiar audience were Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, Maxim Karolik, the Roger Gilmans, Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson, Mrs. John Sargent, Mrs. Palfrey Perkins, Mrs. Grafton Fay, Mrs. Halfdan Lee, the Thomas Proctors, Mrs. Bayard Warren, Mrs. Robert Boas, Elizabeth Fenno, Mrs. Chauncey Gray, Mrs. Alfred Peabody, Mrs. Henry K. White, and Mrs. Franklin Dexter.

MISS KIMBALL ENGAGED—Mr. and Mrs. Dudley Fisher Kimball of Belmont announce the engagement of their daughter, Janet, to Arnold Guyot Dana, son of Mrs. K. Sharpe Dana of Providence, and Albro Newton Dana of Coventry, R. I.

Miss Kimball is a graduate of Stephens Junior College in Columbia, Mo., with the class of 1946, and the Boston Museum Guild of Fine Arts in 1950.

Mr. Dana attended Andover and St. George's School in Newport, R. I., and graduated in 1947 from Yale, where he was a member of the Elihu Society. He is also a graduate of the Harvard Business School.

Boston Herald October 14, 1950

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the second concert of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Rudolf Firkusny, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

"Fireworks Music" ..... Handel-Harty
Prelude, Fugue and Postlude...Honegger
Concerto No. 3 for Piano.....Martinu
Symphony in D minor ..... Franck

By RUDOLPH ELIE

IT IS ALWAYS, for me at least, a source of much gratification when new musical works prove to have both artistic quality of a very high degree and immediacy of communication. So it was yesterday in Honegger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude and Martinu's Third Piano Concerto; they were first rate to listen to, and first rate in substance and in performances, too.

To take them as they were offered, the three excerpts from Honegger's "Amphion," composed for Ida Rubinstein's ballet in the late '20's, demonstrated anew what we have all known for some time: that he ranks with the most virile and original creative minds of the day. Without reaching out desperately for an entirely new musical idiom (as for example Schoenberg has), yet without leaning safely back on the tried and true language of his immediate precursors, he has achieved a personal vocabulary at once original, stimulating, forceful and contemporary.

From its opening chord (and a strikingly beautiful chord it is), the Prelude achieves a singularly original sound; it evokes a little of the atmosphere of Ravel but never the sound. There is no attempt at tonal sensation at all, nor of melodic persuasion either as it leads directly into a drily vigorous fugue and thence into a more reposed postlude. Yet the ear follows every bar and is held in interest and pleasure.

I don't think that Martinu's Third Concerto ranks quite so high in quality. It is not one of the most urgently conceived works of this brilliant Czech composer, but it certainly makes its own way for composer and soloist alike. Oddly enough, though its atmosphere recalls throughout (but especially in the second and final movements) the Czech flavor of Smetana, its language is quite astonishingly Brahmsian. The keyboard technique seems to spring directly from the Brahms of the piano concertos while the coloration of the woodwinds, and the use of them throughout, always recalls Brahms.

THIS IS NOT TO SAY, however, despite the fact there are recurrent echoes of the D minor concerto as well as of the Haydn Variations, that Martinu's new concerto is either reminiscent or overly eclectic. It is somewhat different than we expect of Martinu, that is all, for hitherto, aside from his own special idiom, his inspiration has always seemed to spring from the busy, motoric, forward drive of Bach. Almost unrestrainedly melodic in conception, as witness the extremely beautiful introduction to the slow movement and the gay, witty, polka-like rondo finale, it is a concerto that makes its way instantly.

It is extremely difficult music for soloist and orchestra, however, and it must be said that Mr. Firkusny acquitted himself brilliantly. The orchestra's role was not always perfectly played in matters of ensemble, but it was tonally very expressive under Mr. Munch's direction. The orchestra reached its tonal heights in the ever-fresh "Fireworks Music" of Handel, and its virtuosic heights in a very over-heated performance of Franck's D minor Symphony. Inasmuch as I entertain a fantastic blind spot for the music of Cesar Franck, I am unable to say whether Mr. Munch's realization was good, bad or indifferent. It was certainly notable for the clarity of its instrumental texture, and it certainly made a great effect on the audience. But personally, all I can think of, in listening to Franck's slithering chromaticism, is a bunch of pythons surging about in a glass cage.

The orchestra is out of town next week but will return on Oct. 27 for an interesting program of Bach and Handel, with E. Power Biggs as soloist.

SYRACUSE, N.Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
OCT 8-1950

Final Rehearsals In Boston Open To Students

A note from George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony, tells us that because symphony-minded students in the Boston area often arrive there only to find all of the Orchestra's concerts fully subscribed, that the five final orchestra rehearsals during the current season will be opened. Representatives of 14 colleges and conservatories met for luncheon in the Harvard Club, Boston, to discuss the basic idea and problems connected with distribution and allocation of concert tickets. For several years, public rehearsals with a nominal charge have been a feature of the Tanglewood scene, the Boston Symphony's summer home, but the forthcoming rehearsals will mark the first time since the earliest days of the orchestra that the doors of Boston's Symphony Hall will be opened for other than an actual concert.

* * *

Boston Globe
-SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14,

MUSIC

Munch Introduces Honegger and Martinu Music at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Two French scores, neither new but both engaging, were introduced to Boston by conductor Charles Munch at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The first was the Prelude, Fugue and Postlude by Arthur Honegger; the second was Bohuslav Martinu's Third Piano Concerto, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist. The afternoon began with four movements from the "Royal Fireworks" Music of Handel, in the modern orchestral transcription by Sir Hamilton Harty, and ended with the D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck.

For my taste, this was a rich and rewarding symphony concert, superbly played and showing off the varied attributes of the Boston Symphony at their glorious best. Once again I was deeply impressed by the wisdom of Mr. Munch's new seating plan for the orchestra. It does sound better, and no mistake, under this arrangement. You will never hear anything lovelier than the compact and luminous string tone in the Siciliana of Handel's robust and diverting suite. The woodwinds, from first to last, also were compact and sufficiently prominent, and the horns—which a week ago were overly faint—came through with a solid and completely luscious sound. Mr. Munch has been wiser and more imaginative than any of us; let his seating plan prevail without further discussion.

Honegger's suite evidently is an instrumental conversion of portions of a ballet composed for the fabulous Ida Rubinstein in 1928. As a score whose merit rests upon creative logic, adherence to venerated forms, the Prelude, Fugue and Postlude should depend only upon abstract excellence. At a matter of fact it does. Yet, listening to these three movements that progress without interruption, it is obvious that the depictive quality of the original ballet score still remains. You cannot resist making your own pictures. In fact, it is not too easy to think of the fugue in fugal terms, and the postlude, with its concluding solo for bass clarinet (that poetic and neglected instrument) is "program music" undeniably. There are also some striking solos for saxophone and English horn.

A wit of my acquaintance propounded that the author of this week's Piano Concerto should be named "Johannes Bedrich Tchaikovsky," because Martinu's work is amazingly un-characteristic and suggests a variety of other composers. Some find Brahms, Smetana and Tchaikovsky in it; others yesterday mentioned Bruennhilde's "Ho jo to ho" and a few other influences. They are all correct, so far as superficial resemblances go, especially with Brahms (in the first movement) and Smetana (in the showy, toccata-like finale).

Once an uncompromising individualist who looked to the future, Martinu, the Czech born-and-bred, turned backward in 1948 when he wrote this sweet, long and woolgathering work. It is all very pleasant and tuneful, from first measure to last chord, but even with the cuts sanctioned by the composer, it is too long and syrupy. Mr. Firkusny gave what I construed to be an expert and virtuoso performance of it, lacking nothing of technic and warmth of expression. But the final impression was that even too much honey is too much.

Mr. Munch's reading of the good old Franck Symphony, gradually falling victim to senility, was what is best described as virile and full-bodied. You may complain that the loud places were too loud, the tympani too vigorous. But what else are you going to do with a derivative, late-romantic score which has been showing its age for far too long? (I kept thinking of flesh-potty Paris during most of it.) If the Symphony must be played at all, let it be as Munch does it.

Boston Post - Oct. 14

...Germany.

Art Exhibition in Symphony Gallery

Subscribers to the Boston and Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also members and Friends of the Orchestra, will hold their second annual exhibition of paintings in the Symphony Hall Gallery, opening Oct. 27. Each would-be exhibitor may submit two paintings Oct. 23 and from these a "competent but gentle jury" will select the exhibition. Paintings may be in any medium but not less than 8 by 10 inches in size, exclusive of frame and mat.

New Works for Sym

Rudolf Firkusny to Play Martinů's Third Concerto

By Klaus G. Roy

When the young Czech pianist, Rudolf Firkusny, joins the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Friday and Saturday for the first Boston performance of the Third Piano Concerto by his countryman, Bohuslav Martinů, Charles Munch will continue a long and happy tradition: no fewer than six world premières of Martinů's works have been given under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, and this will be Mr. Firkusny's tenth appearance with the orchestra.

The concert promises to have at least one piece to appeal to every taste Symphony Hall can accommodate. After a con fuoco opening with Handel's "Royal Fireworks" Music, Mr. Munch and the orchestra will cross the English Channel to play three works by composers who have long been associated with France. It is quite appropriate to see Arthur Honegger's Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude, also in its first Boston hearing, preceding the piano concerto of his good friend Martinů, who spent 17 years in Paris before coming to the United States in 1941. Martinů's Double Concerto in particular (played here in 1944) has received some moving tributes by Honegger. Like the Swiss and the Czech composer, a Belgian found his second home in Paris: it was César Franck, whose ever-popular D minor Symphony will conclude the program.

* * *

As in several other of Mr. Martinů's recent works, world events and the tragedies which have befallen his native country are mirrored in this concerto; if it is not with as clear an indication as in the "Memorial to Lidice," then in the mood and frame of expression of the music itself. The work was to have been given its première by the Czech Philharmonic after its completion in New York in 1948. When the Czech Government was overthrown, for the second time in 10 years, the plan had to be abandoned.

An even more direct influence on the structure of the concerto was the tragic passing of the composer's friend, Jan Masaryk. News of the event reached Mr. Martinů while he was working on the last movement, a cheerful polka in the Czech manner, and the composer relates that he found himself unable to complete the piece in the same spirit. An expressive slower section cuts the swirling figure of the polka in two, and when the dance patterns return they appear clouded over; the ending is forceful but no longer gay.

* * *

"In a difficult world of social upheaval and political chaos," the composer has written, "it is more necessary than ever not to obscure our artistic purpose. We should keep our ideals clear, our convictions firm, and maintain the artistic faith that represents and speaks for our life and work."

Rudolf Firkusny gave the première of Martinů's Second Concerto in Prague in 1935; the Third was dedicated to him and first performed with the Dallas Symphony a year ago. In talking with him in the artists' room at Symphony Hall, it was obvious how fully he had made the structure and feeling of this work his own. It was a rare pleasure to hear him play through it, orchestral parts and all—humming what would have required more than ten fingers.

* * *

This is a most melodic concerto, Mr. Firkusny said, good to play for the piano, folk-like in material, and very Czech in spirit. The orchestra is of classical proportions, with some extra percussion like cymbal and bass drums; there is little solo writing for the instruments, and the scoring is quite rich and full throughout. Perhaps it is unusual for a contemporary composer to employ an unequivocal key-signature: this concerto is clearly in B-flat major, and the pianist pointed out how the composer reaches most of his climactic points on a chord or figure of B-flat minor, a sort of tonal motto running through all the movements.

The whole work gives the impression of being almost conservative in its harmonic material. Mr. Firkusny was quick to agree that the shadow of Brahms looms large over the rhythms, colors, and many individual phrases of the concerto, giving it warmth, melowness, and a romantic approach balanced in classical form. Certainly one could find little of the acidity and sharpness of most contemporary harmonic and rhythmic usage. The simple dominant and tonic relationships may cause some inquiry into Martinů's year of birth, which is 1890.

* * *

After several performances with other orchestras and a number of solo recitals, Mr. Firkusny plans to go to Europe in March for a series of concerts. He seemed very pleased to be able to begin his eighth annual tour of this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for which he has the highest regard. Martinů's Third Concerto will also be entrusted to him for performances with the Cleveland Orchestra under Szell, and the Chicago Symphony under Kubelik. The latter event should be a field day for Czech music, with composer, conductor, and pianist (to say nothing of some of the orchestra players) all pooling their Bohemian vitality.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR
OCT 1 [illegible]

Boston Orch. Opens Year Next Friday

Charles Munch, who arrived in Boston September 21 by plane from Paris to prepare for the pending season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced his musical plans for his second season as the Orchestra's conductor. The 70th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon.

New works scheduled to be introduced to Boston will be Honegger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude and the Third Piano Concerto of Martinu, with Firkusny as soloist. Mr. Munch is considering the Third Symphony by Walter Piston, the Fifth by Peter Mennin, the Third by David Diamond, Samuel Barber's revision of his Second Symphony and the Oboe Concerto by Lukas Foss for performance in the course of the season. Also upon his intended list is Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion, Martinu's Concerto for Two String Orchestras with Piano, Ravel's "Sheherazade," Mahler's Fourth Symphony and Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben." Music seldom heard is the early "Printemps" of Debussy and Schumann's Piece for Four Horns and Orchestra. He will remember the 100th anniversary of the birth of Vincent D'Indy next March with a performance of that composer's Second Symphony. Choral works will include: Bach's Christmas Oratorio (four parts) and St. Matthew Passion, Berlioz' Requiem, Schubert's Mass in G, Honegger's "Danse des Morts" and Stravinsky's "Les Noces."

Rehearsals will begin next Monday for the opening concert, which will consist of Beethoven's First and Third Symphonies and "Fidelio" Overture. Every series in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, New York and Brooklyn is completely subscribed. The Orchestra will make a tour westward in the third week of the season, giving concerts in Troy, Syracuse, Rochester and Buffalo, New York; and Detroit, Ann Arbor, Battle Creek and Kalamazoo, Michigan.

The Orchestra's previous conductors, Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteux, will return to conduct as guests in the 70th season, in November and January, respectively.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,
Oct. 13

nphony — Stage a

Bruno of Hollywood

Rudolf Firkusny, appearing as soloist for the Boston Symphony's week-end concerts in the première of Martinů's Third Piano Concerto.

[135]

MUNCH INTRODUCES NEW METHOD:

Boston Symphony Will Give Two Concerts

From Boston, "the home of the bean and the cod," the Boston Symphony will tour into Ann Arbor to give two concerts, the first Oct. 22 and the second Oct. 25.

Boasting a fiery new conductor, Charles Munch, who took over for Serge Koussevitsky last year, the orchestra has caused a favorable tempest in Boston teapot by operating under a new concert method.

* * *

MUNCH INTRODUCED this new method when he took over after a year with the New York Philharmonic. Instead of rehearsing his men long hours so that they would produce his stylizations no matter how exhausted the practice sessions have left them, Munch takes his orchestra once-lightly over the rough parts in the score, and leaves the rest of the interpretation for the permance.

This practice has brought irate screams fro mmany American critics who have grown used to technically perfect performances. Munch's system, already thrilling staid Bostonians, forces the musicians to pay strict attention to the waving baton and vicious grimaces of their conductor, since interpretation depends on his momentary whim.

Approving critics claim that the music thus produced makes up in vitality what it loses technically and the Alsatian conductor's system has been gaining popularity.

* * *

MUNCH STARTED his career as a concert violinist in Strasborg, but switched over to the podium after a sojourn in the German Army. He resents this last portion of his career, since he grew up when Alsace was under German domination.

In his childhood prayerbook was the legend, "From our bones one day an avenger will arise," and he considers his Alsatian birth of paramount importance when discussing his nationality.

The Boston, under his inspired leadership yill present its first concert Oct. 22 on the Choral Union Series, and its second, Oct. 25 on the Extra Concert Series.

* * *

THESE TWO concerts duplicate last year's program which gave both sets of ticket holders a chance to hear what many critics call the best U.S. orchestra. Last year was the first time in Choral Union history that a major orchestra was invited to perform twice during the same season.

The Boston has appeared annually in Ann Arbor since 1930, and on numerous occasions since 1899; Munch's first appearance in Ann Arbor was in 1948 when he conducted the French National Philharmonic in Hill Auditorium.

The two Ann Arbor concerts this year will feature many proven Bostonian favorites conducted in the new Munch method, already known and enjoyed by campus audiences.

The Michigan Daily - August 22, 1950

Charles Munch Returns--and The Symphony Season Looms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

"It is my hope," he said, sitting down in a chair in the green room of Symphony Hall early this week and crossing his legs, "that we have a very good season." The assembled gentlemen of the press, noting his advancement in the peculiar art of speaking English since his arrival in Boston a year ago this time, drew pencils and notebooks. Charles Munch, never more rested and more charming, had arrived in Boston to begin his second—and the orchestra's 70th—season.

It had been for him, a quiet and restful summer in Paris, broken only by several appearances as guest conductor at various European musical festivals, and he had arrived, by plane, late last week to resume residence in the fine old Bishop Lawrence house in Milton. "So beautiful it is!" he exclaimed, "already the color of the leaves is extraordinaire!" But there were more pressing matters at hand and, referring to a typewritten sheet, the conductor related the general plans for the season's music.

He would begin, he said, with an all-Beethoven program next Friday afternoon, doing the Overture to "Fidelio," the First Symphony and the Eroica. The second program on the following Friday would bring out the first of the season's soloists: Rudolf Firkusny doing Martinu's Third Concerto. The program would also include Handel's Fire Music, a Prelude, Fugue and Postlude by Honegger, and Franck's D minor Symphony. The orchestra thereupon goes off on its first tour ("to Kalamazoo," said Mr. Munch with a grin).

In the line of new works, Mr. Munch announced, he plans to do David Diamond's Third Symphony, Lukas Foss' Concerto for Oboe (with the orchestra's new first oboe, Ralph Gomberg, as soloist); Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony and Samuel Barber's Second Symphony in a new version. He will also repeat Piston's Third Symphony.

BERLIOZ' REQUIEM

Among the choral works planned for the season are Honegger's "La Danse des Morts," Schubert's Mass in G, Bach's Christmas Oratorio (four cantatas of the eight) in Christmas week, the St. Matthew Passion (at Easter time) and, in one of the biggest undertakings in Symphony Hall in many years, Berlioz' gigantic Requiem, brass bands at the far corners and all.

Other works planned are a Bartok Divertimento, Mahler's Fourth Symphony, two works of Schoenberg (the Kammersymphonie and "Pelleas and Melisande"), Strauss' "Heldenleben," the whole first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," Ravel's "Scheherazade" (with Suzanne Danco as soprano soloist), Reger's Variations on a Theme of Mozart, Debussy's early "Printemps"; D'Indy's Second Symphony in observation of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth; a concerto for double string orchestra with piano and percussion by Martinu; Stravinsky's "Les Noces" and "Pulcinella," and Robert Schumann's Concert Piece for Four Horns, a novel work with a reputation for unequalled difficulty for the horn players.

Mr. Munch explained that there would be no repetitions of any works given last season, but that he planned a wide-ranging program of the standard repertoire with more emphasis on Haydn than ever before. Among the soloists he announced, besides Mr. Firkusny, are Yehudi Menuhin, Solomon, Aldo Ciccolini (an Italian pianist of whom he spoke most favorably, Nicole Henriot and Ruth Posselt, and he said he plans to use the first desk soloists of the orchestra considerably more than they have been in recent years, which is good and heartening news indeed, as it is to learn that the guest conductors will be Koussevitzky and Monteux.

Perhaps one of the most interesting announcements was that of one of the conductor's extraordinarily novel idea of presenting a special series of five "rehearsal" concerts for the students of Greater Boston. Mr. Munch, who thought up the project, will conduct these five programs on a more or less monthly basis during the season. They will be actual Thursday night rehearsals, not formal concerts, and the 2631 seats of Symphony Hall will be sold on a series basis to students only for $8 the series. The seats, moreover, will be unreserved. Thus, in one unique gesture, (for such a series has never been offered anywhere before), Mr. Munch has solved the problem of making the symphony concerts available to students, who can usually not get regular tickets even if they can afford them, and of insuring cultivated audiences for the future. It is magnificent scheme, and Mr. Munch deserves the greatest credit for having contrived it.

NEW SEATING PLAN

One development that is not, to me at any rate, so enjoyable in prospect, is Mr. Munch's determination to put the orchestra down off its series of platform risers onto a more or less flat stage. He gave the working critics a preview of this scheme last year, and I didn't go along with it on the grounds that from the floor of the Hall it was unsightly, that nothing could be seen of the orchestra but the first row of musicians, and that it did not measurably improve the sound of the orchestra but, on the contrary, covered the woodwinds.

Mr. Munch, who doesn't consider the visual aspect of a concert of any importance (a notion that would put an end to the virtuoso conductor if it were generally accepted) has now achieved a compromise between the high risers and the flat stage, a design worked out by Edward Charron, the Hall's superintendent. By means of risers ranging from three inches to a foot or so high, the orchestra will have a gentle pitch from the apron of the stage to the back. It remains to be seen how this new arrangement works out from the point of view of the audience on the floor, at least from a visual aspect.

BOSTON, MASS. POST

OCT 1 - 1950

Our Critic's Repor for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As Boston is justly proud of its Symphony Orchestra, so has it reason to take pride in the handsome, dignified, commodious, efficiently managed auditorium that is its proper home. Symphony Hall is 50 years old. It was opened for inspection by the press Sept. 22, 1900; the first concert, chiefly devoted to Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, took place Oct. 15, and the first pair of regular concerts were those of Oct. 19 and 20. This was the beginning of the orchestra's 20th season, and when its 50th was started a year ago Mr. Munch, making his first appearance as its official head, repeated the inaugural program. This list, prepared by Wilhelm Gericke, whose second term had six years to go, was typical of the strong Teutonic trend of the times, consisting, as it did, of Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, an Organ Concerto of Handel, the "Rosamunde" Ballet Music of Schubert and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

It is instructive to compare this traditional array with Koussevitzky's first program 24 years later, drawn from Vivaldi, Berlioz, Brahms, Honegger and Scriabin. During the first quarter of the 20th century orchestral programs had changed considerably and Koussevitzky was to change them even more. The French and Russians had definitely entered the picture, the new was considered as worthy of performance as the old, even on special occasions, and the past was being freshly scrutinized and revalued. We are getting a far more liberal education in music than did our forefathers.

* * *

In a literary sense, nothing could be more appropriate at this time than a book dealing with Symphony Hall's first half century, and such a book has come forth in "Symphony Hall, Boston" by H. Earle Johnson (Little, Brown). A resident of Worcester, who teaches music at Clark University, Mr. Johnson has already displayed an interest in the Boston musical scene in his "Musical Interludes in Boston (1795-1830)." The task he lately set himself was no light one, and, barring the misstatements that a second edition should correct, he has accomplished it admirably. In 306 pages he manages to paint a vivid picture of Boston at the turn of the century; tell the story of the hall itself, the first in the world to be constructed in accordance with acoustical principles; tell of the concerts under Gericke, Muck, Fiedler, Muck again, Rabaud, Monteux and Koussevitzky, the latter rating a special chapter; discuss the concerts other than those given by the Boston Symphony, and the Hall's various and varied non-musical events; and in a final chapter bring the record up to the opening of the '49-'50 season. There follow 120 pages of valuable appendices, devoted respectively to a complete listing of works performed by the Boston Symphony from 1881 to 1949, lists of conductors and guest conductors, of soloists with the orchestra, of visiting orchestras, of the more important concert artists and finally the specifications of the re-built organ that was dedicated a year ago.

* * *

This is truly a case of much in little. Mr. Johnson had to plow through a mountain of scrapbooks, culling from them the high spots that he has so successfully picked out, and we owe to the orchestra's staff the aforesaid appendices. For those whose memory goes all the way back to 1900, or most or even part of the way back, this is a book rich in reminiscences; while those who have come upon the scene more recently can learn much regarding other times and other ways. A reading of this book will serve to disabuse the victims of the high-powered Koussevitzky propaganda of the notion that we had no orchestra worthy of the name, no American composers ditto and no curiosity regarding new music before the glamorous Russian took over.

* * *

The lover of anecdotes about outstanding musical personalities will find that Mr. Johnson has not neglected them. He has quoted liberally from the critics of this 50-year period, and an interesting light is thrown on the ways in which musical taste has changed, reminding us anew that the controversial of yesterday will become the accepted of today. Incidentally, a paragraph (attacking Scriabin) is attributed to H. T. Parker that the open-minded Transcript critic could not possibly have written, while Philip Hale is given credit for one of H. T. P.'s felicitous picture captions, describing Milhaud as a "disturber of the peace."

I would recommend to Mr. Johnson a study of Appendix I. He would learn that Rachmaninoff never played here his First Concerto, that either he nor anyone else conducted his early tone poem "The Rock," that there was no performance of the Bruckner Ninth between '14 and '47 and none at Symphony Hall of Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder." Such errors mar an otherwise most useful book.

* * *

On Friday and Saturday Mr. Munch begins the Orchestra's 70th season with Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture and First and Third Symphonies.

[136]

Firkusny Soloist in Martinů Concerto

Munch Program Includes Honegger, Franck

By Harold Rogers

Two works new to Boston are listed on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program this week end—Arthur Honegger's Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude, a suite derived from music he wrote in 1928 for Paul Valéry's "Amphion," and Bohuslav Martinů's Third Piano Concerto, written in 1948. Rudolf Firkusny, to whom the concerto is dedicated, was the soloist. Charles Munch opened the program with Handel's Suite from the Music for the Royal Fireworks, and brought it to a close with César Franck's Symphony in D minor.

* * *

It was in the Franck that the fireworks really occurred — a scintillating display from Mr. Munch's personal arsenal. By infusing the symphony with his own dynamic personality, he tightened it here, broadened it there, all the while setting off an impressive array of musical pinwheels, sparklers, and soaring skyrockets. Perhaps no more exciting reading has ever stormed the tympanum, nor, for that matter, a more erratic. If the public has become patronizing toward Franck's chromatic masterpiece, Mr. Munch's version will help to renew their interest. It is different, to say the least.

* * *

One can hardly believe that the Martinů concerto is of our day, conceived, as it is, in a romantic framework in general, and in a Brahmsian mode in particular. A composer might be justified in choosing an earlier style in which to express himself, provided he had more to say in that style than its originators. But Martinů, if anything, says less, though he speaks with refinement, scholarship, and balance. Considering the few contemporary punctuation marks he employs, we might accede to a neo-romantic classification.

Apart from the concerto's anachronism, however, it is an ingratiating piece of music, one that modern ears will find more than easy to bear. The solo instrument is never obscured by the instrumentation.

Mr. Firkusny's interpretation had power and grace. He can gradually develop a climax of tremendous sonority, as he did in the last-movement cadenza, yet without any disagreeable sense of percussion. The elements of performance yesterday afternoon were close to ideal. As a piece of original writing, however, the concerto utterly fails.

* * *

There is no gainsaying that the musical creative activity of our times has long been coasting in the doldrums. Though we can look back on golden ages, we must be satisfied today with bronze. This age in French music has been more or less dominated by three of the French Six—Honegger, Milhaud, and Poulenc. Honegger has been daring, Milhaud prolific, and Poulenc, though having written things of great beauty, is now mainly a musical prankster.

It was the Honegger music that brought the most compelling contribution to yesterday's program. Opening with strong, atmospheric chords of under-water timbre, the first movement proceeds with an interplay of solo instruments, the dramatic use of a saxophone, and an agitated development that opens out into a broad, heroic melody. The harmonies take hold with a bite.

* * *

The fugue is at first ponderous, marcato in treatment, then smoothing into a passage of nostalgic lyricism, only to finish in a dissonant cry of triumph. The finale is stately, recalling the solo saxophone and returning to the original mood of the piece. The conclusion is serene with a shimmering tone from the gong. If Honegger and Martinů could be considered as competitors on this program, then it was Honegger's day.

Boston's Temple of Glory

Symphony Hall's Story Set Down by "A Bostonian by Conviction"

Symphony Hall, Boston, by H. Earle Johnson: Little, Brown and Co., $6.

This voluminous book contains the story of the red brick temple at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts aves. for 50 years the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and as characteristic a part of our city as the Common and Public Garden. The story has been told, on the whole very well, by H. Earle Johnson, born in Connecticut but "a Bostonian by conviction" and, by occupation, an assistant professor of music at Clark University in Worcester.

Symphony Hall is a monument to Maj Henry Lee Higginson's devotion to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded and for so long maintained, and to the spirit of the citizens who subscribed the $750,000 to build it. In half a century, Symphony Hall also has become a tradition and, to those except sports followers, the best-known of all Boston's public gathering places. Built at the turn of the century specifically to house the Boston Symphony, the hall was designed by the architectural firm of McKim, Mead and White, after the Gewandhaus in Leipzig, Ger. The first major work to be performed there was Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, at a special pre-season concert, when the two most expensive series seats, purchased at auction through a broker for the still fabulous amount of $1120, were occupied by Mrs. Jack Gardner and the local pianist, George Proctor.

As a musician, Mr. Johnson naturally devotes by far the greater part of his book to the concerts of the Boston Symphony. There is also a section on the Pops, and a chapter on the personalities who have given miscellaneous independent concerts at Symphony Hall over 50 years.

Symphony Hall came eventually to lead a double life, and it has seen and heard lectures, banquets balls, college commencements, political rallies, religious services plays, movies, book fairs, cook... schools and even, in the early years automobile shows.

As aforesaid, Mr. Johnson's work is good, but I noticed that he is a little casual about including dates and other specific details, and that his style is often a little prissy and frequently fancy, as witness his paragraph on the death of H. T Parker.

There are valuable indices of compositions played by the Boston Symphony from 1881 through 1949, of soloists with the orchestra, of orchestras from other cities which have visited Symphony Hall, a selected list of concert artists, and the specifications of the new organ. But, sadly, there is no general index.

This story has had to be mainly factual, but there are touches of color and humor, notably the battle of the women's tall hats in 1908, led by Mrs. Jack Gardner and a few others. The same Mrs. Gardner was also a baseball fan, and in 1904 arrived late at a Friday concert, wearing a hat adorned with a red band and the sentence: "O you Red Sox!"

—CYRUS DURGIN.

HARTFORD, CONN. TIMES
OCT 1 41950

Friday, the 13th, Soloist Features Boston's 2d Concert

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the current series in Symphony Hall this afternoon. Charles Munch chose Handel's suite from the Music for the Royal Fireworks as the introductory piece. It was transcribed for orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty.

Although in Handel's day, this work must have been of truly stupendous proportions, it is dwarfed by the gigantic pyrtechnics of the music being ground out today into somewhat of a small firecracker. Regardless, Handel still continues to retain the same richness that he had in the powdered wig era.

* * *

WHAT MAY have been an auditory illusion last week regarding the pinched tone of the orchestra has now stumbled into a disconcerting reality. Despite the dangerously patronizing attitude of the Boston critics, Mr. Munch is letting humpty dumpty sit far too near the edge and a few stiff disciplinary measures can not help but make humpty play a little better in the bargain. These players are all happier than they were under the old regime, but, musicians being human, neither are they working too hard.

The first Boston performance of the prelude, Fugue, and Postlude by Honegger was a meaty one. Actually, this music is quite easy to listen to. It is all tied up with the story of one Amphion, the son of Jupiter, none of the details of which are terribly important. As straight music, however, it is not only extremely listenable, but is really fine music as a whole. The intervals are not pretty in themselves but the piece, although short, has given us some contemporary charm which graces too little of today's works.

* * *

ALSO PERFORMED for the first time in Boston was the Piano Concerto No. 3, by Bohuslav Martinu. The soloist, in a rather luke-warm rendition, was Rudolph Firkusny. At first hearing, the concerto is lesser music than the Honegger piece. It seems to be nothing more on the surface than a changing labyrinth of needless crescendos and diminuendos and Martinu himself seems to have nothing to say.

Firkusny, the soloist, has a frustrating keyboard style. He is forever snapping back ris head in a most unbecoming pose at the end of trifling runs and his technique seems limited to the tops of the keys. A more relaxed and direct approach to the keyboard, the sinking of each finger into the root of each key, and the relaxed resillience of the release, will give a tone which is highly resonant and powerful. Yet this eliminates the awesome banging which accompanies a pianist trying to sound above a spirited orchestra.

* * *

MR. FIRKUSNY was in much too much of a hurry to get his hands off the keyboard and clawing at the keys can be a disconcerting as well as an unproductive habit. Somehow his tremendous follow-through served only to emphasize this lack of power. At bes the performance was shabbily dependable.

Perhaps it can be chalked up to Friday the 13th, if you are superstitious, but the Franck D Minor Symphony, which closed the program, was a fairly noisy, unsensitive affair. By this time everyone was quite out of sorts and nibbling on their programmes, and wishing they had not come at all. You know, it's funny how when one thing goes badly everything seems to fall apart at the seams. On second thought, let's chalk it up to Friday the 13th after all. That way nobody gets blamed. —F. S.

TROY, N. Y. MORNING RECORD
OCT 1 41950

R.P.I. Rushes Work On Music Shell

A crew of more than thirty steel workers, carpenters, electricians and laborers are working day and night at the Field House of Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, in order to complete the new music shell there in time for use by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard under the direction of its conductor, Charles Munch at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday.

According to H. L. Garren, managing director of the Field House, plans for the construction and completion of the shell were made some time ago, but the steel necessary for its construction was held up from delivery because of the Korean War.

The last of the necessary steel arrived at 2 p.m. Wednesday, which accounts for the sudden rush and the day and night work.

Sales for the concert, Mr. Garran says, have been excellent, with more than 5,000 tickets sold to date. This visit of the Boston Orchestra will be the first time that group has played to a Troy audience in 26 years.

The shell has been patterned after that which is part of the music shed at the Boston Symphony Orchestra summer concerts at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. — the purpose of which is to obtain the best possible acoustics in an otherwise large space or room where the sound would not be likely to carry properly. Such an arrangement has met with great success at Tanglewood and other symphonic concert stadiums.

The shell will be permanent and therefore assures proper acoustics for other future concerts to be given at the Field House.

The program will consist of the "Fidelio Overture" and "Symphony No. 3," better known as "The Eroica" by Beethoven and the "Symphony in D Minor" by Cesar Franck.

BOSTON, MASS. POST
OCT 1 41950

Art Exhibition in Symphony Gallery

Subscribers to the Boston and Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also members and Friends of the Orchestra, will hold their second annual exhibition of paintings in the Symphony Hall Gallery, opening Oct. 27. Each would-be exhibitor may submit two paintings Oct. 23 and from these a "competent but gentle jury" will select the exhibition. Paintings may be in any medium but not less than 8 by 10 inches in size, exclusive of frame and mat.

KALAMAZOO, MICH. GAZETTE
OCT 8- 1950

Munch Wins Acclaim as Conductor

He Will Direct Boston Orchestra Here Oct. 24.

Charles Munch, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert here Oct. 24, is already firmly established in the hearts of Bostonians even though the present season is only his second as conductor of that famed symphony.

Munch, who was not well known in the United States, last year faced the rather unenviable task of replacing Serge Koussevitzky, when the latter retired after directing the Boston Symphony for 25 years.

WINS LAVISH PRAISE

However, from the first concert, he won over his Boston audiences and reviews he received from the critics knew no bounds in their lavish praise.

The 58-year-old Munch was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, the son of a a music teacher. He studied violin and in 1919 became a professor at the Strasbourg Conservatory. Going to Leipzig in 1926, he served as concertmaster in the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwaengler.

He began conducting in Paris in 1932 and founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, later becoming its regular conductor. He first came to America in 1946 when he made his debut conducting the Boston Symphony as a guest.

SECOND IN SERIES

Besides conducting our foremost orchestras in the last two seasons, he took the Orchestre National de la Radiodiffusion Francaise on an autumn tour of the United States in 1948. This outstanding French orchestra made appearances from coast to coast.

During his summer vacation this year Munch conducted a series of concerts in Paris, Brussels and Amsterdam.

The appearance here of the Boston Symphony will be the second in the 1950-51 Community Concert series. The concert will be in the Central high school auditorium.

—Landesman photo
CHARLES MUNCH
Boston Conductor

Booklist of American Library Assn.
CHICAGO, ILL.
OCT 15

Johnson, Harold E Symphony Hall, Boston. 1950. 431p Little. $6

The building that o its fiftieth anni- versary this year has t only the home of the Boston Sympl rchestra but the scene of other music nd cultural events and the affectionate given here is a contribution to Amer as well as Boston musical history. Appe include a list of works performed by t Boston Symphony Orchestra compiled by bers of the staff of Symphony Hall.

785.062744 Symphony Hall Boston
Symphony Orchestra

[137]

Firkusny Soloist in Martinů Concerto

Munch Program Includes Honegger, Franck

By Harold Rogers

Two works new to Boston are listed on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program this week end—Arthur Honegger's Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude, a suite derived from music he wrote in 1928 for Paul Valéry's "Amphion," and Bohuslav Martinů's Third Piano Concerto, written in 1948. Rudolf Firkusny, to whom the concerto is dedicated, was the soloist. Charles Munch opened the program with Handel's Suite from the Music for the Royal Fireworks, and brought it to a close with César Franck's Symphony in D minor.

* * *

It was in the Franck that the fireworks really occurred — a scintillating display from Mr. Munch's personal arsenal. By infusing the symphony with his own dynamic personality, he tightened it here, broadened it there, all the while setting off an impressive array of musical pinwheels, sparklers, and soaring skyrockets. Perhaps no more exciting reading has ever stormed the tympanum, nor, for that matter, a more erratic. If the public has become patronizing toward Franck's chromatic masterpiece, Mr. Munch's version will help to renew their interest. It is different, to say the least.

* * *

One can hardly believe that the Martinů concerto is of our day, conceived, as it is, in a romantic framework in general, and in a Brahmsian mode in particular. A composer might be justified in choosing an earlier style in which to express himself, provided he had more to say in that style than its originators. But Martinů, if anything, says less, though he speaks with refinement, scholarship, and balance. Considering the few contemporary punctuation marks he employs, we might accede to a neo-romantic classification.

Apart from the concerto's anachronism, however, it is an ingratiating piece of music, one that modern ears will find more than easy to bear. The solo instrument is never obscured by the instrumentation.

Mr. Firkusny's interpretation had power and grace. He can gradually develop a climax of tremendous sonority, as he did in the last-movement cadenza, yet without any disagreeable sense of percussion. The elements of performance yesterday afternoon were close to ideal. As a piece of original writing, however, the concerto utterly fails.

* * *

There is no gainsaying that the musical creative activity of our times has long been coasting in the doldrums. Though we can look back on golden ages, we must be satisfied today with bronze. This age in French music has been more or less dominated by three of the French Six—Honegger, Milhaud, and Poulenc. Honegger has been daring, Milhaud prolific, and Poulenc, though having written things of great beauty, is now mainly a musical prankster.

It was the Honegger music that brought the most compelling contribution to yesterday's program. Opening with strong, atmospheric chords of under-water timbre, the first movement proceeds with an interplay of solo instruments, the dramatic use of a saxophone, and an agitated development that opens out into a broad, heroic melody. The harmonies take hold with a bite.

* * *

The fugue is at first ponderous, marcato in treatment, then smoothing into a passage of nostalgic lyricism, only to finish in a dissonant cry of triumph. The finale is stately, recalling the solo saxophone and returning to the original mood of the piece. The conclusion is serene with a shimmering tone from the gong. If Honegger and Martinů could be considered as competitors on this program, then it was Honegger's day.

Boston's Temple of Glory

Symphony Hall's Story Set Down by "A Bostonian by Conviction"

Symphony Hall, Boston, by H. Earle Johnson: Little, Brown and Co., $6.

This voluminous book contains the story of the red brick temple at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts aves. for 50 years the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and as characteristic a part of our city as the Common and Public Garden. The story has been told, on the whole very well, by H. Earle Johnson, born in Connecticut but "a Bostonian by conviction" and, by occupation, an assistant professor of music at Clark University in Worcester.

Symphony Hall is a monument to Maj Henry Lee Higginson's devotion to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded and for so long maintained, and to the spirit of the citizens who subscribed the $750,000 to build it. In half a century, Symphony Hall also has become a tradition and, to those except sports followers, the best-known of all Boston's public gathering places. Built at the turn of the century specifically to house the Boston Symphony, the hall was designed by the architectural firm of McKim, Mead and White, after the Gewandhaus in Leipzig, Ger. The first major work to be performed there was Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, at a special pre-season concert, when the two most expensive series seats, purchased at auction through a broker for the still fabulous amount of $1120, were occupied by Mrs. Jack Gardner and the local pianist, George Proctor.

As a musician, Mr. Johnson naturally devotes by far the greater part of his book to the concerts of the Boston Symphony. There is also a section on the Pops, and a chapter on the personalities who have given miscellaneous independent concerts at Symphony Hall over 50 years.

Symphony Hall came eventually to lead a double life, and it has seen and heard lectures, banquets balls, college commencements, political rallies, religious services plays, movies, book fairs, cooking schools and even, in the early years, automobile shows.

As aforesaid, Mr. Johnson's work is good, but I noticed that he was a little casual about including dates and other specific details, and that his style is often a little prissy and frequently fancy, as witness his paragraph on the death of H. T. Parker.

There are valuable indices of compositions played by the Boston Symphony from 1881 through 1949, of soloists with the orchestra, of orchestras from other cities which have visited Symphony Hall, a selected list of concert artists, and the specifications of the new organ. But, sadly, there is no general index.

This story has had to be mainly factual, but there are touches of color and humor, notably the battle of the women's tall hats in 1908, led by Mrs. Jack Gardner and a few others. The same Mrs. Gardner was also a baseball fan, and in 1904 arrived late at a Friday concert, wearing a hat adorned with a red band and the sentence: "O you Red Sox!"

—CYRUS DURGIN.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 1 41950

Friday, the 13th, Soloist Features Boston's 2d Concert

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the current series in Symphony Hall this afternoon. Charles Munch chose Handel's suite from the Music for the Royal Fireworks as the introductory piece. It was transcribed for orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty.

Although in Handel's day, this work must have been of truly stupendous proportions, it is dwarfed by the gigantic pyrtechnics of the music being ground out today into somewhat of a small firecracker. Regardless, Handel still continues to retain the same richness that he had in the powdered wig era.

* * *

WHAT MAY have been an auditory illusion last week regarding the pinched tone of the orchestra has now stumbled into a disconcerting reality. Despite the dangerously patronizing attitude of the Boston critics, Mr. Munch is letting humpty dumpty sit far too near the edge and a few stiff disciplinary measures can not help but make humpty play a little better in the bargain. These players are all happier than they were under the old regime, but, musicians being human, neither are they working too hard.

The first Boston performance of the prelude, Fugue, and Postlude by Honegger was a meaty one. Actually, this music is quite easy to listen to. It is all tied up with the story of one Amphion, the son of Jupiter, none of the details of which are terribly important. As straight music, however, it is not only extremely listenable, but is really fine music as a whole. The intervals are not pretty in themselves but the piece, although short, has given us some contemporary charm which graces too little of today's works.

* * *

ALSO PERFORMED for the first time in Boston was the Piano Concerto No. 3, by Bohuslav Martinu. The soloist, in a rather luke-warm rendition, was Rudolph Firkusny. At first hearing, the concerto is lesser music than the Honegger piece. It seems to be nothing more on the surface than a changing labyrinth of needless crescendos and diminuendos and Martinu himself seems to have nothing to say.

Firkusny, the soloist, has a frustrating keyboard style. He is forever snapping back ris head in a most unbecoming pose at the end of trifling runs and his technique seems limited to the tops of the keys. A more relaxed and direct approach to the keyboard, the sinking of each finger into the root of each key, and the relaxed resilience of the release, will give a tone which is highly resonant and powerful. Yet this eliminates the awesome banging which accompanies a pianist trying to sound above a spirited orchestra.

* * *

MR. FIRKUSNY was in much too much of a hurry to get his hands off the keyboard and clawing at the keys can be a disconcerting as well as an unproductive habit. Somehow his tremendous follow-through served only to emphasize this lack of power. At bes. the performance was shabbily dependable.

Perhaps it can be chalked up to Friday the 13th, if you are superstitious, but the Franck D Minor Symphony, which closed the program, was a fairly noisy, unsensitive affair. By this time everyone was quite out of sorts and nibbling on their programmes, and wishing they had not come at all. You know, it's funny how when one thing goes badly everything seems to fall apart at the seams. On second thought, let's chalk it up to Friday the 13th after all. That way nobody gets blamed. —F. S.

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
OCT 1 41950

R.P.I. Rushes Work On Music Shell

A crew of more than thirty steel workers, carpenters, electricians and laborers are working day and night at the Field House of Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, in order to complete the new music shell there in time for use by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard under the direction of its conductor, Charles Munch at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday.

According to H. L. Garren, managing director of the Field House, plans for the construction and completion of the shell were made some time ago, but the steel necessary for its construction was held up from delivery because of the Korean War.

The last of the necessary steel arrived at 2 p.m. Wednesday, which accounts for the sudden rush and the day and night work.

Sales for the concert, Mr. Garran says, have been excellent, with more than 5,000 tickets sold to date. This visit of the Boston Orchestra will be the first time that group has played to a Troy audience in 26 years.

The shell has been patterned after that which is part of the musi shed at the Boston Symphony Orchestra summer concerts at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. — the purpose of which is to obtain the best possible acoustics in an otherwise large space or room where the sound would not be likely to carry properly. Such an arrangement has met with great success at Tanglewood and other symphonic concert stadiums.

The shell will be permanent and therefore assures proper acoustics for other future concerts to be given at the Field House.

The program will consist of the "Fidelio Overture" and "Symphony No. 3," better known as "The Eroica" by Beethoven and the "Symphony in D Minor" by Cesar Franck.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 1 41950

Art Exhibition in Symphony Gallery

Subscribers to the Boston and Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also members and Friends of the Orchestra, will hold their second annual exhibition of paintings in the Symphony Hall Gallery, opening Oct. 27. Each would-be exhibitor may submit two paintings Oct. 23 and from these a "competent but gentle jury" will select the exhibition. Paintings may be in any medium but not less than 8 by 10 inches in size, exclusive of frame and mat.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE
OCT 8- 1950

Munch Wins Acclaim as Conductor

He Will Direct Boston Orchestra Here Oct. 24.

Charles Munch, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert here Oct. 24, is already firmly established in the hearts of Bostonians even though the present season is only his second as conductor of that famed symphony.

Munch, who is not well known in the United States, last year faced the rather unenviable task of replacing Serge Koussevitzky, when the latter retired after directing the Boston Symphony for 25 years.

WINS LAVISH PRAISE

However, from the first concert, he won over his Boston audiences and reviews he received from the critics knew no bounds in their lavish praise.

The 58-year-old Munch was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, the son of a music teacher. He studied violin and in 1919 became a professor at the Strasbourg Conservatory. Going to Leipzig in 1926, he served as concertmaster in the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwaengler.

He began conducting in Paris in 1932 and founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, later becoming its regular conductor. He first came to America in 1946 when he made his debut conducting the Boston Symphony as a guest.

SECOND IN SERIES

Besides conducting our foremost orchestras in the last two seasons, he took the Orchestre National de la Radiodiffusion Francaise on an autumn tour of the United States in 1948. This outstanding French orchestra made appearances from coast to coast.

During his summer vacation this year Munch conducted a series of concerts in Paris, Brussels and Amsterdam.

The appearance here of the Boston Symphony will be the second in the 1950-51 Community Concert series. The concert will be in the central high school auditorium.

—Landesman photo
CHARLES MUNCH
Boston Conductor

Booklist of American Library Assn.
CHICAGO, ILL.
OCT 15 1950

Johnson, Harold Earle. Symphony Hall, Boston. 1950. 431p. Little, $6.

The building that observes its fiftieth anniversary this year has been not only the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but the scene of other musical and cultural events and the affectionate review given here is a contribution to American as well as Boston musical history. Appendixes include a list of works performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra compiled by members of the staff of Symphony Hall.

780.062744 Symphony Hall, Boston || Boston Symphony Orchestra

[137]

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report For the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Sir Thomas Beecham, one of the great conductors, will appear at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. Only once before has he been there, though we have since heard him at the Opera House and in a Jordan Hall lecture. It was in 1928 that he led the Boston Symphony as guest, in a program drawn from Handel, Mozart, Berlioz, Delius and Strauss, composers with whom his name has been closely associated. Next Sunday he will direct his own orchestra, the Royal Philharmonic of London, now on its first visit to the United States.

* * *

Symphony orchestras are unwieldy things to transport, and interchange of them between Europe and America counts as an event. The only American orchestras to get to Europe so far have been the New York Symphony under Damrosch, the New York Philharmonic under Toscanini and the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy. A second Great Britain tour by the last-named is planned for next summer. During all his 25 years as head of the Boston Symphony Koussevitzky dreamed vainly of taking it abroad.

* * *

We, on the other hand, have been visited by French and Italian orchestras; but so far as I know, the only previous English one to come to us was the London Symphony, brought over here by the B.S.O.'s ex-conductor, Arthur Nikisch. H. Earle Johnson's "Symphony Hall, Boston," reviewed here a fortnight ago, has this to say about the Boston concert:

"The conducting of Nikisch lingered in memory. Accordingly he was welcomed back with the London Symphony Orchestra, in a highly publicized American tour. Mr. Nikisch took no risks with debatable music, selecting an overture by Beethoven, Brahms's First Symphony, works by Tchaikovsky and Wagner. Although regarded as one of the world's finest, Bostonians found the strings brilliant with a hard polish and without sensuousness, the wood winds of inferior quality, as winds not played by Frenchmen invariably are in comparison, and the brass coarse and blatant. On the favorable side, it found the orchestra singularly plastic, and responsive to the conductor's slightest wish." . . . Let us hope the Royal Philharmonic makes a better impression.

Most Europeans who have conducted our top-flight orchestras declare them to be the best in the world. Sir Thomas, who has a mind of his own and thoroughly enjoys pricking bubbles and exploding bombshells, has gone on record as saying that they are as good as the best European ones, but by no means superior to them. Our orchestras are maintained on a more expensive scale and devote more time to rehearsals, but man for man they are not necessarily better than those of Europe. It boils down to a question of whether a national orchestra is to be preferred to an international one, and the cosmopolitanism of the American organizations has been considered their great asset. We have gone to France for our woodwinds, to central Europe for our strings and brass, etc. We are constantly receiving recordings of European orchestras and they make a very good showing, though we are told that recorded performances are rehearsed more thoroughly than those in the concert hall. The English strings and brass should strike us next Sunday as being closer to our ideals in such matters than those of the French Orchestre National, which came to us two years ago with Charles Munch as its head. There were some who found the French strings thin and the brass tinny.

Anyway, to hear the Royal Philharmonic should be an experience, and it is to be hoped that Boston will not display its customary apathy where visiting orchestras are concerned. Mr. Munch has made the statement that we should regard this concert as a special event of the Boston Symphony's 70th season and respond accordingly. Also we should make the most of the London orchestra, since we are not going to hear that of Amsterdam (one of the very finest), whose projected American tour has been cancelled.

And then there is Sir Thomas himself, not only a great conductor but an extraordinary personality, and with a most unusual background. Heir to millions, and a baronet to boot, he has worked harder than most men, and he has uniquely filled the triple role of artist, impresario and financial angel. A man of intellect and of wide interests, he is a remarkable English stylist, as his autobiography, "A Mingled Chime," amply proves. Bernard Shaw has called him the only truly adult conductor he has ever known. His Boston program will consist of Mozart's Paris Symphony, Haydn's No. 93, unplayed at Symphony Hall for 50 years, the Elgar Cello Concerto, which we do not know, with Anthony Pini as soloist, and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Strauss' "Salome."

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

Throng Hears Boston Symphony

By CLIF BRADT

A fall accent to the Berkshire Festival came last night to Troy, where the huge Field House of Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute became for the moment the Tanglewood Shed, but there was one major difference, Charles Munch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was on the podium and from his personality and French musical background was reflected a concert of dynamic power that gave a new and different flavor to the orchestra's efforts.

THE KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
ALBANY, OCT. 18, 1950

There is a strange detachment of almost wistful humor about Munch's facial expression but not in the forthright manner of his conducting, in which one senses tremendous power that is only partially unleashed, even in the strongest passages of the music.

What probably was the largest musical audience of its kind ever gather under one roof in the Capital District heard Beethoven's Symphony, No. 3, the socalled "Eroica," played in a manner that brought out in the first movement the tenseness, the sinister explosive power that motivated Beethoven when he declared himself, in this symphony, liberated from classical tradition.

In the unutterable mystery of the funeral march sections of the second movement, Munch displayed a forte for giving the music every opportunity to speak for itself, rather than adorn it with the foibles of overconducting.

The same was true with Franck's Symphony in D Minor, once considered less profound than is now realized. Thus, without becoming ornate, as many conductors do with the D Minor, Munch opened up the realistic depths of this poignant, at times deeply tragic study of the duality and mystery of man's emotional life. The audience recognized the worth of his efforts in the ovation accorded him at the end of the concert.

The overture from Beethoven's "Fidelio," the more theatrical frontpiece that eventually remained with the score after the previous overtures became the Lenore No. 1 and No. 2, struck the mood of the concert, but kept the program within romantic confines, where a modern work have added a dash of spice.

The accoustics were surprisingly good, considering the cavernous hall, and attested to the efforts made in that direction.

A replica scaled within a few inches of the shell before which the orchestra plays at Tanglewood was constructed and some baffling of the superstructure of the Field House produced a good balancing of the orchestra sections with minor exceptions, such as overaccenting of the brass in passages of the Franck second movement, which probably was due more to the orchestra. Nevertheless, such delicacies as the pizzicato strings and the oboe and flute songs of the Allegretto came through exquisitely.

Boston Symphony Given Big Ovation in Coliseum

BY THOLA TABOR SCHENCK

A cordial crowd of Boston Symphony and Charles Munch enthusiasts welcomed the celebrated musical organization last night at New York State Fair Coliseum in their second successive concert presented by Famous Artists. Ovational tribute greeted the genial musical director's entry on stage, followed each programmed number and mounted to a frenzied clamor at the concert's end.

Acoustics were improved by the Blankenchip shell and the list of compositions performed was arranged to produce the utmost in effect for listeners. The opening Beethoven Overture to "Fidelio", beautifully performed under the musicianly direction of a baton master set an atmosphere of intent concentration on every choir of the orchestra and occasional prominence of individual instrument.

Conducting entirely without a score thruout, Munch spares neither himself nor his players in his confident building of exquisite melody, the blending of each creator's masterpiece into a whole tonal picture, permitting no applause between movements.

The long work was the fourth symphony by Brahms in E minor. Many who were hearing the work for the first time, the thousands to whom the four movements are familiar have never heard a better reading. The spirited Allegro, the melodic theme over plucked strings of Andante; the sparkling color of descending chromatics of the graceful Allegro giocoso and the crashing fortissimo of the final Allegro stirred emotional awe at its perfection. The first flutist came forward to acknoweldge special tribute.

Part II was given over to program music. The ever alluring "La Mer" by Debussy who loved and heard the sea in so many composition of his album of ethereal tone pictures was played first. Titled "Trois Esquises Synphoniques," the surge of drums, the mysterious ebb and flow of softly slipping speed and the clamoring forte passages challenged the imagination in interpretative sound.

Roussel's descriptive ballet music, "Bacchus et Ariane," mood music of the dance, was a gratifying score for closing. The music follows closely the story of the maiden's dream dance, her tripping duet with Bacchus when awakened, and ends with the whirling fortissimo of abandoned ecstasy in the Bacchanale.

The director and some of his staff remained in Syracuse at Hotel Syracuse over night, the musicians entraining by special car for Rochester last night. So, Director Munch will share his birthday, Oct. 19 with Syracuse and Rochester, where they will appear in concert tonight.

SYRACUSE POST-STANDARD
October 19, 1950

Boston Symphony Draws 6,000 to Concert at RPI

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

An audience of nearly 6,000 music lovers converged at the new RPI Field house in Troy, Tuesday night, to listen to the Boston Sympnony orchestra in its first appearance in the Albany Metropolitan area in 26 years. The conversion of the auditorium from a sports arena to a magnificent concert hall bore out the motto of the engineering school: "Knowledge and Thoroughness."

Congratulations are in order for Joel E. Dolven of Albany, musical director of RPI who conceived the idea of bringing the orchestra to Troy and to H. L. Garren, director of the Field house for the excellent seating arrangements and acoustical perfection. The portable shell is an exact duplicate of the one at Tanglewood.

CHARLES MUNCH, the Alsatian, who succeeded Dr. Koussevitzky as permanent conductor of the world-famous orchestra, is a man and musician of the highest artistic stature. He has vigor, personality and great imaginative qualities in his concept and realization of the potentialities of the music he essays to perform. It was evident to the least initiate of his vast audience that he has a catholicity of musical taste, with Beethoven and Cesar Franck receiving magnificent recreation under his vigorous personality. His leonine head and articulate arms and fingers encompass tremendous emotional horizons, with his mobile face taking on an almost benign expression after some particulary gratifying passage of exquisite beauty.

After the playing of the National anthem, which brought the audience to its feet, Mr. Munch went gracefully and melodiously into the overture to "Fidelio" as a prelude to the sonorities of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. It was interesting to see the treatment accorded the second movement, marked: "Funeral March." Under Mr. Munch's inspired baton, the section emerged as more of a choral requiem than the inexorable rhythmic pulse of a march for the dead.

THE CESAR FRANCK symphony which closed the program was a veritable exploration of the possibilities of a modern orchestra. Conducting without score, Dr. Munch injected a note of exhaltation, calling upon each individual member of the orchestra to give of his very best. The resulting collaboration was exciting, glorious music, majestically played. The conductor was called back to the podium to acknowledge the almost fanatic applause, many times.

The one ironic note to the whole evening was the fact that hundreds of Albanians had to journey to Troy in order to hear a concert in a public auditorium worthy of the great orchestra which brought music lovers to that city from a radius of 100 miles.

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
OCT 18 1950

Symphony Provides Outstanding Concert

By KEITH MARVIN.

With a stunning albiet somewhat erratic performance of the famous "Symphony in D Minor" by the nineteenth century Belgian romantic composer, Casar Franck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its new permanent conductor, Charles Munch, brought to a close a thrilling concert before nearly 6,000 persons at R.P.I.'s Field House last night.

This marked the first concert to be given in Troy by that august group since 1924, when the orchestra performed under Serge Koussevitzky, also a new permanent conductor of the orchestra in those days.

Last night's program also marked the first major concert to be held in the new Field House. It was, perhaps, the most significant musical event in Troy history in the twenty-six years since the group played before the Trojan audience. As is known, the Boston Orchestra today is probably the No. 1 orchestra in the United States and perhaps in the world.

Not Ideal.

As far as the program was concerned however, the "Fidelio Overture" by Beethoven and the ever-famous "Eroica" or Third Symphony by the same composer, plus the Franck symphony was far from ideal. The "Fidelio' was put on the program at the last moment in place of an overture by the American contemporary, Samuel Barber, but not matter—the concert was one of the finest heard in the area for many a year.

The Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72b, by Beethoven opered the program and worth mentioning was the attack given by the conductor and the orchestra. Munch was facing the orchestra for a few moments seemingly taking in the audience when, without warning he wheeled about, raised his hands, brought them down, and the concert had begun.

The string section was particicularly fine, and was admirably aided by the woodwinds, horns and percussion. The overture is cast in Beethoven's classical style, and in view of what was to follow—the "Eroica" and the Franck "D Minor," saved the program from being one consisting of old warhorses, the latter two symphonies being legion in the concert repertory of any symphony orchestra.

Wrong Applause.

Aside from the unfortunate applause on the part of the audience between movements of the symphonies, there was a dead hush throughout the evening's performance.

With another whirlwind opening, the "Eroica" was underway, and beautifully played. From any point of view it was an outstanding performance. The majestic opening lovingly performed, and the dirge-like opening of the second movement following the mood. Superlatives might be easily lost in attempting a description of this beautiful section. The gay third movement followed in rapid suit and the majestic finale with its famous and ever-popular theme completed the picture.

The Franck "Symphony in D Minor", also a favorite with concert goers, was rather amazing because of the faster tempo with which it was taken. Crescendos, always required in the Belgian master's great work, were very fine indeed, as was the shimmering brilliance with which the orchestra generally performed the movement. The thrilling climax to the concert brought a tremendous applause from the audience and the conductor took several curtain calls.

Troy has always been noted as a musical city, but from indications tonight at the Field House, with its fine acoustics and more than ample seating capacity, the city has definitely arrived in musical facilities. This concert should prove the point.

[136]

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
OCT 20 1950

Boston Symphony Applauded

By A. J. WARNER

What tradition has made the crowning event of Rochester's musical year, the annual visit of the Boston Symphony, has usually been a Winter attraction.

This year, the famous organization, long since one of the shining jewels in the world's orchestral crown, came to town ere the Autumn leaves have ceased to fall, and last night once again brought joy and beauty to the Eastman Theater, where a great audience conferred the merited accolade of its applause on the conductor, Charles Munch, and his accomplished musicians.

WARNER

There were some new faces among the players, or so it seemed, as must inevitably happen, as one year follows another, but the sovereign power of the Boston Symphony exerted its accustomed spell throughout an evening that held the kind of aural benison which lies within the province of this matchless band to bestow.

In the hands of Mr. Munch, eminent French musician, the orchestra has a magnetic leader, who is an interpreter steeped in the music at hand, even as he is neither a sensationalist nor a "prima donna" conductor, although always a compelling one.

HANDEL SUITE FIRST

The evening began with a Suite from the "Music For the Royal Fireworks," by George Frideric Handel, transcribed by Sir Hamilton Harty, which, in its performance, had all the vigor and splendor, and the feeling for the stately line, of the lovely Handelian melody, such as Handel alone, who lived as magnificently as he wrote, could achieve.

Next came an arresting Suite by Arthur Honegger, "Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude," which was played with eloquent expressiveness, its vivid instrumental effects being proclaimed with all the virtuosity inherent in the score. Especially rewarding was the Second Suite from the second act of Albert Roussel's ballet, "Bacchus et Ariane," a work little known in America and singularly engaging when performed as it was last night by Mr. Munch, whose specialty it is, and by the musicians under his direction. For one could hardly imagine a reading more in the spirit of this gifted pupil of Cesar Franck, Roussel's art suggesting the best French landscape painters, the solidity of the music's frame-work laid over with infinite delicacy, charm and originality.

REMEMBERED 'EROICA'

Followng the intermission the concert was brought to a close with a meticulous and carefully detailed performance of Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica," which had directness and life and was gratefully free of the unnecessary variations of tempo in which so many modern conductors indulge. If it was not always surcharged with rugged power, it was rhetorically effective, an "Eroica" to be gratefully remembered, for the form was realized in scholarly fashion, even though the outline of the presentation was, perhaps, less "heroic" than reflective, more intimate and beseeching than overwhelming: "A spiritual woven signal for all nations, emblem of man, elate above death."

And how beautifully the orchestra played it!

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 21 1950

Munch Maintains High Quality of Boston Orchestra

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

WHEN Charles Munch made his first appearance here last Fall as the newly appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he immediately impressed his hearers as an interpreter who possessed a unique ability to reach beyond the letter of a score to capture the inner spirit of the music in a very personal and intense way.

This impression was reaffirmed Friday evening when he and the Bostonians, presented by Zorah B. Berry, gave vivid readings of works by Beethoven, Debussy, Roussel and Franck before a capacity audience in Kleinhans Music Hall.

The orchestra responds to Mr. Munch's directing with something akin to rapturous enthusiasm. There will be those who will say that it doesn't sound like the Boston Symphony of old, meaning, of course, like the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who was chiefly responsible for bringing the organization to its preeminence as one of the leading orchestras in the world.

* * *

WELL IT DOES AND it doesn't. The precision, high technical standard, musicianship and the tonal richness of a top-flight ensemble are still there. On the other hand, the patrician patina, born of the meticulous training that made the orchestra like a delicately-coiled hair-spring, has been replaced by a youthful, exhilarating and—one is tempted to add—more red-blooded spirit.

Mr. Munch's own overflowing poetic and fiery temperament is essentially responsible, I'd say, for this change.

The Franck symphony, for instance, was given a highly charged, pulsating performance. The conductor's emotional feeling for the music enkindled the players and the result was an interpretation that emphasized the exultant spirit of the score and allowed no sentimentalization.

Mr. Munch did not hesitate to take the opening slow measures somewhat faster than we sometimes hear them, and again, to pace the beginning of the finale very fast. His climaxes might seem to some to have been extravagant. Nevertheless, the rhythmic line had a logic and continuity, both of which can, and do, elude many interpreters of this symphony.

Furthermore, do you censure a poet if he is carried away by the response in his heart to a poem he is declaiming? Or an actor if he is carried away by a role and sweeps his listeners with him? Not as long as what seems extravagance springs from a natural passionate response to the work of art.

* * *

MR. MUNCH GAVE DEBUSSY'S "La Mer" a reading that spelled out with finely defined clarity its incomparable mystery and alluring spell, its fantasy and swirl of sea and cloud.

He also introduced to Buffalo Albert Roussel's Second "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite, which he directed at its concert premiere in Paris in 1936. A brilliantly colored and glittering work, the ballet suite received a scintillating performance that made the most of its propulsive quality. A lively presentation of Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture opened the program.

Enthusiasm for Mr. Munch and the orchestra ran high throughout the evening.

DEMOCRAT AND CHRONICLE
26 Rochester, N. Y.
Friday, October 20, 1950

Munch Accorded Long Ovation With Boston

By NORMAN NAIRN

CONTINUING its superlative ways under Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave another feast to the ears at the Eastman last night, arousing the large audience to enthusiasm reaching ovation proportions.

It took the Beethoven Symphony No. 3 (Eroica) in a marvelously dramatic reading to reach the peak of the evening. For here Munch immersed himself completely in the music—which immersion is the mark of a great conductor—never missing the logic of the towering structure, sending his hearers home grateful for such a contribution.

There was the illusion of spontaneity, too, which makes an orchestra plastic. The titanic quality of the music, with its surges of energy, its sweeping utterances, was moving in its intensity. The essence of Beethoven here is spaciousness, grandeur, nobility of spirit. Munch probed all these qualities.

The playful Scherzo, with its famous and difficult horn passages, came off splendidly, preceded by the poignancy of the Marcia funebre, greatest of all dirges, a sort of crystalization of spiritual and emotional utterance. And the Finale was notable for surety and vigor.

* * *

FROM its earliest days the Boston Symphony has been an orchestra to hear, nearly always nothing short of equisite. Possibly it was the choice of program which made it not quite that last night, for our Philharmonic audiences are not quite in sympathy with such works as Arthur Honegger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude.

It is one which Munch is introducing to his Boston following this season, although not its premiere in this country, for Ernest Ansermet conducted it with the Dallas Symphony early last year.

Honegger, French composer, formerly of "The Six," pursued his dissonant way in this piece, which so far as most of the audience was concerned had strictly intellectual appeal. Your reviewer confesses to receiving no deep inspiration or thrill. The audience gave it just a polite reception. It was here that the horns and trumpets departed from the strict and narrow path. One could hardly blame them.

* * *

Another contemporary French work of far different character is Albert Roussel's Second Suite extracted from ballet, "Bacchus et Ariadne," which so far as I know has not been heard here.

It has an exquisite quality, fascinating in its orchestral colors, emotional, exciting in some of its episodes, wholly enjoyable. The glorious string quality for which the orchestra is famous had full sway here.

Munch opened with Sir Hamilton Harty's transcription of Handel's Royal Fireworks Music, a stunning performance, with the sonorous Overture, the grace and finesse of the Alla Siciliano for strings only. The contrast between the soft woodwinds answering the more positive strings in the Bourree was strikingly effective, the Menuetto sturdy.

Three members of the orchestra, former Eastmanites, had a time in the afternoon renewing old acquaintance, Harold Meek, French horn; Willis Page and Henry Freeman, double basses.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
OCT 23 1950

Power Biggs Soloist With Symphony

Returning from its tour of cities in New York state and Michigan, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third pair of concerts of the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series this week on Oct. 27-28. Charles Munch will devote the program to the music of Bach and Handel.

E. Power Biggs as soloist, playing the new organ in Symphony Hall, will be heard in Handel's Concerto No. 13 ("The Cuckoo and the Nightingale"). He will also appear with the orchestra in the Sinfonia from the 29th Cantata of Bach. The same composer's Sixth Brandenburg Concerto will be performed by the string orchestra and his Second Brandenburg Concerto with Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Roger Voisin, trumpet. The program will end with the Third Suite in D Major, famous for its Air.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
OCT 23 1950

Conductors-Soloists For Symphony Series

Guest conductors and soloists are announced for the series of six Sunday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Charles Munch conductor, and for the remaining eight concerts of the Tuesday evening series. Serge Koussevitzky, who has been invited by Mr. Munch to conduct in this the 70th season of the orchestra, will take the next Tuesday concert on Nov. 21 and the second Sunday concert on Dec. 3. Pierre Monteux, also returning to conduct the orchestra which was once his, will be heard in the Sunday series on Jan. 28.

Notable soloists for the Sunday series are Patricia Travers, violinist, on Feb. 2, and Joseph Battista, the pianist, on April 1. In the Tuesday series Ania Dorfman, the pianist, will be heard on Dec. 19 and Miss Travers on March 6. These soloists will not be heard in the Friday and Saturday series this season.

Music Review

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its second visit to Buffalo with Charles Munch in command, last evening in Kleinhans Music Hall under the sponsorship of Zorah Berry. Munch's first appearance made a good impression and a capacity audience was on hand for the second.

The program of the evening called for Beethoven's Fidelio Overture, Debussy's La Mer, Roussel's Bacchus et Ariane Suite and the Cesar Frank Symphony in D Minor.

There is no denying Munch's ability when it comes to symphonic effect and coloring. Given to the use of extremes in all departments and particular emphasis on the application of accent, the Frank Symphony was fashioned by Munch to form a complete finale to the evening. The breadth and stature of the tonal monument was beautifully engineered with keen appreciation for the tempo of growth and the impact of climax.

Shining above the major work was the Roussel Ballet, the one work on the schedule new to Buffalo audiences. Here a story was told, and related so well that characters and surroundings were clear almost to the point of vividness. The awakening of Ariane, the appearance of Bacchus, the rise and fall of the impetuous dance and the mounting fury of the Bacchanale would sell the actual ballet to all who attended. A simple explanation of orchestra and conductor in this work would be—tremendous.

At no time did the orchestra play badly, yet in the Fidelio Overture, performance could have been improved. The unison of thought carried later in the Roussel work and the Frank Symphony were not yet present, nor was the solidness of the Beethoven form.

The Debussy poems were something of a disappointment as well, especially when followed by the magnificent ballet. The apparent desire to grip the attendance completely with over-muted mumblings and furious shocks of fortissimo were extreme contrasts inclined to muddy the lacy echoes and harshen the towering chords of the seascape. K. G.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 1950

For Proper Bostonians

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON. By H. Earle Johnson. Illustrated. 431 pp. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $6.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

SYMPHONY HALL in Boston is a fine concert hall. It is not superior to several other such structures in this and other countries, but as the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it has [illegible] and beneficent influence in the world of music, and its service has gone beyond music. As Mr. Johnson puts it, "In the community of Boston and its environs it is a touchstone for testing ideas, old and new, stimulated, published and brought into the focus of present-day living."

Mr. Johnson, former music editor and now Assistant Professor of Music at Clark University, has done an exhaustive job of examining the hall's history and uses. He tells in detail how the building was planned and constructed. He pays his respects to Henry Lee Higginson, the man who founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1880 and then made possible this home for it. He relates the excitement (which took on a proper Bostonian cast, of course) attending the opening of this new hall.

FROM an examination of Boston at the beginning of the century and the hall itself, Mr. Johnson turns to the people and institutions that have given meaning to the building's existence. He provides what amounts to a short history of the Boston Symphony. He gives full information about conductors, programs and soloists. There is a full chapter devoted to Serge Koussevitzky and the twenty-five years of his stewardship at the head of the orchestra. Mr. Johnson does not fail to make clear Mr. Koussevitzky's contribution not only to Boston but to music everywhere, as he recounts the conductor's continuing concern with contemporary music.

This is a book that will have special appeal to Bostonians and to people like Mr. Johnson who are "Bostonians by conviction." For the reader with no particular passion for Boston there is too much material in it that seems strictly for the record (witness the six appendices, including one devoted to all the works performed by the Boston Symphony and another to the specifications of the new organ installed in the summer of 1949).

Mr. Taubman is music editor of this newspaper.

[139]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 22 1950

A FRIEND OF MUSIC

Mrs. Coolidge, Patron of the Art, Will Be Honored at Washington Festival

By OLIN DOWNES

THE seventh chamber music festival and the twenty-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the Coolidge Foundation which has made these festivals the epochal force which they are in our national musical life takes place next Saturday, Sunday and Monday, Oct. 21, 22 and 23 in the Coolidge Auditorium of the Library of Congress in Washington. The last day of the festival is the eighty-sixth birthday of its founder, who has not inappropriately been called the "patron saint" of chamber music in America: Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge.

Mrs. Coolidge's immense benefactions for chamber music started when she established the Berkshire Chamber Music Festival in 1918 at South Mountain in the Berkshires. This festival assembled leading musicians and chamber music organizations of the nation as performers, and periodically offered prizes and commissions for new compositions which received first performances at the festival. Thus the enterprise, founded and developed by a lady who is not only an exceptionally sincere and farsighted patron of music, but herself an accomplished musician and student of the art, gave new impetus to the cultivation of chamber music in the land.

No Happy Lot

Up to that time the lot of the American composer of instrumental music in its smaller forms had not been a happy one. There were few chamber music organizations of sufficient resources or influence far-reaching enough to benefit the native composer to any great extent.

Now, from 1918 onward, chamber music organizations began to multiply, and composers too. In the first year of the festival eighty-six scores of chamber music were presented in competition for the prize offered at the time, which was $1,000, with a guarantee of the work's early performance. The first prize-winner was a notable contribution to the repertory, the Suite for Viola and Piano by Ernest Bloch, which, incidentally, will reappear on the program of next Saturday evening's concert.

In the second year a total of one hundred and thirty-six new scores was submitted. The scores came from North and South America and most of the nations of Europe. Evidently, thanks to the initiative and generosity of Mrs. Coolidge, composers were becoming newly chamber-music-conscious! Not that there had been no local chamber music organizations of excellence in the years previous, or that chamber music had failed to be cultivated in different cities and especially in the homes of amateur devotees of the art, perhaps more numerous then than now, over the country. But here was a greater area of music in intimate and distinctive ensemble forms than had previously existed.

Festival Beginnings

One cannot go farther here into the particulars of the Berkshire festivals given under Mrs. Coolidge's auspices in the twenty years from 1918 to 1938 at Pittsfield. We skip to the beginning, in 1925, of the festivals at Washington.

It was then that the plan which Mrs. Coolidge had been harboring for some years in her mind came to fruition. She had envisioned a chamber music festival established on a broader and more enduring basis than anything she had been able to accomplish in the Berkshires, one which would have a national scope and significance, and that would endure in a future far beyond the lifetime of the festival's founder. Mrs. Coolidge was finally able to persuade the nation's Congress and the properly cautious authorities of the Library of Congress to knock a hole in a wall, adjacent to the quarters occupied by the Music Division, by this means making available to the Government of the United States the gift of an auditorium admirably equipped for the performance of stage and chamber music.

This accomplished, Mrs. Coolidge promptly proceeded to the next necessary step, namely, the establishment of the Coolidge Foundation, which by its funds would perpetuate the functioning of the auditorium in the purposes for which it was intended. These can be briefly described by a few words from a statement that she made at the time.

"I have wished," she said in part, "to make possible, through the Library of Congress, the composition and performance of music in ways which might otherwise have been considered too unique or too expensive to be ordinarily undertaken * * * as an occasional possibility of giving precedence to consideration of quality over those of quantity * * * to opportunity rather than expediency."

Achievements

In the intervening years from 1925 the Coolidge Auditorium has held hundreds of concerts. Over 200 compositions of chamber music have been presented in the course of ten seasons, many of them commissioned by the foundation. A by-product of these performances, of great value to the library, is the collection of composers' manuscripts of works which have received first performances there. When a score is commissioned by the foundation one condition is attached: the manuscript belongs to the Music Division of the library. There are no other strings attached. The new work is thenceforth the complete and exclusive possession of the composer.

Composers have augmented this collection by voluntary gifts. These gifts are not exclusively by those whose works have been presented at the American festivals, for Mrs. Coolidge's benefactions have not been confined to the programs of Pittsfield and Washington. She has subsidized three festivals in Europe, also the efforts of individual composers at home and abroad.

Four important new works have been commissioned for this festival of 1950. They are a quartet by William Schuman, a piano quintet by Robert Palmer, a quartet by Aaron Copland, and the "Cinque Favole" of Malipiero. The novelties of the programs will be supplemented by certain of the most important scores commissioned for this festival in past seasons: by "Apollon Musagète," the ballet of Stravinsky and the ballet by Copland, "Appalachian Spring," by the repetition of the work which was first-prize winner of the Berkshire music festivals—the Bloch score aforesaid—and by a composition which Mrs. Coolidge commissioned and for which she arranged the first public performance in Paris in 1946—Ravel's "Chansons Madécasses."

The first concert is on Saturday afternoon next. The program is of quartets, including the new quartet by William Schuman. The second concert, in the evening, will be of vocal and instrumental chamber music, including the Ravel songs, the Bloch suite, and Jennie Tourel's interpretations of the Mussorgsky "Songs and Dances of Death." The program of Sunday afternoon will be of music by Mozart and Brahms and the new piano quintet of Palmer. On Sunday night the music will be for piano and strings, and will include the first performance of the string quartet of Copland. The final birthday program, on Monday night, will be of vocal and orchestral music. It includes the two ballets of Copland and Stravinsky and, as the last of the novelties, the "Cinque Favole" of Malipiero.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
OCT 23 1950

Boston Orchestra Concert Has Imprint Of Greatness

By Carl Gehring

Last evening's concert at Hill Auditorium bore the imprint of greatness from first to last. Fundamental in making the occasion one of such heroic stature was an all-Beethoven program composed of the Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72-b; the First Symphony in C Major, Op. 21, and the "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3 in E-Flat Major, Op. 55. While the concluding work, of course, is identified as "Heroic," and was all that the title implies in its realization, let there be no mistake about the "Fidelio" Overture and the First Symphony: they, too, are Beethoven, and they also were done in heroic style.

A great orchestra and an old friend, the Boston Symphony, did the honors at this second concert of the Choral Union Series, while Charles Munch re-enforced the fine impression we had had of him when he directed this group in two concerts here last season and the French National Orchestra two years ago. Munch seems to have a yen for Beethoven, as evidenced by the fact that he did the Fifth Symphony at the first concert here last year and the "Egmont" Overture and Seventh Symphony at the second. With all of these, as on this occasion, he projected noble music as only great men can do.

A Vital Experience

Those who were exposed to such a vital experience of spiritual uplift and exaltation, as was last evening's, are better fortified to meet the stresses of these trying times. The strength and fortitude inherent in the music of men like Beethoven, as distinguished from the mere heroics of lesser figures, communicate courage and are tremendously sustaining. The effect of hearing Beethoven as performed by Munch and his orchestra, in sum, was like that of reading Robert Frost in the hours that followed Pearl Harbor.

Oct. 22, incidentally, was a date of great significance in American music for it was 69 years ago that this orchestra gave its first concert in Boston. Perhaps intrigued by the fact that it was a birthday anniversary, the musicians quite outdid themselves at this time. Perfection was the rule in all the many phases of orchestral performance, with a string section which was wondrously expressive and of great elasticity and depth of tone; a wood choir of the most striking sheen and clarity, and brasses which had just the right authority without unduly arresting one's attention.

In the matter of ensemble and orchestral balance, bouquets are due the director for his synthesis of the forces under his command. The incisiveness with which the opening staccato chords of the "Fidelio" Overture were struck off was a perfect example of the instrumental integration and compelling drive which characterized the evening. This series of chords, twice sounded, constrasted well with the smooth elegance of intervening legato passages in slow tempo, while the succeeding allegro was run through with that satisfying sense of objectives adroitly achieved.

The First Symphony, Beethoven for all its identification with the style of Haydn, was a dream. As interpreted by Munch, its music said just what it had to say, no more and no less. The handling of the slow introduction to the first movement and its resolution into the Allegro Con Brio, for example, was masterful; the simplicity of the second movement was beautifully maintained; in the Menuetto, the interplay of the instruments fairly sparkled, with the incisiveness of the string figurations in the Trio recalling Sir George Grove's description of "a delicious dialogue between the wind and the stringed instruments."

Heroic Performance

The performance of the "Eroica" Symphony was completely in keeping with its title. A long and learned first movement was articulated with the utmost lucidity and was tremendously moving; the second movement had such sweep and scope as to seem to transcend its designation as Funeral March, and the incorporated fugal treatment was worked out with great skill; the Scherzo was brilliant, with the contrast between its fitful opening and closing sections and the sedate Trio well wrought; in the Finale, Munch's gifts for synthesis shone at their best.

A new arrangement of the musicians had the double basses shifted to the right of the platform for better synchronization with the celli, and this necessitated a slight movement to the left for the timpani. In the matter of performance, the basses were magnificent in the opening measures of the Funeral March from the "Eroica," as was the first oboe. Right on the beam, also, were the French horns in a tricky passage from the Trio of the Scherzo in this same Symphony. Here a high E-flat as often as not spells trouble for the first horn player, but not a crack was heard on this occasion.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
OCT 23 1950

ue story.

A Review: Full House Hails Boston Orchestra

By HARVEY TAYLOR
Music Editor

SYMPHONY HUNGRY Detroiters, nearly 5,000 of them, filled every seat, including some in the orchestra pit, and bought SRO tickets Saturday evening to hear the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch.

Except for Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, the program consisted of works of the French school.

This is the second time we have heard the fiery, hard working, Alsatian-born Munch conduct the Boston and on neither of these occasions has he given us the thrill he did when he conducted the Orchestre National Francais here more than two years ago.

STRIVES FOR CLARITY

Could it be that the long shadow of Serge Koussevitzky still hangs over this orchestra and that, so far, its performers have not quite forgotten his two decade dominance?

The orchestra played superbly, but, and it may have simply been the program, it did not seem to us that it had the quality we remembered.

It may be that Munch, in his incessant striving for Gallic clarity, which he always succeeds in attaining, stresses rhythm rather than color and phrase detail rather than overall conception of each composition.

We're indebted to Munch, however, for revealing to us niceties in rhythm, phrasing and counterpoint in Debussy's "La Mar," which many other conductors overlook in their efforts for what program annotators call "impressionistic coloration" and other lush effects.

TEMPO REFRESHING

As Munch did it, "La Mar" seemed the work of a man rather than that of a languid hedonist. Whether this is good Debussy or not we couldn't say.

Similarly, in the Franck symphony, the second movement of which we've heard collapse completely and had half blamed on faulty composition, we found ourselves hearing clearly for the first time. In this entire work Munch's passion for clarity, virility of rhythm and devil-may-care tempos was extremely refreshing.

In Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" ballet suite (No. 2) Munch nearly had the brass and percussion blowing off the roof in Bacchanale and the rhythm was defined with savage brilliance. The piece should be heard oftener.

It's still a little hard for us to forget Koussevitzky, but Munch, an entirely different kind of conductor, is an exciting musical personality.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
OCT 23 1950

A Gala Event Is Concert of Bostonians

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN

RELYING, as Detroit must, on its sister cities for symphonic music, it is still a town with audiences for that sort of thing; as witness the full 5,000 inhabitants of these shores who came to the Masonic Auditorium, Saturday night, to hear the Boston Symphony. The Bostonians, with Charles Munch conducting, opened the series of five visiting orchestras, which will provide all the music in the major form which we are likely to get between now and next March.

This great orchestra, this year attaining the age of three-score years and ten, has probably done the most of any to keep the American symphonic standard high. For two full generations, its visits have been lights of every season. So the hungry citizens marshalled their thousands, Saturday night, and were regaled abundantly.

It appears that Munch, the versatile Frenchman, was sagaciously chosen for his post and that he adequately meets the challenge of his illustrious predecessors. Twice we have heard him, leading this perfect organization, and in many kinds of music.

* * *

TO SIGNIFY HIS RANGE, we heard, Saturday evening, the rich, romantic and deeply harmonized D Minor Symphony of Cesar Franck, following soon upon the fragilities of Debussy, with a quotation, in between, from the similarly modern "Bacchus and Ariadne" ballet of Roussel. And there was latitude for you. Few conductors, ever, could have taken a great orchestra into the realms of great performance in these contrasting humors.

Munch spun the Debussy—it was "The Sea"—so fine that it was often sea-foam, rather than sea-surge. But Debussy was certainly doing his tone-painting in grays and pale blues. Cruel sunlight and tempest are not parts of this particular sea-scape. And this, Munch emphatically indicated. So, had we not just heard a remarkably accented "Fidelio" overture, we might have concluded that Munch was in a cloudy mood.

But then came, also full of subtlety but with vigorous stresses, a musical program of poor Ariadne, "stood up" on her rocky isle and soon consoled by the boisterous vine-god's opportune arrival. And this was pure, modern ballet, which seemed to scream for a stageful of dancers and two gifted stars.

* * *

SO THE MODERN FRENCH, exposed in every characteristic trait, made prolog to what could be called the main event; the Franck Symphony which never, in this writer's lengthening years, has failed to seem an overshadowing occurrence, whatever hand guided it or band played it.

And Munch, addressing this delightful composition, forsook all his faculty of subtlety and drove furiously through some of the lushest fields in all music. Because his brasses are so suave, there was never a smashing climax that did not combine voluminous voices and make taste apparent, too. Because his strings possess so truly the attributes of song, there was nowhere in all Franck's pages of sheer melody that the lyric principle was, however briefly, betrayed. His hand was wondrous firm; never faltering, never heavy.

One calls Munch a great conductor of this matchless orchestra; perfectly at home in a spider-web of sound, perfectly suited to whatever hallelujahs a composer might require. Not at all a prima donna, he knows his business better than most. The Boston baton has been highly held heretofore. This ardent, scholarly, dramatic-minded man is likely to equal any who have held it.

[140]

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE
OCT 25 195

Capacity Audience Hears Boston Symphony Concert

By R. A. PATTON

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra received a richly-earned ovation at the close of their program in Central high school Tuesday evening from a capacity Community Concert Association audience.

The program ended with a masterful reading of the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E Minor. While that brought insistent and vociferous applause, the listeners' accolade was awarded as well in memory of an evening of music that stirred deep emotional response as it evoked admiration for its consummate artistry.

Munch has been with the Boston organization since 1949, succeeding the tradition that is Koussevitzky. That, in a way, has put the Frenchman on the spot, a place he seems not to be bothered in occupying. Tuesday evening he essayed in the Brahms a symphony in which many persons believe Koussevitzky said the last word.

EXPRESSION OF DELIGHT

Those who heard it as projected through Munch's musical understanding heard a vital and cogent commentary on life. The message was never insistent but it was always persuasively there. The never-ending quest of the first movement, its eager questioning, beaten down but always returning—the relief from conflict by slipping into light and airy pastime in the second movement—the joyous expression of delight in life in the vigorous third and then the return to the many problems and their solution in the fourth with its triumphant finale—all were clearly and cogently set forth in Munch's reading.

The final movement, a work of daring genius built of 31 variations on a passacaglia, Munch projected with such lucidity and perfect integration that the massive force of the development was never marred by this use of form within a form.

Munch demanded and got beautiful sonority from his string sections, a singing richness that never cloyed and always seemed equal to ever mounting demands. The brasses performed with amazing suaveness and purity of tone—such perfect tone production was evident in all choirs that an almost puzzling blending was a recurring wonder. Woodwinds and brasses and the violas and 'cellos questioned and answered, bandied melodies about with skilled smoothness of tone that sometimes defie analysis.

BEAUTY OF SIMPLICITY

Munch opened the program with the Overture to Fidelio by Beethoven. He wove the intricacies o Beethoven's amazing ornamentation through his choirs with crystalline clarity, never losing the thread and sacrificing nothing o the master's beauty of simplicity Its joyous coda celebrates solution of all difficulties and Munch overlooked none of the drama or exultation.

Without imagination in an interpreter, Debussy's unconventiona intervals and strange harmonie become banal. As Munch interpreted the three orchestra sketches of "The Sea," Debussy's symphonic masterpiece, the music comes alive with movement, scudding foam from wind-harried waves forms almost lace-like patterns o harmony.

There is movement, restlessness the sense of great clashing forces now and then the deeper rumble of the surging ground swell, but over all is the pervading loveliness of a tossing sea under a cloud-flecked sky. Munch uses his strings and woodwinds with a sure touch and if he is not of the sea he must love it for no one who did not could bring to life Debussy's tone picture so perfectly.

The same was true of Roussel's Bacchus and Ariane Ballet. The conductor must have, in his mind's eye, seen the swiftly moving figures of the ballet weaving their gay and sensitive patterns over every measure of the music. I was not hard, as Munch wove his spell, to imagine the stage people with Bacchus and his followers comforting the deserted Arian and then winning her to their midst and all dancing with bac chanalian abandon.

Munch, imaginative, sensitive t each hint of melody, misses noth ing, never over-stresses and hold his orchestral choirs to as near perfect balance as men are capab of attaining. No choir is ev heard above another until it needed to be heard.

No one who was there Tuesda evening needs to be reminded th the Boston Symphony Orchest under Charles Munch is still rate as it was under Koussevitsk among the four leading orchestr of the world.

BATTLE CREEK ENQUIRER & NEWS Oct. 24, 1950

AT CELEBRATION OF COMMUNITY CONCERT ANNIVERSARY

Enquirer and News Photo

When the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night in W. K. Kellogg auditorium was ended, Conductor Charles Munch came to the lobby to receive the enthusiastic congratulations of the Battle Creek Community Concert association officers and visiting dignitaries: Pictured here are Arthur Wisner of Chicago, vice president of Community Concert Service and western division manager; Mr. Munch; Mrs. Philip J. Ross, executive secretary of the local association and field worker for the service; Ward French of New York City, president of Community Concert Service, and John Craig Allen, president of the Battle Creek association. The concert marked the 20th anniversary of the association, first of its kind in the world.

* * * * * * *

Supper Party After Boston Symphony Concert Is Part of 20th Anniversary

Celebration of the Battle Creek Community Concert association's 20th anniversary, which also marked the same anniversary of the founding of the organized concert audience movement throughout the world, did not end last night with the program of the famed Boston Symphony orchestra in W. K. Kellogg auditorium.

Afterwards the observance continued at a supper party held in the ballroom of the Hart hotel, with Conductor Charles Munch, George Judd, manager of the orchestra, Thomas Perry, assistant manager, and about 20 "first chairs" of the orchestra as guests. Others invited as guests were E. C. Nettels, first president, and Mrs. Nettels; Joseph C. Grant, second president of the association, and Mrs. Grant; Mrs. E. E. Storkan, for the first 10 years the executive secretary of the association, and Mr. Storkan; Lawrence G. Fell, a past president and director, and Mrs. Fell; Loren J. Kuehnle, first treasurer, and Mrs. Kuehnle; Roger Parkes, conductor of the Battle Creek Symphony orchestra, and Mrs. Parkes, and Dr. Pedro Paz, conductor of the Civic Symphony orchestra.

Others present were the current officers and directors: John Craig Allen, president; Paul H. Tammi, Mrs. Howard M. Preston, Floyd W. Parsons and Lowell B. Genebach, vice presidents; George F. Aldrich, treasurer; Mrs. Philip J. Ross, executive secretary, and Mrs. Frank E. Bechmann, Mrs. Horace F. Conklin, George B. Dolliver, Shelby Minter and Mrs. H. F. Smith, directors. Mr. Dolliver was the third president, Mr. Fell the fourth and Mrs. Bechmann the fifth president of the association. Mr. Allen is the sixth to serve in that office in the 20-year history.

The buffet supper was served at a table which was decorated with a centerpiece of red roses, the same bouquet which adorned the lobby during the concert at the auditorium. Other decorations were bouquets of yellow and of pink and white chrysanthemums. The guests were seated at tables for four, arranged near the buffet, and the remainder of the ballroom was set up as a lounge.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
OCT 21 1950

Showbiz in Upsurge; Hub Opera, Symph See Sold-Out Houses

BOSTON, Oct. 14.—Along with the general upsurge in entertainment business here, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New England Opera Theater are enjoying a season of full houses.

Before the Boston Symphony opened its 70th season (and second under its new permanent conductor, Charles Munch) on October 6, the four series of local concerts and all those in other cities were fully subscribed. Thus, unless some season subscribers turn back seats they occasionally cannot use, there will be no tickets on sale at the box-office thruout the season for any of the concerts.

Since the federal tax exemption bill was not passed, the trustees of the orchestra petitioned season subscribers to add 20 per cent of their ticket prices as a contribution to the orchestra to help meet the expected deficit. The response was practically unanimous.

Opera Well Set

The New England Opera Theater, of which Boris Goldovsky is artistic director, is in almost as fortunate a position as the symphony. Nearly two months before the scheduled October 29 opening, its season of four operas was more than two-thirds subscribed. Burton J. Jones Jr., of the Harvard University Press, has been appointed executive director. His efforts in selling the opera to schools, as well as subscription drive, netted the advance sale.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Excels in Concert

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN
Free Press Music and Drama Critic

Detroit's season of concerts by visiting orchestras got off to an impressive start at Masonic Temple, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra doing the honors under the direction of Charles Munch.

The appearance of this mighty musical organization in Detroit was the signal, as always, for the dusting off of the "Standing Room Only" sign.

Even the space in the orchestra pit, with a view only of the upper half of the first row of musicians, was packed.

* * *

MR. MUNCH, probably the hardest-working conductor in the concert field, gave an exciting visual display of his art. His dynamic action sets him apart in appearance from other conductors.

It is, of course, what results from direction that counts. The results of Mr. Munch's activity counted heavily. His concert was most rewarding, especially for those whose preference lies in the field of French impressionistic music.

* * *

THE PROGRAM consisted, with the exception of Beethoven's overture "Fidelio," of what is termed French music, even though its major offering was by a Belgian born composer, Cesar Franck.

Two works from the impressionistic school were consecutive on the concert. They were Debussy's tone painting "La Mer" and Roussel's ballet suite, "Bacchus and Ariane."

This provided a rather large serving of music of a similar nature, so that the key changes and thicker harmonies of the Franck D. Minor Symphony were the more welcome by contrast.

* * *

THE BOSTON musicians elicited great beauty from the transparencies of much of the Roussel and Debussy music. Under Munch's influence they have become notable creators of tone color. The more dramatic sequences of the two works were presented with fine intensity.

In the Franck symphony, one was impressed especially by the employment of tempi which served as a splendid unifying force. In a "cyclic" work such as this, integration is especially to be desired. The reading given it by Mr. Munch and his musicians was a very effective one.

[141]

Symphony's Student Tickets Available

Although most of the seats have been subscribed for five Boston Symphony rehearsals which will be opened to music students at a reasonable cost, about 600 are still available. The students of music schools and upper grade schools are eligible and should telephone Norman S. Shink, Assistant Manager at Symphony Hall.

BOSTON HERALD
OCT. 26, 1950

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
OCT 15 1950

In Music World

By Edgar S. Van Olinda

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, will make its first appearance in the Albany Metropolitan area in 26 years, Tuesday evening at 8:30 in the Field House of the Rensselaer Polytechnic institute. The full orchestra of 110 men will play a program which includes the Overture to "Fidelio," by Beethoven; Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") by Beethoven; the Cesar Franck Symphony in D-minor. Tickets are on sale at the Van Curler Music company, 110 State street, Albany.

The first attraction sponsored by the Albany Civic Music association will be the world-famous dance satirist, Iva Kitchell, at the Grand theatre Thursday night. There are no tickets available for any individual Civic Music presentation and only members may attend. Miss Kitchell's program will be selected from her repertoire of over 40 dance creations, and will include satires on many of the accepted forms, in addition to many of her own creations.

THE ALBANY Symphony orchestra, Edgar Curtis, conductor, will present the first concert of its season Sunday evening, Oct. 29, in the Playhouse at 8:30 o'clock. The guest soloist will be Lucille Cummings, member of the New York Civic Center Opera company, and heard recently on "The Telephone Hour." Miss Cummings will be heard in Brahms' "Rhapsody" for solo alto with the R. P. I. Glee club, conducted by Joel Dolven and orchestra. The balance of the program will include Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute;" Chaussen' "The Time of Lilacs;" Bizet's "Habanera," "Fantasia on a Theme" by Tallis and Beethoven's "Symphony No. 1."

William F. Dollard, son of Mr. and Mrs. William F. Dollard of Benson street has been selected president of the senior class of Boston university where he is majoring in music and studying piano with Alfredo Fondecaro. He is also president of the Newman club, treasurer of Catholic council, warden of Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia and a member of Scarlet Key, University Brotherhood council, Student Executive board. Mr. Dollard is a former piano pupil of Mrs. Alice McCullen of the Octavo School of Musical Art.

Miss Helen Henshaw will present the third in a series of lecture-recitals at the Albany Institute of History and Art tomorrow evening at 8 p. m. Her subject will be "The String Quartette." Single admission tickets will be available at the door.

BATTLE CREEK ENQUIRER & NEWS
Oct. 24, 1950

Boston Symphony

...tle Creek Will Not Soon Forget Wonderful Music ... Concert Anniversary.

...ments of dissonance, which an ...ge rendition might make pain... the sensitive ear. The violin ... work of Richard Burgin, con...master, was superb, and that of ...e first flautist, Georg Laurent, was ...azingly perfect. Two harps, ...ed by men, rather than the ...al feminine artists, added greatly ... this number, which covers many ...otions, dealing with the experi...es of the wine god and the aban...oned Ariane (Ariadne is more com...on nomenclature). Dr. Munch's di...ection was dynamic.

The second half of the program ... devoted entirely to Johannes Brahms' marvelous symphony in E ...inor (No. 4, Op. 98) and, despite ...s length and its four distinct move...ments, the time passed all too quickly. The Allegro non troppo ...vement was played quietly, with ...ome of the most exquisite plucking of the strings imaginable. Even the nine bass viols seemed as one in...trument, as did the violins and violas. The Andante moderato open...ed with some beautiful French horn passages, leading through some lace...like moments to a stately finale. The Allegro giocoso movement was off to a vigorous start, followed by the loveliest of diminuendos and then a nice swing which did not dull the appreciation of the meaty content of the movement. The Al...legro energgico e passionale intro...duced some vigorous bowing, tech...nically perfect, some alluring flute passages, and a lovely control of the brass section.

Vienna could not have attained more enjoyment, back in September, 1884, than Battle Creek experienced Monday evening. Dr. Munch was called back to the stage several times. It was not his policy to provide an encore, after this difficult and exacting program, and the audience finally sensed this fact. The usual exodus during the final number was for once not in evidence.

At intermission time both Ward French, national president of Community Concerts (New York) and Arthur Wisner, vice president (Chicago), were introduced by John Craig Allen, local president, and both spoke briefly. Mr. French was in a happy mood, as he should be in considering the growth of Community Concerts from the inception in Battle Creek in 1930-31 to the international set-up of today. He has a well-trained voice and could be heard plainly without the microphone, which he declined to use. Both he and Mr. Wisner were loudly applauded, most of those present realizing the tremendous amount of work that had to be done to create the Community Concert organization of today. It may be years before the Boston Symphony returns to Battle Creek, but it will be years, too, before those who attended its performance Monday evening will forget Dr. Munch and his musicians. Now they know that while there are many great symphony orchestras in America, there is only one Boston Symphony.—G. B. D.

Symphony Rehearsals Open to Students

Most of the tickets have been subscribed for the five Boston Symphony rehearsals which will be opened to music students at a minimum cost, according to a new plan of Charles Munch. The first student rehearsal will be given in Symphony Hall on the evening of November 9th at 7:30, and the remaining ones will be on Thursday, December 14, Wednesday, January 24, Thursday, March 1 and Thursday, April 26 at the same hour. These rehearsals follow out the original idea of the Friday afternoon concerts which were at first public rehearsals intended to enable students to hear the Orchestra.

Although most of the seats have been subscribed for the new series, about 600 are still to be had. The students of music schools and upper grade schools are eligible and should telephone Norman S. Shirk, assistant manager, at Symphony Hall.

BOSTON TRAVELER
Oct. 26, 1950

BOSTON, MASS. HERALD
OCT 22 1950

Survivor of First Symphony Welcomes Royal Philharmonic

The only living member of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra last night greeted members of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London as they arrived for their concert today at 3 o'clock in Symphony Hall.

It is the first time an English orchestra had visited Boston since 1912, and brought the total number of foreign orchestras that have come to Boston up to five. Though the most recent visit of a symphony orchestra from abroad was in 1948, the nevt previous time Bostonians heard a foreign orchestra was in 1922.

MEMORY VIVID

It was appropriate then that they should be greeted by Daniel Kuntz, who at the age of 90 still clearly remembers the first Boston Symphony concert in October, 1881, when he was "concert-master from the rear."

Kuntz recalled that the English orchestra that came here in 1912 was the London, not Royal, Philharmonic, and that it was conducted by Arthur Nikisch, then a former conductor of the Boston Symphony. Nikisch, said Kuntz yesterday, was a stern disciplinarian.

"One day I asked him if I could be excused from rehearsal the following Thursday. He asked what I was going to do. I told him that I would be married Wednesday night, and Thursday would like to be free. He thought a minute and then said 'All right, if you won't do it again.' And I kept my part of the bargain."

TRAVELED ABROAD

Though he has lived alone since his wife died 20 years ago (they had no children), Kuntz has enough memories of a rich life to keep him more than company. It was his custom to travel abroad, frequently to Heidelburg, where he was born and lived until the age of 14.

Every important festival was on his itinerary on the 12 trips to Europe he made before his retirement in 1914. That was shortly after the night when the former Boston Symphony conductor, Carl Muck, was arrested as a German alien, at the end of a gruelling 13-hour rehearsal session.

He spoke of meeting Frau Cosima Wagner and her son Siegfried, and of being shown through Richard Wagner's huge musical library at Bayreuth. At that famous opera center he played under three of the most celebrated conductors—Hans Richter, Felix Mottl and Herman Levi.

TO FIRST RANK

"It was Wilhelm Gerricke who first built the Boston orchestra up to first rank. He was the second conductor, before Nikisch, and came back for another term before Muck arrived (by permission of aKiser Wilhelm). It was in 1886 under Gerricke that the Boston Symphony first travelled. We played in old Steinway hall on 14th street in New York.

"Lately, in the past four years, I have given up playing violin. I am getting deaf." He still has a full head of close-cropped white hair atop his stocky frame, and cherishes a collection of rare old printed scores from Germany.

The other orchestras from Europe that have visited Boston, he said, were the Cociete des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris in 1918 and the La Scala Orchestra from Milan in 1906 and 1922.

BOSTON, MASS. POST
OCT 26 1950

Symphony's Student Tickets Available

Although most of the seats have been subscribed for five Boston Symphony rehearsals which will be opened to music students at a reasonable cost, about 600 are still available. The students of music schools and upper grade schools are eligible and should telephone Norman S. Shirk, Assistant Manager at Symphony Hall.

THE MICHIGAN DAILY
OCT. 26

MUSIC

Charles Munch and his Boston Symphony presented another magnificent program in Hill Auditorium last night. Differing greatly from Sunday's all-Beethoven concert, the program was varied, highly interesting and well-planned—less demanding of the audience, but perhaps even more taxing for the orchestra.

Munch's Handel, like his Beethoven, may probably be termed unorthodox; it certainly is not "pure" baroque. But in its tempos, dynamic contrasts, sweeping melodic line and healthy vigor, it was completely satisfying.

The jump from Handel to Debussy is a difficult one, but the orchestra effected it successfully, and their rendition of "La Mer" was outstanding. In Munch's hands, even Debussy is straightforward. There is less blending of elements into a diffused whole than the composer might have wished, and Munch, never a colorist, relied on rhythmic emphasis, dynamic accentuation and the skillful use of inner voices; but the over-all effect was overwhelming.

The opportunity for first-hand acquaintance with the works of Roussel is a welcome one. The "Bacchus et Adriane" ballet music was interesting, beautiful and effective; it came well after Debussy and served as a climax to it. In both French works the woodwinds and brasses upheld the fine impression made Sunday night.

If Munch's Beethoven can be questioned, his Brahms can not. The fourth symphony came as a climax not only to last night's program, but to both the Boston's appearances in Ann Arbor. This work, one of the greatest tragic symphonies since Beethoven, was read with the same heroic grandeur which characterized the Eroica. Munch approached it with simplicity and naturalness, breadth, depth and intensity. His melodic conception and interpretive perception were outstanding, and his musical understanding impeccable.

Heartfelt thanks to Mr. Munch and his men for one of the finest musical experiences of this or any season.

—Louise L. Goss

[142]

THE MICHIGAN DAILY
OCTOBER 24, 1950

MUSIC

CHARLES MUNCH conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in a program that few who sat in Hill auditorium will ever forget. His appearance here with the National French Orchestra in 1948, and the two spectacular performances with the Boston Orchestra last year had raised to high pitch an expectancy which was not disappointed.

A year ago, Munch had been working with the orchestra only a short time; his way was a new way—different, demanding and somewhat startling. The orchestra was used to Koussevitsky and loyal to him, and for everyone the adjustment must have been a difficult one. This year that adjustment is made. The Boston isn't Koussevitsky's orchestra under Munch any longer; it is Munch's orchestra, and as such may well become the greatest in the world today.

Last night's program, devoted entirely to works of Beethoven, was not only superbly executed but ideally planned. To hear the first and third symphonies, in their chronological order on the same program, is musically rewarding and historically enlightening; it is an experience which clothes the first in fresh beauty and renews awareness of the immense progressiveness and monumental significance of the third. The inclusion of the Fidelio Overture completed the balance, introducing the program with a somewhat lighter Beethoven.

The performance itself was magnificent. Munch has achieved an ideal orchestral balance; the brass and woodwind sections played magnificently, running the always peerless strings a close second. The ensemble work was impeccable and frequently had an almost chamber-music quality; there was an unusually independent significance of single instruments and choirs which only added to the effectiveness of the total ensemble, and while Munch brings out inner voices with remarkable clarity he never destroys melodic line or sacrifices a firm foundation.

The orchestra as a whole has achieved an intensity as well as beauty of tone. Though Munch does not use an infinite variety of cloristic possibilities, his coloring is always interesting, straight-forward and in good taste. The orchestra's unique quality is achieved through an uncanny exploitation of rhythmic elements and a constantly maintained dynamic interest. The dynamic level is subtlely planned and has structural significance, and there is always perfect balance between stress and rest, crescendo and decrescendo, etc. Munch's tempos, which were a matter of some discussion last year, were less startling and more leisurely paced. His phrasing is fresh and original, full of small interest which does not destroy the broad line.

